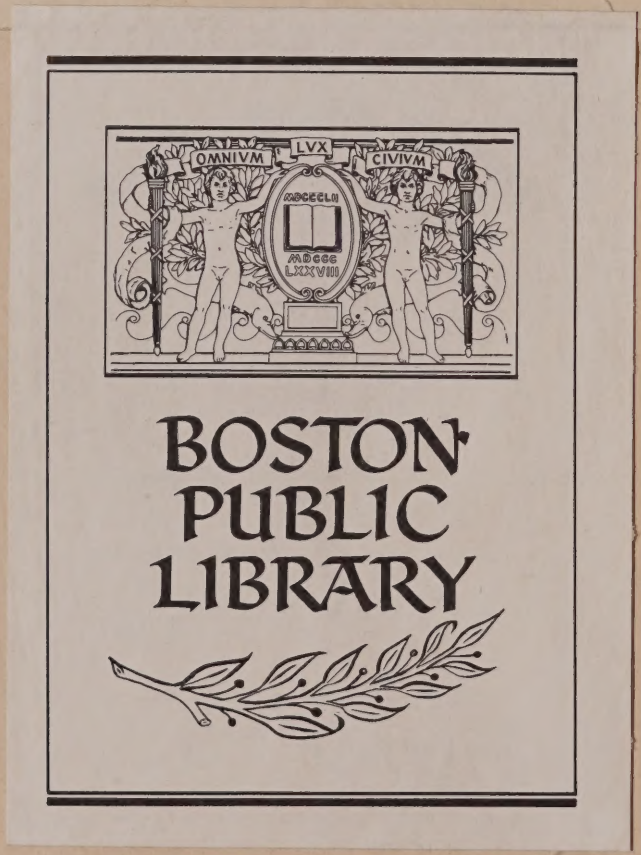
Boston Public Library
3 9999 10588 649 1

PRESENTED TO

THE MALDEN PUBLIC LIBRARY,

BY E. F. BICKFORD.

Malden, Oct. 1st, 1885.



The Nation:

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

DEVOTED TO

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

VOLUME IX.

FROM JULY 1 TO DECEMBER 31, 1869.

NEW YORK:
E. L. GODKIN & CO., PUBLISHERS.
1869.

Periodical
AP2
.N2

INDEX TO VOLUME IX. 10599

JULY TO DECEMBER, 1869.

The Week.

AT HOME.

Ashtabula Sentinel on Chinese immigration, 143—Avondale mine catastrophe, 222—Gov. Ashley mounts white man's platform, 282, removed, 553—Judge Allison's decision in Philadelphia contested election cases, 377—Alabama negotiations on the tapis, 525, correspondence, 577.

Borie, Mr. Adolphe, resigns War-Secretaryship, 1—Marshal Barlow in disfavor with Republican politicians, 21, resigns, 378—Elihu Burritt displaced from Birmingham consulship, 41—Gen. Frank Blair at Long Branch army dinner, 42—Secretary Boutwell's letter to Gen. Stokes, 101, financial statement for August, 101, September, 282, October, 378, interference in Tennessee and Texas election, 354, annual report, 498—Mr. John Bigelow, editor of N. Y. Times, 103—Judge Bond and Maryland Republicans, 162—Mr. August Belmont displeasing to Irish Democrats, 181, 221, 241—Miss Catharine Beecher to the public press, 182—Parson Brownlow on Tenn. election, 202—Byron scandal the public topic, 202—Gen. Butler reviews Mrs. Stowe, 202, agricultural address, 263, connection with Jonas French, distiller, 427, amnesty controversy with Mr. Greeley, 555—Messrs. Brewster's experiment in industrial partnership, 306—Gen. Belknap appointed Secretary of War, 330—Gen. Butterfield resigns, 354, requests court martial, 378, not brought to trial, 402, succeeded by Senator Folger, 425—Atty.-Gen. B. H. Brewster superseded by his brother, 377—Deputy-Collector Blatchford resigns, 450—Mr. Beecher's defence of his action in the Richardson marriage charge against McFarland, 499—Burlingame commission, 578.

Chief Justice Chase's decisions ascribed to political motives, 2—Chinese representations to Committee of Ways and Means, 22, Coolie contractors before agricultural convention at Memphis, 61, Chinese society described by Count de Rochechouart, Chinese immigration as viewed by Ashtabula Sentinel, 143, Chinese Mission unfulfilled, 223, Chinaman as a servant, 283—Clarendon-Johnson negotiations made public, 22—Gov. Claflin a railroad director, 42—Charleston riot, 101—Curtis-Churchill nose-pulling case, 163, 181, 222, Commonwealth upon it, 182, Mr. Curtis at large, 355—Gen. Canby interviewed, 181—California election, 201—Cuban Junta subscribe to Rawlins fund, 222—Corbin-Fiske scandal, 281—Mr. G. W. Curtis declines State nomination, 282—Chicago municipal reform movement, 282, victorious, 377, 401—Constitutional disabilities of color in N. Y., 354—Senator Casserly on cheap labor, 378—Clinical victims, 426—Cleveland Woman's Rights Convention, 499—U. S. Circuit Judgeship nominations, 554—Cable diplomacy, 578.

Congress (XLIst, 2d session):—Opens; Trumbull's bill against Congressional endorsement of office-seekers, Sumner's bill to increase national bank circulation (Senate), Butler's bill to repeal Tenure-of-Office Act, bill to make neutralization uniform (House), 497—Bills to raise salaries of Supreme Court; to define jurisdiction of same in political questions; and as to acts of Congress (Drake's); to retire judges of same; Wilson's bill to regulate importation of foreigners (Senate), Ninth census, Ingersoll's bill to inflate currency (House), Cuba, Georgia, the late Senator Fessenden (both Houses), 525—Carpenter-Sumner debate on the release of the Spanish gunboats, Morrill against the eight hour law, Schurz's bill to reform Civil Service (Senate), Repudiation repudiated, Census bill passed (House), Senate Georgia reconstruction bill passed (both Houses), 553—Adjourns for holidays, 577.

Dent, Judge, and Gen. Alcorn stumping Mississippi, 305—Mr. W. H. Dall, on Alaska, 330—"Drawback frauds," 425, 450—Dominion of Canada in trouble, 450—Dominican annexation, 474—Mr. Drake's bill to prohibit Supreme Court deciding on acts of Congress, 526—Del. State Journal makes Editor of Nation a Government office-holder, 527.

Erie-Susquehanna civil war, 122, 142.

Financial success of Grant's Administration, 1—French Cable and U. S. Government, 61, 102, landed at Duxbury, celebration, 82—Fifteenth Amendment's prospects, 201—Senator Fessenden's illness and death, 202, 222, post-mortem eulogists in Congress, 554—Isaac V. Fowler deceased, 282.

Georgia, election outrage in Barnwell District, 81, Gen. Terry's report on Georgia, 525, Georgia Reconstruction Bill and its defenders, 553—Collector Grinnell's experience in appointments, 121—Grant's attitude towards Miss. and Va. politics, 141, letter to Mr. Bonner on gold conspiracy, 330, message: as to Georgia, specie payments, Cuba, 497; Alabama question, Civil Service, 498, 525—Gold Gambling in Wall st., 261, investigated by Grand Jury, 354—Horace Greeley accepts nomination for Comptroller, 305, free-trade debate with Mr. Perry, 306, defeated at polls, 377, 401, supported by Sun, 378.

Hale-Perry scandal in its last stage, 63—Harvard beats Yale at Worcester regatta, chances with Oxford, 82, 122, 161, defeat, 182, Tom Hughes's account, 221, Chas. Reade's, 222—Maj. Haggerty refused his exequatur at Glasgow, 122—Gov. Hoffman's interference in Erie-Susquehanna War, 142, reply to the Prison Association, 183, agricultural address, 263—Senator Howard accused by Tribune, 182—Atty.-Gen. Hoar's opinion of test-oath in Va. legislature, 201, nominated to Supreme Court, 554—Humboldt centenary, 242—Capt. Hall's researches after Sir John Franklin, 283—Hornet libelled, Higgins surrenders, 330—Father Hyacinthe's arrival in American, 331, previous career, 402, avoids visitors, 355—Gov. Holden on N. C. bonds, 378.

Indians on the Reservations, 102—Indianapolis Journal on Indiana divorce laws, 526, Indiana ashamed of them, 554.

Jackson, Mr., and his tenure of office in Treasury, 43—Johnson's prospects for Tenn. Senatorship, 262, defeat, his career as repudiator, 355—Jenckes's bill favored by Government clerks, 330—Judiciary Clause of new N. Y. State Constitution adopted, 449.

Kapp, Mr. F., under a political accusation, 378—Kings Co. Ring and election frauds, 425—Amos Kendall deceased, 425, 474—Edgar Ketchum released, 427.

Labor Convention at S. Framingham, Mass., 23, at Philadelphia, 142, 162.

Mormonism vs. Pacific R. R. and the miners, 3—Mass. legislative corruption, 3, liquor troubles, 62, 102, Republican convention, 261, election, 377, a license Legislature, 401, cannot negotiate a small loan in Europe, 402—Mariposa Co.'s victims, 42—Mackay-Clark strife over Charleston collectorship, 81—Judge McCunn's controversy with Marshal Bigelow, 142—Maine election, 221—Methodist Book Concern frauds, 241, report on them, 450—Minnesota election, 377—Mississippi election, 473—Morning Post (Phila.) and Collector Moore, 473—Mrs. McFarland's mode of obtaining her divorce, subscriptions to Mr. McFarland's defence, 526—Hon. Mr. Mungen advocates repudiation, 553.

N. Y. Custom-house and Retrenchment Committee, 181, "drawback frauds," 425, 450—N. Y. politics, 262, 282, 305, 329, election, 377, 401—N. C. disorders, 353, 378—Nation to be merged in N. Y. Leader, 450—New England dinner, 578.

Ohio Democracy nominate Gen. Rosecrans for Governor, 41, 141—Ohio election prospects, 201, 282, carried by Republicans, 305, 329—Oneida Community and Internal Revenue, 578.

Penn. politics, 41, 61, 201, good Democratic nominations in Phila., 221, 241, Phila. address in favor of Civil Service Bill, 42, Asa Packer Democratic candidate for Governor, 61, address of Republican State Committee, 262, 263, State carried by Republicans, 305, 329, judiciary, 377—Phila. medical students insult women at lectures, 426—Mrs. C. S. Peirce inaugurates co-operative housekeeping, 42—Pratt case before Judge McCunn, 142—Mr. Pendleton accepts Ohio nomination for Governor, 162, speech on state of the country, 221—Col. Powell's exploration of the Colorado, 283—Ex-President Pierce deceased, 306—Perry-Greeley free-trade debate, 306.

Robeson, Hon. Geo. M., succeeds Mr. Borie as Secretary of War, 1—Gen. Rosecrans nominated Governor by Ohio Democracy, 41, declines, 121, letter to Democratic party, 181—Republican Central Committee formed to supplant the "gangs" in N. Y. City, 121, union of the "gangs," 241—Removal of National Capital, 183—Secretary Rawlins deceased, 202—Gen. Reynolds's report on Texas politics, 262—Red River rebellion, 450, 474, 578—Mr. A. D. Richardson assassinated, 474.

Sickles, Gen. Dan E., farewell reception as Minister to Spain, 1, instructions, 102—Southern States, political condition, 2, 82, 101, 121, 353, 377, 378, crops, 82, 101—Mr. A. H. Stephens on Georgian affairs, 21—Sing Sing prison horrors, 83—Gov. Senter the only man left in his party, 161—Stokes's interview with Herald reporter, 161—Springfield Republican and Sumner-Bright correspondence, 202—Senator Sumner's speech at Worcester convention, 262—Mr. Seward's opinion of Alaska, 330—Shipping interests and the tariff, 331—Bishop Simpson shut out of M. E. church in Atlanta, 353—Supreme Court, decision on contracts in Confederate money, 378, interfered with by Congress, 402—Sun's effort to elect Greeley, 378—Rear-Admiral Stewart deceased, 426—Specie payments in prospect, 449—South Carolina favors belligerent rights for Cuba, 473—Hon. E. M. Stanton succeeds Grier as Judge of Supreme Court, 554; decease, 577—Mr. Schenck assails Mr. Peabody, 578.

Tennessee, amenities of Stokes-Senter canvass, 22, election prospects, 101, carried by Senter, 121, address of Stokes faction, 201, letter of Parson Brownlow, 202, senatorship, 141, legislature and the XVth amendment, 181, 201, rejects it. 473, repealing everything, 305, Johnson's prospects, 262. 305, Cooper chosen U. S. Senator over Johnson, 353. his election contested, 377, 401—N. Y. Times on superior value of great States, 123, reports triple alliance (Russia, Austria, France), 427, 475, 527—Mr. Tweed's seventeen offices, 262—Texas, Gen. Reynold's report, 262, election, 473—Gen. Thomas on Alaska, 330—Tribune's London correspondent's falsehoods concerning Nation, 354, mistakes Lord Howe, 475—Gen. Terry's report on Georgia, 525, remedy, 526—Tribune on war between Turkey and Egypt, 579.

Usury before the N. Y. Grand Jury, 63, usurers sent to jail, 123.

Virginia election in Walker's favor, 21, 41, 61, statistics, 162, Wells party rebuffed from reconciliation, 121, legislature and test-oath, 241, ratifies XIVth and XVth Amendments, 305, chooses U. S. Senators, 329, 353, Republicans divided, 473—Vermont election carried by Republicans, 201.

World's defence of Gen. Blair at Long Branch, 42—Senator Wilson on senatorial corruptibility, 102—Robert J. Walker and Maj. Gen. Wool deceased, 426—Woman's Parliament on the Richardson affair, 499, reorganized, 555—Mr. Wells's annual report, 554.

Yerger case before Supreme Court, 62, jurisdiction affirmed, 354—Hon. Geo. H. Yeaman's nomination for U. S. Circuit Judge withdrawn, 554.

ABROAD.

Great Britain:—Irish Church Bill amended by the Lords, 3, 23, 43, final loss of Lords' political influence, 23, House rejects Lords' amendments, 63, bill passed by compromise, 82; Agitation of land tenure in Ireland, Land Tenure Reform League in England, Episcopal clergy in Ireland waking up to situation, 203; Irish prelates denounce mixed, sectarian schools, sudden activity of disestablished church, progress of land reform movement, 242, 379, land question uppermost, disestablishment proposed for Wales, 283; Mr. Gladstone declines pardoning Fenians, 379—Central Asian question becoming important, 23, debate in House on it, 103—Daily News and Pall Mall Gazette as penny papers, 23—Bill to assume monopoly of telegraphs, 82—Petition for woman suffrage, 82, meeting in London, 103—Mr. Fitzjames Stephen goes to India, 103, Mr. Grant Duff on East Indian budget, 203—Anti-capital-punishment cause defeated in House, statistics, 123—Duke of Edinburgh's cheap liberality to Australians, 163—Protectionist movement, 223, 283, Mr. Bright on protectionists, 263, Mr. Ashworth's free-trade figures, 283, 475, "Revivers of British Industry," 403, depressed state of cotton manufactures, 242, clerks complain of low wages, 379—Excitement over Gen. Sickles's note to Spanish Government, 242—Times on state of religion in Germany, 242—Earl Derby deceased, 355—Mr. Gladstone's appointments to bishoprics, unpopularity of Ritualists with workingmen, 355—Mr. Bright not a contributor to late London Star, 379.

India:—Female normal school at Poona, 223.

France:—Emperor's speeches and letters, 3, concedes legislative autonomy and responsible ministry, 43, appoints ministry without Liberals, 63, message of concession, 103, illness, return of Empress, panic on Bourse, 203, 223, malady described by Tribune correspondent, 307, 403, brutally treated by the press, 403, speech at opening of Chambers, 475, poor effect, health improving, 555, Empress at the East, 355—Rochefort fined, 3, returns to Paris, 403, one of the "non-jurors," 451—Case of the Rappel and its printer, 3, ferocious freedom of press, 307, 403—Success of French Cable, 3—French understanding with Austria in 1866, 63—Meeting for civil rights of women, 83—Liberals protest against prorogation, 83—New Ministry, 103—Senate deliberates on message, 123, senatus consultum as adopted, 223, Prince Napoleon's speech on it, 243—Government yielding anticipated by action of tiers parti, 123, motives for reform, new powers of Lower Chamber, 143—Father Hyacinthe's defection, 263, rebuked by Bishop of Orleans; on his way to U. S., 307—Count Montalembert dissatisfied with Œcumenical Council, 263—M. de Kératry on Emperor's delay in convening Lower Chamber: hostility of educated classes to every régime; Gen. Fleury sent to St. Petersburg, 307—Liberals will not convene on constitutional day, Simon and Favre allied with the Reds, 331, no disturbance, Oct. 26, 379—Pantin murder, 355—Sainte Beuve's private papers obtained by Government, 451—M. Pouyer-Quertier and the French protectionists, 451, 527—Opening of Chambers, reaction against radicalism, 475, address and programme of the Left, Ollivier a possible premier, 499, Jules Favre's interpellations, and bill to secure constituent power for Corps Législatif, 555—Ollivier to form a ministry, end of personal government, 579.

Holland:—Liberal triumph on question of public education, 23.

Germany:—Prince Hohenlohe's circular on the Œcumenical Council, 43—Temporary retirement of Bismarck; Bavarian reform of marriage laws, 83.

Austria:—Dualism working badly, 123—Cordial relations with Prussia; internal difficulties 427—Insurrection in Dalamatia, 451—Bohemian and Galician aspirations, 527.

Italy:—Popular disturbances in the North, last work of the Parliament, 3—The Pope's good humor over approaching Council, 307—Victor Emanuel dangerously ill; disordered finances, 403—Fall of Menabrea Cabinet, 579.

Prussia:—Alarm at Prussian naval development, 123—Statistics of population, 143.

Turkey:—Sultan's reprimand of the Khedive of Egypt, 243, menacing attitude toward him, 555.

Egypt:—Opening of the Suez Canal, competition with railroads, 427, doubtful success, 579.

Spain:—Carlist insurrections, 83, 163, connivance of clergy, 123—General uneasiness, disaffection in army, 163—Republican risings, 305, at an end, 331—Montpensier likely to be King, 103, Duke of Genoa's candidacy, 307, 379, 451, 579—Gen. Sickles received by Serrano, 103, drives a pony phaeton in royal gardens, 163, note to Spanish Government, 242, unpopularity of Americans, 283—Refusal to negotiate for sale of Cuba, 183—Bad state of finances, 451—Porto Rican deputies admitted to Cortes, 526.

Cuba:—Arrival of Rodas; spread of yellow fever, 3—Expedition from N. Y. broken up by Marshal Barlow, 3, 21, descent on Gardiner's Island and the Hackensack, affairs at Fort Lafayette, 62—U. S. mediation in behalf of Cuba, 62—Barbarities on both sides, 81—Proposed redemption of the island, 102, 163, Spaniards losing ground, 162—Surveillance of Spanish gunboats in N. Y., 281, seizure, 451, no case against them, 473, departure, 554—Hornet detained at Wilmington, 281—Cuban claims to belligerency; American volunteers in Cuba dissatisfied, 281—Native Spanish loyal address, 331—Cubans in N. Y. urged by Tribune to take the field, 355—Cuban stock declines after President's message, 498—M. André Cochut on Cuba's grievances, 526—Diplomatic correspondence, 577—Administration changes its mind, 578.

Literary Notes.

Announcements, 29, 70, 91, 108, 130, 150, 171, 191, 210, 229, 250, 270, 294, 315, 339, 361, 387, 410, 435, 459, 506, 535—Alsop's Character of Maryland, 483—Arnold, Matthew, on St. Paul, in Cornhill Magazine, 411—Amherst College, Dr. Nathan Allen on physical culture at, 29—Arundel Society's publications, 91—American Literary Bureau, 110—American Institute of Architects, papers, 388—American Sovereign, 230—Anglo-American Times, 109—Academy, 295, 339, 362—Ave Maria's premium masses, 484.

Byron controversy, 251, 252, 271, 362, 388, 436; Byron advertised by Mrs. Stowe, 171; Byron, Burns, and Scott in the market, 295—Braun carbon-photographic series, 562—Bloor, Mr. A. J., essay on Architectural and Art Societies, 460—Burnand, F. C., comic works and plays, 362—Bastian's "Reisen im Indischen Archipel," 252—Baldwin's "Pre-historic Nations" and some Semitic names, 51—Björnstjerne Björnson to visit America, 538—Boston lecture course, 1869-'70, 270; Public Library gathering library statistics, 50, special collections, 411—Bible, American version of the, 70; in schools, 361—Bhagavad-Gita translated into German by Dr. Lorinser, 112—Blackwood on lost preterites, 316—Brooklyn Mercantile Library, 586.

Creasy's and Mommsen's views of the origin of nobility, 507—Chasles, Michel, admits imposition, 317, names impostor, 340—Cleasby's Icelandic-English Dictionary, 507—Conway, M.D., on the international boat-race, 387—Col. Geo. R. Clarke's Campaign in the Illinois, 11—Chaucer Society's publications, 563—Cincinnati public schools deprived of the Bible, 387—Chinese co-operative societies, 435—"Christian Life Insurance Co.," 192—Christian Union on Methuselah, 536—Church Union, 230—College papers, 295—College Review, 192, Curtis, Mr. G. W., not a contributor to it, 212—Concord Sketches, 586.

Dana-Lawrence controversy decided, 270, 539—Deutsch, E., on Islam in the Quarterly Review, 412—De Gubernatis on marriage-usages in Italy, 152—D'Épinay, Mme., memoirs, 296—Dramatic Unions in France, 92.

English works—Theology, 50, 71, 131, 171, 213, 252; fiction, 51, 71, 130, 252; miscellaneous, 51, 71, 212, 252; poetry, 51, 130, 172, 212, 252; history and biography, 172, 252—English ignorance of America, 213—East Indian Archipelago, works on, 252—Ethnological Society's Journal for April, 1869, 12—Every Saturday, 585.

Fiske, Mr. John, lectures on Positivism, 484—Forcade, Eugène, recovery from insanity, 152—French Academy list, 193—French school libraries, 231.

Gordon, Lady Duff, deceased, 111—Goodridge, Miss M. R., on the marking system in schools, 109—Gage's map of Palestine, 536, 562—Goddard, Mr. S. A., letters on the rebellion, 108—Grosart, Mr. A. B., Elizabethan reprints, 111—Goethe and Mme. Willemer, 172—Grants under the Great Council for New England, 31—Greek pre-historic remains, 173—Gynæcological Society's Journal, 251—Gaiety Journal, 316—Graphic, The, 585.

Herschel, Sir John, the late Jas. Grahame, and the Saturday Review, 411—Hazlitt-Bohn controversy, 484—Halleck, Fitz-Greene, monument dedicated to, 49—Hildesheim ware on exhibition, 562—Harvard College lectureships, 50, 91, 586; Divinity School, 151; losses in war, 295; Advocate, 11—Historical Magazine on Prof. Washburn, 11, on President Lincoln's disunion proclamation, 459—Historical works in Germany, 563—Historical MSS. Commission (England), 507.

Italian libraries to be re-organized, 296—Iron Mask, The Man of the, discovered, 71—Index, The, 483, 506.

James, Col. Sir Henry, fac-similes of national MSS., 340—Jerdan, Wm., deceased, 111—Jenckes's Civil Service bill in the Bulletin de la Société de Législation Comparée, 31.

King's College, Bristol, Va., 460—Kaleidoscope, 109.

Libri, Guglielmo, career and death, 460—Livingstone, Dr., heard from near Lake Tanganyika, 460—Lea, Mr. H. C., new work on Church History, 270—Land-question essays, 231—Long Island Historical Society, 586, and the Palestine Exploring Fund, 50—London Ethnological Society's meetings, 151—Living Church, 10—Little Corporal's School Festival, 483.

Martin, Henri, errors of translation, 296—Macmillan & Co. in New York, 192—Molière's library, 71—Mommsen to Bancroft, 230—Massachusetts population statistics, 29; Board of Health, 294—Memphis newspapers, 192.

Newton, Prof. A., on cuckoos' eggs, 537—"Nasby," supposed a real existence, 30—Norwegian literature redivivus, 412—Naming of U. S. States and Territories, 171—New Englander, 130—Nature, 339, 536—National Intelligencer's death and history, 50—News Letter, 484—Neue Zeit, 295.

Oxford slang, 435—Old English reprints, 340—Old and New, 483, 506.

Poor, Hon. J. A., argument for transcontinental railway, 562—Podiebrad's projected Christian confederation, 92—Prévost-Paradol's Edinburgh lecture, 588—Peabody, Francis, and the Salem Lyceum, 110—Pope and the Council, the, 412—Pasquinade on the Pope, 340—Pusey, Dr., on Dr. Temple's heresy, 435—Pennsylvania, education in, 459; Philadelphia Library Co. and the Rush bequest, 70; Philadelphia libraries, 506—Philadelphia Photographer, 230—Peabody Academy of Science, First Annual Report, 110—Public Parks, 535—Philological Convention at Poughkeepsie, 109—Palatine excavations, 338—Patent Question in Europe, 562—Paralysis in fiction, 295—Pseudonyms, bibliography of, 508—Prison Discipline Congress proposed, 151—Pall Mall Gazette on Loring interview, 387—Punch for sale, 131—Psychological Journal on Rochester knockings, 151—Packard's Guide to the Study of Insects, 586.

Quérard's Supercheries Littéraires Dévoilées, 508—Quarterly Review on Byron controversy, 388.
Reade, Chas., on copyright and autographs, 70—Ruggles, Hon. S. B., report on cereals, 561—Russian bibliographical catalogue, 173—Reporter's style, 250, 270—Revue Celtique, 231, 316—Round Table merged in the Citizen, 29, 50.
Stowe, Mrs., a card from, 316—Southey on Portuguese mode of damping linen, 537—Stedman, Mr. E. C., not a poor poet, 231—Schermerhorn's Reader, 483—Surgeon-General's Circular No. 2, 229—Swarthmore College, 459—Slang of thieves in France, 31—Social Science Association's N. Y. meeting, 270.
Tappan, Mr. Lewis, on the "good old times" in Massachusetts, 30—Tennyson's "Vision of Sin," 435—Thompson, Gen. T. Perronet, deceased, 270—Trenton Educational Convention, 171—Thanksgiving Day observances, 388—Translations, commercial value of, 70—Tribune on Œcumenical Council, 536.
University of the State of N. Y., convocation, 130.
Vickers, Rev. T., on the Bible in schools, 387.
Wagner on Judaism in music, 271—Woodbury photographic process, 230—Woolsey, President, on Mr. Sumner, 130—Worman's Complete Grammar, 11; Worman and the educational journals, 361.
Zeitschrift für Bildende Kunst, 230.

Editorial and Miscellaneous Articles.

Administration and Southern Politics, The, - - - - - - 104
"Alabama" Case Again, - - - 580
Art Study in the Imperial School at Paris, - - - - - - 67
Bar and the Judges, - - - - 529
Barbarian, Coming of the, - - - 44
Bible in the Schools, - - - - 480
Boat-Race, The, - - - - - 187
Bohemian Question, - - - - 246
Boutwell, Mr., as Secretary, - - 5
Bribery, Prevention of, - - - - 105
Byron Horror, The, - - - - - 167
Was it a Mystification? - - 189
Supposing it to be True, - - 208
Catholic Lesson for Protestants, - 530
Children, Rights of, - - - - - 503
China, The new Turn of Affairs in, - 184
Chinese Question, - - - - - 205
More Light on the, - - - - 309
Church and State, A Word more about, - - - - - - - 146
Clergy and the Courts, - - - - 124
Congress and the Civil Service, - - 64
Contrast worth Notice, - - - - 407
Cotton still King, - - - - - 356
Cuba, Our Supposed Sympathy with, - 24
Cuban Case, The, - - - - - 264
Democratic Platform, The, - - - 184
Economical Discussion, Difficulties of, 65
Elections, Results of the, - - - 332
England and her Influential Colonists, 245
European Radicals, - - - - - 405
Fall Prospects, - - - - - - 225
Female Agitators, A Hint to our, - 479
Field for the Humane, - - - - 265
Financial Advertisements, - - - 186
Financial Relations with Foreign Countries, Our, - - - - - 124
France, Prospect in, - - - - - 145
Tariff in, - - - - - - - 428
Germans in Politics, - - - - - 332
Gold Bubble, - - - - - - - 285
Gold Room, - - - - - - - 284
Grant, Alleged Dissatisfaction with, 224
Harvard, New Régime at, - - - - 408
Hoar, Judge, was not Confirmed, Why, 582
Hyacinthe, Father, as an Orator, - 532
Income Tax Ought to be Collected, The Way the, - - - - - 452
Ought not to be Collected, The Way the, - - - - - 453
Individual Man, A Plea for the,—His Drink, - - - - - - 165
His Food and Clothing, - - 166
Insults, A Few Remarks on, - - 148
Ireland, Situation in, - - - - 557
Irish Land Question, - - - - 266
Jefferson in "Rip Van Winkle," - - 247
Journalists, Education for, - - - 311
Judicial Corruption, Proposed Remedy for. - - - - - - - 380
Labor Reform Means, What, - - - 453
Legal Tenders, Future of, - - - 500
Lobby, Existence of the, - - - - 64
"Main Question," The, - - - - 308
Manual Labor, - - - - - - - 226
Massachusetts, "Progress" in, - - 501
Methods of Agitation, - - - - 381
Minority Representation in Illinois, - 556
Morals of the Future, - - - - 45
"National Game," Philosophy of the, 167
Nichols, Nichols, - - - - - 310
Œcumenical Council, - - - - 287
Œcumenical Council and the Protestants, - - - - - - - 476
Why it was called, and What it may do, - - - - - - 581
Opinion-Moulding, - - - - - 126
Our Great Cities, - - - - - 404
"Pennsylvania Dutch," - - - - 583
Prison Discipline, - - - - - 206
Prohibition, Future of, - - - - 429
Protection, Origin of, - - - - 333
Public Service, Illustrations of our, - 85
Railroads again, - - - - - - 6
Reconstruction, Going Back in, - - 476
Republican Committees of N. Y. City Unite? Shall the, - - - - 84
Republican Minority, - - - - 204
Republican Party, The Next Work for the, - - - - - - - 144
Richardson Tragedy, - - - - - 502
Ring in the West, The, - - - - 358
"Ripe Scholar," Tale of the, - - - 558
Royal Pretenders, - - - - - 207
Sainte-Beuve, - - - - - - - 359
Self-made Men as Public Benefactors, 406
Sickles, Testimonial, - - - - - 24
Social Distinctions from Bridget's Standpoint, - - - - - - 106
Social Science Meeting, - - - - 381
South, Industrial Condition of the, - 164
Southern Boy, Advent of the, - - 4
Specie Payments, Resumption of, - - 528
Speculators, Defences of Society against the, - - - - - - 244
Sumner, Mr., and the Alabama Treaty, - - - - - - - 248
Trenton Convention, Work for the, - 66
Trumbull's Supreme Court Bill, - - 556
United States Judges, New, - - - 477
Usurers, Recent Attack on the, - - 104
Usurers in Court, - - - - - 147
Vanderbilt Memorial, - - - - 431
Virginia Election, - - - - - 44
Wages in the Public Service, - - 26
"Woman's Parliament," - - - 336
Workingmen's Ideal Society, - - 226
Yerger, Case of Col., - - - - 86

Occasional Correspondence

Anti-slavery Reminiscences, - - 228
Benson, Carl, Two Mistranslations by, 228
Byron, Lord, Mistranslation by, - - 190
Byron's Mystifications, - - - - 210
Capital, Against Removing the, - - 228
China, - - - - - - - - - 361
China, Another American View of, - 89
China Merchants, - - - - 210, 227
Chinese Immigration, - - - - 28
Civil Service Bill, What Our Congressman says of the, - - - - 69
Civil Service has Run Down, Why the, 49
Cookery and the Suffrage, - - - 458
Cricket, A Word for, - - - - - 190
Currency? Who is Responsible for the Inconvertible, - - - - - 292
Dartmouth, Gymnastics at, - - - 108
Diez, A., Two Blunders by, - - - 293
Misemendation by, - - - - 294
Diplomatic Service in the Levant, Our, - - - - - - - 290
Germans, Religion among the Americanized, - - - - - - 292
Harvard University Lectures, - 108, 189
Harvard "Rah," - - - - 210, 227
Humboldt no Atheist, - - - - - 250
James, Mr., and the Swedenborgians, - - - - 458, 482, 505, 534
Lea, Mr. H. C., and the Quarterly Review, - - - - - - - 457
Lobby and Lobbying, The, - - - 108
"Manual Labor" again, - - - 269, 293
A Manual Laborer on, - - - 337
Massachusetts Legislature, Corruption in the, - - - - - - 10
Mulford, Mr. E., - - - - - - 483
Peabody Southern School Fund, Effect of, - - - - - - - 458
Pennsylvania School Expenses, - - 505
Philological Convention, - - - 129
Presbyterian Church and the Anti-slavery Men, - - - - - - 410
Prizes, Burning of, - - - - - - 9
"Revolution" and its Conductors, - 386
Secretary of the Treasury and the Chairman of the "Ways and Means," - - - - - - 338
Sex, Influence of, on Character, - 149
Spanish Asonante, - - - - - 315
Universalism, - - - - - - - 291
Varro, St. Augustine, and Mr. Lecky, 91
Wainwright's Pamphlet on Julius Cæsar, - - - - - - - 292
Woman's Cause, Advocates of the, 434
Woman's Comments on the McFarland Case, A, - - - - - 535
Woman's Parliament, - - - - 434
Woman's Work, - - - - - - 561
Women and Religion, - - - - - 170
Worman, Mr., and his "Endorsers," 69

Special Correspondence.

Boston—Present Condition of the Massachusetts Tippler, - - 127
A Political Phenomenon, - 289
Washington—Men and Things in, - 454
A Peep into the Cabinet Windows, - - - 531
England—47, 87, 168, 312, 383, 432.
Prospects of the Peers, - 7
Land Question, Protection, Emigration, - - - 335
Colonial Empire, Emigration, - - - - - 504
Twelve Days' Mission, - 560
France—128, 168, 359.
Emperor in the Crisis, - - 27
Emperor's Hesitancy, - - 88
Amnesty, Government Encouragement of Art, - - 209
Professional Schools for Women, - - - - - 249
The Church in, - - - - 288
Emperor's Successors, - - 409
Beaumont Duels, - - - - 433
"Seeing French Society," - 480
Bishop Dupanloup and M. Veuillot, - - - - 533
The New Ministry, The Theatre, - - - - - - 584
Italy—Right and Wrong in, - - - 48
Social Equality in, - - - 267
Condition of Women in, - 456, 480
Switzerland—International Congress of Peace and Liberty, 313, 336
Russia—Russian Universities, - - 384

Literature.

Across America and Asia, - - - 564
Adirondacks, Two Books on the, - 53
Anti-slavery Conflict, - - - - 343
Audubon, Life of, - - - - - 13
Birds of the United States, Our own, 213
Chicago, Landscape Architecture in, 132
Children's Books, - - - 540, 563, 587
Democratic Diplomatist, A, - - - 390
Elinor, My Daughter, - - - - - 298
English Doctrine of Ideas, - - - 461
Freeman's Norman Conquest, - - 31
Freeze's Tour through Palestine and Syria, - - - - - - - 32
French Literature, Current, 14, 132, 214, 365, 485
Gladstone's Juventus Mundi, - - - 254
Hindu Traveller in India, - - - 52
Holiday Books, Illustrated, - - 538, 567
Homeric Studies, - - - - - 416
Hopkins, President, on the Woman Question, - - - - - - 193
James's Secret of Swedenborg, - - 436
Lee's Biography of his Father, - - 512
Librarian on Free Libraries, A, - - 233
Linguistics, A Bad Book in, - - - 414
Lippitt on Field Service, - - - 566
Literary Veteran, - - - - - - 153
Lord's Ancient History, - - - 565
Magazines for August, - - - - 94
September, - - - 174
October, - - - 273
November, - - - 362
December, - - - 462
January, 1870, - - 588
Man Who Laughs, The, - - - 509
Maryland, A London Apprentice in, 508
Mill's, Mr., Plea for Women, - - 72
New Testament Translators, - - 53
New West, - - - - - - - 33
North American Review for July, - 115
October, 415
Old Testament Commentaries, Semi-Critical, - - - - - - 284
Osborn's Metallurgy of Iron and Steel, - - - - - - - 511
Parker, Prof. Joel, on Politics, - 113
Parkman's Discovery of the Great West, - - - - - - - 389
Planchette, A Clergyman on, - - - 298
Pollard's Secret History of the Confederacy, - - - - - - 340
Ranke's Wallenstein, - - - - - 296
Recent Republications, 35, 54, 74, 367, 513
Reminiscences of an American Octogenarian, - - - - - - 253
Renan's "St. Paul," - - - - - 92
Robertson's and Brooke's Sermons, 412
Robinson, Henry Crabb, Diary of, - 231
Roman History, Another Popular, - 319
Roscoe's Spectrum Analysis, - - 73
Russian Exile on Russia, A, - - - 271
Thomassen's Unveilings of Primeval History, - - - - - - 73
Two American Poets, - - - - - 391
Villa on the Rhine, - - - - - 12
Viollet-le-Duc's French Mediæval Architecture, - - - - - - 134, 173
Wallace's Malay Archipelago, - - 317
West of Fifty Years Since, The, - 152
Woman from a Conservative Standpoint, - - - - - - - 112
Woman Question, Ten Essays on the, 342

Books Reviewed.

[The Italics indicate the Lesser Notices.]

Across America and Asia, - - - 564
Admiralty and Prize, - - - - 156
Alps, Flowers from the Upper, - - 540
Alsop's Character of the Province of Maryland, - - - - - - 508
American Family in Paris, - - - 543
Analysis of the Phenomena of the Human Mind, - - - - - - 461
Ancient States and Empires, - - - 565
Anti-Slavery Conflict, Some Recollections of, - - - - - - 343
Arithmetics (Cruttenden's), - - - 439
Aspen Court, - - - - - - - 16
Astronomy, Elements of Theoretical and Descriptive, - - - 137
Without a Telescope, - - 136
Athenian, The Last, - - - - 437
Audubon, Life of J. J., - - - - 13
Aunt Dinah's Pledge, - - - - - 542
Bastiat, Essays on Political Economy, 320
Beatrice, and other Poems, - - - 156
Biblical Commentary on the Old Testament (Keil and Delitzsch), - 234
Birds of the United States, Our Own, 203
Black Forest Village Stories, - - 56
Bryant Homestead Book, - - - 567
Buddhist Pilgrims, Travels of, - - 137
Cats and Dogs, - - - - - - 568
Carriers, Law of, - - - - - 195
Ceylon, Eight Years' Wanderings in, 235
Chemistry, Manual of Elementary, - 439
Chicago, Public Grounds of, - - 132
Civil Government, Analysis of, - - 56
First Lessons in, - - - 137
Daisy, - - - - - - - - - 568
Dallas, G. M., Letters from London, - 390
Dame Nature and her Three Daughters, - - - - - - - 568
Dickens's Christmas Books, - - 568
Dictionnaire Raisonné de l'Architecture Française, - - - - 134, 173
Dingman's Bookseller's Directory, - 487
Erling the Bold, - - - - - - 587
Enthüllungen aus der Urgeschich e, 73
Fairy Egg, - - - - - - - - 543
Familie, Die, - - - - - - - 112
Field Service in War, - - - - 566
Filling up the Chinks, - - - - 568
Florida and the South, A Guide-book of, - - - - - - - - 417
Four Gospels (Folsom's Translation), 53
Free Town Libraries, - - - - - 233
Genesis (Lange), - - - - - - 234
German Language, Manual of the, - 439
German Tales (Auerbach's), - - 438
Glimpses of Pleasant Homes, - - 588
Great Mysteries and Little Plagues, - 543
Grèce Moderne, - - - - - - 344
Hamilton, Jas. A., Reminiscences of, 253
Histoire des Doctrines Chimiques, - - 255
Hindoo, Travels of a, in Bengal and Upper India, - - - - - 52
Illuminated Christian Year, - - 540
Independent Third Reader, - - - 369
Indian Pass, - - - - - - - 53
In Fairy Land, - - - - - - - 568
Innocents Abroad, - - - - - 194
Ireland, Patriot's History of, - - 393
Italie, Reflexions sur l'état actuel de l', 392
Ithaka, der Peloponnes und Troja, - 416
Jack and Florie, - - - - - - 544
Jefferson Davis, Life of, - - - 340
Jenkins's Handy Lexicon, - - - 345
Jeremiah (Cowles), - - - - - 234
Joe and the Howards, - - - - 587
John and the Demijohn, - - - - 543
Julius Cæsar, Did he Cross the Channel? - - - - - - - 155
Juventus Mundi, - - - - - - 254
Kaulbach's Female Characters of Goethe, - - - - - - - 538
Königsmark, - - - - - - - 391
Krilof, - - - - - - - - - 588
Lady Geraldine's Courtship, - - - 539
Language, On the Origin of, - - 414
Latin-English and English-Latin Dictionary (White's), - - - - 135
Latin Reader, A, - - - - - 345
Law of Love, - - - - - - - 193
Lectures (by Joel Parker), - - - 113
Lexington, History of, - - - - 116
Literature and Literary Men of Great Britain and Ireland, - - - 176
Lost in the Jungle, - - - - - 542
Mademoiselle Fifty-Millions, - - - 256
Majesty's Tower, Her, - - - - 320
Malay Archipelago, - - - - - 317
Man Who Laughs, The, - - - - 509
Memoirs of the War in the Southern Dept. of U. S., - - - - - 512
Metallurgy of Iron and Steel, - - 511
Minor Chords, - - - - - - 186
Mopsa, the Fairy, - - - - - 155
Moral Philosophy (Fairchild's), - - 393
Moral Reforms, - - - - - - 487
My Daughter Elinor, - - - - - 298
Mystic Bell, - - - - - - - 588
Nanny's Christmas, - - - - - 568
New Testament (Noyes's translation), 53
New West, - - - - - - - - 33
Nidworth, and his Three Magic Wands, - - - - - - - 568
Nordamerikanischen Union, Die inneren Kämpfe der, - - - - 320
Norman Conquest of England, History of the, - - - - - - 31
Norman Leslie, - - - - - - 36
Old English History for Children, - 543
Old Testament History, - - - - 76
One Poor Girl, - - - - - - 439
On the Edge of the Storm, - - - 570
Outlines of Composition, - - - 345
Palestine, Syria, and Asia Minor, - 32
Parables of Our Lord, - - - - 540
Parser and Analyzer, - - - - 156
Philosophy and Theology, Studies in, 36
Phocylidis Poema Admonitorium, 321
Pictorial Field-book of the War of 1812, 569
Psalms, Notes on the Book of (Barnes), - - - - - - - 234
Public Parks, - - - - - - - 132
Rev. Dr. Willoughby's Wine, - - 543
Rhetoric, - - - - - - - - 345
Robinson, Henry Crabb, Diary of, - 231
Römische Geschichte (W. Ihne), - - 319
Rough and Ready, - - - - - - 587
Russie? Que faut-il désirer pour la, - 271
Sacristan's Household, - - - - 75
Saint Paul (Renan's), - - - - - 92
Science of Government in connection with American Institutions, - - 236
Science of Right, - - - - - - 137
Seats and Saddles, - - - - - 16
Sermons (Robertson's), - - - - 412
(Brooke's), - - - - 412
Service Manual, - - - - - - 344
Shakespeare's Midsummer Night's Dream, - - - - - - - 567
Shipping, Treatise on the Law of, - 136
Soi-même, - - - - - - - - 439
Songs of Life, - - - - - - - 540
Spanish Barber, - - - - - - - 588
Spectrum Analysis, - - - - - - 73
Spiritual Manifestations, Physical Media in, - - - - - - - 298
Springdale Abbey, - - - - - - 55
Stellung des Menschen in der Natur, 438
Stories from my Attic, - - - - 587
Story of a Bad Boy, - - - - - 588
Stretton, - - - - - - - - 137
Swedenborg, the Secret of, - - - 436
Swiss Family Robinson, - - - - 321
Tennyson's Poems, Illustrated, - - 568
Think and Act, - - - - - - 438
Ting-a-ling, - - - - - - - - 569
Tom Harding and His Friends, - - 542
Too Bright to Last, - - - - - 438
Trees, Plants, and Flowers, - - - 486
Trotty Book, - - - - - - - 540
Two Lives in One, - - - - - - 568
Typhaines Abbey, - - - - - - 37
Vagabonds, The, - - - - - - 391
Villa on the Rhine, - - - - - 12
Virgil's Æneid (Searing's), - - - 255
Wallenstein's Geschichte, - - - - 296
Wandering Recollections of a Somewhat Busy Life, - - - - - 153
West, Discovery of the Great, - - 389
West, Recollections of Persons and Places in the, - - - - - 152
White and Red, - - - - - - - 588
Whittier's Ballads of New England, - 539
Wilderness, Adventures in the, - - 53
Woodbine Series, - - - - - - 541
Woman's Work and Woman's Culture, 342
Women, The Subjection of, - - - 72
Yosemite Guide-Book, - - - - 369

Books of the Week.

16, 37, 56, 76, 97, 117, 137, 157, 176, 195, 215, 236, 256, 275, 299, 321, 345, 369, 393, 418, 440, 464, 487, 515, 544, 570, 591.

ERRATA.

Page 62, 1st column, line 2. For "Navy" read "Treasury."
Page 96, 1st column, line 32 from bottom. For "Rome" read "Home."
Page 162, 1st column, line 20 from bottom. For "calculation" read "intimidation."
Page 283, 2d column, lines 30, 50. For "Ashton" read "Ashworth."
Page 345, 2d column, lines 16, 28. For "Landeer" read "Zander."
Page 511, 2d column, line 38. For "Phosphorous, not phosphoric, acid" read "Phosphorus, not phosphoric acid."
Page 514, 2d column, line 24. For "Toby Adam's" read "Fitz Adam's."
Page 527, 2d column, line 12. For "slaves" read "Slaves."
Page 536, 1st column, line 14 from bottom. For "we" read "he." 2d column, line 3 from bottom; For "favorable" read "formidable."
Page 537, 1st column, line 3. Insert "French" before "contributors." Line 11; for "Bruce" read "Bence." Line 12; for "Clement" read "Clements." Line 23; for "now" read "read." Line 34; for "prowl" read "growl." 2d column, line 25. For "cunningly" read "commonly." Line 27 from bottom; for "birds' eggs" read 'birds, eggs."
Page 541, 1st column, line 18. For "was" read "were." Line 24; for "cannot" read "can."
Page 542, 1st column, line 21 from bottom. For "men" read "folks." Line 18 from bottom; for "for" read "of." Line 10 from bottom; for "ever" read "more." Line 6 from bottom; dele "alligator." 2d column, line 16 from bottom; for "even" read "soon."
Page 543, 1st column, line 10. For "they attack" read "she attacks."
Page 563, 2d column, line 26. For "Galesbury" read "Salesbury."

REGISTER OF BOOKS RECEIVED DURING THE HALF YEAR.

Theology, Metaphysics, and Ethics.

Abbott (Rev. L.), Old Testament Shadows of New Testament Truths, illustrated.....(Harper & Bros.) $3 00
Baring-Gould (S.), Origin and Development of Religious Beliefs, Part I.....(D. Appleton & Co.) 4 50
Bartle (Rev. Geo.), Scripture Doctrine of Hades.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.) 1 50
Beecher (Rev. H. W.), The Overture of Angels.....(J. B. Ford & Co.)
Sermons, March-Sept., 1869.....(" " ")
Boardman (W. E.), He that Overcometh.....(Henry Hoyt)
Brooke (Rev. S. A.), Sermons Preached in London.....(Fields, Osgood & Co.) 2 00
Brooks (N. C.), Scripture Manu l.....(Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger) 0 75
Sabbath School Manual.....(" " ") 0 75
Bulfinch (Rev. S. G.), Studies in the Evidences of Christianity.....(Wm. V. Spencer) 1 50
Burgon (Rev. J. W.), England and Rome.....(E. P. Dutton & Co.)
Chase (W. H.), Day by Day.....(Dennis Bros. & Co.)
Clarke (Rev. D.), The Oneness of the Christian Church.....(Lee & Shepard)
Collier (Rev. R. L.), Every-day Subjects in Every-day Sermons.....(Am. Unit. Assn.) 1 00
Coxe (Rev. A. C.), Mrs. Sherwood's Stories for Sunday, illustrating the Catechism.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.) 1 75
Evans (F. W.), Autobiography of a Shaker.....(C. Van Benthuysen & Sons)
Everett (C. C.), The Science of Thought.....(W. V. Spencer) 2 00
Fairchild (Prof. J. H.), Moral Philosophy.....(Sheldon & Co.)
Ffoulkes (E. S.), Second Letter to Archbishop Manning, swd.....(Pott & Amery) 0 25
Goulburn (Rev. E. M.), The Pursuit of Holiness.....(D. Appleton & Co.)
Hagenbach (K. R.), History of the Church in the XVIIIth and XIXth Centuries, translated, 2 vols.....(Chas. Scribner & Co.)
Hedge (Rev. F. H.), The Primeval World of Hebrew Tradition.....(Roberts Bros.) 1 50
Heinzen (K.), Six Letters to a Pious Man, swd.....(Indianapolis) 0 25
Holcombe (Dr. W. H.), In Both Worlds.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.) 1 75
Hood (Rev. E. P.), Lamps, Pitchers, and Trumpets.....(M. W. Dodd) 1 75
Hyacinthe (Father), Discourses.....(G. P. Putnam & Son) 1 25
Jackson (Rev. T.), Curiosities of the Pulpit.....(Virtue & Yorston)
James (H.), The Secret of Swedenborg.....(Fields, Osgood & Co.)
"Janus," The Pope and the Council.....(Roberts Bros.) 1 50
Jones (Rev. Harry), The Perfect Man.....(D. Lothrop & Co.)
Jones (Rev. J.), St. Liguori's Way of Salvation.....(Cath. Pub. Soc.)
Kroeger (A. E.), Fichte's New Exposition of the Science of Knowledge, swd.....(John Wiley & Son)
Lange (Rev. J. P.), Commentary, Vol. X., Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Solomon.....(Chas. Scribner & Co.) 5 00
Lange (Rev. J. P.) and Fay (Rev. F. R.), The Epistle of Paul to the Romans.....(Chas. Scribner & Co.) 5 00
Lord (C. E.), Evidences of Natural and Revealed Theology.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.) 3 50
Meditations on the Suffering, Life, and Death of Our Lord Jesus Christ, Part I., swd.....(Robt. Clarke & Co.) 0 25
Morning Light.....(Pott & Amery) 1 00
Perinchief (Rev. O.), Sermons.....(Wm. Ballantyne)
Prentiss (E.), Stepping Heavenward.....(A. D. F. Randolph & Co.)
Robertson (Rev. F. W.), Sermons preached at Trinity Chapel, Brighton, 2 vols.....(Fields, Osgood & Co.) 3 00
Sadler (Rev. M. F.), Church Doctrine, Bible Truth.....(Pott & Amery) 1 50
Simmons (C.), Scripture Manual, 36th ed.....(M. W. Dodd) 1 75
Smith (Dr. W.), Dictionary of the Bible, Am. ed., swd., Parts XIX.-XXII.....(Hurd & Houghton) 0 75
Spalding (Rev. A. T.), The Little Gate, and How to Enter it.....(Gould & Lincoln)
Speakman (T. H.), Divisions in the Society of Friends.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Stanley (Prof. A. P.), Lectures on the History of the Jewish Church, 2 vols.....(Chas. Scribner & Co.) 5 00
Lectures on the History of the Eastern Church " " 2 50
Thayer (Rev. W. M.), Communion Wine and Bible Temperance.....(Nat. Temp. Soc.)
The Christian Year: Collects for Christmas, Easter, etc., illuminated.....(Duffield & Ashmead)
Tuttle (H.), The Career of the God-Idea in History.....(Adams & Co.)
Washburn (F. T.), J. H. Maronier's Hand-book of Religious Instruction. 2 parts, swd..(W. V. Spencer)

Poetry.

A Chaplet of Leaves: Poetry.....(Hurd & Houghton) $2 00
Alexander (C. F.), The Sunday Book of Poetry.....(Sever, Francis & Co.)
Boker (G. H.), Königsmark, and Other Poems.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.) 1 75
Brown (Rev. A. W.), Lyrical Pieces, Secular and Sacred.....(Sampson Low, Son & Marston)
Browning (Mrs. E. B.), Lady Geraldine's Courtship, illustrated..(Chas. Scribner & Co.) 5 00
Clough (A. H.), Poems and Prose Remains, 2 vols.....(Macmillan & Co.) 6 00
Coleridge (S. T.), Christabel, and Lyrical and Imaginative Poems.....(Scribner, Welford & Co.)
Embury (Emma C.), Poems.....(Hurd & Houghton) 2 50
Evenings with the Sacred Poets.....(A. D. F. Randolph) 2 50
Heady (M.), Seen and Heard: Poems.....(H. C. Turnbull, jr.) 2 00
Hemans (Mrs. F.), Complete Works, 2 vols.....(D. Appleton & Co.) 3 00
Hill (G.), Titania's Banquet, and Other Poems.....(" ") "
Hopper (E.), Old Horse Gray: a Poem.....(Hurd & Houghton) 0 75
Keble (Rev. J.), Miscellaneous Poems.....(Pott & Amery) 2 00
Leavitt (Rev. J. M.), The Siege of Babylon; a Tragedy, swd.....(Hurd & Houghton)
Leland (C. G.), Hans Breitmann's Ballads, with Glossary.....(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 2 00
Lowell (J. R.), Poetical Works, complete.....(Fields, Osgood & Co.) 1 50
The Cathedral: a Poem.....(" " ") 1 25
Lytton (Sir E. B.), Odes and Epodes of Horace.....(Harper & Bros.)
Massey (G.), A tale of Eternity, and Other Poems.....(Fields, Osgood & Co.) 2 00
Mayfield (Millie), A Wreath of Rhymes.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Nash (G.), Bay Leaves, and Other Poems.....(Nichols & Noyes) 1 50
Palmer (Sir R.), The Book of Praise: Poetry.....(Sever, Francis & Co.)
Rodenberg (J.), Poems, translated.....(Western News Co.)
Sargent (E.), The Woman who Dared: a Poem.....(Roberts Bros.) 1 50
Scott (Sir W.) The Lady of the Lake.....(Hurd & Houghton) 1 25
Smith (Rev. S. F.), Rock of Ages: Poems.....(D. Lothrop & Co.)
Smith (W. R.), Diomede: from Homer's Iliad, swd.....(D. Appleton & Co.)
Songs of Life, Illustrated.....(Chas. Scribner & Co.) 5 00
Spenser (E.), Complete Works, Globe ed.....(Macmillan & Co.) 1 75
Tennyson (A.), The Holy Grail, and Other Poems.....(Fields, Osgood & Co.) 1 00
Trowbridge (J. T.), The Vagabonds, and Other Poems.....(" " ") 1 50
Under the Cross: Sacred Poetry.....(Henry Hoyt) 2 00
Watson (J. W.), Beautiful Snow, and Other Poems.....(Turner Bros. & Co.) 1 25
Whittier (J. G.), Poetical Works, Merrimac ed., 2 vols.....(Fields, Osgood & Co.) 5 00
Ballads of New England.....(" " ") 5 00
Wilson (W.), Poems.....(Hurd & Houghton) 1 50
Wireman (H. D.), Gems of German Lyrics.....(Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger) 2 00
Xariffa's Poems.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)

Political and Social Subjects.

Adams (C. F., jr.), A Chapter of Erie, swd.....(Fields, Osgood & Co.)
Allen (Dr. N.), Physical Culture in Amherst College, swd.....(Stone & Huse)
Bonghi (R.), L'Inchiesta sulla Regia Cointeressata dei Tabachi, swd.....(Milan)
Butler (Josephine E.), Woman's Work and Woman's Culture, swd..(Macmillan & Co.) $3 50
Coxe (Bishop A. C.), Moral Reforms.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Fourth Annual Report of the National Temperance Society.....(New York.)
Greenwood (J.), The Seven Curses of London.....(Fields, Osgood & Co.) 1 50
" " " swd.....(Harper & Bros.) 0 25
Hale (Rev. E. E.), Sybaris and other Homes.....(Fields, Osgood & Co.) 1 50
Lunarius.....(Nat. Temperance Society)
Mayo (Rev. A. D.), Religion in the Common Schools, swd.....(Robert Clarke & Co.)
Mill (J. S.), The Subjection of Women.....(D. Appleton & Co.)
" " " .....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.) 1 00
Parker (Prof. J.), The Three Powers of Government, etc., swd.....(Hurd & Houghton) 0 75
Pomeroy (Prof. J. N.), Education in Politics, swd.....(New York)
Reed (J.), Man and Woman, Equal but Unlike.....(Nichols & Noyes) 0 75
Ruskin (J.), The Mystery of Life and its Arts.....(John Wiley & Son)
Strutt (E.), The Feminine Soul.....(H. H. & T. W. Carter)
Tocqueville (A. de), American Institutions.....(Sever, Francis & Co.) 1 75
Twenty-fourth Annual Report of the N. Y. Prison Association, swd.....(Albany)
Welch (Prof. F. G.), Moral, Intellectual, and Physical Culture.....(Wood & Holbrook)
White (C.), Ecce Femina.....(Carlos White) 1 50
White (H.), Bastiat's Essays on Political Economy.....(Western News Co.) 2 00
Woolsey (Rev. T. D.), Essay on Divorce and Divorce Legislation.....(Chas. Scribner & Co.) 1 75

History, Biography, Geography, Travels, etc.

Abbott (J. S. C.) History of Joseph Bonaparte.....(Harper & Bros.) $1 20
The Romance of Spanish History.....(" " ") 2 00
Agassiz (L.), Address on the Humboldt Centennial Anniversary, swd.....(A. Williams & Co.)
Alcott (Mrs. L. M.), Hospital Sketches.....(Roberts Bros.) $1 50
Alexander (Rev. H. C.), Life of J. A. Alexander, D.D., 2 vols.....(Scribner & Co.) 5 00
Alsop (G.), A Character of the Province of Maryland (1666).....(W. Gowans)
Bamberger (L.), Count Bismarck: from the German, swd.....(B. Westermann & Co.)
Beal (Rev. S.), Travels of Fah-hian and Sung-Yung from China to India, A.D. 400, 518...(John Wiley & Son)
Bennet (Dr. J. H.), Winter and Spring on the Shores of the Mediterranean.....(D. Appleton & Co.)
Bill (L.), A Winter in Florida.....(Wood & Holbrook) 1 25
Bowden (J. E.), Life and Letters of F. W. Faber, D.D.....(John Murphy & Co.) 2 00
Bryant (W. C.), Letters of a Traveller.....(G. P. Putnam & Son) 2 00
Burt (Rev. N. C.), The Far East.....(Robt. Clarke & Co.) 1 75
Butler (B. C.), Lake George and Lake Champlain from their First Discovery to 1759.....(George P. Putnam & Son)
Clemens (S. L., "Mark Twain"), The Innocents Abroad.....(Am. Pub. Company)
Cusack (M. F.), The Patriot's History of Ireland.....(Catholic Pub. Soc.)
Dallas (G. M.), A series of Letters from London, 1856-60.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Davidson (J. W.), The Living Writers of the South.....(G. W. Carleton & Co.) 2 00
De Costa (Rev. B. F.), Sailing Directions of Henry Hudson.....(Joel Munsell)
De Vere (Prof. M. S.), The Great Empress.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Dixon (W. H.), Her Majesty's Tower, Second Series.....(" ")
Fallet (C.), Les Princes de l'Art.....(S. R. Urbino)
Falloux (Count de), The Writings of Mme. Swetchine.....(Roberts Bros.) 1 50
Foster (J.), Walter Savage Landor.....(Fields, Osgood & Co.) 3 50
Froude (J. A.), History of England, Vols. I.—IV.....(Chas. Scribner & Co.) 1 25
Hamilton (J. A.), Reminiscences during three-quarters of a Century.....(Chas. Scribner & Co.) 5 00
Hawthorne (Mrs.), Notes on England and Italy.....(G. P. Putnam & Son) 2 00
Heinzen (K.), The Character of Humboldt, swd.....(Indianapolis) 0 20
Higginson (T. W.), Army Life in a Black Regiment.....(Fields, Osgood & Co.) 1 50
Holland (C.), Aspasia: a Tale.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.) 1 25
Hughes (T.), Alfred the Great.....(Macmillan & Co.) 2 00
Jones (Dr. B.), Life and Letters of Michael Faraday, 2 vols....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Jonveaux (E.), L'Amérique actuelle, swd.....(F. W. Christern)
Kingsley (H.), Tales of Old Travel.....(Macmillan & Co.) 2 00
Lanoye (F. de), Egypt 3,300 Years Ago.....(Chas. Scribner & Co.) 1 50
Lectures before the Lowell Institute, Boston, on the Early History of Massachusetts, 1 vol.....(Boston)
Lea (H. C.), Studies in Church History.....(Henry C. Lea)
Lee (R. E.), Henry Lee's Memoirs of the War of the Southern Department of the United States.....(University Pub. Co.) 4 00
Life of Gerard Hallock.....(Oakley, Mason & Co.)
Lossing (B. J.), Pictorial Field-Book of the War of 1812.....(Harper & Bros.) 7 00
Maclear (Rev. G. F.), Apostles of Mediæval Europe.....(Macmillan & Co.) 2 00
May (Rev. S. J.), Some Recollections of our Anti-Slavery Conflict (Fields, Osgood & Co.)
Memoirs of the Long Island Historical Society. Vol. II., The Battle of Long Island.....(Brooklyn) 5 00
Meunier (V.), Adventures on the Great Hunting-Grounds of the World.....(Chas. Scribner & Co.) 1 50
Milman (Rev. H. H.), History of Latin Christianity, 8 vols.....(W. J. Widdleton) 14 00
Mommsen (T.), History of Rome, Vol. I.....(Chas. Scribner & Co.) 2 50
Monnier (M.), Wonders of Pompeii.....(" ") 1 50
Northen (W. D.), Speeches and Essays, 1860-69.....(H. P. Ives)
Noyes (J. H.), History of American Socialisms.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Oliphant (Mrs.), Historical Sketches of the Reign of George III., swd..(Littell & Gay) 1 00
Parkman (F.), The Discovery of the Great West.....(Little, Brown & Co.) 2 50
Pollard (E. A.), Secret History of the Southern Confederacy.....(Nat. Pub. Co.)
Proceedings of the Am. Antiquarian Society, April 28, 1869, swd.....(Worcester)
Pumpelly (Prof. R.), Across America and Asia.....(Leypoldt & Holt) 5 00
Richardson (R.), Memoirs of Alexander Campbell, Vol. II.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Rogers (J. E. T.), Speeches of Hon. John Bright, M.P., Author's pop. ed.....(Macmillan & Co.) 2 00
Sadler (T.), Diary, Reminiscence, and Correspondence of Henry Crabb Robinson, 2 vols.....(Fields, Osgood & Co.) 4 00
Thackeray (W. M.), Four Georges and English Humorists..... " " 1 25
The Life of Mother Margaret Mary Hallahan.....(Cath. Pub. Soc.)
Tousey (S.), Papers from over the Water.....(Am. News Co.) 1 50
Wainwright (J.), Julius Cæsar: Did he Cross the Channel? Reviewed, swd.....(John Campbell)
Walford (Edith), The Story of the Chevalier Bayard.....(Scribner, Welford & Co.) 1 25
Winkworth (Miss C.), Christian Singers of Germany.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)

Fiction.

A Beggar on Horseback, swd.....(Harper & Bros.) $0 35
Adams (W. H. D.), The Queen of the Adriatic.....(D. Lothrop & Co.)
Agnes Graham, swd.....(Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger) 0 60
Ainsworth (W. H.), The Miser's Daughter, swd.....(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 1 00
A. K. D., Contradictions; or, High Life at Edgerton.....(D. Lothrop & Co.)
Andersen (H. C.), The Two Baronesses.....(Hurd & Houghton) 1 75
" " The Improvisatore.....(" " ") 1 75
Arthur (T. S.), Rainy Day at Home.....(D. Lothrop & Co.)
Fireside Angel, and Other Stories.....(" " ") 0 75
Auerbach (B.), German Tales.....(Roberts Bros.) 1 00
Villa Eden.....(" " ") 2 00
Austin (Mrs. J. G.), Cipher.....(Sheldon & Co.)
Ballantyne (R. M.), Erling the Bold.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.) 1 50
Shifting Winds.....(Porter & Coates)
Björnson (B.), The Happy Boy.....(Sever, Francis & Co.)
Black (W.), In Silk Attire, swd.....(Harper & Bros.) 0 50
Bound to John Company, swd.....(" " ") 0 75
Brackenridge (H. H.), Modern Chivalry, 2 vols.....(T. B. Peterson & Bros.)
Brewster (Miss A. M. H.), Compensation, 2d ed.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Brock (Mrs. C.), Sunday Echoes in Week-day Hours.....(E. P. Dutton & Co.)
Bushe (Mary C.), Rupert of the Rhine.....(Pott & Amery) 0 75
Chaplin (Mrs. J. D.), Out of the Wilderness.....(H. A. Young & Co.)
Charles (Mrs.), The Spanish Barber.....(M. W. Dodd) 1 25
Chellis (Miss M. D.), Aunt Dinah's Pledge.....(J. N. Stearns) 1 25
Dash (Countess), Mademoiselle Fifty Millions.....(D. Appleton & Co.) 0 60
De Mille (J.), Cord and Creese, swd.....(Harper & Bros.) 0 75
Dorr (Mrs. J. C. R.), Sibyl Huntington.....(G. W. Carleton)
Dorsey (Mrs. A. K.), Nora Brady's Vow, and Mona the Vestal..(J. B. Lippincott & Co.) 1 75
Dumas (A.), Love and Liberty.....(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 1 75
Eliot (George), Adam Bede.....(Fields, Osgood & Co.) 1 00
" " " .....(Harper & Bros.) 0 75
Felix Holt, the Radical.....(Fields, Osgood & Co.) 1 00
" " " .....(Harper & Bros.) 0 75
Romola.....(Fields, Osgood & Co.) 1 75
" " .....(Harper & Bros. 0 75
Silas Marner, and Scenes of Clerical Life.....(Fields, Osgood & Co.) 1 00
" " " .....(Harper & Bros.) 0 75
The Mill on the Floss.....(" " ") 0 75
Evans (Miss A. J.), Vashti; or "Until Death Us Do Part".....(Carleton)
Fair Harvard.....(G. P. Putnam & Son) 1 50
Found Dead, swd.....(Harper & Bros.) 0 50
Going and Son, swd.....(American News Co.) 0 75
Hale (Rev. E. E.), The Ingham Papers.....(Fields, Osgood & Co.) 1 50
Harland (Marion), Phemie's Temptation.....(G. W. Carleton & Co.) 1 50
Hatton (J.), Christopher Kenrick.....(G. P. Putnam & Son) 1 75
Hentz (Mrs. C. L.), Linda.....(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 1 75
" " Rena.....(" " ") 1 75
" " Robert Graham.....(" " ") 1 75
Hugo (V.), The Man who Laughs, Part I., II., swd.....(D. Appleton & Co.) 1 50
Kimball (R. B.), To-day.....(G. W. Carleton) 1 75
Kingsford (Jane), The Soprano, swd.....(Loring) 0 75
Kingsley (H.), Hetty, swd.....(Harper & Bros.) 0 25
" " Stretton, swd.....(" " ") 0 40
Laure: the History of a Blighted Life.....(Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger) 1 50
Lettice Lisle, swd.....(Littell & Gay) 0 38
Levin's Treasure in Bank.....(Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger) 0 75
MacDonald, (G.), David Elginbrod.....(Loring) 1 75
McCarthy (J.), My Enemy's Daughter.....(Harper & Bros.) 0 75
Macgregor (Annie L.), The Professor's Tale.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
McKeever (Miss H. B.), Westbrook Parsonage.....(Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger) 1 50
Marlitt (E.), Countess Gisela.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.) 1 50
Marryat (Miss F.), Veronique, swd.....(Loring) 0 75
Meta's Faith, swd.....(Harper & Bros.) 0 50
My Daughter Elinor, swd.....(" " ") 1 25
Nauman (M. D.), Twisted Threads.....(Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger) 1 50
Neal (J.), Great Mysteries and Little Plagues.....(Roberts Bros.) 1 25

Register of Books Received.

Newby (Mrs. C. J.), Married, swd.....(Turner Bros. & Co.) $0 50
Oliphant (Mrs.), The Minister's Wife, swd.....(Harper & Bros.) 0 75
On the Edge of the Storm.....(G. P. Putnam & Son) 1 75
"Ouida," Puck.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.) 2 00
Reade (C.), Foul Play, swd.....(Harper & Bros.) 0 25
Peg Woffington, Christie Johnstone, etc., swd..... " " 0 50
Love me Little, Love me Long, swd..... " " 0 35
The Cloister and the Hearth, swd..... " " 0 50
White Lies, swd..... " " 0 35
Regester (S.), The Dead Letter.....(Beadle & Co.)
Figure Eight, swd..... " " " 0 50
Shelton Mackenzie (Mrs. A.), Married against Reason, swd.....(Loring) 0 50
Sikes (W.), One Poor Girl.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.) 1 50
Smythies (Mrs. G.), Popping the Question, swd.....(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 0 75
Soi-même: a Story of a Wilful Life.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.) 1 25
Southworth (Mrs. E. D. E. N.), The Bride's Fate.....(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 1 75
The Prince of Darkness..... " " " 1 75
Speight (T. W.), Under Lock and Key.....(Turner Bros. & Co.) 1 75
Spielhagen (F.), Through Night to Light.....(Leypoldt & Holt) 2 00
Stephens (Mrs. A. S.), Ruby Gray's Strategy.....(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 1 75
Tautphœus (Baroness), The Initials..... " " " 1 75
Thackeray (Miss A. I.), Story of Elizabeth, with other Tales....(Fields, Osgood & Co.) 1 00
The Village on the Cliff, and Other Stories.." " " 1 00
Thackeray (W. M.), Henry Esmond, and Lovel the Widower.... " " " 1 25
" " " " " " .....(Harper Bros.) 0 50
The Adventures of Philip.....(Fields, Osgood & Co.) 1 25
" " " .....(Harper & Bros.) 0 75
Miscellanies, I., II.....(Fields, Osgood & Co.) 2 50
Catherine, swd..... " " " 0 35
The Virginians..... " " " 1 25
The History of Pendennis, swd.....(Harper & Brothers) 0 70
Men's Wives, swd.....(D. Appleton & Co.) 0 50
A Shabby Genteel Story, swd..... " " " 0 50
The Yellowplush Papers, swd..... " " " 0 50
The Gabled House; or, Self-Sacrifice.....(Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger) 1 50
The Norrises.....(Pott & Amery) 0 75
The Veil Lifted: A Story of Convent Life.....(Henry Hoyt)
The Woman in Red, swd.....(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 0 50
Thomas (Annie), False Colors, swd.....(Harper & Bros.) 0 50
Too Bright to Last, swd.....(Fields, Osgood & Co.) 0 35
Townsend (Miss V. F.), The Hollands.....(Loring) 1 50
Trollope (A.), The Vicar of Bullhampton.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
(T. A.), Dream Numbers.....(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 1 75
Walker (Mary S.), The Rev. Dr. Willoughby and his Wine.....(J. N. Stearns) 1 50
Walter Ogilby.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.) 2 00
Warner (Miss S.), Daisy..... " " " 1 75
Whitney (Mrs. A. D. T.) Hitherto.....(A. K. Loring)
Wood (Mrs. H.), Roland Yorke, swd.....(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 1 50
Yates (E.), Wrecked in Port, swd.....(Harper & Bros.) 0 50

Juvenile Literature.

Aldrich (T. B.), The Story of a Bad Boy.....(Fields, Osgood & Co.) $1 50
Alger (H., jr.), Luck and Pluck.....(Loring)
Rough and Ready..... " 1 25
An American Family in Paris.....(Hurd & Houghton) 1 50
Bache (Mrs. A.), Legends of Fairy Land.....(Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger) 0 75
Bourne (H. R. F.), Famous London Merchants.....(Harper & Bros.) 1 00
Boyd (Mrs. E. E.), Captain Charley and his Little Right Hand.....(Henry Hoyt)
Bright (Mrs. A. M.), The Three Bernices.....(Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger) 1 75
Christmas Day: swd.....(Turner & Bros.) 0 50
Courtney (Mrs. E. L.), Twice Tried.....(Claxton, Remsen, & Haffelfinger) 0 80
Davis (Caroline E. K.), The Yachtville Boys.....(Henry Hoyt)
De Ségur (Mme.) and Carraud (Mme. Z.), Les Petites Filles Modèles, et Les Goûters de la Grand'mère.....(S. R. Urbino)
Du Chaillu (P.), Lost in the Jungle.....(Harper & Bros.) 1 75
Eyster (Miss N.), Tom Harding and his Friends.....(Duffield Ashmead)
Fuller (Jane J.), Uncle John's Flower-Gatherers.....(M. W. Dodd) 1 50
Gorham (E.), Rainy Days in the Nursery.....(W. V. Spencer)
Gouraud (Julie), A Little Boy's Story.....(Hurd & Houghton) 1 50
Greene (Hon. Mrs. R., jr.), Filling up the Chinks.....(E. P. Dutton & Co.)
Hazelton (M.), Aunt Mattie and her Young Friends.....(D. Lothrop & Co.)
Joe and the Howards.....(A. F. Graves)
Ketchum (Mrs. A. C.), Benney; a Christmas Ballad.....(S. R. Wells) 1 50
Knatchbull-Hugessen (E. H.), Stories for my Children.....(Macmillan & Co.) 2 00
Leslie (Mrs. M.), Walter and Frank.....(A. F. Graves)
McKeever (Miss H. B.), Jack and Florie; or, The Pigeons' Wedding.....(Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger) 0 75
Miller (Mrs. Hugh), Cats and Dogs.....(D. Lothrop & Co.)
Nanny's Christmas.....(Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger) 0 80
Newbury (H.), May Bell.....(D. Lothrop & Co.)
Phelps (Miss E. S.), The Trotty Book.....(Fields, Osgood & Co.) 1 50
Philip Brantley's Life Work.....(M. W. Dodd) 1 25
Prentiss (E.), Nidworth and his Three Magic Wands.....(Roberts Bros.) 1 25
Saintine (X. B.), Dame Nature and her Three Daughters.....(Hurd & Houghton) 1 50
Scudder (H. E.), Stories from my Attic..... " 1 50
Sea-Drift.....(Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger) 0 90
Sewall (F.), Moody Mike.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.) 1 00
Stockton (F. R.), Ting-a-Ling.....(Hurd & Houghton) 1 75
Strong (Mrs. M. D.), New Year, and Other Stories.....(D. Lothrop & Co.) 0 75
The Fairy Egg, and What it Held.....(Fields, Osgood & Co.) 1 50
The Mystic Bell.....(G. P. Putnam & Co.) 1 25
The Play School Stories for Little Folks, 2 vols.....(Gould & Lincoln)
Tweedie (Rev. W. K.), The Early Choice.....(D. Lothrop & Co.)
Uncle Sam Series for American Children, swd.....(Fields, Osgood & Co.) 0 60
Vanny Croft.....(Pott & Amery) 0 80
"Vieux Moustache," Two Lives in One.....(Hurd & Houghton) 1 50
Walker (Mrs. E. A.) From the Crib to the Cross, one syllable.....(Geo. A. Leavitt)
Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, " " .....
Weeks (Helen C.), White and Red.....(Hurd & Houghton) 1 50
Wright (Mrs. J. McN.), John and the Demijohn.....(Henry Hoyt) 1 50

Education.

Ahn's German Hand-writing.....(E. Steiger) $0 40
Allen (Prof. W. F. and J. H.), A Latin Reader.....(Edwin Ginn) 2 50
Manual Latin Grammar, 12th ed..... " " 1 25
Ansted (D. T.), The Earth's History: a Text-book.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Chase (Prof. T.), The Works of Horace.....(Eldredge & Bro.) 1 50
Cooley (Prof. L. C.), Text-book of Chemistry.....(Chas. Scribner & Co.)
Cruttenden (D. H.), The Young Pupil's Arithmetic.....(J. M. Bradstreet & Son) 0 25
The Objective or Synthetic Arithmetic " " " 0 60
The Subjective or Analytical Arithmetic " " " 1 00
Day (H. N.), The American Speller.....(Chas. Scribner & Co.)
Denison (E. B.), Astronomy without Mathematics.....(G. P. Putnam & Son) 1 75
Drew (J.) Manual of Astronomy, 2d ed.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Eliot (Prof. C. W.) and Storer, (Prof. F. H.), Compendious Manual of Qualitative Chemical Analysis.....(D. Van Nostrand)
Freeman (E. A.), Old English History for Children.....(Macmillan & Co.) 1 75
Fownes (Prof. G.), Manual of Elementary Chemistry, Am. ed.....(Henry C. Lea)
Grauert (W.) Manual of the German Language.....(E. Steiger) 0 70
Griffith (A. A.), Drill-Book of Elocution and Oratory.....(Adams, Blackmer & Lyon) 0 75
Hadley (Prof. J.), Elements of the Greek Language.....(D. Appleton & Co.)
Haven (Rev. E. O.), Rhetoric: a Text-book.....(Harper & Bros.) 1 50
Johnson (Prof. W. W.), Elementary Treatise on Analytic Geometry.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.) 2 00
Keam (P.), and Mickleborough (J.), Handbook of Map-Drawing...(E. H. Butler & Co.)
Lectures delivered before the American Institute of Instruction, Pittsfield, Mass., Aug., 1868.....(Boston)
Loomis (Prof. E.) Elements of Astronomy.....(Harper & Bros.)
Lord (J.), Ancient States and Empires: a Text-book.....(Chas. Scribner & Co.) 3 00
March (Prof. F. A.), Parser and Analyzer.....(Harper & Bros.) 0 40
Mill (J. S.), Froude (J. A.), Carlyle (T.), Scottish University Addresses, swd.....(J. W. Schermerhorn & Co.) 0 20
Morris (C. D.), Compendious Grammar of Attic Greek.....(F. J. Huntington & Co.) 1 75
Raub (A. N.), Plain Educational Talks.....(Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger) 1 50
Ray (Dr. J.), The Elements of Astronomy.....(Wilson, Hinkle & Co.)
Rolfe (W. J.), Craik's English of Shakespeare.....(Edwin Ginn)
Sands (N.), The Philosophy of Teaching.....(Harper & Bros.)
Schuyler (A.), Principles of Logic.....(Wilson, Hinkle & Co.)
Silber (W. B.), Elementary Grammar of the Latin Language....(A. S. Barnes & Co.)
Steele (J. D.), A Fourteen Weeks' Course in Astronomy..... " "
Waddell (Prof. W. H.), A Greek Grammar for Beginners.....(Harper & Bros.) 1 00
Walton (G. A. and E. N. L.), Illustrative Practical Arithmetic....(Brewer & Tileston)
Watson (J. M.), Independent Third Reader.....(A. S. Barnes & Co.)
Whitney (Prof. W. D.), A Compendious German Grammar.....(Leypoldt & Holt) $1 50
German Reader..... " " 1 50
Worman (Prof. J. H.), The German Echo.....(A. S. Barnes & Co.) 1 25

Science and Technics.

Bæhr (Dr. B.), The Science of Therapeutics, according to the Principles of Homœopathy, 2 vols.....(Boericke & Tafel) $10 00
Baily (Wm. L.), Our Own Birds of the United States.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.) 1 50
Bascom (Prof. J.), The Principles of Psychology.....(G. P. Putnam & Son) 1 75
Bell (Dr. J. B.), Homœopathic Therapeutics of Diarrhœa, etc.....(A. J. Tafel) 1 25
Bennett (E. H.) and Heard (F. F.), Selection of Leading Cases in Criminal Law, 2d ed., 2 vols.....(Little, Brown & Co.)
Blackwell (R. S.), A Practical Treatise on the Power to Sell Land for Non-payment of Taxes.....(Little, Brown & Co.)
Bloor (A. J.), The Architectural and other Societies of Europe, swd....(New York.)
Büchner (Dr. L.), Die Stellung des Menschen in der Natur, Part I., swd.....(B. Westermann & Co.)
Burt (Dr. W. H.), Characteristic Materia Medica.....(A. J. Tafel) 3 00
Crocker (U. H. and G. G.), Notes on the General Statutes of Massachusetts.....(Little, Brown & Co.)
De Vere (M. S.), Wonders of the Deep.....(G. P. Putnam & Son) 1 75
Elam (Dr. C.), A Physician's Problems.....(Fields, Osgood & Co.)
" " " " .....(Macmillan & Co.) 3 00
First Annual Report of the Trustees of the Peabody Academy of Science, 1868, swd.....(Salem)
Flint (Dr. A., Jr.), The Physiology of Man.....(D. Appleton & Co.)
Garretson (Dr. J. E.), Treatise on the Diseases and Surgery of the Mouth, Jaws, and Associate Parts.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.) 7 50
Hartwig (Dr. G.), The Polar World.....(Harper & Bros.)
Jahr (Dr. G. H. G.), The Clinical Guide.....(Boericke & Tafel) 3 00
Lippitt (Brig.-Gen. F. J.), Field Service in War.....(D. Van Nostrand)
Marlitt (E.), Countess Gisela: a Tale, swd.....(Harper & Bros.) 0 25
Menault (E.), The Intelligence of Animals.....(Chas. Scribner & Co.) 1 50
Meyer (Dr. M.), Electricity in its Relations to Practical Medicine.....(D. Appleton & Co.)
Napheys (Dr. G. H.), The Physical Life of Woman.....(George Maclean) 1 50
Niemeyer (Dr. F. von), A Text-book of Practical Medicine, 2 vols.....(D. Appleton & Co.)
Packard (Dr. A. S., jr.), Guide to the Study of Insects.....(Salem) 5 00
Fouchet (Dr. F. A.), The Universe Translated, profusely illustrated.....(Chas. Scribner & Co.) 12 00
Redfield (I. F.), The Law of Carriers.....(Hurd & Houghton) 6 50
The Law of Railways.....(Little, Brown & Co.) 15 00
Roberts (D.), Treatise on Admiralty and Prize.....(Hurd & Houghton) 7 50
Sanger (G. P.), The U. S. Statutes at Large, 1st Sess., XLIst Congress, 1869, swd.....(Little, Brown & Co.)
Shearman (F. G.) and Redfield (A. A.), Treatise on the Law of Negligence.....(Baker, Voorhis & Co.) 7 50
Taylor (J. N.), Treatise on the American Law of Landlord and Tenant.....(Little, Brown & Co.) 7 50
Thompson (Rev. J. P.), Man in Genesis and in Geology.....(S. R. Wells) 1 00
Thrailkill (Dr. J. W.), Causes of Infant Mortality, swd.....(St. Louis)
Vogel (Dr. A.), Practical Treatise on the Diseases of Children.....(D. Appleton & Co.)
Wagner (R.), Das Judenthum in der Musik, swd.....(L. W. Schmidt)
Wallen (Brig.-Gen. H. D.), Service Manual.....(D. Van Nostrand) 1 50
Waterman (T. W.), Treatise on the Law of Set-off, Recoupment, and Counterclaim.....(Baker, Voorhis & Co.) 7 50
Wight (P. B.), Remarks on Fire-Proof Construction, swd.....(New York)
Wood (Rev. J. G.), Bible Animals.....(Chas. Scribner & Co.) 5 00
Zürcher and Margollé, Meteors, Aërolites, etc.....(D. Appleton & Co.)

Periodicals.

Appleton's Illustrated Almanac for 1870, swd.....(D. Appleton & Co.) $0 30
Bastian (A.) and Hartmann (R.), Zeitschrift für Ethnologie.....(L. W. Schmidt.)
Feydeau (E.), Revue Internationale de l'Art et de la Curiosité.....(F. W. Christern)
Journal of the North China Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society, December, 1868.....(Shanghai)
Koner (Prof. Dr. W.), Zeitschrift der Gesellschaft für Erdkunde zu Berlin.....(L. W. Schmidt)
Littell's Living Age, Vols. XIII., XIV., April—Sept., 1869.....(Littell & Gay)
Lützow (Prof. Dr. C. von), Zeitschrift für Bildende Kunst.....(L. W. Schmidt)
The Atlantic Almanac, swd.....(Fields, Osgood & Co.) 0 50
The Workshop.....(E. Steiger) 0 50

Miscellaneous.

Allen (L. F.) American Cattle.....(Taintor Bros. & Co.) $2 50
Bancroft (H. H. & Co.), Guide for Travellers in the Pacific States..... 0 50
Beers (W. G.), Lacrosse, The National Game of Canada..(W. A. Townsend & Adams)
Boutell (C.), Arms and Armor in Antiquity and the Middle Ages..(D. Appleton & Co.)
Brinton (Dr. D. G.), A Guide-book of Florida and the South.....(Geo. Maclean) 1 00
Caldwell (G. C.), Agricultural Qualitative and Quantitative Analysis.....(Orange Judd & Co.) 2 00
Catholic Family Almanac for 1870, swd.....(Cath. Pub. Soc.) 0 25
Colange (L.), Zell's Popular Encyclopædia, Parts 7-16, swd.....(T. Ellwood Zell) 0 50
Elliott (S. H.), The Attractions of New Haven, Ct.....(N. Tibbals & Co.) 1 00
Emerson (R. W.), Prose Works, 2 vols.....(Fields, Osgood & Co.) 5 00
Emerson (L. O.), The Choral Tribute.....(O. Ditson & Co.) 1 50
Fetridge (W. P.), Harper's Handbook for Travellers in Europe and the East, 8th year.....(Harper & Bros.)
Frost (S. A.), The Laws and By-laws of American Society, swd....(Dick & Fitzgerald) 0 30
Gladstone (W. E.), Juventus Mundi.....(Macmillan & Co.) 3 50
" " .....(Little, Brown & Co.) 2 50
Greenwood (J.), Wild Sports of the World.....(Harper & Bros.) 2 50
Hatfield (Julia), The Bryant Homestead-Book, Illustrated.....(G. P. Putnam & Son) 6 00
Hittell (J. S.), The Resources of California, 5th ed.....(A. Roman & Co.) 1 50
How to Amuse an Evening Party, swd.....(Dick & Fitzgerald) 0 30
How to Cook Potatoes, Apples, Eggs, Fish, 400 ways, swd..... " " 0 30
Howard (C. J.), Book of Conundrums and Riddles, swd..... " " 0 30
Jarves (J. J.), Art Thoughts.....(Hurd & Houghton) 2 50
Jenkins (J.), Handy Lexicon.....(Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger) 1 00
Josh Billings's Farmer's Almanax, swd.....(G. W. Carleton & Co.) 0 25
Kelly (W. K.), A Collection of the Proverbs of all Nations.....(W. F. Draper) 1 25
Latrobe (J. H. B.), Hints for Six Months in Europe.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Lewes (G. H.), Kaulbach's Female Characters of Goethe.....(Theodore Streefer) 36 00
Lindsley (D. P.), The Elements of Tachygraphy.....(Otis Clapp)
Logan (Miss O.), Apropos of Women and Theatres.....(G. W. Carleton)
Lorimer (Mary), Among the Trees.....(Hurd & Houghton) 2 25
Miller (Mrs. Hugh), Cats and Dogs.....(D. Lothrop & Co.)
Mills (A.), The Literature and Literary Men of Great Britain and Ireland, 2 vols.....(Harper & Bros.)
Newspaper Advertisers' Guide.....(Cook, Coburn & Co.)
New York Illustrated, swd.....(D. Appleton & Co.) 0 50
Ocean to Ocean: a Guide-Book.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.) 0 50
Osborn (L.), The Magnetizer; The Prodigal; Prose Comedies.....(James Miller)
Perkins (J. E.), Sabbath Carols.....(A. S. Barnes & Co.)
The Mount Zion Collection of Sacred and Secular Music. " "
Pummill (J.), Russet Leaves.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.) 2 00
Robinson (Rev. C. S.), Songs for Christian Worship.....(A. S. Barnes & Co.)
Robinson (W.), The Parks, Promenades, and Gardens of Paris.....(Scribner, Welford & Co.) 9 00
Ruskin (J.), The Queen of the Air.....(John Wiley & Son) 1 00
Shakespeare's Midsummer-Night's Dream, Silhouette illustrations...(Roberts Bros.) 5 00
Sherwood (J. D.), The Comic History of the United States....(Fields, Osgood & Co.) 2 50
Strange Visitors: Spirit Communication.....(G. W. Carleton & Co.) 1 50
The American Joe Miller, swd.....(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 0 50
The Holbein Society's Fac-simile Reprints.—Vol. I., The Dance of Death.....(Trübner & Co.)
The Merchants and Bankers' Almanac for 1869, 3d ed.....(I. Smith Homans, Jr.) 2 00
Trees, Plants, and Flowers.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.) 1 00
Twelfth Annual Report of the Board of Commissioners of the Central Park, 1868, swd.....(New York)
Twelve Parables of our Lord, illustrated and illuminated.....(Macmillan & Co.) 15 00
Vincent (B.), Haydn's Dictionary of Dates, Am. ed.....(Harper & Bros.) 5 00
Walker (W.), Fruits and Flowers.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Ward (Artemus), His Panorama.....(G. W. Carleton) 1 50
Whipple (E. P.), The Literature of the Age of Elizabeth.....(Fields, Osgood & Co.) 1 75
White (Rev. J. T.), Complete Latin-English and English-Latin Dictionary.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.) 4 50

The Nation.

VOL. IX.—NO. 209. THURSDAY, JULY 1, 1869. { FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM / TWELVE CENTS PER COPY

THE WEEK 1

EDITORIAL ARTICLES:
The Advent of the Southern Boy 4
Mr. Boutwell as Secretary 5
Railroads Again 6

England 7

CORRESPONDENCE:
The Burning of Prizes 9
Corruption in the Massachusetts Legislature 10

NOTES:
Literary 10

The Villa on the Rhine 12
The Life of Audubon 13
Current French Literature 14

CURRENT LITERATURE:
Seats and Saddles, Bits and Bitting.—Aspen Court 16

Books of the Week 16

Terms:—Five Dollars per annum, in advance; Clergymen, Four Dollars.  Remittances at the risk of the subscriber, unless made by draft, check, P. O. money order, or registered letter.

The date of expiration of each subscription is indicated on the printed label. A delay of more than three months in renewing subscriptions will endanger their continuance.

ADDRESS, PUBLISHER OF "THE NATION," BOX 6732, NEW YORK.

PUBLISHING OFFICE, 3 PARK PLACE.

The Week.

ANYTHING makes talk in this dull season, and the papers have utilized Mr. Borie's resignation thoroughly—one enterprising gentleman going so far as to invent for Grant the note in which he accepted the Secretary's resignation. The real note is to be published—to his shame, we were going to say, but that would be doing the gentleman injustice. Of the various rumors most seem to be false, and none of their authors appear, at any rate, to have more than scanty information. Indeed, the most remarkable thing, and perhaps the best thing, about the whole affair was the secrecy of the resignation and of the choice of a successor. Grant thus escaped a great pressure, and probably the country escaped a "statesman;" for we should have had more of Ohio's Favorite Son, and Pennsylvania's Man for the Place would surely have been brought forward by special train and in great numbers, and the unsatisfied Pacific Coast would have begun telegraphing, and there would have been a candidate for every Congressman in Washington—and it is said that, in spite of the heat, a good many were lying there in wait for the President, calculating that his vacation trip would strengthen him and placate him. Perhaps the choice will turn out to have been equally good with this praiseworthy circumstance of the secrecy. Mr. Robeson is spoken of as a man of ability, character, and force of character, and, being a good lawyer, and apparently a selection of Mr. Borie's, it is probable that, what with his energy and legal abilities, and the practical naval experience of Mr. Borie's friend and adviser, Admiral Porter, we shall have the Secretaryship better filled than it was before. That it was ill-filled before we have never seen any evidence at all. Our own taste and Mr. Borie's were not in agreement in the matter of the ships' names that he changed; but we can mention nothing else in which we think he went wrong; and the manner in which he, next after Grant, has been made to bear the brunt of the dissatisfaction of the "disappointed" has been disgraceful. Nothing could be said against Mr. Hoar, little or nothing could be said against Mr. Fish, or General Rawlins, or General Cox, or Mr. Creswell; Mr. Boutwell was let alone at first, because he had so much to give away, and was giving it away after the old fashion, and since, he has been pretty much let alone—except, of course, by the Bulls and Bears, who cannot hurt him—because he has been seen to be doing well. But Mr. Borie, who really had little or nothing to do but take good advice from capable men, and who did that very well, has been so abused, and his superior has been hit so often over his back, that it would be no wonder if he had retired to Philadelphia for the mere sake of getting from under fire. And this, we take it, together with somewhat infirm health, and a lack of love for office, is at the bottom of his resignation—an act which deprives Grant of an honest counsellor, in whom he may well have reposed confidence.

A public reception in honor of General Sickles's appointment as Minister to Spain has been contrived by some of that gentleman's friends, and the correspondence relating to the affair has been published in the papers. There is nothing specially remarkable about it except some of the names appended to the invitation. Several of them are those of men as far "inside politics" of all kinds as General Sickles himself, but there are others which it is a surprise to see at the end of such a document. We presume the list is intended as a sort of informal ratification of the General's appointment, which the Senate is to act upon next winter. But probably there was no need that a whitewashing so expensive to those who engage in it should have been done; the confirmation is reasonably certain, although, to be sure, there is a legal technicality which may perhaps serve the Senate as a means of escape. Still, if men are to be made this and that one of the half-dozen great representatives of the United States abroad for the reason that they have "rendered services to the party in the last campaign," General Sickles's "claims" are so good that he and his friends have no cause for alarm; the Senate has no right, on such a supposition, to reject so accomplished and laborious a speech-maker, and there is very little cause for suspecting it of such an intention. It was hardly worth while, then, for men whose acts are examples to stretch their credit so far as to pay honors to a man who stands publicly accused of many crimes, and who, whether or not he is as guilty as is told of him, has not, so far as we know, made any effective vindication of his character. It is common in his case to point his accusers to his "war record." Of this we are not going to say anything except that, if it covers over his previous political and social record, it does all that can be required of it, and that it affords insufficient reason for making him an observed custodian of our national dignity. A more glaring instance of the sacrifice of everything to the doctrine of "soundness on the main question" which has been at the root of so many misfortunes, and which we have just seen pretty well illustrated by General Sickles's predecessor in Spain, has not for a long time been furnished us.

The preparations for the canvass in various States are bringing out all that the Democrats have to say against the Administration, and all that its friends have to say for it, and the discussion therefore furnishes some interesting reading. The main charge against the Administration is, as might have been expected, the badness of its appointments, some of which are exceedingly bad; but its defenders meet these by a set-off in the shape of great improvements in the work of the Administration. Six hundred clerks have been dismissed from the Treasury since March last, and the new fiscal year will begin with a reduction of $26,000,000 or thereabouts in the cost of the army, owing to a reduction in the number both of soldiers and civilian employees. The present quarter—the last of the fiscal year—will yield, it is announced, $100,000,000, or $20,000,000 more than any quarter under the rule of Andrew Johnson; the whiskey tax, which under that potentate produced but $1,500,000 in May, 1868, in May, 1869, produced $4,500,000, with thirty-six collection districts still unaccounted for; and the results in other departments, though not so remarkable, because in none was the old state of things so bad, are equally satisfactory. The reduction of the debt, too, continues steadily, the decrease in June having been not less than eight millions. This is a very good show; and if we could remove Messrs. Washburne, Sickles, and some others from the foreground, the scene would be one of the fairest which has met the eye of the tax-paying citizen for a long time. The platforms in Maine, Pennsylvania, and Ohio show, however, that no question of deep interest is agitating the public mind. The parties are either too languid even to offer the time-honored guarantee that the pensions of the soldiers and sailors will be punctually paid, or else the unscrupulous persons who have been for so many years trying to cheat them out of their pensions have at last given up the attempt in despair. But the truth appears to be that there is a universal disposition to political repose, and unless we except Maine, where the Temperance party have nominated an independent candidate, there is very little prospect of excitement in any State before the advent of cool weather.

What are the probable results of the contests in the various States which vote early in the fall, it seems impossible to say. It is, of course, early as yet to be making predictions for next October, but it would be nothing astonishing if the Republicans were to lose Pennsylvania and Ohio. In the latter State there is the issue of the ratification or rejection of the pending Constitutional Amendment; and good a Republican State as Ohio is, she seems to have a "scunner" for negroes, and for the sake of preventing the voting of some eight or ten thousand new voters—for that is about all the addition would amount to—she may very likely send up to Columbus a Democratic Legislature. This may put off the adoption of the Amendment for years, and put the Republican party in the somewhat ridiculous attitude of having adopted as a whole what several of its more important parts reject—to say nothing of the failure of the Southern negro's "irrevocable guarantee." We cannot see, either, that there is any satisfaction for anybody in the prospect; even the Democrats, who, ex officio, will have to congratulate the noble yeomen of the Buckeye State for having freed themselves from the party yoke, will have an unagreeable sense of rather yeomanlike logic in the reasoning which, if a man is nine-sixteenths negro, denies him the ballot which he would have without question if he were seven-sixteenths colored and nine-sixteenths white. Pennsylvania is in the hands of the accomplished politicians of that State, and no prophet—of good character—knows anything about the coming election, for no such person could be familiar with the secret counsels of Philadelphia and Harrisburg. The McClure kind of men are belied, or else they want General Geary defeated for the sake of teaching Grant their power. Probably Grant will lose a great deal of sleep when he discovers exactly how strong they are; Pennsylvania's loss of her only place in the Cabinet he seems to have taken with much equanimity, considering his anxiety about the result next October. On the whole, the Democrats have rather more to work for than the Republicans who are not disaffected; and as the Republicans are doing no work at all, we may, before the year is out, have a Governor Hancock in training for 1872.

In the South there is more activity in the political field. How rapidly the disfranchising policy is becoming discredited, and how natural it is that it should fall to pieces under the stress of party contests, is illustrated by the fact that the party of enfranchisement have appeared in still another State; in Texas, the notorious "Jack Hamilton" is up for Governor on his own nomination, and announces himself as a Republican in favor of removing all disabilities. His Radical opponent, Davis, is not a candidate of a regular convention any more than he is, and it is not easy to say what is the opinion of the Texan Republicans upon this important subject. Flake's Bulletin, a journal of ability and conducted with courage, and probably more influential than any other Republican paper in the State, supports Hamilton, though grudgingly, and we suppose his election is likely. It would be worth while to know how much of the apparent willingness of some of the Republicans to remove political disabilities is due to the trucking and dickering of politicians, and how much of it is based on a belief that the late rebels are now to be trusted. Both these causes seem to be at work; but on the whole we are inclined to think that the first is rather more effectual in the South, and that it is up here, away from the border, that the other makes itself felt most forcibly. The Tennessee vote will be valuable as affording indication of the opinion of the Southern portion of the party on this subject. There the voters certainly cannot complain that it has not been put fully before them. The candidates have been all over the State "stumping" from the same platform and drinking whiskey out of the same pitcher, and each proving the other, to the satisfaction of delighted audiences, to be a perjured rebel, a former slaveholder, a coward, and other forms of the incarnate fiend. Mr. Johnson, too, is momently expected on the scene, and the political education of the Tennesseeans may be expected to go on rapidly. Virginia inclines more and more towards Walker, apparently, and away from Wells. The white voters outnumber the black in the registration by an increased majority, and Walker may be expected to get the white vote nearly "solid," it is said; and Hunnicutt will draw off some of the colored vote from Wells. We should say that Mr. Hunnicutt may very probably afford an early instance of what we expect to see quite a number of instances of before many years have passed away—namely, a Southern Radical made the subject of biographical sketches more readable than flattering, written by his whilom political friends. It is a fate that we should be rather sorry to see overtake any of them, as well on account of the material for the biographies and the tone the biographers probably might take; but still it would have a certain instructiveness, and might be useful.

The unfortunate results of allowing the Chief-Justice, or indeed any Judge of the Supreme Court, to be eligible to the Presidency or any high office, we see exemplified now every day in the case of Chief-Justice Chase. As a consequence of his having been an aspirant to the Democratic nomination last summer, and his being still talked of for the same position, he never pronounces a decision in a case possessing the slightest political bearing without being vigorously denounced by one party or another, and the decision ascribed to a desire to help his political prospects. In the recent habeas-corpus cases in Virginia, Judge Underwood pronounced counter-judgments in opposition to them, and was taken up, with all his ignorance and folly, and patted on the back by various journals at the North, just as if he were a rival stump orator, and were "dividing the time" with the Chief during a hot canvass. Suspicion on one side, too, naturally begets confidence on the other; and when the Chief-Justice shows himself anywhere at the South, both parties conclude that he is electioneering, and one calls him out to make balcony speeches, and the other abuses him for making them. The Washington correspondent of the New York Times writes, denouncing these imputations on him, on behalf of his friends—but there is no use now trying to put an end to the stories against him, though their currency is certainly a great scandal.

The bad reputation for veracity which struggling nationalities, especially when of the Latin race, have established for themselves, is still fully maintained by the Cubans, so far as we can tell, and inasmuch as the Spaniards are not much behind them, if indeed they are not probably quite abreast of them, and possibly a little ahead of them, it is as difficult as ever to come to any conclusion as to the prospects of the two parties. Rodas, the new Captain-General, has arrived and made his proclamation, in which, it seems, he had nothing to say to the insurgents; told the volunteers that they had reason to be proud of their past action; and announced that his "platform embraced but three words—Spain, justice, and morality;" which makes a vague enough platform of it. But then it is action that is expected of Rodas, and not words, and he is likely enough to gratify expectation, as he did at Cadiz. He brought with him about a thousand troops, and probably will not be reinforced to any great extent till colder weather. Various small skirmishes are reported, which it is not worth while to pay any attention to, even if they are all that the reporters represent them; and that they are not, everybody will believe till we cease to get Cable news to the effect that "the Cuban army is said to be in good fighting condition, and the leaders are determined to follow up their recent victories, and are confident of success." Yellow fever, which has long been a chief reliance of the insurgents—this is cheering news to the friends of patriot Americans who have gone over—has been making some headway among the Spanish troops, while the insurgent force, being in the mountains, is said to suffer not at all. Here in New York the Junta has come to grief—a steamer of theirs ready for sea having been seized by Marshal Barlow, and all the members of the Junta having been twice arrested. The Spanish Government is apparently well served in this city, and Secretary Fish appears to be doing his duty efficiently, though we do not observe that from the beginning of the trouble the Government has been over-zealous. There has been, on the whole, singularly little talk that anybody regards in favor of our violating our obligations as neutrals; and much of what talk there has been, has been mere talk. The people may be said to be well satisfied with the Government; certainly it has behaved better than our House of Representatives gave it credit for being able to behave when that body paid the country the compliment of passing its "resolution of sympathy," expecting to be applauded for doing so.

The Chicago Tribune says that amongst the good results of the completion of the Pacific Railroad will be the settlement of the question of polygamy in Utah, from meddling with which Congress has so long shrunk. It says the miners, who have up to the present time been kept out of the Territory by Brigham Young's prohibitions, will now pour in in such numbers as to make his prohibitions useless; and once in, they will turn their attention, as they usually do, to the moral reform of the district in which they find themselves. Polygamy they are pretty sure to object to and suppress, on two grounds. One is its sensuality, and the other is its want of fairness as between man and man—giving many wives to the few, and leaving the many wifeless. We are inclined to think, without meaning to cast any imputation on the miners, that it is the last objection to the system which will weigh most powerfully with them. Brigham Young's "sensuality" is no doubt very disgusting; but the mining population of the West, if we have read their history aright, concern themselves but little with the reform of individual character; and if Brigham Young and his followers and a certain number of women choose to maintain improper relations, would not seriously object to it, unless it entailed some inconvenience on the community at large. But there is probably no offence against the general weal which in a young settlement is more likely to be felt and resented than a monopoly of wives. A man taking more than his share of anything an average miner strongly objects to; but by the sight of an individual man making a beast of himself he is only slightly affected, as anybody may satisfy himself by a short sojourn in any mining village. The Mormons are, however, likely to be brought to reason in more ways than one, as the discontented subjects of Young are escaping rapidly by the railroad.

The correspondent who discusses the relations of the Massachusetts Legislature to the railroads, in another column, seems to cherish the idea—which to most New Yorkers, we regret to say, will wear the appearance of an amiable hallucination—that when a committee of the Legislature enquires into the truth of charges of corruption against its members, and declares that it can find no trace of corruption anywhere, it must needs be that the charges are false. The popular impression here, we are sorry to confess, is that in all such proceedings the committee follows the example of Mr. Samuel Weller when he was looking for his father in the gallery of the court-room, in order that Mr. Justice Stareleigh might commit him for contempt; or of the late lamented Admiral Nelson, K.C.B., when he was looking for the signal of recall at Copenhagen; in other words, it either looks up at the ceiling or puts the spy-glass to the blind eye. There are many rural districts in this State which are now familiar with the spectacle of lawyers and farmers going poor to the Legislature and coming back in comfortable circumstances, and indeed making no secret of the accession to their means; and if you suggested to anybody familiar with Albany legislation the possibility that there was no corruption at Albany, or only a little, he would laugh at you, and refuse any longer to talk politics with you, as too simple a person to be worth interchanging ideas with. Nevertheless, there is a corruption enquiry nearly every session, and the committee, strange to say, always report in very much the same terms as the Massachusetts committee. There is a great deal of talk about corruption, they say; and there is little doubt the lobby-men are bad fellows, and by false accounts of their influence on legislators do get money out of the unsuspecting people; but not a cent of it ever reaches the members. This result, however, leaves us in the presence of a greater mystery than any—that is, the existence and growth of the lobby, year after year, and the extraordinary number of cases in which the bills the lobbyists advocate are passed—and passed, too, without debate and in the teeth of public indignation. The "apathy" of the public in this State is largely due to sorrowful experience of the hardened indifference of both lobbyists and legislators to newspaper and pulpit denunciations. By the time the newspapers begin their thunders, the peculators are either in Europe enjoying their plunder, or are busy in erecting churches and almshouses with part of it at home, and could at any time collect a crowd of pious and well-meaning people to stone the editors who assail them.

The news from England relates chiefly to the proposed amendments, by the Lords, of the Irish Church Bill, the plan of concurrent endowments seeming the most definite of any, and perhaps likeliest of adoption. The Alabama discussion has subsided with Mr. Motley's entrance on the scene, and has only been recalled during the week by the Confederate bondholders, who met and protested against certain parts of Mr. Sumner's speech. The reappearance of these unhappy gentlemen is, like the letter of the Laird Brothers, better calculated to excite unpleasant reminiscences than to further a settlement between the two countries. In France, the popular disturbances being over, the Emperor has betaken himself to his customary "glittering generalities" in letters to various persons, and in speeches at the camp at Châlons and at the town of Beauvais. The courts, meantime, have been busy in punishing violations of the press law, Rochefort being visited with a sentence of three years' imprisonment, a fine of 3,000 francs, and loss of citizenship, whether as a voter or a candidate, for three years. A serio-comic incident attended one of these prosecutions. The printer of the Rappel, a M. Schiller, having been seized with a reasonable fear of the tribunals, in view of the probable obnoxious contents of the paper, had refused to keep his agreement, and the conductors, being unable to compel him to it by procuring a judicial order, at length brought an action against him for breach of contract. The court was impartial enough to say that as he deliberately engaged to print the paper and take his chances with the Government, he must pay a fine of 1,000 francs for his breach of contract, notwithstanding the fact that he had just been sentenced by another court to pay a like fine and suffer a month's imprisonment for printing the first of a series of prosecuted articles in the Rappel. M. Schiller is doubtless sure of the sympathy of his fellow-craftsmen wherever his pitiable dilemma is related. The laying of the French Cable has met with uninterrupted success, and its landing at Duxbury, Massachusetts, may be looked for in the course of the next ten days.

The disturbances which broke out in Parma on the night of the national holiday, have been reported in various places during the week, chiefly in the north of Italy—the seat of the late Mazzinian conspiracy—but in Naples of course. What definite aim they have, except to excite hostility to the monarchy, it would be hard to determine. They occur during the recess of Parliament, which certainly did nothing to set an example of concord and self-restraint. Its closing hours were devoted to the appointment of a committee of enquiry into the Civinini-Crispi scandal, of the result of which, if it had any immediate result, the mails have not yet informed us. In the wrangling over the selection and form of proceeding of this committee, the Right seemed to recover something of its previous consistency, but not enough to allow of any important business being transacted after the inquest was fixed upon. The Cabinet had little or nothing to do with even this slight improvement among its natural supporters, and the Permanente voted so independently of it that the Right, as was said, had gained but one vote by the coalition—that of the Minister taken out of the ranks of the Opposition. In the almost universal lamentation of the Pope, in his allocution delivered on Sunday, he might have found some consolation in the present state of Italy, which is certainly not the best that the Kingdom has known, though, as we believe, far from desperate.

THE ADVENT OF THE SOUTHERN BOY.

THE Tribune has of late been offering some very sensible advice to the Southern Unionists in the matter of disfranchisement. It advises them to give it up, partly on the ground that it has done all the good it can be expected to do, and partly on the ground that they will shortly have to give it up whether they will or no; and it declares very truly that the question in all Southern States will very shortly be, not whether the Radicals shall disfranchise the rebels, but whether the rebels will not disfranchise the Radicals. It has to be remembered that it is now four years since Lee laid down his arms, and the sons of the men who fought in the Confederate armies, or are in any way disqualified for voting under the Constitutional Amendment, are rapidly attaining their majority; and the Southern ranks are now receiving every year such reinforcements from this source alone as will, before long, enable them to carry all before them at the polls. Those who were under age during the rebellion cannot be disfranchised; and if anybody supposes that they are reaching man's estate full of love for the Union, and of fraternal affection for the white and colored Unionists of their neighborhood, he cannot know much of the nature of the influence exercised on young minds for some years back by Southern mothers and sisters and Southern clergymen. In fact, we doubt if there be one of the influences—domestic, educational, or social—to which a Southern boy is exposed which has not, since 1865, been instrumental in making him hate Radicalism and Radicals in every shape and form, and in developing in him a firm determination to do what he can to overthrow them, and even to be avenged on them, when he gets an opportunity. The Southern Boy of the last fourteen years is now the Southern man, and he is coming rapidly to the polls; the Constitutional Amendment does not affect him, and he is impervious to the influence of either "speeches" or "documents" from this part of the country. There is nothing surer than that he will shortly have the upper hand, and that when he gets it he will try to "pay off" those of his neighbors who, during the last five or six years, have been keeping his father in "subjection." The Southern Radicals are therefore advised by their friends at the North to make terms with him as speedily as possible—or, at all events, to appease him by letting his father vote at once.

It was the knowledge that the Southern Boy was on his way to political life, and that the state of mind in which he reached it would be a matter of considerable importance to the rest of the country, which made a great many people desirous of having the reconstruction process made as conciliatory as was consistent with its main object; of having wild threats and denunciations banished from Congressional debates upon it; and of having it conducted with at least a show of caution and deliberation, and of anxiety to confine the work of arbitrary interference with local self-government within the narrowest possible limits. For two or three years, however, the ordinary counsels of prudence on these points were totally disregarded. The orators and journals who are now advising the Southern Unionists to make terms with the enemy not only stimulated their bitterness of feeling towards the men with whom they had to live, and on whose good-will they were shortly to be dependent for their safety, but excited amongst them the most extravagant hopes of protection and support from the Federal Government—hopes which they knew well could not be realized. Severe abuse of the Southern Boy and his father became the staple product not of newspapers simply, but of men calling themselves statesmen; and the whole force of the Republican majority was occasionally devoted either to the passage of measures which were utterly without value, except as irritants—such as Mr. Boutwell's great bill to prevent Southern lawyers practising in the Supreme Court—or to creating expectations in the minds of the Southern Radicals that the Union army would be at their backs for an indefinite period, and that, therefore, it was of comparatively little consequence whether they cultivated the ways of peace or not.

We know very well that the leaders in these performances dislike to have them recalled, and consider anybody who does so a very malignant and ill-conditioned person; but then we must remind them that a large part of the value of their performances lies in the material they supply for warning and illustration. The threatening aspect of the Southern Boy is, however, not the only unpleasant sign in the Southern sky. The reports of the general condition of Southern sentiment and society are far from favorable. There are evident signs everywhere of a revival of political life. The dogged apathy which followed the interference of Congress with the Presidential policy of reconstruction is rapidly passing away. The most rabid extremists are making up their minds to adapt themselves to the situation, accept such constitutions as are acceptable, and, having once got the States into their own hands, drive their enemies out of office and manage their affairs in their own way. When even Mosby, the guerilla, announces that he now holds it to be his duty to register and vote in Virginia for the adoption of the new constitution as about to be submitted by Grant, we are warranted in fearing that the ultra-Radicals all over the South have troublous times before them, and that the last five years' disfranchisement, gratifying as it may have been to the sense of justice, was not a very valuable piece of policy after all from the practical politician's point of view. The story goes, too, that a trustworthy correspondent of the Tribune, who has been travelling in the South for that journal, has been compelled to request the suppression of his letters till his return, owing to the bad accounts he had been obliged to give of the state of society and the unpleasant indications of the existence and activity of the Ku-klux which he has met with in various places. On the other hand, we receive from others whose business or pleasure has happened to lead them into Virginia and other parts of the South, the strongest assurances that "it is perfectly peaceful and tranquil, as much so as any Northern State." The probabilities are that the experience of each traveller depends somewhat on his way of looking at things and on his character. A man going down there with strong Radical prepossessions would doubtless find a great deal to discourage, if not alarm him; while one who sympathized with the Southerners, if not in their political sentiments, at least in their sufferings, would be most impressed by their air of resignation. On one point we have found no difference of opinion amongst trustworthy witnesses, and we have examined some whose sole object in remaining at the South is the education and elevation of the freedmen, and that is, that the character of the active politicians who have gone down there from the North under the Radical régime, and of the officers whom they have put into power, might be better than it is. Whichever story be the more correct, we think there can be little doubt that we are approaching a period once more of considerable disturbance, in which black and white Unionists will have to take some very hard knocks, and in which the Southern Boy will behave in a turbulent manner. What ought we to do with the Young Man? We honestly confess we do not well see what can be done with him, except trust to time and the various educating influences which are now at work in the South to civilize him. There are various reasons, too, for feeling hopeful about him. One is, that he must hereafter be industrious. He cannot live, as his father did, on the labor of other people, and he will never again find the post-office and custom-house of his country the sure refuge from the storms of Southern life which they once were. Moreover, he cannot very long shield himself from the influence of Northern books and newspapers. The addition of the negroes to the free reading population would alone be sufficient to open the floodgates and let the pestilential waters in upon him. Even if he does not read himself, he will breathe in the very air the doctrines on which modern states live. Moreover, he will find out, before he has been very long engaged in business for himself, that he cannot make money unless he behaves well and lets his neighbors alone; that turbulence "depresses values," as they say in Wall Street; and that the way of the rowdy in free societies is exceedingly hard and uncomfortable, owing to his having to "wait upon himself," and keep his own clothes in order, and procure the money to pay for them. It will be better, we are satisfied, to let him get his political and social training in this way than by laying the country around him waste every time he commits an outrage, or governing him for an indefinite period by martial law. What he has had of martial law has, we are satisfied, done him good. It has made him, bad as he is, a philosopher and a Christian compared to what his father and grandfather were, and has given him views of justice and of law and of the ends of civilized society which he could never have got from books, nor even from speeches, which in the South have always stood higher than books.

MR. BOUTWELL AS SECRETARY.

Neither Mr. Boutwell's individual antecedents, nor the common characteristics of the class of professional politicians to which he belongs, led us to anticipate, when he was appointed Mr. Stewart's successor, that his career as Secretary of the Treasury would furnish much occasion for our approval. After four months' experience of his financial administration, we do not hesitate to admit that, as far as his measures are concerned, we are agreeably disappointed. No brilliant strokes of genius, no enunciation of broad financial theories, no startling changes of administrative policy, no bold and flattering promises, have marked his course. But intelligible, business-like purposes, frankly announced in advance and faithfully adhered to, a consistent recognition of the law as his only and imperative guide, and an equally consistent disregard of that kind of popular clamor which is almost always due only to the selfishness of influential individuals, and which is so often pleaded as an excuse for official vacillation and tergiversation—these characteristics of Secretary Boutwell's administration up to the present time have gone far towards vindicating Gen. Grant's wisdom in the selection of a man who certainly at the outset did not inspire very general confidence. It is doubly interesting at this moment to examine the recent doings of the Secretary, because the indiscriminating abuse of his partisan opponents and the indiscriminating praise of his partisan friends have so obscured the facts in the case that no two intelligent people can be found to agree as to what he has really done. The intuitional financiers of the "On to Specie Payments" school, who look upon a Secretary of the Treasury only as a supremely endowed fighting missionary sent forth by the rural districts forcibly to convert the wicked gold-gamblers of Wall Street into competitors for strawberry prizes, who danced with joy each time the Treasury sold a million of gold, and shouted themselves hoarse with their demand for "double and treble doses," have made many thoughtless people believe that Mr. Boutwell was engaged in a blind but successful crusade against a special and essential, but really rather insignificant, part of the financial community; while the brilliant frondeurs of the opposite political camp have persistently sought to explain his every move as part of a corrupt organized plan to break down the price of the Western farmers' wool in the interest of New England cloth manufacturers, and have converted every unsuccessful merchant into a helpless victim of the Secretary's infatuated contraction policy. These are specimens of the various interpretations put by friend and foe upon official Treasury measures which, in the nature of things, cannot be readily understood by the great majority of even intelligent readers. The facts are these:

In the first place, let Mr. Boutwell have credit for the attempt to restore to our financial management that first and most essential element of purity—official secrecy. Few persons outside of the limited inner circle of the financial world can form even a remote estimate of the corruption growing out of what has been aptly termed "Treasury leaks." It is evident that the complicated arrangements involved in important Treasury transactions will necessarily make any proposed transaction known to several officials before it can be publicly announced. It is equally evident that such transactions must necessarily produce important changes in the market value of gold, bonds, or other securities. Now, it is scarcely too much to say that for years past certain men have been regularly and systematically in possession of knowledge concerning proposed Treasury transactions, hours and sometimes days in advance of their official publication, and have been enabled thereby to reap enormous profits at the expense of the community at large. This system the present Secretary has, if not yet entirely abolished, certainly reduced to far less formidable proportions. It is true that grave suspicions rest on the Department somewhere of having betrayed the most recent of Mr. Boutwell's orders in relation to purchases of bonds and sales of gold; but the authorship of the wrong is limited to one or other of a very small number of persons, and we trust the Secretary, out of regard for his rising reputation and the public good, will not rest until the wrong-doer is discovered and severely punished. But, on the whole, the last four months of Treasury administration stand conspicuous for an absence of corruption and jobbery that is alike encouraging to the public and creditable to the Secretary. Every important operation has been announced to the public a reasonable time in advance of its execution, and every announcement has been rigidly adhered to; and to-day every citizen interested in the national finances knows what the important transactions of the Treasury will be during the coming months, and can regulate his affairs accordingly.

The principal official act of the present Secretary has been the purchase of about ten millions of United States bonds. The manner of buying these bonds, from the lowest bidder at regular public sale after sufficient previous announcement, leaves nothing to be desired. The wisdom of the step is a different question. On Mr. Boutwell's accession to office, he found over $115,000,000 in coin and currency in the Treasury, which were lying entirely idle, producing nothing to the Government or to the country, and involving an annual loss of interest to the people of $7,000,000 or $8,000,000. There was but one opinion among all classes, that measures must be found to utilize this immense accumulation of cash, and relieve to that extent the burden borne by the people in the payment of the interest. Congress, the only law-making power, had provided only one single method by which this object could be accomplished, and that was the purchase of bonds for the Sinking Fund. Not only was this the only method of legally employing a portion of the surplus funds of the Treasury, but the law actually enjoined the Secretary, without reference to his having surplus funds or not, to purchase a certain amount of bonds annually, one per cent. of the total amount of the debt, for the purpose of creating a sinking fund. This injunction of the law had been—excusably enough, perhaps—entirely disregarded by Mr. McCulloch, and it is very probable that Mr. Boutwell would have been similarly excused for disobeying it, had similar good reasons existed therefor. But there is not one single valid reason for failing to comply with the law; on the contrary, obedience to this particular law was and is the sole legal means open to the Secretary for complying with the just wishes of the people, and profitably employing a portion of his idle cash balances. It is, as far as any action of the Treasury is concerned, entirely futile to discuss the various measures proposed for accomplishing this end, for the Secretary had no authority to adopt any of them. The only measure open to him was the one prescribed by law, and that measure was imperative on him, even if his judgment had been opposed to any employment whatsoever of his surplus funds. It is, then, in obedience to an imperative law of Congress that Mr. Boutwell has purchased during the last ten weeks about nine millions of 5-20 bonds, at a cost to the Treasury of about ten and one-half millions of dollars in currency.

During the same period of time the Treasury has sold—and this is the second important measure of Mr. Boutwell's administration—fifteen millions of gold, which have brought into the Treasury about twenty and one-half millions of currency, or about ten millions more than were expended in the purchase of bonds for the Sinking Fund. It is on this subject, more than on any other connected with the national finances, that the public mind is persistently befogged by partisan writers and prejudiced theorists. Habitual readers of these columns need not be reminded that the currency revenues of the country are below its currency expenditures, and that the receipts in gold coin, on the contrary, exceed the requirements for coin. It is, therefore, under existing laws, at all times an imperative necessity for the Treasury to sell a portion of its coin receipts, in order to meet its current requirements for currency expenditures. Foolish friends have praised, and foolish enemies have blamed, the Secretary for these very sales of gold which were an absolute necessity. He has been praised for their supposed injury to the gold-gamblers—of whom, by the way, just as many are benefited by a decline as are injured by it—and he has been blamed for the injury and inconvenience supposed to accrue to the whole mercantile community from the scarcity of money consequent upon the large sums of currency going into the Treasury in payment of the gold sold. We have seen that the Government has paid out for bonds bought somewhat less than eleven millions, and has received for gold sales less than twenty-one millions, making an excess of receipts of about ten millions of dollars. This is the total amount of the currency withdrawn from the market by the Treasury during four months, in consequence of its purchases of bonds and sales of gold. On the 1st of March, a few days before Mr. Boutwell went into office, the currency balance in the Treasury was seventeen millions. According to the last advices from Washington, the currency balance is now twenty-nine millions, an increase of twelve millions during the four months. Of these twelve millions, ten are, as we have seen, due to the excess from gold sales, showing that during the last four months the regular currency receipts have exceeded the regular currency expenditures by only two millions. This period includes the collection of the income-tax, which furnishes the largest amount of currency receipts by the Treasury during an equal period of time. During the period, therefore, of the heaviest regular currency receipts, the latter exceeded the regular currency expenditures by only two millions, showing clearly how largely the expenditures will exceed the regular receipts during the months when the latter are light. It is for these months that the currency has to be provided in advance, and there is no other method of obtaining it than by the sales of surplus gold revenues. The time for making these sales is, and must be, left to the discretion of the Secretary; and Mr. Boutwell has undoubtedly used his discretion well in selling a liberal amount of gold during the summer months, when business is dull, when the trade of the country requires least currency, and the currency itself can best be spared to be locked up in the Treasury for future use.

It is very true that during the time of the Secretary's gold sales money has been far from abundant; has, on the contrary, been scarcer and more difficult to obtain than at almost any period since 1861. But it does not necessarily follow that that scarcity has been caused by the operations of the Treasury. It has not; the true causes are different, and are well known. Misled by many reckless writers and interested speculators, the Western farmers refused to sell their crops last fall as they should have done, and have consequently been compelled to throw them upon the market this summer in great haste and in unprecedented quantities. The money required to move the grain crops alone is probably double the amount withdrawn by the Treasury—the single city of Chicago having received six millions of currency from the East since the summer crop movement began. In addition to the permanent drain of currency to the South, there has been an extra demand for currency from all parts of the country, to carry on the various speculations in grain, and wool, and real estate, and railroad enterprises; and, besides all these, the feverish and desperate speculation in securities of all kinds at the great financial centres has required this summer more money than ever before. These causes are sufficient to account for any scarcity of money, without reference to the additional ten millions gone into the Treasury. But even if the scarcity had been wholly due to the operations of the Secretary, it would still have been prudent in him to gather in the currency now; for if money is tight now, in the dull summer season, it is likely that it would and will be much more so in the fall; and to have postponed the bulk of the gold sales until then would have exposed the money market to much worse complications than it has now had to contend with.

To resume: the purchases of bonds for the Sinking Fund have been made in accordance with an imperative law, and in a manner perfectly satisfactory to the business community, and conducive to the best interests of the country. The most of the gold sales were unavoidable in order to procure the currency to pay for the bonds so purchased without further reducing the already dangerously low currency balance in the Government vaults. The rest of the gold sales, netting to the Treasury about $10,000,000 in greenbacks, were equally necessary, but might have been postponed until later in the season. In making these sales now the Secretary has, we think, shown good judgment; for, although they no doubt somewhat aggravated the prevailing monetary stringency, their influence in this direction has been very much exaggerated, and would have been far worse had they been postponed until the fall. So far, then, we think Mr. Boutwell's management of the financial affairs of the Treasury entitled to our sincere commendation.

RAILROADS AGAIN.

In commenting two weeks since on the apathy of the public on the subject of railroad corruption, we made a misstatement which, though it had no bearing on the general truth of our remarks, we are glad to take an early opportunity to correct. It was not true that the $10,000 paid by the president of the Boston, Hartford, and Erie Railroad as hush-money was given to a member of the Legislature; it was paid, however, as the published testimony of the president shows, to influence legislation. We might be content, as this is a local matter, chiefly of interest to the taxpayers of Massachusetts, to let it drop here; but the letter of our correspondent, published in another column, makes it necessary for us to justify our remarks at greater length; and for that purpose we propose to give a short account of the rise, progress, and present condition of the Boston, Hartford, and Erie Railroad. We are all the more glad to do so, inasmuch as the State which encourages the practices we are about to describe has heretofore borne a reputation, if not above reproach, at least above the reproach of those who live in New York, and it is much to be wished that she might continue to do so.

Two years ago the Boston, Hartford, and Erie Railroad was a half-built line, anxious to get money from some quarter for the purpose, its friends alleged, of enabling it to complete its road to Fishkill in this State, and here it was to connect with the Erie. It went before the Legislature, and the arguments of eminent counsel, seconded by the general feeling that this new road would develop the resources of the State, were strong enough to procure the passage of an act lending $3,000,000 in gold to the company on certain conditions. For every $200,000 properly expended in the construction of new road, and in the purchase of equipment, scrip to the amount of $100,000 was to be delivered to the company; but it was made necessary for the company to show the propriety of their expenditure to the satisfaction of the Governor and Council and three commissioners appointed under the act. For every $100,000 of scrip so issued, the company was to "put up"—or, in other words, deliver—to the Treasurer of the Commonwealth, as security, $133,333 33⅓ in its bonds. By Section 6 of the act, the Governor and Council were to appoint three commissioners, one of whom was to be a competent civil engineer, to ascertain the amount of work performed, and the expenditures properly incurred, "and to advise and inform the Governor and Council in reference to all matters and things they are called upon to ascertain or verify under the terms and provisions of this act." By Section 7 of the act, the issue of scrip was not to begin until it should be made to appear to the satisfaction of the Governor and Council and Commissioners that the company would be able, either alone or with the aid of parties other than the State, to complete a line of railway from Boston to Fishkill; and the issue of scrip was to stop if at any time it should appear that a through line would not be so completed in five years. On the passage of the act, three commissioners were appointed—Judge Bigelow, late chief-justice of the State; Mr. Washburne, late governor of the State; and Mr. S. Ashburner, "a competent civil engineer." Under the provisions of the law, these gentlemen proceeded to make an investigation into the condition of the company, in order to see whether it would be able to complete its road to Fishkill; and it was while this investigation was going on that $10,000 were paid by J. S. Eldridge, president of the road, to a Mr. Thomas Drew, as hush-money, to prevent the publication by Mr. Drew of statements which Eldridge was afraid would influence the commissioners' report. Drew was a journalist, who had entered into a conspiracy to depress the price of the stock of the Boston, Hartford, and Erie by means of the publication of certain statements about the condition of the road, which Judge Bigelow, Mr. Washburne, and Mr. Ashburner were then investigating. According to the testimony taken by the Committee on Corruption to which we referred in our last article, Eldridge sent for Drew, and procured the destruction of the statements by paying him $10,000. As to one of his objects in paying this same, we give Mr. Eldridge's own words (Evidence, p. 12):

"Q. Was the matter of the loan at that time before the Governor and Council?

"A. No, sir, except in this form. I think that the commissioners had been appointed, and that Governor Washburne and Judge Bigelow were then examining our various matters. They were making an investigation. We had nothing to conceal from the commissioners.

"Q. This money was not paid to have any influence upon the Governor and Council, or to prevent his stating anything that might influence them?

"A. I don't know but all that might have entered into my mind. I thought the influence everywhere would have been temporarily bad."

Now, when money is loaned to a railroad on condition that the company shall furnish proof to commissioners that its finances are in such a condition as to enable it to complete its line, and when, while the commissioners are making their investigation, the president of the company pays a large sum of money for the destruction of papers purporting to contain facts injurious to the credit of the road, we ask whether it can be said that this money was not paid to "influence legislation." The fact that this was what Mr. Eldridge calls a "personal matter," and does not appear on the books of the company, may be true, but is without point. That the money was not paid to a legislator, we are very glad to admit; but the assertion of our correspondent that it had "no reference whatever to legislation," we deny. We repeat that we are amazed at the audacity of the committee's report Let us quote a few words from it:

"The committee in their several investigations are satisfied that the influence of the lobby (so-called) is greatly overestimated. A certain number of persons, known as lobby members, receive very considerable sums of money from corporations and other parties having business before the Legislature. In the opinion of the committee, this influence is not legitimate in matters of legislation.

"The parties referred to as lobbymen are not lawyers, and have no legitimate professional calling at the Capitol; but are supposed to have more or less influence in private talks and conversations by partial presentation of matters to individual members."

Does the committee really expect the public to believe that the influence of these lobbymen is exerted through a commanding personal appearance and attractive manners? The best of the whole thing is that the witnesses summoned before the committee were, with not more than one or two insignificant exceptions, all lobbyists and railroad men.

To return to the Boston, Hartford, and Erie: After Eldridge had settled his "personal matter" with Drew, nothing of importance occurred until the commissioners made their report, in which they stated their conclusion to be that the company could build the road as the act of 1867 required. Payments under the act now began; but not more than $660,000 scrip had been issued when the commissioners, becoming doubtful as to the financial condition of the road, made a new investigation, and discovered that some two millions of dollars, which they had relied upon as making it possible for the company to finish their road in five years, had been quietly invested in speculations in the company's own stock. It could not be reached; it was useless. This fact the commissioners reported to the Governor and Council, who decided that payments under the act might be continued if a certain number of the richest directors would file a bond with the State Treasurer, obliging themselves personally to produce this two millions when it might be needed for the completion of the road. Under this state of facts, the company applies to the State for a new loan of $2,000,000, urging its poverty as an excuse; and the Governor, instead of making the obvious suggestion that, if $2,000,000 were needed for the completion of the road, the signers of the bond had better produce the amount, actually engineered the bill through the Legislature. So our correspondent informs us, and so we have every reason to believe. And through all this, the commissioners appointed two years before to protect the interest of the State are not summoned to give evidence on the subject. Eldridge is summoned; and, as we said before, without one scintilla of evidence before it except Eldridge's testimony, the Railroad Committee report a bill. That two or three persons besides Eldridge may have appeared and spoken in the committee-room subsequently to the writing of our former article, is very possible; but they uttered Eldridge's words and spoke with his voice. It will be seen from what we have said before that there could have been no real evidence in the case. Besides all this, notwithstanding the statement of our correspondent, we still doubt the fact. But the whole matter is of the most trifling importance. The fact of real importance is that the bill was hustled through in the last days of the session, without any hearing on the part of the commissioners—three gentlemen specially appointed "to advise and inform the Governor and Council"—and that this was done simply on the faith of representations made by Eldridge, a man who testifies that he paid ten thousand dollars to procure the suppression of statements likely to exercise an unfavorable influence on the first report of the commissioners. Governor Claflin's policy with regard to the South Boston flats we care nothing about. He may convert South Boston into a garden of delight; yet those who care more for the credit of Massachusetts than for the rise in value of her taxable property will forget that, and remember only the means which were taken to accomplish it.

We have gone at some length into this matter, and we believe we have made good all our assertions in connection with the loan to the Boston, Hartford, and Erie, except the charge brought against the Legislature that Drew was a member of it; and we must say again that the apathy of the public with regard to this kind of legislation is indeed astonishing. We have had no intention of accusing Massachusetts of the same unblushing corruption that is practised in this State. But affairs like that of the Boston, Hartford, and Erie loan pave the way for worse things. The "men inside politics" come from just the same class in Massachusetts as elsewhere. They are ignorant they have no sense of responsibility, they are in the hands of great corporations. Governor Claflin's honesty is not doubted, yet we have seen what operations he considers admissible. Let us mention, as an illustration, that he is now director on the Boston and Albany Railroad—a corporation perpetually making contracts with the State; in case of any negotiation between the two, he "trades with himself." Nothing wrong comes of this, doubtless; but what should we say of a broker or lawyer who acted for both parties in a transaction? Yet a governor does it without attracting even passing attention. So it is in other cases: Mr. Richardson, now Assistant-Secretary of the Treasury, still holds his office as Judge of Probate in Massachusetts, though it is manifestly impossible for him to discharge properly the duties of both; and we must say that he can hardly be blamed for doing it, as nobody seems to care. Of course, if the public is indifferent to the spectacle, the spectacle will go on. We have taken as instances men whose integrity no one doubts; if the public permits its governors and judges to do these things, what does it suppose is going on in the lower walks of politics? Log-rolling is going on; wire-pulling is going on; and very soon open bribery will come into fashion.

Our assertion about the three other railroads which were mentioned in our last article, we can only repeat. The Massachusetts Central scheme was defeated because the apathy of the public did not exist in that case—papers like the Boston Advertiser denounced it, and it fell through. When we wrote, it was still uncertain whether it would pass or not. The statement that the scheme was to give "to the rest no one knew precisely how much" was a true statement, and we could not have a better proof of this than the assertion of our correspondent that the object of the bill affecting the Boston and Albany Railroad was simply to enable it to "get to deep water on paying for the way." It was not quite so simple; it authorized an increase of the capital stock of the company by eight millions. The act incorporating the Great Northern authorized an increase of stock by fifty millions, and the "proper restrictions" which, according to our correspondent, "have been put in to secure the public against the watering of stock," are the appointment of "commissioners." What kind of restriction this will be if the road is dishonestly managed, may be inferred from the history of the Boston, Hartford, and Erie. That there was a combination to press these bills may be inferred from the fact that the Boston and Albany is a rival of the Boston, Hartford, and Erie, and yet did not oppose its new bill. As to our use of the word "give," any one may see by the context that we used it, as it is frequently used, as a synonym of "loan." We did not mean to say that the Legislature was so infatuated as to present gratuities of two millions to railroad companies.

ENGLAND.—THE PROSPECTS OF THE PEERS.

LONDON, June 11, 1869.

THE long days of summer are beginning, and some of us are already casting our eyes towards the pleasant country fields of England or planning trips abroad. Indeed, we have had one or two of those rare days on which we may say, with a good conscience, that it is rather too hot to be pleasant. But members of Parliament must dwell upon no pleasant dreams of vacation. A struggle may begin in a few days which will far exceed in interest anything that we have witnessed in recent years. There are even dark forebodings, which would indicate that peers and commoners may have to desecrate the sacred days of August and September, when the shooting season opens for grouse and partridges, by attending to their legislative duties. The question is now before us, what will the peers do in the matter of the Irish Church? A meeting was held a few days back, at which most of the Conservative members of the House of Lords were present, and an animated discussion took place. The most courageous course was advocated by Lord Derby and Lord Cairns, who proposed to throw out the bill on the second reading. Cooler counsels were suggested by a sensible minority, represented by Lord Cranbourne and Lord Carnarvon; but the sense of the greater number appeared to be impressed by the feeling of resistance at all hazards. There will probably, it is admitted, be a secession from the Conservative ranks; but it is doubted whether in sufficient numbers to turn the scale. All sorts of rumors have been flying about. The Standard, as the Tory organ, committed itself at one moment to the propriety of concession; but its courage has since been rising. The Times has oscillated according to its nature, and one day positively asserts that the peers will be reasonable, and on the next asserts as positively that they will hold out. What will be the end?

It is useless to prophesy, inasmuch as before you get this letter you will learn the result by that objectionable telegraphic wire which is always cutting away the ground from under the feet of correspondents. Yet I will venture, at the risk of being confuted by anticipation, to say one thing I have always held, that the peers would give way; and I have thought so, not so much from any loftier considerations, as from the simple reason that it is obviously the interest of the Conservative party. It will remove from the Liberal platform the one topic upon which they are unanimous, and give a chance to Mr. Disraeli and his friends of profiting by the divisions of their opponents. Moreover, there is always in the background the unpleasant question, what is the good of the House of Lords? which it is not desirable to bring into prominence. I therefore believe—though I think its present indications are perhaps the other way—that the peers will allow the bill to pass by a small majority, and trust to taking the sting out of it by amendments. In short, I shall not believe, until I see it, that our hereditary legislators will have the courage to oppose themselves to the pronounced opinion of the people. If I am right, there may still be a good deal of skirmishing, but not a pitched battle.

As, however, I am very likely to be wrong, I will just notice the probable course of the contest which would ensue upon a rejection of the bill. The old-fashioned plan of bringing the Upper House to reason by refusing the supplies, is obviously impossible. We have got beyond the time at which such tricks can be played with the credit of the country. The next mode of warfare would be the creation of enough peers to carry the measure; or, as in the case of the Reform Bill of 1832, the threat of creating them; for probably, if the intention were known, the peers would save their order from pollution at the expense of their principles. It seems, however, more likely that a different scheme would be adopted, which would probably produce the desired effect. The same bill cannot be introduced twice in the session; but Parliament might be prorogued for a short time; a new session would be held in August, and the same bill would be passed without any discussion from the Liberal benches, and sent up as a summons to the House of Lords. Under this pressure, it is supposed that they would probably submit, without venturing to provoke any more dangerous expedients. This, at any rate, is the device most in favor at present; and it would amount to giving the Upper House one more place of repentance. I hope, however, that the necessity may be avoided, if only that we may waste no more precious time over the wearisome debates, which are stopping the way of all useful legislation. I confess to being heartily sick of the subject; and I fancy that my disgust is shared by the great majority of mankind. The Irish Protestant Dissenters have been agitating against the bill, and have stirred a certain number of bishops and lay peers into spasmodic excitement; but to discuss the matter seriously has long become an impossibility, and the only interest concerns the possible effect of the contest on the future of the House of Lords. Symptoms are not wanting of coming danger.

A bill which I mentioned some time ago, for permitting the creation of life-peers, is getting through the Upper House, though so mutilated by the jealousy of that assembly as to be of little value, unless as the "thin end of the wedge." A certain light has been lately thrown upon the subject from a very different quarter. The Duke of Newcastle, whose father was a liberal and intelligent minister, has succeeded in following the steps of the Marquis of Hastings. He has managed, that is, to ruin himself hopelessly by keeping race-horses and betting on the turf. How many thousands of pounds he has thrown away, I know not; but he has nothing whatever left except the income secured to his wife. The moral which, I need hardly say, has been drawn for his benefit in numerous leading articles, is twofold. In the first place, his fate is only one more illustration of the thoroughly disreputable condition of the turf. Upon that topic I need not enlarge, beyond remarking that it seems rather inconsistent to suppress gambling-tables when a system far more generally demoralizing is left in public operation, and patronized by our highest nobility. But, secondly, the event makes the absurdity of a hereditary peerage very inconveniently palpable at the present moment. Here is a young gentleman of whom we know this fact alone: that he has managed to waste a fine property in a very few years in a disreputable amusement. We may presume, from the general habits of his class (I know nothing about him personally), that his mind was probably a blank on all subjects except the state of the odds, and, it may be, a few scraps of Latin and Greek painfully drilled into him at Eton. This youth has a right to a voice in the most important legislative questions which is equal to that of Mr. Disraeli or Mr. Gladstone; and he and his like are threatening to throw the whole business of the nation out of gear because they are too stupid to understand certain first principles of politics. I do not mean to argue the general political question, but it must be admitted that such instances bring out the weak points of the institution in such a way that he who runs may read; and if he does n't, there are plenty of people to read it for him. Lord Carnarvon, who is a very intelligent Conservative, said the other night that a great defect of the House of Lords was the absence of a censorial power: no peer could be deprived of his dignity, however much he might have disgraced his order. The defect is indeed a marked one; yet it indicates one much greater. A censor might turn out peers who have created scandals; but what censor could get rid of the stupidity, thoughtlessness, and want of reasonable education which is characteristic, not of one or two individuals, but of a large proportion of the House? The Duke of Newcastle is a frivolous youth, who has got into a scrape; but frivolous youths who have kept out of scrapes are not a bit better fitted for legislation. The fact is that our peers, having lost the influence which they once possessed, have also lost the chief stimulus for exertion; and they are deficient in the energy and spirit which well-nigh redeemed the theoretical defects of an aristocracy. Lord Derby shows the high courage of a genuine noble; and if there were a few more such men as Lord Cranbourne, the peers, with their strong hold both on the snobbishness and the honest conservatism of the nation, might look forward to a long lease of power. Unluckily, when they do distinguish themselves, it is too often after the fashion which a groom or a gamekeeper might be expected to exhibit on receiving an unexpected inheritance. The eminent lawyers or statesmen who come to them from the Lower House frequently give importance and value to their debates; but the peers are losing in moral weight, and changes may come sooner than we had generally expected. The progress of the Irish Church Bill may stir some awkward questions, though I am still inclined to think that the difficulty will, in one way or the other, be tided over for the present. The action of the peers is at present the one subject of much political interest. The Alabama question has been partly forgotten. Mr. Motley has said nothing, except his answer to an address on arriving at Liverpool, and intends, I believe, to avoid public dining. Indeed, we have had a lesson on that subject which will be a check upon orators for some time to come. Debates turn upon questions of compound householding, union rating, poor-law amendment, army reserves, and other points which I should almost despair of making intelligible to transatlantic readers; nor does any one pay much attention to them here. Perhaps, however, I may mention one matter which is beginning to excite a good deal of interest—the boat-race between the students of Harvard and our Oxford and Cambridge crews. I wish the Harvard men all good fortune short of absolute victory, for which my patriotic feelings are not sufficient. But I can promise them, with great confidence, that they will receive a welcome which I hope can be open to no misconstruction. The international struggle will, on this occasion at least, excite nothing but good feeling amongst us, and they will have every chance that our crowded and narrow rivers will permit. The athletic mania which has taken possession of us shows no symptoms of declining. Every boat-race at Oxford or Cambridge is attended by greater crowds of spectators than its predecessors. The passion for running, walking, jumping, and the enthusiasm for cricket-matches, seem to increase daily. We are all going mad after velocipedes; and the ordinary English youth is devoted to every species of muscular exertion with a zeal which shows no symptoms of decline. The American oarsmen come at a bad season of the year; but they will probably find themselves greater heroes, especially if they do well, than they could be in their own country. Whether this enthusiasm is a good or a bad symptom, I shall not venture to pronounce; certainly in its excesses it threatens to turn our schools into gymnasiums instead of places of learning; but I confess to a sneaking regard for athletics of all kinds; and though our tone is often exaggerated, there are, I think, some undeniably good points about it. One of them, I feel sure, will be the extension of very general hospitality to our expected guests.

Correspondence.

THE BURNING OF PRIZES.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: In your remarks (June 3) on my letter to the Hartford Courant, you make two points—one of fact, the other of law.

As to the first, in saying that the rebels had Courts of Admiralty, you were right so far as the establishment of them by the Confederate Constitution goes; and when I said they had not, if I had explicitly added, not to any practical effect (through the operation or alleged operation of our blockade), I should have expressed my meaning with verbal as well as substantial correctness.

As to the second point, in asserting that the proceedings of the rebel cruisers were "piratical in their nature," I assumed that public law is against such proceedings. This you contradict. The question is, of course, one not to be settled by assertion or counter-assertion, but by reference to the established convention of nations. What you advance in the way of authority and argument does not seem to me to settle it.

You say, "Prize courts exist, in fact, for the protection of neutrals." Suppose it to be so, to the exclusion of every other consideration, would that preclude or determine the question whether the general rule of public law obliges belligerent cruisers to carry in their prizes for adjudication? I take it, not.

Equally inconclusive as to this question, it seems to me, is the quotation from Mr. Dana. It is undeniably true that, as he says, "a trial by a prize tribunal is not a right that enemies can claim, nor a duty to them;" but what of that? Does it follow that there is no reason for carrying enemy's property to a prize tribunal? Mr. Dana intended no such inference to be drawn. It is no less undeniable that "if it be assumed that all captures are enemy's property, there need be no prize courts." But what of that? Who is there that holds that all captures may be assumed to be enemy's property? Not Mr. Dana, nor anybody else. Public law has established prize courts, and presumably upon the very ground that it has no right to assume or grant to belligerent governments the right to assume that all captures are enemy's property. That is the only proper inference.

Public law allows, indeed, a lawful cruiser to capture a vessel under an enemy's flag. But what then? What after it becomes a capture? You say it is "the principle of international law that enemy's property captured at sea vests instanter in the captor, to keep or destroy as he sees fit." I find no such doctrine anywhere laid down in the books. If such be the principle of the law, the law is at variance with its principle.

On the question when the property of a captured vessel vests in the captor, authorities are divided. Voet says the title passes immediately to the captor; Bynkershoek that a firm possession vests it in the captor. But Grotius and other writers, and the ordinances of France and of the United States, make twenty-four hours' quiet possession the test of title by capture. Lord Stowell says it "has been the prevailing doctrine" that twenty-four hours' possession, or the bringing of the vessel infra præsidia, is necessary. Phillimore lays it down that, "by the modern usage of states, neither the twenty-four hours nor the bringing of the prize infra præsidia is sufficient to change the property of a captured vessel;" and this, he thinks, is "not matter of regret" (Phillimore, "International Law," iii. 339).

From this it appears that the instanter vesting of the title is not an established doctrine of international law. But no matter for that; the more important question for my purpose is, whether the vesting of the title in the captor—be it instanter or not—is such a vesting as, by public law, to allow the commander of a cruiser who has, or avers that he has, no doubt about his capture being enemy's property, "to keep or destroy it as he sees fit," arbitrarily or for any reason of convenience? I find no where in the authorities a line or a word that gives the shadow of such an allowance. On the contrary (see Dana's "Wheaton," p. 480 et seq., and Phillimore's "International Law," iii. 340), it is expressly and clearly made obligatory on all belligerent sovereigns to decide, in certain established modes, on the lawfulness of all captures made by their agents, and on all cruisers to bring in their prizes for adjudication as soon as possible, and that nothing but "some reason of necessity" (and not any consideration of mere inconvenience or difficulty) can excuse a commander for disobeying the law.

Such appears to be the law of nations on this subject. And to me it seems to have good reason in the nature of the case. Only through the operation of such a law can the responsibility of sovereign belligerents be well ascertained; and by holding commanders of cruisers to obedience to it, the commonwealth of nations obtains a measure of guaranty—otherwise impossible—against the piratical plunder and destruction of vessels not the enemy's, on the high seas.

The rebels in the late war do not seem to have questioned the obligation imposed by public law as here laid down. The justification alleged by them for not attempting to obey it was the blockade of their ports by the United States—although private merchant vessels were constantly incurring the hazard of running the blockade. But I am of opinion—and Mr. Dana's authority (v. ut sup., p. 487) is certainly not one to be cited to the contrary—that belligerents who have in effect no ports or courts to which they can go, or who allege that they have none, and therefore go roaming over the high seas, plundering and destroying their prizes, should not be held to be lawfully employed. On mere general principles, as Lord Stowell says (Phillimore, iii. 346), it is lawful to destroy your enemy in any way; but public law makes a distinction, allowing some and prohibiting other modes of destruction, and belligerents are bound by the law. I am still of opinion that such proceedings as those of the late rebel cruisers were piratical in their quality, and that the commonwealth of nations should unite in treating them as piracy under the law of nations.

C. S. Henry.

[The cases which occur in the books touching the formalities necessary to vest captured ships in the captor, have all arisen out of claims of neutrals against captors, or of owners against recaptors. A legal controversy between belligerents, as to the ownership of a vessel actually taken possession of, has never arisen, and, as Kent says, "can never arise." Therefore, prize courts do exist for the benefit of neutrals; one of the parties to all suits about prizes must be a neutral, or a recaptor. That a cruiser ought, in justice to neutrals, to carry his prizes in for condemnation, we do not deny; but even about this the commentators differ, and the English decisions (see Dr. Woolsey) and the practice of every maritime power justify a cruiser in destroying a prize, if it be inconvenient or difficult for him to carry her into port. If he does this, his Government becomes responsible to neutrals, but to neutrals only, for any damage done to neutral interests; if he does it to excess, as Semmes did, he and his Government become proper objects of moral reprobation, but not of legal pursuit at the hands of the other belligerents. That Semmes's course was barbarous in the extreme, we do not deny; all we want to accomplish in criticising Dr. Henry at all—with whom our difference is really not so great as it seems—was to prevent that mixing of moral and legal considerations in this Alabama question which renders it, or any question like it, so difficult to settle satisfactorily. The impression produced on the popular mind by the usual mode of denouncing Semmes's operations is that not only did he carry his business to the point of excess, but that to burn a prize at all at sea is "piracy;" that is, an offence against the human race, of which the other belligerent may complain. Unhappily there is not another maritime power, as we have said, which has not burnt prizes—the captains of their cruisers being the sole judges of the necessity of the measure. We should gladly see the practice prohibited by agreement of all civilized countries, and have little doubt it will be; and it is a disgrace to civilization that such a man as Semmes should have a particle of legal justification for his course; but facts are facts, and law is law. Dr. Henry's distinction as to prize courts we do not understand. Does he mean to say that Russia had no prize courts during the Crimean war, when her ports were hermetically sealed, or that the United States would have no prize courts if the "tripartite alliance" of the New York Tribune should institute a rigorous blockade of our ports? The doctrine that the blockade of a port is equivalent in the eye of the law to the physical destruction of the port seems to us a very dangerous one, especially for small powers, or powers with a small navy. Our own theory about Semmes, as we have frequently said, is that he was not a lawful belligerent; that the English proclamation did not, and could not, make him a lawful belligerent; and that his burnings were wholly illegal, but not "piratical," because, if they were, England would not be responsible for them. No Government can be held to answer for the depredations of a pirate. In discussing the question, therefore, from the point of view of those who have adopted Mr. Sumner's notion that the proclamation gave the Alabama a legal status, in spite of the facts of her history, we are discussing it for argument's sake only.—Ed. Nation.]

CORRUPTION IN THE MASSACHUSETTS LEGISLATURE.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: In the Nation of June 17 an article, entitled "Railroads in the Legislatures," does great injustice to the Legislature of Massachusetts, to the management of her railroads, and to most of the respectable newspapers in that commonwealth. It begins with the assertion, "In the last days of the Massachusetts General Court, it is understood that one of the most gigantic of 'railroad combination' schemes—a scheme which gives two millions to one half-built road, three millions to another not even half-built, and to the rest no one precisely knows how much—that this scheme is going to be hustled through."

The whole and every part of that allegation is in substance untrue. The combination exists only in the imagination of the writer; it is strong evidence that there has been no such combination that one of the bills has been defeated, while the others—which, with some proper amendments, commend themselves to the judgment of most intelligent and unbiassed minds—have passed almost unanimously. The scheme does not, as you say, give two millions to a half-built road. It simply provides that the State shall lend its credit to the Boston, Hartford, and Erie Railroad to the amount of two million dollars, in consideration that the corporation shall purchase certain flats of the commonwealth and make upon them extensive and costly improvements, which it is believed will enhance the value of other flats of the commonwealth. The loan is to be secured by a mortgage of this and other flats and by a pledge of bonds. This is understood to be a plan devised by Governor Claflin for the benefit of the State and to reduce taxation, and he is not supposed to be wanting either in financial shrewdness or integrity.

The Boston and Albany Railroad is to receive, it seems, "no one knows precisely how much." It is to receive simply a right to get to deep waters on paying for the way, and it is well known that, so far from "combining" to get it, the directors are very reluctant to take the grant which the merchants of Boston have for years demanded for them.

The act incorporating the Northern Railroad Company is passed to secure economy and efficiency by consolidating several short roads, and proper restrictions have been put in to secure the public against the watering of stock. As the other bill has not been "hustled through," but rejected, it is unnecessary to consider its merits.

The statement that "one of the prominent railroad men of Massachusetts testified that he had presented a certain legislator with ten thousand dollars, as hush-money," is grossly unjust. The evidence is all printed, and your writer could have seen it. The money was not paid to a legislator, was not paid when the railroad had any bill before the Legislature, and had no reference whatever to legislation. It was a payment of a little more than ten thousand dollars to buy off a combination of brokers, who had formed a plan to depress the stock of the company.

The writer is "amazed" at the audacity of a committee which made a report that there is no such thing in the State as a corrupt influence on the part of railroads. That committee reported the facts as they appeared. They did not follow in the footsteps of a late Congressional investigating committee, and report, in substance, that there must have been bribery because they could find no evidence of it. It is a fact that the respectable papers of Boston endorse the report, and that the intelligent and honest men of Massachusetts, who know her railroad managers and her Legislature, believe it. It is easy to say that Governor Clifford, or the Stearnses, or Brown, or Coggswell, or Stark, or Chapin, or Eldridge, or some of them, have used corrupt means to secure legislation, but there is not a word of evidence to prove it; and those who know best the character of the Legislature and these men do not believe it.

It is true that most of them have employed men to influence legislation by communicating with legislators who are not upon committees. There are undoubtedly evils attending this, but as long as it is not only the right but the duty of legislators to get information from any proper source—from newspapers or from their constituents—and as long as committees do not report the evidence presented to them or the reasons on which they act, and as long as amendments to bills are acted upon without going to any committee, some kind of lobby will continue to be a necessity. No modern legislative assembly ever existed without it, and it is safe to say that none like ours ever will. Nothing has a stronger tendency to make lobby-men corrupt than to assume that every one who lobbies uses corrupt means.

The statement that the Railroad Committee "summons before it the financier, to whose legislative liberality we have already alluded, hears what he has to say, and, without another scintilla of evidence before it—without summoning either the State commissioners or any one except this person—reports a bill which gives five millions instead of three, and abolished the commission," is remarkable. The committee did examine several witnesses; but the fact that no one of the commissioners was summoned before the committee on this matter does certainly give cause for grave suspicion. This probably arose from the fact that the bill was reported and carried through as a part of an arrangement made by Governor Claflin and his Council for the sale and improvement of certain flats owned by the commonwealth. Under acts of the Legislature, these flats, which are near the terminus of the Boston, Hartford, and Erie Railroad, have been advertised for bids. In 1867, several bids were made, but, for various reasons, none were accepted. In 1868, they were again advertised, and there was only one bid; and Governor Bullock and a minority of the Executive Council were in favor of its acceptance, while Lieutenant-Governor, now Governor, Claflin opposed it, taking the ground that the terms offered were not high enough. The matter was fully and publicly discussed, and the bid was finally rejected, but under such circumstances that Governor Claflin was undoubtedly very desirous of selling the flats at a higher price. No purchaser at a satisfactory price could be found except the Boston, Hartford, and Erie Railroad Company. They have agreed in substance that if the State will lend its credit for $2,000,000, on a pledge of that amount of their bonds and a mortgage of the flats, they will pay the State three or four times as much as they paid for similar flats to private parties last fall. In substance, the State receives two or three times as much as any one else would give for the flats, and the railroad company receives par for $2,000,000 of its bonds, which it could have sold in the market at only about sixty. This is probably a good arrangement, pecuniarily, for both parties, and it was carried through as the Governor's measure. No one suspects his integrity in the matter.

You will pardon me for the length of this reply, but the importance of the matter seems to me to demand it. The "apathy of the public" under all charges of corruption is due in part to their wholesale and indiscriminate character. The people of Massachusetts do not believe their Legislature is corrupt, and will not sit easily under charges like those in your paper. **

Boston, June 21, 1869.

Notes.

LITERARY.

The Broad Churchmen have established an organ called the Living Church, of which the second number has appeared. Some of the ablest ministers of the school are among its contributors, and as the paper appeals to a class in the Episcopal Church which the movements of the Ritualists will doubtless rapidly enlarge, and—as an article in the last number indicates—inasmuch as one of its objects is to bring the Church into closer practical relations with the reformatory movements of the day—in other words, to make it much more of a social force than it has hitherto been in America—we have little doubt it will prosper. Its literary merits, as far as it has gone, are very considerable, and there is one in particular which is worth calling special attention to, and it is this: that the writing is tough and fibrous, and will bear pressing and pulling, which is more than can be said of that of many of our religious contemporaries. Their greatest defect, if we may be allowed to say so, is the perfunctory air with which they discuss things—the signs of commercial fear of offending subscribers, or of saying the wrong thing, or of saying it in the wrong way, which appear in their articles—so that one does not always expect to find an earnest or thinking man behind the pen, but a good business manager, who knows what his customers do not want, and is determined to keep it faithfully from them. A religious organ, therefore, which should hit hard, without being abusive or personal—that is, fight as men can fight, and as none others do, with positive opinions—and should keep old sermons and cheap morality and the "potato gospel" out of its columns, would be a real gain to the community, and we think the Living Church gives very good promise of being such.

—The Harvard Advocate, the best of the collegiate periodicals, has been able to make two hundred dollars over and above its expenses during the past year; and in pursuance of its announced intention, has given that sum to the college to be used for the increase of the library. The books to be purchased are designated by the donors. It is in Williams College, we believe, that each class as it graduates makes the library a present of books, and the custom is perhaps a better one than that which the supporters of the Advocate are trying to establish at Cambridge. Chronic insolvency is the condition of too many college papers and magazines, but the classes are usually well enough off to make an annual gift of real value; and if the Cambridge classes are not, they might profitably retrench some such expenses (say) as those attendant on one of the most disagreeable of American college customs—the presentation of "the class cradle," a piece of furniture which is given to the first member of the class who shall become a father, and which, it is to be hoped, he and his wife receive with complacency. The Advocate is kindly spoken of, we see, by the Acting President, Doctor Peabody, who, taking a tone rather different from that usually adopted by misguided professors when speaking of undergraduates' periodicals, expresses the wish that the paper may become "the medium of communication between the teachers and students as to those subjects of common interest in which a college literary organ is an undoubted need." But this would be to spoil the paper for outside readers, at any rate; and we suppose there are no subjects, or very few subjects, upon which the professors cannot talk to the students to better advantage through the columns of some paper other than the undergraduates' own. As the Advocate stands, it is the mouthpiece of the students' discontents—so far as they have any; and the place for the exercise of their literary abilities; and, apart from all that, it is pleasant, too, as expressive of the humors of undergraduate life. To let in the Faculty as contributors would not improve it in any of these respects. However, there is not much danger, probably.

—Messrs. A. S. Barnes & Co., publishers of "Worman's Complete German Grammar," send us a copy of their Educational Bulletin, containing a reply, such as it is, to Prof. Fischer's first criticism of that text-book. In our allusion last week to this controversy, we implied that the publishers avoided meeting the specific allegations of their critic, which, of course, we should not have done if the Bulletin had been published at that writing, and had been in our hands. Without undertaking to side at every point with Prof. Fischer, we have no hesitation in saying that the Messrs. Barnes's reply is wholly inadequate to relieve Mr. Worman and his book from the serious charges of ignorance, carelessness, and plagiarism, while the tone of it is both undignified and discreditable. One-half of the Bulletin is wasted on a disingenuous statement of "facts," quotations from and lists of incompetent or unwary endorsers, and an advertisement of the Worman Series. In the remaining two pages, such points of Prof. Fischer's criticism are selected for answer as are thought capable of it, and those only, while the reader is left under the impression that space alone prevented a rejoinder to every item of allegation. Of course, the most is made of those cases in which the authorities differ, Mr. Worman, we remark, appearing to have no independent knowledge; but the authority on which he relies is often merely distorted into agreement with him. We may say, finally, that there is not a scholarly or pedagogic tribunal in the world that would not condemn the book and the author solely on his treatment of the word "Deutsch," either with or without the benefit of his "defence" of it.

—A very original and striking Revolutionary character is portrayed by himself in "Col. George Rogers Clark's Sketch of his Campaign in the Illinois, in 1778–9," published, with a portrait, as part of Messrs. Robert Clarke & Company's Ohio Valley Historical Series, already more than once referred to in these columns. The value of this campaign, and of Col. Clark's services generally along the Ohio, in extending the domain of the United Colonies, and afterwards of the United States, is probably not exaggerated by Mr. Pirtle in his Introduction to the sketch. Clark's military capacity was certainly of a high order, and it is seldom one reads of a commander possessing such boldness, resource, and tact. He understood perfectly, for military purposes, the Indian nature, and how to exhibit at the right time courageous defiance and magnanimity. "It may appear otherwise to you," he writes to the famous George Mason, of Virginia, "but I always thought we took the wrong method of treating with Indians, and strove as soon as possible to make myself acquainted with the French and Spanish mode, which must be prefferable to ours, otherwise they could not possibly have such great influence among them." This mode is illustrated a little further on: "Gave harsh language to supply the want of men; well knowing that it was a mistaken notion in many that soft speeches was best for Indians." The operations at Kaskaskia and Vincennes are described in a very graphic but truly modest manner—the march from the former fort to take the latter being one of extraordinary hardship and enterprise. The odd spelling of the French, Spanish, and Indian names mentioned by Clark, and his ordinary orthography too, make his narrative quite amusing. Some persons may guess what "Messicippa," "Laprarydrush" (La Prairie du Rocher), "Canoweay" (Kanawha), "adjutated," and "adgetation" stand for. Major Bowman's journal of the expedition against Vincennes is appended to Col. Clark's letter, and the notes of the editor of this volume add very much to its readableness and historical completeness.

—In the last number of the Historical Magazine, Mr. H. B. Dawson congratulates Massachusetts because, recently, at the Lowell Institute, there has been an "application by her own family physicians of literary poultices and sticking-plasters to her poor, old, tottering carcass." The doctors, having been called in by the friends of the patient, who, it seems, are much terrified at the injuries inflicted on her by Mr. Dawson, "proceeded to discharge the grave duties to which they had been respectively called—one probing a deep-seated mass of corruption, and relieving the patient's system of the long-accumulating rottenness of her pretended primitive 'Freedom to worship God;' another applying the restorative of Roman and Grecian slave-codes, so much worse than the patient's," etc. We say Mr. H. B. Dawson; but quite as likely it is Mr. G. H. Moore who reports the sad condition to which Massachusetts is now reduced. Removing the figures of speech, we suppose that what the writer of the article means to say is that Judge Parker and Dr. George Ellis have recently been delivering some lectures in which they told things concerning the early history of their native State which have often been lost sight of by the ordinary run of our historians—a class of writers about whom it is perhaps easy to trouble one's self too much, but whom it is, after all, just as well sometimes to trouble in the way in which Mr. Moore and Mr. Dawson have for some years troubled the historical societies of New England. We are not sure, but not impossibly it is to the burning wrath of these two gentlemen that we owe these late researches and lectures that give the Historical Magazine so much pleasure; and we are, therefore, not too eager to find fault with them. Still, they sometimes—not to say habitually—go wrong, and commit various literary sins to which their attention should be called. For example, there is no good excuse for the writing of such a passage as this one, which we quote as we find it—italics, capitals, and all:

"The 'Puritan Fathers' of Massachusetts ARE ADMITTED to have been persecutors as well as prosecutors; and, notwithstanding Dr. Washburne was pleased to CONCEAL the important paper which was previously sent to him and then remained in his hands—the same that was published by us in our last number as the RITUAL OF SLAVE MARRIAGES IN MASSACHUSETTS—these Puritan Fathers ARE ADMITTED to have been man-stealers, man-whippers," etc., etc., etc.

Now, as a matter of fact, Professor Washburne, in his published lecture, refers in a foot-note to the important paper which the Magazine says was put in his hands, and the charge that he "CONCEALS IT" must not be listened to. Then, again, even if he had "concealed it," if he had taken not the least notice of it, there would have been no harm done; it is so far from being "important" for any purpose of controversy between Massachusetts and the rest of the world, that it is of no importance at all. Everybody knows that once there was slavery in Massachusetts; nobody ever supposed, we should hope, that, slavery being in existence in that religious commonwealth, there were not in regular use forms for slave marriages; suppose certain things in certain places, and you suppose certain incidents; so to lay hold at this time of day of a form which as it happens was used by this or that Massachusetts minister, and attempt to make it seem of extraordinary value as evidence that Massachusetts was once a slave State, is to show that one does not well understand the position of one's case. And to charge Professor Washburne with fraudulently concealing evidence that would make against him is a piece of indecency, if the accuser knows that gentleman's reputation and character—and a piece of indecency, too, if he does not know it. It is such displays of party ill-temper and injustice that make people laugh at the Historical Magazine and cause its influence to be less than it should be. It is a work to be valued, for this reason if for no other, that it utters the protest of the rest of the country against the claims to respect which New England sometimes urges with more arrogance, so to speak, than good right. It does real service in this way, if in no other way, to American historiography. But it is frequently childish in its rages; it hurts its own cause by its heat and abusiveness; it cannot be unreservedly depended upon in its statement of facts, to say nothing of its inferences from facts; and not seldom it makes grossly unjust charges against the characters of men of probity and honor. Even as it is, we would not have it reformed altogether—reformed out of existence—but it is a great pity that it is not reformed into good manners at least, whether or not into perfect reasonableness. It is an honor to American periodical literature by reason of its erudition in its own field, and its devotion to historical research, but then, there is no denying it, it has also some characteristics which make it disgraceful to our journalism.

—The April number of the Journal of the Ethnological Society of London has for its opening paper an account of flint instruments from Oxfordshire and the Isle of Thanet, which may be recommended to the student of Cæsar or the student of English or North American history; and Sir John Lubbock's paper on stone implements from the Cape of Good Hope should also be read in connection with it. Both papers have illustrations. Mr. Howorth's paper on "The Westerly Drifting of Nomads" would be easier reading if its style were improved as one would think a proof-reader, ex-officio, would improve it. Mr. Westropp's paper on "Cromlech and Megalithic Structures," and Col. Lane Fox's extended remarks upon it, are good reading, and open up important vistas of prehistoric times. Dr. Hooker's paper on "Child-bearing in Australia and New Zealand" is an admirable compilation of scientific testimony on a subject which civilized peoples should not be above examining for light and guidance. Finally, we may call attention to Mr. Lamprey's method of measuring the human frame, and to the photograph of a young African from Sierra Leone in illustration of it.

THE VILLA ON THE RHINE.*

Compared with its predecessor, "On the Heights"—which is the only novel to which it bears sufficient likeness to make a comparison at all appropriate—"The Villa on the Rhine" does not seem to be a successful novel. It contains much powerful writing, however, and will be found interesting and suggestive reading even by people who do not usually occupy themselves with novels. Auerbach has some admirable qualities as a student of character, and has written works in which his powers as a story-teller and as a thoughtful observer of men and manners were the most obviously attractive features; although, so far as we know of his earlier works, there was always present in them the germ of such speculative moralizing as has of late years been the most prominent characteristic of all that he has written. The artist and the moralist in him seem to have kept pretty even step together up to the time of his writing "On the Heights," which sometimes seems to us the noblest and most charming of modern novels. The theme with which it deals—the rehabilitation of a fallen soul through such aids only as are offered by philosophy—was, we suppose, one which would be more naturally suggested to, and more temperately handled by, a man like Auerbach, who had passed through Judaism only on his road to philosophical speculation, than by a writer who, at any period of his life, had been accustomed to measure himself and others by more arbitrary standards. Certainly, the tone of the book, which was perfectly tolerant and unaggressive, was as admirable as its artistic treatment of the subject; and even readers who necessarily rebelled against its theory and its conclusions must have been charmed by its purity and its at times pathetic beauty. One objection which has been brought against it—that it has little or no value as a picture of actual human nature, and that the people who are most apt to sin are precisely the people who have no recuperative power—does not seem to us well founded, nor, even if it were true, to diminish the excellence of the book. Portrait-painting is not, after all, the most important work of art; and it is certain, also, that, although they drive a most flourishing business in it, a monopoly of sinning is not enjoyed by morally and intellectually weak people. There seems to us to have been utility as well as beauty in this presentation of the moral law, made plain by reason and enforced by sanctions which have over many minds more force than any others.

In his present novel, Auerbach discusses a problem fuller of suggestion, and at the same time more difficult, than that of "On the Heights:" Can a free man be educated without the aid of religion to a full recognition of, and a willing obedience to, the laws which govern civilized society? So stated, the question does not appear an overwhelmingly difficult one; but Auerbach, who shows himself in this case more moralist than novelist, increases the difficulty in various ways. He does not propose to show how a man with exceptionally good chances for raising a luxuriant crop of wild oats shall gather it without the aid of the approved implements, but how he shall be prevented from willing to sow it at all. Roland is made, in the first place, as absolutely free as a human being can be. He knows that he will inherit enormous wealth, and has neither the need for exertion nor the ordinary incentives to it. Although born in America, his father is a German; and until his fifteenth year, when he and his tutor are first presented to the reader, most of his time since his birth has been spent in travelling from one country to another, and he feels tied to none by either duty or affection. He must, however, be trained so that the duties of citizenship shall appear imperative to him, while he is still left at liberty to choose where he will fulfil them. He has been taught by his father's precept and example that wealth is the only power, that hypocrisy is the unfailing characteristic of all mankind, and that every one has his price. Yet he is to be made not only to recognize his duties to his kind, but to learn to identify his interests with theirs, and to use wealth wisely and unselfishly. He is to be made capable of resisting temptation, and up to the close of the novel he is never represented as yielding to it; indeed, he can hardly be said to be tried in any way.

It will be seen that our author has presented to himself a very difficult subject, and his peculiar fair-mindedness has prevented him from representing the difficulties at less than their real value. He shows no want of power until, after having stated the problem at great length, giving it nearly or quite a third of the novel, he attempts to solve it. Of course every reader will have his own opinion both as to the possibility of any adequate solution and of the value of the particular one offered by Herr Auerbach. Ours is that he complicated the matter in a needless fashion. Perfect virtue, which is a thing quite different from ignorant innocence, is not a plant of hardy growth, and cannot be produced except under limiting conditions. The conception of duty must come from the performance of duties; as Auerbach expresses it, "You can make spirits from grain, but not grain from spirits." A thoughtful man may deny the force of the ordinary sanctions of the moral law, and yet yield the law itself unquestioning and full obedience; but, setting aside the consideration that the church itself makes its saints out of sinners, and does more hospital than hygienic service, it seems absurd enough to suppose that any man can stand when all supports have been removed from him. And Auerbach carefully cuts away from under Roland's feet every sentiment of duty, and even, at last, such slight restraints as had been imposed by his natural filial ties. He leaves him, it is true, a passionate love for and confidence in his teacher; but this, if the thing is to have any permanent moral value, can only signify that without love and faith there can be no right education. Good citizens we must have, and good members of society; and it is impossible to give each of them a Herr Erich as a personal guide.

As to the modes of education suggested by the novel, they are, briefly: scientific instruction in the laws of nature and of human nature—the presentation of noble models; the endeavor to make plain the duties of man as a member of society; and, further, the cultivation of the sentiment of humanity or philanthropy—against which we have no objections to offer. Our statement, however, is a general one; in the novel the thing is stated specifically, and Roland is brought up on Benjamin Franklin and Theodore Parker, and gets a good deal of satisfaction and of moral impulse from Longfellow's "Hiawatha."

As a whole, the book disappoints us; and Auerbach shows himself less of a thinker and more of a sentimentalist than is altogether pleasant. Still, his novel contains some good thinking and some powerful statement, and is worth attention also as a study of character. His fairness and his shrewd observation give his characters great vitality; but, from one point of view from which most great novelists have studied life and character, his method of considering both appears to have cut him off—latterly at least—almost completely. He looks at human beings as almost absolutely free, depending for their virtue and their happiness not nearly so much upon others as upon themselves, and capable, if they will consider things fairly, of disentangling themselves from all but the necessary consequences of their own acts and those of others. On the heights of contemplation, that is, the opinions of one's neighbors do not weigh very heavily—which is true enough—but on those heights one loses a part of one's own weight also, which is regained on coming down to the ordinary level. It is possible to remain there long enough to write a novel, however, and so omit to take into consideration the tragedy which comes from the fate which obliges us to accept the good or evil opinions of our neighbors as part of the utterly unescapable consequences of our deeds. It seems probable, moreover, that the fact of Auerbach's birth and training as a Jew should have unconsciously disposed him to take the view of life which is peculiar to him. Accustomed to social ostracism without any accompanying feeling of guilt, a Jew might naturally set a lower value on social estimates, and a higher one on purely human worth, than people who have been accustomed to regard the one as, in most cases at least, the result of the other.

* "The Villa on the Rhine. By Berthold Auerbach. Author's edition. With a Portrait of the Author, and a Biographical Sketch by Bayard Taylor." New York: Leypoldt & Holt. 1869.

"Villa Eden: The Country House on the Rhine. A Romance. By Berthold Auerbach. Translated by Charles C. Shackford." Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1869.

In an artistic point of view, also, "The Villa on the Rhine" does not seem to us a perfect success. It is a novel which depends for its interest mainly upon the suggestiveness of its central idea and the delineation of a few of its characters, and in no sense upon its plot, and but slightly upon its incidents. But its great length, which was necessary to the development of neither its idea nor its characters, and the multitude of personages who do nothing but distract the reader's attention, prevent a pleasant impression of the book as a whole. Then, too, there is much irrelevant matter—or what seems so—as, for instance, the chapter called "In the Brotherhood," where Freemasonry appears as the ultimate refuge of culture and humanity; and the conclusion falls flatly, is hastily written, and quite unworthy of much that preceded it.

As to the two translations, the differences are so slight that, taking chapter by chapter, there is little to choose between them. For our own part, we prefer the New York edition; the whole of the first part of it seems nearly unexceptionable; and afterwards, in critical passages, such as Sonnenkamp's confession, where a certain vigor and swing of expression are necessary, it seems to us at once more smooth and more forcible than Mr. Shackford's version.

THE LIFE OF AUDUBON.*

THE fact that Audubon, like all discoverers and explorers who have published an account of their labors, has been to so large an extent his own biographer, giving so many details of his doings and habits, and so many illustrations of his spirit and character, in the great work which is the monument of his fame, has perhaps made the public less eager for a life of him than it otherwise would have been. It is now eighteen years since his death, and this biography, edited by his widow, is the first and only one that has appeared. And this is essentially an autobiography, being made up almost entirely of extracts from his private journals, which seem to have been very copious and full, containing often a minute account of the doings of each day.

We learn from the introduction that this volume was first published in London in 1867, and that it comprises only about one-fifth of the matter which was placed in the hands of the publisher by the widow. We are further told that should Mrs. Audubon recover her MSS. from the London house, between whom and herself some unfortunate misunderstanding seems to have arisen, other volumes similar to the present one may be looked for. Within a reasonable limit, say to the extent of one more volume at least, we should be glad to see this purpose carried out, because the book before us is one of unquestionable interest and value, not only for its relation to the life of the illustrious naturalist, but also on account of the spirited and graphic pictures which it contains of the border and backwoods life of this country. If other matter equally good and entertaining remains, it should be given to the public.

Audubon lived in a period of our history which is fast receding from view, and of which the personal memoirs and portraitures are by no means abundant. He was a keen, sympathetic observer not merely of the birds and animals, but of men and things generally; and, though by no means a first-class literary workman, there are yet at times wonderful vividness and truth about some of his off-hand sketches which, of their kind, it would not be easy to match. How clearly the coon-hunter of Kentucky, loading his rifle, stands before one in the following passage:

"The hunter has taken an axe from the wood-pile, and, returning, assures us that the night is clear, and that we shall have rare sport. He blows through his rifle to ascertain that it is clear, examines his flint, and thrusts a feather into the touch-hole. To a leathern bag swung at his side is attached a powder-horn; his sheathed knife is there also; below hangs a narrow strip of home-spun linen. He takes from his bag a bullet, pulls with his teeth the wooden stopper from his powder-horn, lays the ball on one hand, and with the other pours the powder upon it until it is just overtopped. Raising the horn to his mouth, he again closes it with the stopper, and restores it to its place. He introduces the powder into the tube, springs the box of his gun, greases the 'patch' over some melted tallow, or damps it, then places it on the honeycombed muzzle of his piece. The bullet is placed on the patch over the bore, and pressed with the handle of the knife, which now trims the edges of the linen. The elastic hickory rod, held with both hands, smoothly pushes the ball to its bed: once, twice, thrice has it rebounded. The rifle leaps as it were into the hunter's arms, the feather is drawn from the touch-hole, the powder fills the pan, which is closed. 'Now I am ready,' cries the woodsman."

It is worthy of note that neither of the great American ornithologists was in the strict sense an American. Wilson was a Scotch weaver, who came to this country when a young man; and Audubon, though born in Louisiana, then a French colony, passed his youth, and was educated, in France, of which country his father was a native. His mother was a Spanish lady. Wilson brought out his work in this country, but Audubon was compelled to seek the patronage of British capital.

Audubon seems to have conceived his passion for ornithology while a youth in France, where he received lessons in drawing from David, and first exercised his hand in tracing objects of natural history. He also made collections of European birds, and displeased his father, who was a rigid disciplinarian, by his wild and wandering habits. His subsequent career presents a series of experiences and adventures remarkably curious and animated. At the age of seventeen we find him, a gay, handsome youth, established in the country on one of his father's estates, called Mill Grove, in the vicinity of Philadelphia, passing his time in hunting, fishing, drawing, attending balls and parties, and raising all sorts of fowls. He is an admirable marksman, an expert swimmer, a good dancer and skater, plays on the flute and violin, is skilled in training dogs, and in stuffing and preserving animals and birds, has great bodily strength, and great beauty of form and feature. At this age he was preposterously fond of dress, and loved to hunt in black satin breeches, pumps, and ruffled shirts, obtained from Paris.

This is his May-day, his flowering season, and the efflorescence is quite extraordinary; but the bitter winds and storms and the nipping frosts are sure to follow. He marries at the age of twenty-eight, moves to the West, and in various business ventures at Louisville and Hendersonville his property, which is considerable, is entirely swept away, mainly because of his own preoccupation and distaste for business. Then follows the Æneid of his life—his wanderings in the West and South-west; his struggles to earn a livelihood, which he does as a crayon portrait-painter and teacher of drawing; his passionate pursuit of his beloved birds; his adventures in Kentucky and along the Mississippi—twelve checkered years, putting his patience and purpose to the severest tests, but rich in ornithological studies and experiences. At one time, in New Orleans, he is too poor to buy a book to write his journal in; but, on hearing that an expedition is talked of to survey the boundary line between Mexico and the United States, his spirits revive, and, thirsting for new fields of adventure, he writes to President Monroe for an appointment as draughtsman and naturalist to the expedition. The project lightens his heart instantly, and in imagination he sees the new and rare birds which await him in those unexplored regions. He seeks a recommendation from Vanderlyn, the historical painter, then living in New Orleans, and, with the perspiration streaming down his face, the obscure naturalist opens his portfolio, and lays his drawings out before the critical eye of the famous artist. Vanderlyn is impressed, and gives him a complimentary note, evidently feeling that he is not the mendicant he at first sight took him to be. But, unluckily, Audubon does not go to the Pacific, and, a few years later, desperately bent on improving his financial condition, he turns dancing-master at Bayou Sara, where his wife holds a position as governess. His music and instructions are appreciated, and his pecuniary prospects brighten. On one occasion he is requested by his delighted pupils and their festive parents to dance to his own music, which he does till the whole room comes down in thunders of applause.

He is forty-six years old before his own earnings, added to those of his brave and hopeful wife, furnish him with the little capital with which he hopes to take the first step toward publishing his drawings. Meeting only with discouragement in this country, he sets sail for England, where he arrives in July, 1826.

* "The Life of John James Audubon. By Mrs. J. J. Audubon." New York: G. P. Putnam & Son. 1869.

The story of his labors and trials, and his final complete success abroad, as told by himself in this volume, is specially interesting, but we have no room to detail it here. His drawings are published by subscription, and in a style that eclipses anything of the kind before known. When completed, he undertakes in Edinburgh his "American Ornithological Biography," the first volume of which is brought out in 1831, and which is also a great success. Before the final completion of his works, he makes several return visits to this country, and extends his rambles North, South, and West in quest of new material. In 1846, the first volume of his "Quadrupeds of North America" is published, but he is not able to complete the work. His mind and strength fail him, and in January, 1851, he passes peacefully away. The second volume of the "Quadrupeds" is mostly prepared by his sons Victor and John, and has been published since their father's death.

We find no confirmation in this volume of the story generally current that two hundred of Audubon's first drawings were destroyed by mice while stowed away in a chest in Philadelphia. The only allusion to any accident to his works is in his journal of March, 1822, where he says that he "opened a chest with two hundred of my bird portraits in it, and found them sorely damaged by the breaking of a bottle containing a quantity of gunpowder." A fact of such moment as the total destruction of the labor of years would certainly not have been passed over in silence by his widow, who must have known of such an occurrence.

Audubon seems to have been a flowing, picturesque character, not profound or imposing, but ardent, luxuriant, and genuine, and reaching his goal through great hardship and difficulties less by force of will and iron tenacity of purpose than by his copious animal spirits and his unquenchable enthusiasm. He is indeed the ideal of the hunter-naturalist, and the halo of romance surrounds his whole career. Ordinary worldly people looked upon him as more than half-mad, and his long hair and beard and his strange goings and comings confirmed them in the theory; but he was only madly in love with his pursuit—his ideal. He had the stuff in him of which poets and prophets are made; and in his enthusiasm, his impressibility, his unworldliness, his simplicity, his love of nature, his good faith, etc., he suggests and is allied to some of the finest characters in history. He had a lively and a picturesque but not a profound or comprehensive, sense of things; on hearing Sidney Smith preach he was led to think more deeply, he said, than ever before in his life.

However, he was, perhaps, just what he should have been for the work he had undertaken. His inspiration was genuine; and we mean no dispraise when we say that love of nature and of copying natural forms, rather than the love of science, was the mainspring of his career. To his delight in the rod and gun and in wild sports and rambles, his ambition to do something for science came as the finish and crown, utilizing and sanctifying the whole. And herein we have an important clue to his success. In the pursuits of natural history, above all others, a born lover of the chase for its own sake, and of the exhilarations of streams and woods, has a great vantage-ground to begin with. This vantage-ground Audubon originally had, though, as stated, his passion in the end was entirely bent into the service of science.

His work is most unrivalled, perhaps, in the department in which his artist faculty for copying nature comes into play—namely, in his drawings. It is here that he distances Wilson and all other competitors at home or abroad. The more his drawings are studied by the light of nature, the more wonderful will appear their spirit and truth. He not only paints the form and color of the bird, but its manners also. Its most characteristic and instantaneous attitude is seized with a grace and a completeness all but marvellous. There is no end to the observations that may be made upon the birds, or to the biographies of them that may be written; but all future artists in this field will copy more or less Audubon's groups and figures.

In painting the birds with his pen he does not achieve the same relative success. His ear is less skilled than his eye. His "Ornithological Biography" is a monument of industry and acute observation, and its value in that particular field is beyond price; but the reader may be excused if he feels at times that many unimportant facts are given—facts which are not characteristic or interesting, and which do not help him to identify and "place" that particular species. His style is generally graphic and well-timed, yet it seldom rises into any literary importance, while it occasionally degenerates into a goody-goody strain, that may do credit to his heart but not to his head. Nuttall, though he lacked Audubon's ambition and enthusiasm, had a much more discriminating ear, and is far more successful in reporting the characteristic notes and songs of the different birds.

Compared with Wilson, Audubon has not only the advantage of being much the superior draughtsman, but his text is much more copious and full, and his list of species fuller. Wilson began to publish at a much earlier day relatively to his studies and observations. Audubon's researches not only extended over a longer period of time, but comprised within their range a much larger extent of territory. In point of accuracy of observation and manner of presentation, there is not much choice between them.

Audubon was twenty-eight years old when Wilson began to publish, and though he had then long been known among his friends and acquaintances as an ardent naturalist, he seems never to have heard of Wilson or his book until the latter came into his store in Louisville in 1810. Neither had Wilson any knowledge of Audubon, and he opened his eyes very wide when the Louisville merchant, from whom he wanted only a subscription to his work, showed him a collection of drawings superior to his own, and containing birds he had never seen or heard of. It is evident that Wilson thenceforth looked upon Audubon with a jealous eye. He was silent to all of Audubon's generous offers, treated him coldly when they met afterward in Philadelphia, and in the ninth volume of his "American Ornithology" speaks of his visit to Louisville in terms unusually severe, and conveys an impression very wide from the truth, if Audubon is to be credited.

In person Audubon was finely formed, and in his mature life, with his hair falling to his shoulders, his open throat, his keen eye, and animated movements, was a figure of mark wherever he appeared. In the streets of Edinburgh he attracted much notice, and says that his hair gave him as much notoriety as his drawings did. He was perhaps a little boyish and immature in certain phases of his character, and his eagerness for fame, which occasionally breaks out in his journal, is hardly consistent with his really noble and fervid aspirations. But it must be remembered that he has not the cold reserve and the caution of the Anglo-Saxon character, and the stories of his vanity and self-glorification have their origin in his boyish frankness and a certain transparency, rather than in any undue preponderance of conceit. Take him all in all, he is one of the most striking figures in our history, while the service he has rendered to ornithology surpasses perhaps the work of any other one man who ever lived.

CURRENT FRENCH LITERATURE.

REGNIER, one of the few French writers of the sixteenth century whose fame has survived the poetical hecatombs of Boileau, and one of the very few whose verve and originality have brought his productions down to our day, through modifications of style, of language, and of customs, is now honored by a new edition of his complete works—"Œuvres de Mathurin Regnier: texte original avec notice, par L. Courbet." An old man at thirty, and dying at forty, Regnier unfortunately leaves in his poetry too many traces of the irregularities that sent him to an early grave, and made Boileau denounce the > ———"son hardi de ses rimes cyniques

> Qui alarmait souvent les oreilles pudiques."

The Duc d'Aumale's historical work, "L'Histoire des Princes de Condé au seizième et dix-septième siècles," is at last out. It was ready for publication more than two years ago; but on the 19th of June, 1867, the entire edition in the hands of its publisher, M. Lévy, was seized by the Prefect of Police. A lawsuit resulted, which has been lately decided in favor of the plaintiffs, the Duc d'Aumale and M. Lévy. The materials used for the work, consisting of letters and papers of the family, and documents of every kind from the archives of Geneva, Rome, Simancas, Paris, and the State Paper Office of London, are particularly full and rich. Louis, son of Charles Vendôme, born in 1530, was the heir of the house of Condé. Its last descendants died in 1830, making precisely three centuries covered by this history. Each of these centuries has for the Condés its culminating points: the first in the religious wars, the second in the Fronde, and the third in the French Revolution. In all these great events the Condés participated, and generally as leading actors. The royal author merits high praise for industry, clearness, and impartiality; apparently he rises above all prejudice of caste and family; as, for instance, in the passage where he denounces the treachery of Louis in surrendering Havre and Calais to the English ("Condé accepta le honteux marché") and justly brands the memories of Condé and Coligny for their participation in the treachery.

M. Paul Féval's "Les Parvenus" is not a decided success, although containing some good passages, one of the livelier and more ingenious of which is in the preface, à propos of the title. "Why is it that this word 'parvenu' is not the most admirable of all the words alphabetically arranged in our dictionaries? What, after all, does this word express, if not successful and victorious efforts, obstacles overcome, journey completed, mountain ascended, and its steepest heights scaled? Why is it that in our language a word so triumphant as this should be one of reproach? We might say to our language that she herself is a parvenue, the daughter of such parvenus as Montaigne, Malesherbes, Corneille, Molière, and Bossuet. And our language might reply that the Academy founded by a parvenu for parvenus sanctions the abuse, and that a beautiful language, like a pretty woman, has the privilege of indulging in caprices."

The student of Grecian history will recollect the unpleasant surprise with which he comes upon a noted void in its narration precisely at one of the most important epochs of its entire annals. Herodotus, Thucydides, and Xenophon, closely following each other, present an unbroken chain of historical events from the heroic period down to about 360 B.C., the date of the accession of Philip of Macedon. For Alexander and his successors there is no want of chroniclers, but for the period from 360 to 336 B.C., we are without the testimony of any contemporary historian. The mere biography of Demosthenes is far from giving us a sufficiently clear idea of this period of a quarter of a century, in which, slowly but surely, the servitude of Greece was prepared. It does not connect the main events of the life of the great orator with the general history of the time. Plutarch is far from filling the void; other writers of antiquity, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Lucian and Libanius, have looked upon Demosthenes rather as the orator than the statesman, and general historians, such as Photius and Suidas, throw no light upon him. Nevertheless, M. Boullée, the author of the "Histoire de Demosthène" before us, claims that we have an admirable historian contemporary with the epoch of Philip and Demosthenes; we have Demosthenes himself. The result of M. Boullée's learned, critical, and penetrating study of his subject is a connected history of the period referred to—a luminous exposition of the personages, events, and political manners of the period.

"The Man with the Iron Mask" is the subject, and, probably, the title of an announced work by M. Marius Topin—the opening chapters of which have appeared in the Correspondant. By long and careful study of all the official papers and despatches relating to the famous masked prisoner of state, from 1660 to 1710, M. Topin announces that he has succeeded in solving the iron mask problem, so long and fruitlessly labored upon, although he does not as yet reveal the name of its wearer. The work proceeds by elimination; taking up in succession all for whom the mask has been claimed, and disposing of their several pretensions. Of these claimants, the number is so large that our historical and material patience will be sorely tried before the name is announced. M. Topin is by no means a beginner in historical research. His "Panegyric of Cardinal de Retz" and his "L'Europe sous Louis XIV." were both crowned by the Academy.

The latest work of M. Brasseur de Bourbourg is entitled "Quatre Lettres sur le Mexique." Since the fiasco of the Abbé Domenech, the results of French authorship in Mexican antiquities are so hesitatingly received that the reputation of M. de Bourbourg for successful and scientific investigations is absolutely requisite to give the present volume any authority at all. He has already given to the scientific world seven enormous volumes, remarkable for their erudition and ingenuity, if not for their philological soundness, in the field of Mexican and Central American history and philology. These four letters form the eighth volume of the series. Referring to the opinion of Oppert on the aborigines of Europe anterior to the Aryans, and to the method successfully employed by that philologist to discover in the Latin and Greek languages the proportion of Semitic and other roots, M. de Bourbourg states that he has made a similar calculation for the Latin in connection with the languages of the Mexico-Guatemalan group, and he finds that America has the decided advantage not only in the majority of Latin roots unknown to the Aryans, but also in a large number of Sanscrit roots. He adds that Bopp and Chavée do not, in fact, look upon the Sanscrit as a mother tongue. From this it results that, for M. de Bourbourg, the New World is the Old. That the ancient myths of the two continents are analogous he had already endeavored to show. He had remarked the complete connection of these myths in Mexican theology, while those of Europe were mere disjointed fragments. This opinion has been expanded into demonstration, as he thinks, by the translation of an old Mexican manuscript whose text he has at length deciphered. This MS. is the well-known "Historia de los Reyes de Colhuacan y Mexico" of the Boturini Collection, otherwise known as the "Codex Chimalpopoca." Hieroglyphic copies of it have survived the destructions of the Conquest. One of them, the "Troano," is in the Royal Library at Dresden.

"Un Naufrage Parisien," by Claude Vignon, is a story of the social life of to-day in Paris, and a sad one. It is well told, and worth reading.

"La France sous la Terreur" is an historical étude by Ernest Merson. Appreciations of the French Revolution abound in the literature of every language. Few of them, though, are more thorough and more damaging than that of one of its greatest admirers and boldest advocates—we mean Louis Blanc. "Liberty was indeed a lie when she was invoked axe in hand. Equality sent a cold shudder through even its admirers when it simply meant equality on the scaffold. Fraternity, a hollow enigma when men in its name slaughtered each other."

"La Vie de Madame Elizabeth," by M. A. de Beauchesne, tells the story of the unfortunate sister of Louis XVI. who underwent the same revolutionary martyrdom suffered by her brother and Marie Antoinette. The work contains some interesting documents of the Reign of Terror, now for the first time published.

"Études sur la Poésie Latine" is by M. Patin, a member of the French Academy and Dean of the Faculty of Letters. His work is not, as the title might lead us to suppose, a mere collection of extracts, but a succession of treatises as rich in thought as in material. The second part of the work, in which the author analyzes in detail the most remarkable specimens of early Roman literature, is of striking merit, and many of its chapters, previously published from time to time in the Journal des Savans, have attracted the attention of German and English classical scholars. His essay in particular, on Lucilius, which is based on the few fragments that have survived of this earliest satirical Latin poet, is a model of literary analysis and redundant erudition. M. Patin shows him cited and eulogized by Cicero, Horace, Persius, and Juvenal, by the early apologists of Christianity, and by Lactantius, who refers to Lucilius as one of the first interpreters of pagan wisdom. He almost reconstructs the vital body of the pagan poet's creation from the few skeleton remains, chiefly preserved by grammarians for reasons purely grammatical. In like manner, he almost restores Livius Andronicus, Nævius, Ennius, Pacuvius, Afranius, and others, and this not merely as a matter of grammar and rhetoric, but from the standpoint of philosophical study of the ideas, passions, and essential characteristics of antiquity.

The new "Dictionnaire Japonais-Français" is mainly translated from the Japanese and Portuguese Dictionary originally compiled by the Jesuits, printed by them at Nagasaki in 1605, and subsequently at Manilla in 1630. The present work was commenced under the patronage of M. Drouyn de Lhuys, formerly Minister of Foreign Affairs. The publishers—MM. Didot & Co.—have lately made enquiry here as to the probable sale in the United States for a Japanese-English Dictionary which they intend to publish, with reference to the probable demand for such a work expected to arise from the openin of trade between Japan and our Pacific coast. Some sale for such a work there would doubtless be; but it seems improbable that the American demand would of itself justify the publication of it. It would take up a certain number of copies; but we should say that, to dispose of an edition, the publisher should have some other reliance.

The "Étude sur les Maladies Éteintes et sur les Maladies Nouvelles" by Professor Anglada, of Montpellier, is a work most interesting not only to the special but to the general student of science. Professor Anglada is a believer in vitalism; that is to say, in the doctrine that maladies are determined not only by accidental circumstances, but are often the result of the mere evolution of life or vitality in any given temperament. He begins by establishing the difference between maladies of reaction and maladies of affection. The first are those whose primary phenomenon is a morbid manifestation immediately answering to an exterior injurious impression, as, for instance, the poison of deleterious miasma or an inflammation of the lungs resulting from cold. These are reactive maladies. Our organization reacts against them, and the resulting fever is one of its modes of reaction. Affective maladies, on the contrary, represent a general morbid condition of slow and gradual growth, whose origin is ordinarily obscure, intangible. No connection can be traced between them and ordinary morbid influences. In vital activity itself must be sought the cause of the change effected in the normal condition of the functions and organs. Thus, gout and cancerous affections, except in rare cases, are never the result of an exterior stimulant. Are there maladies that disappear never again to be seen? Are there others that, for the first time, make their appearance? These are questions we cannot answer. Is the source of affective maladies perennial, and are we to expect new ones as long as the human race exists? Charles Bærsch, of Strasbourg, asks—since there are races of animals and of vegetables that no longer exist in their primitive form, and we daily see their gradual transformation around us—why should there not be historical maladies just as there are fossil animals and vegetables? Why should not new and temporary diseases arise from temporary circumstances, just as new varieties of plants and animals come into existence? And admitting that this assertion of new generations and transformations in the animal and vegetable kingdoms cannot be controverted, can the same assertion be made concerning maladies? That is the question; and it can only be decided by examination of the facts. But there lies the difficulty. It is not as easy as it might be supposed, with the testimony of history before us, to pronounce with certainty on the novelty of a morbid manifestation until then undetermined, nor on the disappearance of a form well known and established. This is no question concerning our ordinary maladies, to which men in all ages appear to have been subject, and which continue to afflict humanity without interruption; that is to say, neither rheumatism, nor apoplexy, nor cancer, nor gravel, nor phthisis, nor consumption. These diseases are tributes that poor humanity seems destined to pay everywhere and in all ages; and if they had a beginning, as doubtless everything human has, their origin is lost in the night of ages, and is confounded with that of society itself. No: the question is as to those pests which, under the name of epidemics, come at long intervals to scourge and desolate the earth. M. Anglada treats with erudition and eloquence the histories of the pest of Athens, the Antonine pest, those of the third and eighth centuries, the eruptive epidemics of the same epoch, the gangrenous epidemic of the Middle Ages, the black plague of the fourteenth, the sweating sickness of the fifteenth, and, finally, of the cholera in the nineteenth century. He is of opinion that these horrible things will never again recur, and that they have disappeared from the face of the earth. But who can answer for this, and what surety have we that the English sweating sickness, now dead three centuries, may not again revive? Length of interval is not a sufficient protection, and nothing proves that a conjunction of certain climatic conditions and certain deleterious influences may not again bring it forth. The cholera, now some thirty years old, has for a time disappeared, but who can say not to return? Among new diseases, M. Anglada's history of the small-pox is a most interesting chapter. Its advent is fixed in the sixth century (570), although the erudite Littré, with his characteristic reserve, declines to say positively that this disease was unknown to antiquity. Freind, the historian of medicine, affirms it positively to the contrary, and is supported by Mead and by Sydenham. A fresh and striking argument is also presented by M. Anglada. It is, substantially, that if such a disease as small-pox existed among the ancients, it is impossible that they should have passed over in silence the marks and cicatrices that characterize it. Among a people who worshipped the human form and erected altars to beauty, the physical degradation worked by this terrible disease would have raised a concert of maledictions, the echoes of which must certainly have been transmitted to us by the writers of Greece and of Rome. The Latin satirists especially, who appeared to take special delight in the portraiture of cutaneous diseases and the hideous stigmata with which they mark their victims, would never have neglected the opportunity of allusions to "colander visages." Leprosy M. Anglada looks upon as nearly extinct, although in the thirteenth century there were two thousand lepers in France, and nineteen thousand in Europe: that it is not quite extinct, however, and is to be found in all quarters of the earth, is still true.

"Paris en 1794 et 1795, Histoire de la rue, du club et de la famine," is a new book by C. A. Dauban, a writer not now for the first time at work on the French Revolution as a theme. Last year appeared his "Demagogie en 1793," of which the present work is in reality the supplement. The history here presented, which covers the end of the Reign of Terror, the Thermidorean reaction, and the last days of the Convention, is not taken from the proceedings of the Convention, nor from Government bulletins, but from the events of the street and the Jacobin clubs. The author cites several letters of Gouverneur Morris to George Washington, describing what he saw of the Revolution, and gives letters of Santerre, Kleber, Baron Trenck, and others. His documents and citations form the most valuable part of his work. His material is certainly excellent. Too many of his 600 pages, though, are filled with digression and declamation, in which he makes display of no very enormous capacity for the writing of history.

Seats and Saddles, Bits and Bitting. By Major Francis Dwyer, Austrian Hussars. (Philadelphia: Lippincott & Co.)—The spring of 1869 will be memorable as a season unusually productive of sporting books of all kinds and of works on the horse. Indeed, if the production of works of the former class continue to increase as is promised, we shall shortly have a sporting book to each game-bird of the country and on every kind of fire-arm, and unpractised young maids may go out with a full descriptive list and kill creatures they have never seen in the flesh.

Amid the desert of such books we find a very bright sort of an oasis in the work of Major Dwyer. Beside the introductory chapter, which is an essay on various styles of riding and uses of the bit, we have in Part I., subdivided into chapters, a thorough treatise on the horse itself; on the saddle and its influence on the seat; on seats and the military seat. Part II. treats of bits and bitting—the general principles of bitting; of the various forms of bits, nosebands, halters, and bridles, and of a new method, invented by the Major, of measuring the mouth for the bit. Part III. treats of the cure and prevention of restiveness in horses, and is the most valuable and instructive portion of the whole book; it deals with the subject in a manner entirely original, and is in direct opposition to the established practice of the modern horsemen and grooms—the latter a class of beings bigoted to the last degree. In view of the growing taste in the Eastern and Middle States for equestrianism, we recommend every one about to mount himself to purchase and carefully read Major Dwyer's little book, and we are greatly mistaken if thereafter more men than before do not sit, ride, and manage their horses with more comfort to themselves and the beasts, than if the new riders trusted to the light of nature or the advice of the average instructor.

Aspen Court. By Shirley Brooks, author of "The Gordian Knot," "Sooner or Later," etc. (Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1869.)—For a clever man who knows certain parts of his business tolerably well—who has, for instance, a knack of expressing himself clearly, and an air of knowing what he is about, and the faculty of describing, with much show of detail and accuracy, characters which have, however, no actual or possible reality—Mr. Shirley Brooks is as unsatisfactory a writer as we remember. One reason for this—in the case of the present novel, at least—is to be looked for in his constant use of absurdly illegitimate means for the production of his effects; as, for instance, where Paul Chequabent, on attempting to purloin some valuable papers belonging to his employer, is prevented from entering the strong room by a hyena, who has been "in a kind of a casual way" locked up there for one night only. The hyena is, in its turn, accounted for by the introduction, in an early chapter of the novel, of a sleeping partner in the law firm by which Paul is employed, who amuses his leisure by maintaining a private menagerie at his country-seat.

Another case in point is the skeleton placed by a mad priest in one of the rooms at Aspen Court, and so arranged that it shall be impossible for the new inmates to avoid coming suddenly upon it. Of course they do so come upon it, and, of course again, little Amy is frightened by it into a consumption of the lungs, in the course of which her flesh becomes lambent and phosphorescent and what not. It appears to us that such machinery is too cumbrous, and the effects sought to be produced too vulgarly sensational, to be employed by a writer who, in his general tone and manner, lays claim to such knowledge of his art and of life in general as does Mr. Brooks. The exigencies of serial writing—"Aspen Court" was, we think, first printed as a serial several years ago—may be pleaded as partial extenuation of faults of this description, or it might be if most of the best novels of late years had not been published in the same form, and if it were not also true that there are not only legitimate effects which may be created by a novelist, but legitimate means of creating them. Mr. Brooks, however, seems never to know when or in what way he is trenching on forbidden grounds. He has, too, a sort of whining morality—to give it a bad name—and, altogether, the experiment of reprinting him does not seem to have been very well worth the making.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Auerbach (B.), Villa Eden	(Roberts Bros.)	$2 00
" " Part III., swd	" "	0 50
Burgon (Rev. J. W.), England and Rome	(E. P. Dutton & Co.)
Forster (J.), Walter Savage Landor	(Fields, Osgood & Co.)	3 50
Kingsley (H.), Stretton: a Tale, swd	(Harper & Bros.)	0 40
Latrobe (J. H. B.), Hints for Six Months in Europe	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Leland (C. G.), Hans Breitmann's Ballads, with Glossary	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.)	2 00
Loomis (Prof. E.), Elements of Astronomy	(Harper & Bros.)
My Daughter Elinor: a Tale, swd	" "	1 25
Newby (Mrs. C. J.), Married: a Tale, swd	(Turner Bros. & Co.)	0 50
Southworth (Mrs. E. D. E. N.), The Bride's Fate: a Tale	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.)	1 75
Steele (J. D.), A Fourteen Weeks' Course in Astronomy	(A. S. Barnes & Co.)
Thackeray (W. M.), The Virginians	(Fields, Osgood & Co.)	1 25
Watson (J. W.), Beautiful Snow, and other Poems	(Turner Bros. & Co.)	1 25

The Nation.

VOL. IX.—NO. 210. THURSDAY, JULY 8, 1869. { FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM / TWELVE CENTS PER COPY

THE WEEK 21
EDITORIAL ARTICLES:
Our Supposed Sympathy with Cuba .. 24
The Sickles Testimonial 24
The Wages in the Public Service 26
France.—The Emperor in the Crisis 27
CORRESPONDENCE:
Chinese Immigration 28
NOTES:
Literary 29
Mr. Freeman's Norman Conquest 31
Freese's Tour through Palestine and Syria 32
The New West 33
Recent Republications 35
CURRENT LITERATURE:
Studies in Philosophy and Theology. — Norman Leslie. — Typhaines Abbey ..... 36—37
Books of the Week 37

Terms:—Five Dollars per annum, in advance; Clergymen, Four Dollars.  Remittances at the risk of the subscriber, unless made by draft, check, P. O. money order, or registered letter.

The date of expiration of each subscription is indicated on the printed label. A delay of more than three months in renewing subscriptions will endanger their continuance.

ADDRESS, PUBLISHER OF "THE NATION," BOX 6732, NEW YORK.

PUBLISHING OFFICE, 3 PARK PLACE.

The Week.

SINCE our last issue, news comes that the capture of the Catherine Whiting was a heavier blow to the Cuban Junta than it had previously received, although the police have been very busy with it of late, and most of its members have been in jail and have had to find bail-bonds more than once. District-Attorney Pierrepont having learned that two (or three) steam-tugs had sailed up the Sound, telegraphed for orders, and was answered by Secretary Fish that the men were to be captured and turned over to Admiral Godon, at Brooklyn. This was done, the tugs having spent a good deal of time in the Sound waiting for the Whiting, the men meantime starving for food and water. Some of the talk about American sympathy would be quieted a good deal by running over the list of the prisoners' names; the very large majority of the hundred and fifty of them were Cubans, and of the other score or two most were Irishmen, while American names are of very rare occurrence. The leading spirits of the expedition seem to have been Colonels Ryan and Byron—apparently typical Irishmen, full of courage and adventurousness, and with as much coolness on some occasions as heat on others. After Byron's capture he twice, it is said, attempted in vain to make his escape, and then, nothing daunted, tried it a third time and succeeded—as some say, by coolly taking his place in a boat which was bringing away Marshal Barlow and a couple of newspaper reporters from the Navy Yard. Meantime there seems to be nothing of consequence from Cuba, unless there shall turn out to be some truth in a story which is told by the Times, and which might give things a black look for Spain. It is to the effect that of two "filibusters" who were executed by the Spanish authorities the other day, one, Speakman by name, was a sailor, who declared that he had shipped in the Grapeshot for a voyage to Falmouth; that he knew nothing of the voyage to Cuba till he was at sea; that he was left on Cuban territory against his will; that he would not join the filibusters after the vessel's departure; and that he surrendered to the Spaniards at the first opportunity. He was shot, however—the American consul at Santiago laboring hard, it is said, to save his life, and the British consul assisting.

General Barlow, the United States Marshal in this city, is having a curious experience. The Republican organization is split into two sections, one known as the "Twenty-third Street Gang," headed by Charles S. Spencer, Esq., of the criminal bar, whose acquaintance with the "inside of politics" is probably surpassed by that of no other citizen of any bar whatever. The other section is of inferior influence and ability, and has its headquarters we believe in Twenty-second Street, and wages an unequal war with the Spencer "gang." The zeal of both, however, for the rights of man, for the extension of the area of freedom, and their hearty hatred of tyrants are such as would draw tears of admiration from a gorgon or other fabulous animal. Under their auspices, we need hardly say, the Republican party in this city is a great, flourishing, and aggressive body, much respected by all who know it. The State and municipal offices it allows to be divided amongst our foreign-born citizens of the Democratic party, partly to attach them more firmly to the country of their adoption, and partly to make them more familiar with the working of our political machinery; the Federal offices it endeavors to keep for itself. Marshal Barlow, however, who is a crotchety man, with little experience of "politics," and a most ridiculous sense of personal honor, and a kind of simple, feminine respect for duty, has appointed his deputies as he pleased, selecting them from various parts of the State, and with reference to their fitness solely. On hearing of this outrage, the two "gangs," whose combined force is known as "the Republican Central Committee," visited him by deputation, and enquired of him what he meant, and whether he was really going to pay heed to their recommendations for office or not; to which he made a saucy reply, to the effect that he was not responsible to them, and would do as he pleased. They have accordingly met, considered his case, and have asked the President to remove him for bad manners and indifference to party traditions.

We are waiting for the result with considerable anxiety, because it is quite plain that if General Barlow's offence should be passed over, there is no knowing to what lengths the disobedience of officials may go. What will become of the "workers" if there is uncertainty that the recommendations of committees, editors, and prominent politicians will be attended to? Is there not danger that we shall see before long a large body of "faithful men," now usually supported gratis by the public, engaged in some form of useful but repulsive industry? The Albany Journal, commenting on the affair, indulges, we regret to say, in some disgraceful abuse of Mr. Spencer, of whose conduct, career, and character, and, indeed, of those of the whole Republican committee, it takes a low and ill-natured view. The Hartford Courant, on the contrary, says that the course of the committee "seemed to the members just and wise"—of which, we suppose, nobody entertained any doubt—but that "it will not bear the test of criticism." That depends, however, on who the critic is. It will bear the criticism of a "practical man," who understands party management; it will not and was never expected to bear the criticism of visionary people like the Courant, whose childish admiration of the man Barlow is really pitiable. The damning fact that the latter has disregarded "party claims" remains, and cannot be explained away by any shallow and flippant sophistry.

In Virginia, after a most exciting contest, the Conservative Republican Walker is elected Governor, and the expurgated constitution is ratified. In Georgia, Mr. Stephens seems to be in as high a state of political activity as anybody else. We suppose he will never till the end of his life cease to tell us that the Federal Government is a government of delegated limited and specific powers; and we do not know that it is desirable he should. But one would like to hear it said once in a while that some of these grants of so-called limited powers carried with them, by necessary inference, powers so sovereign that the coexistence of fate and free-will is not harder for the natural man to understand than the coexistence of any Federal sovereignty with any State sovereignty. Anyhow, Mr. Stephens admits that "secession is a dead issue." We are glad to see, too—for his influence is very great with the people of Georgia—that Mr. Stephens tells General A. H. Wright that, in his opinion, the Supreme Court decision, affirming the right of a negro to hold office, is a sound one. Characteristically, he shows that the Court is right; and that the Legislature also had a right to turn out its colored members; and that the Legislature's decision is irreversible, and that of course the Court also is supreme and its decision is binding. Then he says that it is true, however, that as the Legislature asked the Court to settle the question, it will be very proper for it, when it has to settle such questions, to pay regard to the Court's opinion. So the knot is untied; but there was no need of tying it apparently. The Legislature, as long as it exists, can reverse its own decisions as easily as it can adjourn—omnipotence within their sphere being as much a characteristic of Legislatures as their right to judge of the qualifications of their own members.

In Tennessee, the fearful Stokes and Senter canvass goes on. Senter was so withering the other day that Stokes told him that although he (Stokes) was the father of a family and the husband of a wife, he would fight him any time within thirty days after the election. This gallant offer was accepted, and Senter even offered to fight there and then, which was a happy thought, but Stokes declined. "There's a pair of them," as the Irish say, and it would be a pity to lose one without losing the other. We believe, however, there is no danger of a fight, as Mr. Stokes is understood to have said that his challenge was only for the crowd, and was not intended to affect unpleasantly his relations with Mr. Senter. The latter gentleman has just removed thirty registrars, and replaced them by others of his own, so that his chances seem to be quite good, we should say. On the whole, it is not difficult to understand Andrew Johnson with this stream of Tennessee light thrown on him.

Our correspondent in another column may be right in thinking that Senator Casserly does not truly represent the public opinion of California when he denounces the Chinese, and favors the policy of exclusion. But the Legislature of the State, then, also misrepresents public opinion, for the statutes in relation to the Chinese are very much the same as if Mr. Casserly had inspired them. The San Francisco Bulletin of the 25th of last month contains a report of a meeting of the delegates of six Chinese Emigration Companies with Senator Conkling and the House Committee of Ways and Means, when a merchant of position, Fung Tang by name, made a speech which is worth attention as showing how we are disgracing ourselves in California. It is of a piece, too, with all the evidence that has ever been offered on the point in question. "Most of all," he says, "we feel the want of protection to life and property when courts of justice refuse our testimony, and thus leave us defenceless and unable to obtain justice for ourselves, and often for others." He complained of other things; but when that one thing is said, everything is said that is necessary; except, perhaps, it should be remembered that the race thus given over to the tender mercies of anybody who chooses to oppress and plunder it, is one of the most inoffensive in the world, even a Digger Indian being haughty and overbearing in his intercourse with it; and, secondly, that California boasts a breed of ruffians which it would be hard to match anywhere else, because all earthly rascaldom has contributed choice specimens to it. We dare say that next winter, when the Chinese question comes up for discussion, Mr. Conkling and his associates may find the information they are collecting quickened with enough of moral indignation to be very effective as speeches. Fung Tang went on to promise that if Chinamen could have the protection which the law accords every other inhabitant of the country, they would cultivate rice and cotton in the South, would raise silkworms and tea in California, would invest heavily in American business enterprises, would enlarge greatly the trade between this country and Asia, and in many other ways would be of service to the United States as well as to China. No doubt the Chinese question is a large one, and it may not be a sufficient answer to it to say that we will take all the Chinamen that may come and work them into the body politic; but in this one aspect of it, it is small enough to be easily comprehensible: we have no right, if we let them come in, to let our native cut-throats and robbers take them to practise on, which is what we are now doing to a considerable extent.

It looks probable that when the Chinese question is regularly ventilated by the Congressional lawyers, our friends of the California Democracy may find that their legislation is as illegal as it is inequitable, as being overridden, to say nothing of the Civil Rights Act, by the treaty-making power of the General Government. It would be no more surprising than a good many things that have happened since the beginning of the world, if one of the salutary and important results were to be some fluent speeches from Mr. Casserly in Pigeon English. We partly expect to live to hear him declaring from the stump that "brack man killy up we too much;" it would be good, sound Democratic doctrine, and the form in which it is put ought to make it effective. And what objection could there be to Judge Axtell's flying kites from the top of his dwelling, or walking out to the graves of his ancestors on the other side of the Chinese quarter, scattering small pieces of paper on which prayers are written? It would be no worse than owning a pew in a joss-house, or buying a barrel-full of hideous idols for presentation purposes, and any "man inside politics" knows there is no harm in that. Or, what would be the harm of Mr. Conness's putting on a conical hat on the day of the Feast of Lanterns or learning sentences out of the writings of Confucius? There is a vast fund of moral truth in Confucius—or Con-fut-zee, as Mr. Conness will find that our thriving, our industrious, our ancient, our light-colored fellow-citizens, who invented the compass and the art of printing, designate a man whom we are proud to acknowledge as the greatest of sages—which it would not hurt any Congressman to assimilate—or would not hurt him after he had assimilated it. A good account of him may be found in Dr. Legge's "Life and Teachings of Confucius;" and Mr. A. W. Loomis's "Confucius and the Chinese Classics" is a good little compilation, to which it is all the more appropriate to call the attention of the Pacific coast members, as Mr. Loomis is a San Franciscan, if we are not mistaken.

The New York Times contains a long summary, with extracts, of the Clarendon-Johnson negotiations, which contains, however, little in regard to them with which the public is not already familiar. One or two remarkable facts, however, leak out in it. Mr. Seward seems to have made up his mind, about the time Mr. Adams came home, that the negotiations were closed, as far as the United States were concerned, and could not by them be reopened. Nevertheless, when Mr. Johnson went out, he (Mr. Seward) deliberately reopened them, and suggested the convention of 1853 as a model for the machinery by which the Alabama claims were to be settled; and this poor Mr. Johnson kept steadily in his mind and constantly referred to throughout the transaction, and yet it was their taking this convention as a model, and putting the Alabama case in the category of a mere pecuniary claim, that did most to prejudice the public mind against the treaty. Moreover, strong as Mr. Seward was during the war on the "belligerent rights" question, it was he who first dropped it out of sight; and though Mr. Johnson appears to have been under the impression that his treaty secured its submission to the arbitrators, Mr. Seward expressed no desire to have the point made clear. In fact, there does not appear to be a scintilla of evidence that Mr. Johnson in any way departed from his instructions. If we are rightly informed, Mr. Sumner now admits this himself, and admits, moreover, that he wrote a letter some time ago to John Bright, acknowledging that had the treaty been submitted to the Senate six months earlier, it would undoubtedly have been ratified. This sets one to enquiring what occurred in that interval to make it appear so preposterous to Mr. Sumner when it actually came up, and we can discover nothing except Reverdy Johnson's foolish speeches. If it was really they which led to Mr. Sumner's demand for consequential damages, all we can say is, that it shows that post-prandial bunkum is rapidly becoming dangerous to civilization, and that blatherskite orators may henceforth be ranked among the "enemies of the human race," an elevation to which many of them aspire, but none, so far as we know, have hitherto attained.

The Labor Reformers have held a great convention near South Framingham, Mass., at which they did not mince matters. Mr. Legro, President of the State Lodge of Shoemakers, who was the first speaker, gave the discussion its tone. He chastised the Republican party in the State very severely for its refusal to charter the Knights of St. Crispin, and its subservience to speculators. The resolutions pronounced labor the only source of property, and denounced all interest on capital as "a vast scheme of organized theft;" called for the "immediate withdrawal of the notes of the national banks," "to be replaced by Treasury certificates of service," and the provision of free banking associations, "whereby money based on commodities may be furnished anywhere at cost;" decided that men who combine to rule women against their will are tyrants; and demanded "the immediate and unconditional payment of the war-debt by assessment on the whole property of the nation, including Government bonds." One of the speakers—not a man, we are glad for the honor of our sex to be able to say—made a ferocious attack on Wendell Phillips. "Who," said this dreadful creature, meaning Mr. Phillips, "I should like to know, used to humbug the people during the entire war?" She then added, bitingly and sarcastically, that "he had never worked a whole day in his life, and was nothing but a great baby, and never yet had played the part of a man"—sentiments which the degraded crowd received with laughter and applause. Similar liberties were taken with other prominent public men, showing that a spirit of severe, searching "criticism" begins to pervade all classes of the community.

The demand for "Treasury certificates of service," and for "the supply of money at cost" to anybody who wants it, is really the only important point in the platform, and does not present as many real difficulties as may appear at first sight. It would, it is true, be difficult to withdraw the national bank-notes as long as anybody wanted them; but why not issue "certificates of service" also for those who prefer them? Of course the Labor Reformers do not intend to force people to part with their goods "for certificates of service;" and, on the other hand, there is no reason why those who choose to give beef and cloth in exchange for them should not be permitted to do so. We fear the number of such persons would be found in practice to be small; but this would not, of course, make any difference. The Labor Reformers are wrong in asking to be supplied with "money at cost." Arrangements for that purpose already exist: they can procure both gold and silver coin at any broker's for almost the exact cost of procuring a similar weight of either metal at the mines. Greenbacks, it is true, bring more than the cost of the paper and printing, but this is solely because they are promises to pay gold. Remove the promise, and any poor man will be able to provide himself with a good, substantial five-thousand-dollar bill for about two cents, or even less. We doubt if a well-engraved, well-printed note can be supplied for less; but doubtless special arrangements could be made with trades unions, co-operative associations, schools, and boarding-houses, at lower rates. There is, however, a painful side to these doings and sayings of the convention which is obvious enough. That men constantly occupied with the study of the economic conditions of human society, and capable of speechifying about them in public, should possess so little acquaintance with even the history of some of the leading economic problems, shows how defective popular education still is.

The "Central Asian question" seems to be rapidly rising in England into the position of importance once held by the Turkish or "Oriental question." The progress made by Russia is still a mystery; that is to say, it is known how far the Russian troops have penetrated, but it is not known in what force they are holding what they have conquered or what their intentions are, and the Russian press keeps up a series of pleasant reminders that their presence in Asia must prevent England hereafter playing a prominent part in any European war. It begins to be doubted now, too, in India, whether Shere Ali, the Ameer of Afghanistan, has not received more encouragement than is good for him and for his patrons; that is, whether he may not be led by the support he expects from England to make attempts to push his dominion towards Turkestan and thus provoke Russia, and bring on a collision either too soon for English convenience or altogether unnecessarily. In the meantime, there appears to be little doubt that the Russians are pushing reinforcements out to Samarcand, and that, whatever may be the ultimate political fate of that region, their occupation is a great gain to civilization. Russia, on the other hand, has been greatly startled by finding that Prussia has quietly built up an iron-clad fleet in the Baltic, which seems capable, should the occasion arise, of playing the Russian fleet the same unhandsome trick which the Prussian army played the Austrians in Bohemia.

The Irish Church Bill is working its way out of the House of Lords under a load of amendments, none of them of importance, but the process has lost most of its interest since it became certain that the House would not venture to reject the measure. The two important results of the debate on the bill may be said to be that the Lords have proved that their loss of political influence is final and irretrievable, and that their debating powers are greater than they were supposed to be. One or two of the bishops made good speeches, but the intellectual feebleness of the junior occupants of the right reverend bench, as compared with the older men, is said to be a subject of general comment. Few of the later appointees rise above the rank of exemplary and irreproachable and rather dull parish priests. The Bishop of Peterborough, however, who is one of the new men, distinguished himself to such a degree as to lead the spectators in the gallery to applaud—an offence which, in the House of Lords, stands in much the same category as "speaking out in meeting."

The London Daily News, after a year's trial of the penny experiment, pronounces it a great success. The Pall Mall Gazette has now followed its example, and, since the 1st of July, sells also at a penny, and reproaches itself for not having sold at that rate from the beginning, the reason of its fixing the price high having been a want of confidence in the goodness of the popular taste. The Daily News came down in price without coming down in tone or quality, and the Gazette promises to do the same thing, which suggests the enquiry whether it is necessary for publishers of very cheap papers in this country to be as wildly sensational, and vulgar, and slangy as they usually maintain that it is. We suspect the consumers of cheap literature in America can, if fairly tried, stand as much good sense, good English, and decency as the same class in England; but the purveyors for them seem to dread nothing so much as overestimating their capacity. One of the curses inflicted on the country by the New York Herald was that its immense pecuniary success as a low buffoon set an example which most seekers of quick returns have ever since been imitating. One of the good things done by the late H. J. Raymond was, however, his demonstration of the possibility of being popular without being vulgar, or trashy, or sensational. The Herald, however, bred the "lively writer," and he has propagated his kind with fearful results to the press.

Although Dutch politics do not often press upon the attention of those who study the course of European affairs, they are found, when examined, to have much the same complexion as those of neighboring states, and to be subject to the same tendencies at any given period. Just now, accordingly, they are showing not only the struggle between Liberals and Conservatives, Protestants and Catholics, Heterodox and Orthodox, but the triumph of liberal ideas. The parliamentary elections have just taken place, returning thirty-eight new and five additional members to the Chamber, and the Liberals have made a clear gain of eight, besides increasing the "doubtful" members from one to seven. Even Amsterdam was carried by them. The Government now has a firm majority on which it can rely to carry out its reforms. The party which has really been beaten is the clerical, whose aim and hope was to unite Orthodox and Conservatives in an effort to hand over the public schools to the control of the clergy. The Liberals cheerfully took up this issue, and obtained the encouraging verdict just mentioned in favor of keeping the school-system, as now, unsectarian and secular. To the majority of the people no satisfactory reason could be given why the educational establishment of 1806 should be reversed; and as time goes on it will probably be still harder to furnish one.

OUR SUPPOSED SYMPATHY WITH CUBA.

In all the discussions which we have seen on the subject of the disturbances in Cuba, one point has always been taken for granted. It is always assumed by the orators, newspapers, and clergymen who approach the topic, that whatever hindrance the neutrality laws may place in the way of active intervention, or however little the proverbially cool blood of marshals and deputy-marshals may dispose them to violate their official oaths for the sake of struggling patriots, still one thing is clear, that a profound sympathy is felt by all true Americans with the inhabitants of the "Queen of the Antilles" in her attempt to throw off the "Spanish yoke;" we may feel compelled to enforce our neutrality laws, but we should like to see them broken; Grant may have to direct the seizure of the tugs, but Grant is sorry; what Grant would like to do would be, not simply to sympathize with Cuba, nor even merely to administer a little belligerent rights to Spain, but to go to war instanter with Spain, and show her that the monarchies of the past need not expect fresh, vigorous, young republics to respect the traditions of a diplomacy invented by those very monarchies for their own base purposes of insult and oppression. The main idea of the persons who urge the plea of sympathy seems to be to apologize for the existence of the neutrality laws by showing that Grant and the whole people are filled with a loathing of them, that they all long for an opportunity to fly at the throat of Spain, that they weep at every defeat of the Cuban forces, and clap their hands over every disaster which the Spaniard meets—in other words, that "America sympathizes with Cuba."

Now, after giving the subject much careful attention, we find ourselves believing that this supposed sympathy hardly exists except in the imagination of our prominent "statesmen," wire-pullers, and manufacturers of issues. Of course we cannot say what feelings Grant may have, but as for any general feeling on the part of the American public, there is simply a feeling of indifference. We have not yet had the pleasure of seeing any person of education and influence in any part of the country who was not free to admit that he knew little about the result of the Cuban struggle, and that he thought he did not care very much. We have heard the atrocities of the Spaniards deplored, but we have heard it intimated at the same time that the Cubans were probably just as bloodthirsty. We have heard regret expressed that Spain left it to Cuba to abolish slavery in the island, but we have heard doubt expressed at the same time as to whether the island had done it or would do it. We have heard the Cubans called the "lazy Cubans" and the "dirty Cubans," but never the noble, or the brave, or the generous, or the chivalric Cubans. And we cannot say that such specimens of the population as are now engaged in pouring forth fury and war upon Spain from the lower part of this city appear to have that calibre, intellectual, moral, or physical, which would lead one to sympathize with them in the present or any other undertaking. We have, it is true, read numerous fiery editorial articles denouncing Spain and proclaiming a warm love of her colony, but we never met any one who had read these editorials, or signified his attention of being about to do so. Most people whom we have met appear to have a horror of the whole subject, as a bore, and an unintelligible bore, too; those who express any other feeling than weariness express disgust, saying that Cuba is as totally devoid of interest as any colony in America—without a history, without literature or art, without great names in war, politics, or science, sunk for generations in slavery and ignorance, her inhabitants divided sharply into two classes, the indolent rich and the degraded poor—what is there in all this for us to sympathize with?

The reply generally made to this question is that we sympathize with her "noble effort to get rid of her debased past, and substitute for it the progressive career of a modern nation." But then these disgusted persons say Spain has been doing just the same thing, and according to the latest accounts is in a highly progressive condition, having cut quite adrift from feudalism, and established in its stead institutions fully in harmony with the spirit of the times. If Cuba, then, wished to show herself a foe of feudalism and a friend of liberty, it was not a very happy moment to choose for the exhibition—the very moment when Spain was beginning to show the temper most favorable to her objects. If Cuba wished to obtain reforms, the disgusted claim that the cue for her was to wait and take advantage of the liberal movement in Spain. The disturbances in the island of course now prevent any Spanish government from making concessions. In the face of an insurrection, the only thing that Spain can do is to rivet her chains. Suppose in 1775 George III. had been suddenly driven from the English throne, and a moderate party headed by Chatham come into power, would it have been a very intelligent thing for the colonies of England to declare their independence and make war? Would any one have either sympathized with their patriotism or applauded their intelligence if they had done so? We say all this on the supposition that it is Cuba that has declared war, and not Broadway and Houston Street. The doubt which exists in the minds of most people, however, on this last point, makes sympathy still more difficult. It is absolutely necessary to make sure of the identity of the person with whom you sympathize.

Those who suppose that any acute feeling is at work in the hearts of the American people, either for or against the insurrection, appear to make the mistake of relying on traditions which have lost their vital forces. One of these traditions is that we sympathize with every dependent people, no matter what its character or its fitness for self-government, which rises in a struggle for its autonomy. No doubt we used to do so, but in the last twenty years we have seen so many insurrections which, however holy and patriotic in themselves, were not productive of anything but misery and ruin to the people engaged in them, that we have become a little sceptical as to insurrection in the abstract. And, then, insurrection before 1861 meant to American ears a rising of a down-trodden, freedom-loving people against a European despotism; but the experience of that year showed that there might be insurrections against liberty-loving republics as well, and this has rather changed the force of the word. Besides this, the annexation fever, which some years since might have been very potent in fomenting trouble between ourselves and Spain apropos of any colonial rising, has latterly quite died out. We are not, thank heaven! the annexers we once were; we have come to see the folly of mere territorial expansion; and the scheme of adding Cuba to the United States, so popular in the filibustering times of twenty years ago, neither fires the heart nor even attracts the attention of the community of to-day. We have so much land now, and so little good government in it, that an increasing number of people would, we fancy, prefer to sell off a few acres or so, rather than acquire any more. As for enlarging the country by the island of Cuba or the Dominion of Canada, we believe very little more interest is felt in the proposition than was felt in Mr. Seward's polar-bear purchase.

As we said before, it seems to us that those who think it necessary to apologize to Cuba for the enforcement of the neutrality laws are laboring under a mistake. The time may have been when a party could be got up on an issue of sympathy with the "Queen of the Antilles," but that was in the old days, when she was needed not in the interests of freedom, but for the sake of slavery. We have something else to do now than to be going up and down the earth seeking whom we may annex. If any one expresses interest in anything connected with the Cuban troubles, it is, so far as our experience goes, in the rigid enforcement of the laws, and not in the success either of brawling desperadoes in New York or of their unknown confederates in Cuba. It may indeed be that the "men inside politics" sympathize with the insurrection, but how much the opinion of these gentlemen is to be valued we all know. As for real active interest, on the part of independent and honest men, there is not nearly so much as there was with the Cretan struggle; let those who remember the zeal of Dr. Howe and the passionate interest of Mr. Stillman in that contest tell us where to look for the like feeling on the part of like men now. Who is the Dr. Howe of Cuba? Is it Col. Ryan? And who is their Stillman? Consul-General Plumb, perhaps.

THE SICKLES TESTIMONIAL.

We suppose few intelligent persons read the extraordinary "testimonial" sent to General Sickles, and signed by a number of "prominent citizens," previous to his departure for his post in Spain, without feeling, if not saying, that it is high time that there should be a plain, general understanding as to the nature and extent of the relations existing in the United States between morals and politics. We cherish no delusions on this subject. No politician need fancy that in opening the subject we are going to furnish him with a laugh at our expense, by arguing from the assumption that none but the pure and good should fill places of honor or profit. What we seek, and what the community seeks, from the class of people who signed this Sickles testimonial, is a plain answer to these two questions:

1. Would it be possible for a man to commit any crimes so heinous, or lead any life so debased, as to disqualify him for a political office in the United States?

2. Supposing that there exists no such disqualification, what is your real opinion as to the effect on social order and on morality—putting politics aside altogether—of a public announcement, such as has been made in this Sickles case, by lawyers, editors, merchants, and philanthropists, that a man of infamous character is not only not unfit for a high public position, but is deserving of "the personal respect and esteem and friendship" of his fellow-citizens!

Lest it should be supposed that we are indulging in mere declamation, with nothing but a hypothesis for our text, let us briefly state the facts of the case. General Sickles was—in so far as his public life was concerned—up to the outbreak of the war a New York politician of the lowest order, which is saying a great deal. But in addition to this, his private life was from early manhood down to the same period—that is, to the age of forty-five or thereabouts—infamous in the literal, generally accepted sense of that term. We are not going to sully our pages by reiterating the leading incidents in his career. It is sufficient to say that they are such that, to match them in the case of a public man, one has to search not the historical literature of modern Christendom, but the pages of Tacitus or Suetonius. This, we admit, is strong language; but we mean it to be strong. Considered in relation to the facts, of which it is intended to give the reader an idea, it is mild language. Moreover, we are not in saying this giving the results of mere rumor. We are giving a version of his career which we have had from men who knew him well in his youth and manhood, which hundreds in this city could confirm on oath, which is, in part, of judicial record, and which nobody—neither he nor those who last week attempted to fête him—has had the courage to deny. In short, the year 1861 found him a man with whom men of honor in civilized countries do not associate, and whom no respectable woman could meet under any circumstances in social life. The war opened to him a chance of partial redemption. The advice which honest men who attach any importance to character would have given him when he was entering the army, was to expose himself freely, and earn the silence and forgetfulness of the community he had lived in by an honorable death. He served bravely, was badly wounded, and survived the war. We have no desire and no occasion to underrate his military exploits. His mistakes or misconduct at Gettysburg cannot affect his moral character, and there are few purely military errors which are not atoned for by a desperate wound. But all that he earned by his military career—all he could have earned by it, had it been twice as brilliant—would have been, as we have said, the silence of the public about his past. In serving in the army, and serving well, he did no more than hundreds of thousands of men of pure life and unblemished character. To mention him in the same breath with thousands who entered the service, not as a refuge from disgrace, but as the seal and confirmation of long-cherished convictions, as the last and noblest sacrifice to duty, would be to insult them if living, and dishonor their memory if dead. In short, all that his fighting entitled him to was silence and oblivion. If it gave him a claim to anything more than this, that claim was amply satisfied by his receiving rapid promotion to all but the highest military rank. This attained, a proper regard for decency and morality required that he should, during the remainder of his days, obtrude himself as little on the public notice as possible, and that his friends should call as little attention to his existence as was consistent with the proper discharge of his duties.

A portion of the public, therefore—and we are glad to believe it is still by far the larger portion of the public—were both astonished and shocked by his selection for the Spanish mission, particularly when the relations of the two countries were in a most delicate state. They were astonished and shocked, first, because his military career had not been such as to entitle him to extraordinary distinction or to any of the more valuable prizes of civil life; secondly, because the selection of such a man for any high office was nothing short of an insult to the multitude of men all over the country who had served as well as he and from far purer motives, whose character was unsullied, and whose qualifications for diplomatic functions were at least as good. The appointment of Sickles, in short, would have only become legitimate when the position had been offered in vain to all other Americans of good character and education. As it is, his appointment was an outrage on every gentleman—we do not use the word in the narrow, conventional sense—who wore a sword or carried a musket in the war.

The appointment, however, is not the worst of it. After seeing some of the men whom certain constituencies send to Congress and place in other high offices, and whom professed Radical "moralists" pat on the back, and even cover with laudation, we cannot be too hard on the Administration if it now and then puts a pimp, or bully, or murderer, or peculator in high office. There are lower depths of shame for the country than this; and we have in the Sickles case reached them. There are, we take it, two great restraints on vice in our day—the fear of God and the fear of man. Doubtless some men are kept in the strait and narrow way by a philosophic love of virtue in itself; but this motive must influence at best only a very small number; has never in any age influenced many, and is never in any age likely to influence many. The great defences of society in our time, and for all time to which it is worth our while to look forward—the sanctions which maintain faith between man and man, respect for family and for property, for truth and chastity and justice—are the religious sentiment and the dread of public opinion. Of the importance of both of these, nobody who remembers how small a class of offences against society can, after all, be reached by judicial pursuit, and how much the law is always dependent for its efficiency not simply on the support it receives from public opinion, but on the personal character of the men who administer it, needs any argument to convince him. Courts and laws and constitutions, however perfect theoretically, are, as has been a hundred times shown in the history of the world, worthless, unless the people who stand behind them are on the whole virtuous, and use their influence, their power, their public honors, their praise and blame, for the support of virtue. There is a great deal of talk amongst stump orators of late about the resemblance between the life of a man and the life of a nation. They evidently believe, though the fallacy has been repeatedly exposed, that the life of a nation is a physical life, and that, barring the occurrence of accidents or acute disease, a nation may count on youth, maturity, and old age as a foreordained right. The life of a nation is, however, wholly moral, and if its moral tone sinks below a certain point—that is, if the moral standard of the individual men who compose it be obscured and debased—it may die at any age, and may die though its treasury be full, its armies and fleets gigantic, and its territory immeasurable.

Now when leading merchants, leading lawyers, and leading editors come forward and deliberately sign a paper, as was done in New York last week, not only approving of the selection of a man like General Sickles as the representative of the nation at a foreign court, but expressing—we quote their own language—their "personal respect, esteem, and friendship" for a man whose career up to the decline of life had been what is usually called infamous; and when leading newspapers load him with eulogy on account of services to a political party which were not half so valuable as those of thousands of respectable men, they do what they can, we have no hesitation in saying, to break down one of the strongest protections against political and social degradation. No merchant who "esteems" or "respects" Sickles has a right to ask his son or clerk to be honest, or pure, or faithful, or industrious. No public writer who lauds him can expect his expressions of zeal for reform to be treated as anything better than an outburst of snivelling hypocrisy. Some of the papers report "clergymen" as having been present at the "reception" by which the written testimonial was followed up. If this is true, we ought to have been favored with their names, and they owe it to themselves to make them public. They must be, in more senses than one, remarkable men, who have been led by their study of the Evangelists not only into "esteem and respect" for Daniel E. Sickles, but into deeming it their duty to hold him up publicly as a model for youth. The affair will, we believe, serve one useful purpose. It will open the minds of the people at large more clearly than ever to the moral and political abyss which the "men inside politics" are preparing for them, and into which they will lead them if let alone, and the blinding effect of party discipline and party fidelity on the moral sense of even good men.

We have no doubt many of those who signed this shameful testimonial did so out of sheer cowardice. The number of persons who have the courage or honesty to refuse their names when asked to help a political adventurer into office is daily declining. Large numbers now endeavor to reconcile their weakness with their sense of duty to the public, by writing privately to the dispensers of patronage, asking them to disregard their signatures to testimonials. But this device, though it may in some cases prevent the direct mischief of the "testimonial" system, does nothing to neutralize the effect on the public mind of the daily endorsement of worthless persons by men of character and influence. A weak and timid man who finds himself tempted to sign a glowing testimonial for a good-for-nothing, might better steel himself for a refusal by a moderate potation than to give way. Better go home with a foul breath than foul hands; for hands which have helped, in never so slight a degree, to diminish the contempt and hatred of one's fellow-citizens for knaves and profligates, and to lower their appreciation of honesty and purity, are always foul. The salvation of this nation and of all other nations must come not from either labor or capital, climate, soil, or products, but from individual character. It is the confidence in this—which history, reason, and revelation all justify—which sustains and consoles those who are disposed to be appalled by the growing magnitude and importance of material interests. Lasting national prosperity is the reward and result of the general devotion to high ideals, of the general love of truth and justice, and the general faithfulness to duty. All reforms which do not rest on this as a basis are superficial and evanescent, and it is this tremendous fact, which explains the rise and fall of a hundred states, which makes the importance attached by some of our reformers to the help of any rascal or hypocrite they can rope into their ranks so supremely childish and ridiculous. Our constitutional amendments and acts of Congress are but as the flowers of the field, unless they are rooted in the general integrity. He who does anything to efface the distinction in the popular mind between the honest man and the rogue, between the unselfish patriot and the self-seeking rowdy or demagogue—he, and not the armed rebel, or malignant copperhead, or foreign tyrant, is the real enemy of the Republic. No party triumph is worth anything if, in winning it, you have in never so slight a degree depraved the popular taste or perverted the popular judgment.

THE WAGES IN THE PUBLIC SERVICE.

A CASE recently before the Court of Claims in Washington, and decided by Judge Nott, throws some useful light on the condition of the Civil Service, as affected by the rate at which the regular officers of the Government are now paid. It also furnishes some assistance in getting at the real nature and importance of the "eight-hour movement," begun last session in the Senate, and brought, through the efforts of Senator Wilson, General Butler, and others, in spite of the adverse opinion of the Attorney-General, to a happy and prosperous issue. The case in question consists of a suit brought by forty-five bank-note printers employed in the Currency Bureau, and paid for their work by the sheet or day, to recover the twenty per cent. ordered by the joint resolution of Feb. 28, 1867, to be paid "to persons employed in the civil service of the United States," in consideration of the smallness of their salaries. It has to be borne in mind, however, that persons employed by the Government in work which is such as might be rendered to any employer, or which is not in its nature political—such as shipbuilding or other manufacture—are not covered by this resolution. The rate of wages paid to them is by law regulated by the rate paid by private employers in the same place for similar work. It was to override this exception, and secure to them in some way or other a benefit similar to that derived by the officers of the civil service from the joint resolution, that the great eight-hour movement was got up and carried out. We have frequently drawn attention to the demoralizing effects of the smallness of the salaries which Congress—in obedience to the general sentiment of the public, particularly of the farming public, and with the applause, and indeed at the instigation, of the leading members of the blatherskite press—persists in paying to the regular employees of the Government. The contrast between these salaries and the pay of the mechanics employed by the Government, about which Senator Wilson has been of late so much disturbed, has however, never, as far as we know, been pointed out, and it is well worth attention.

In Baker's case — the case before us — the forty-five bank-note printers—merely mechanical laborers, be it remembered, who ask for the addition of twenty per cent. to their pay—received for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, from $2,039 to $3,500 each. The pay of one of them equalled the salary of the Comptroller of the Treasury; that of three of them exceeded the salary of the Chief of the Division; and that of all of them exceeded the salary of the Superintendent of Printing under whom they worked. Now, who is the Comptroller of the Treasury, who is paid at the same rate as these mechanics, employed for a few hours a day printing national bank-notes? We will extract an account of his duties from Judge Nott's decision:

"They embrace the work of examining all accounts settled by the first and fifth Auditors, and of certifying the balances arising thereon to the Register; of countersigning all warrants drawn by the Secretary of the Treasury which may be warranted by law; of reporting to the Secretary the official forms to be issued to the different officers for collecting the public revenue, and the manner of keeping and stating the accounts of the persons employed therein; of superintending the preservation of the public accounts subject to his revision, and providing for the payment of all moneys which may be collected; of superintending the recovery of all debts due to the United States, and directing legal proceedings to enforce their prompt payment, and of laying before Congress annually a list of such officers as shall have failed to make the settlements required by law. (Act 3d March, 1817, 3 Stat. L., 367, §§ 8, 10, 13, 14.) The single requirement that all warrants drawn by the Secretary of the Treasury 'which shall be warranted by law,' be countersigned by the Comptroller, obliges that officer to pass to a certain extent upon the legality of every payment made by the United States; and in the fiscal year to which this twenty per centum applies there were 40,814 warrants drawn, requiring of the Comptroller 40,814 signatures given with his own hand."

This office of Comptroller of the Treasury—one, as we see, of enormous labor and responsibility—was created in 1789, and the salary was then, when its duties were trifling compared to what they are now, fixed at $3,000, the members of Congress who fixed it themselves receiving at that time $1,500 a year. The value of money having declined about two-thirds since then, Congressmen have very properly raised their own salaries to $5,000 a year, exclusive of mileage, although their legislative duties only occupy them half the year. The salaries of other Government officers, however, they left untouched and unadjusted from the foundation of the Government till 1867, and then sought to deal with the injustice of the present scale by adding twenty per cent. by joint resolution. The Comptroller, therefore, now gets $3,600; but if his salary had been raised in the same proportion as those of Congressmen, he would now, as Judge Nott points out, be in receipt of $10,000 in currency. The Congress, in fact, which founded the Civil Service was evidently determined to make it pecuniarily attractive to men of good character and ability, and make it also an independent and respectable career, such as men of good character and ability would be content to live and die in. Had subsequent Congresses been as careful of its dignity and efficiency, not only would it have saved a large amount of public money, but it would have saved American politics from one of the most corrupting influences to which the politics of any country was ever exposed. But it would not do to raise the salaries to their proper level now without recurring to the old mode of appointment and the old tenure of office. Any increase in the pay would only increase the eagerness of the scramble following the Presidential election, and would probably end in reducing the ordinary term of office from four years to one year, or even to six months, so as to give as many "workers" as possible a share of the "spoils."

In Baker's case, Judge Nott held that the Treasury printers were not civil servants, but contractors simply, and therefore not entitled to the benefit of the joint resolution, and pointed out the marked difference between the position of artisans employed by the Government and receiving the market rate of wages, and that of its regular officers, whose salaries are fixed by law. The wages of the former have steadily risen with the decline in the value of money, and, even if now inadequate, are no more so than the wages of all other laborers.

There is of course in all this no answer to the argument that plenty of persons can be got to do the work of the civil servants for the amount now paid, and a great deal less. This is probably true; and if it made no difference how work was done, the argument would be unanswerable. There stands ready in every community a large body of persons ready to fill all possible posts for a mere trifle. The bench of the Supreme Court could be filled with nine members of the bar for what the clerk now costs; and if the editorship of the New York Tribune were made part of the "spoils," we have no doubt that a vast body of citizens could be found ready to take the place for a sum which Mr. Greeley would think too small for his weekly expenditure in charity. The experiment of ignoring human nature in the matter of salaries, however, cannot last very much longer in a rich and growing country. Its absurdity will shortly be demonstrated, owing mainly to the increasing attractions of commerce. The religious world is making an attempt to get clerical work done cheaply by lofty appeals to the religious sentiment of young men, who have not yet chosen their calling, and glowing pictures of the beauties and advantages of lives of poverty and privation. It is, however, quite certain that well-to-do church members will never succeed in convincing theological students of the worthlessness of comforts to which they themselves plainly attach so much importance, or of the duty of entering on a calling in which the struggle for bare existence is becoming so intense as to make all valuable intellectual work well-nigh impossible. Every man's first duty is to his own bodily and mental constitution, and it is wrong for him to accept any place, except through sheer necessity, which does not afford him the means of keeping them in good working order.

FRANCE.—THE EMPEROR IN THE CRISIS.

PARIS, June 18, 1869.

THE extreme gravity of the present situation in France seems hard of appreciation by a foreigner, because its excess of gravity comes principally from the peculiarities of the French nation, and from the special characteristics of the individuals who have attained to power, and who exercise now more control than is supposed. Let us cast a glance over the events of the last few months, which have culminated in the events of the last few days. Since the elections of the year 1863, there has been a steady, continuous, unbroken advance towards more liberal ideas in the Legislative Chamber—towards the greater participation of the nation itself in the work of governing. This is the starting-point, and the point which it is important to seize, because it underlies everything, and does not vary. There may be questions "on one side," as it were, of this, upon which (as, for instance, on the Roman Occupation question) deputies of the most conflicting opinions vote together; others which separate the very men who seem indissolubly united; but wherever the question of pure "personal" government is touched, and put face to face with the principle of "self-government," you perceive clearly that the latter is in the ascendant, and that, on each succeeding opportunity, more votes come over to it. On the affairs of the city of Paris, of public meetings, of the Budget, this tendency showed itself distinctly, and ought to have prepared the Emperor for the strong but perfectly peaceable expression of feeling which was manifested by the general elections. Six years had made a tremendous difference in the public thought. Instead of the not quite two millions who altogether returned the twenty or thirty Opposition deputies of the last elections, these present elections showed nearly four millions of electors resolved to return whomsoever was the champion of the nation against personal rule. In fact, the Government counts little more now than a majority of 700,000, whilst its commencement (in 1851–52) was seven or eight millions—unanimity, in short. Here lay the truth: the expression of the national will—which, if you have invented the system of universal suffrage, and are prepared to abide by it, you are absolutely bound to take into consideration The riots—the Rochefort election and the breaking of a few lamps and windows in Paris and Bordeaux—were comparatively insignificant, and simply signs of school-boy effervescence. These riots have had the excellent result of teaching the Parisian "bourgeois" that, if he chooses, he is always strong enough to put down mere street-rows with tongs and broomsticks. It was not there that any importance whatever lay—not half as much importance as might have been found in the Park riots in London, which certainly frightened no politician in his senses.

Well, then, here we have the position: A strong, calmly-expressed feeling (expressed throughout the land) in favor of reform tending towards self-government, and a puerile outbreak of silly violence at one or two given points—utterly unmeaning. What was the attitude of the Government? At first, on the part of the Emperor, surprise (which, had he felt the pulse of the country for some time past, he ought not to have experienced), and, on the part of his present ministry, disappointment and blank consternation at seeing how powerless had been their own intrigues and their numerous administrative arts and wiles. Immediately there was a summons of Prince Napoleon, who, in all emergencies, is applied to as the man who is felt by the Emperor to be the most intelligent, most clear-sighted and impartial, and most to be relied upon. The Emperor's first impulse was undoubtedly the right one; and his tendencies, by those who during the first days of the crisis stood nearest to him, were judged problematical only from the peculiar manner of their liberalism. While Prince Napoleon, Émile Ollivier, and the just converted M. de Persigny talked politics, the Emperor talked socialism, and in the first moments "harked back" unmistakably to his own "Idées Napoléoniennes." This puzzled many of those around him, who said too late that the "checks and balances" of true representative government were precisely what Louis Napoleon disliked most, and that, while he would have no objection whatever to inaugurate "democratic socialism" in its wildest theories so long as he remained personally its dictator, he would always, till the last hour, recoil from a division of power, from submission to the control of the nation through its representatives.

Prince Napoleon was the first to see the hopelessness of the attempt to save the Empire from itself, and he retired full of the gloomiest forebodings; M. de Persigny was the last, and he sent forth his extraordinary epistle, in which he recommends himself as one of the "young generation," and which, after it has been ridiculed by all parties, he tries now to disavow. The retirement, however, of the "constitutionalists" and of the men who sincerely wished to save the Empire, left the Emperor alone, exposed to the counsels of the reactionists and the supporters of the status quo—both equally dangerous.

As Louis Napoleon holds less to his own dreams and theories than most men, he soon gave up all advocacy of the "Idées Napoléoniennes," and the democratic socialist dictatorship, and listened solely to the Empress, who would have leaned easily towards "repression," and to M. Rouher, who, with all his colleagues, advocated unanimously the maintenance of the status quo. To a vacillating and naturally indolent mind, nothing is so agreeable as to be able to "do nothing" conscientiously; so to the theory of the "status quo" Napoleon III. was converted without much trouble, and out came the deplorable letter to M. de Mackau, upon which there are certainly not two opinions throughout France. Official papers may be condemned to defend the Emperor's epistle, and functionaries be "advised" to praise it to the top of their lungs, but to appreciate the death-blow it gives to the dynasty and to the Empire in its possible stability, it is only required to talk upon the subject with no matter what serious believer in Bonapartism or genuinely attached friend and servant of the dynasty. There is (as there indeed can be) but one sentiment about it, namely: that the Emperor has mistaken—and has been made to mistake—the entire situation.

Instead of opening his eyes to the tendency towards more participation in the work of governing that has been quietly and gravely shown by all France, the Emperor's attention has been drawn to the unimportant fact of the riotousness, so easily defeated, in the Paris streets; he has been made to take the shadow for the substance, and has been deluded into committing what is probably one of a long list of irretrievable errors, from the weakest of all causes in a sovereign—the fear of seeming to be afraid. His unfortunate letter to M. Mackau might have been written by the unhappy Emperor of Austria before Sadowa had taught him its cruel lesson. There is a mistaken apprehension of the spirit of modern times about it which strikes every one. You see that all the lessons of early adversity, all the examples witnessed, have been powerless to teach

Louis Napoleon that what in this nineteenth century the peoples one after the other revolt against, is the fact of being dictated to, provided for—"governed," in short. The Emperor speaks as he might perhaps have done in 1851, but as the French nation will not acquiesce in his speaking now. He speaks as a power outside of and above the country itself; and he does not see that this is the very principle that the elections have condemned. The one only hope expressed by some of his best friends is a sorry one. It is this: "With the Emperor one must never despair; he is so open to conviction that he may very likely, ere many weeks, act in diametrical opposition to what he has just said."

The Emperor and his entourage entered upon the elections with the certainty that (by some means) the official candidates would be elected wherever they were put forward. The contrary stared them in the face almost at once, and now the Government sees the position pretty much as it really is. Then, what to do? Between the results of the 24th of May and those of the ballottage of the 7th of June, a faint appeal was made to the shade of the old system. Military agents were despatched into every garrison town of France, and into the whole northwest of Germany. A week sufficed, and the reports were in purport identical: "In the French army no enthusiasm; in the population, resolute horror of war. In Germany, an army one with the people, and a nation ready to resist to the very death if attacked." Now, to-day, the Emperor knows that war is forbidden him, and that of that "way out" he disposes no more.

There are but two courses open before him—repression or change of principle (called by the Bonapartists abdication). Is repression possible? Is it possible now, after seventeen years of arbitrary rule, which the country refuses to call successful, to come and persuade "society" that it requires to be once more "saved," as in '51–'52? Besides, from what is it to be saved? If you merely take the figures, the Government may say it has a majority in the Chamber; and in the street, where is revolt? Do what it will—provoke and irritate the mob as it may—the police cannot get more than a few cheers for Rochefort and a few shouts of the "Marseillaise" out of a handful or two of loungers on the boulevards. There is no pretext given, or likely to be so, for "saving society;" so that, in truth, the "repression" theory has to be abandoned.

Apropos to this, there is a little fact that has perhaps not been sufficiently studied by the Imperialists, and that is, that since the invention of "conical balls" and Chassepot rifles, etc., no armed repression of street insurrection is possible. No troops in France would discharge "Chassepot" rifles upon their fellow-citizens. That, any sous-lieutenant will tell you.

Well, "repression" being so very difficult of execution, what is left save what Imperialists term abdication—namely, constitutional government? For this Napoleon III. has a singular but deep-rooted aversion. He believes in democracy; has no objection to a dictatorship being "popular," or "socialistic," or whatever you may choose to call it; would not mind if it were decreed to-morrow that no man should leave his fortune to his children—nothing in the wildest notions of the communists or any other sect scares or troubles him: but the notion of a regular and unescapable control he recoils from. Now, control—the essence, the vital principle of constitutional or representative government: each force controlling the others, and thus making it impossible for any one force to go too far—is what the majority of the French nation is desirous of at present—no more; but it is on the cards that the Emperor may attempt to offer it "more," in order to avoid conceding to it just that.

A very curious study has been the clergy throughout the last electoral contest. The clergy of France was, some thirty or forty years ago, the first in the Catholic world. They were the true descendants of Bossuet and Fénelon, heroes of the noble Gallican Church, and bulwarks against Ultramontanism and Jesuitry. But this could not suit the calculations of arbitrary rule; so one of the first steps taken by Napoleon III. was to call back the Jesuits. Of these he thought he could readily make his own mere instruments; and so he did—up to a certain point, not beyond. A Jesuit is not easy to satisfy, and impossible to subjugate if once you try to satisfy him. When the Jesuits and Ultramontanes got fairly seated in their saddle here, they demanded more than the Empire could give them consistently with its own even temporary safety. Then the Jesuits ceased to uphold the Empire uncompromisingly. In the last elections the clerical influence has been exerted with but lukewarm zeal for the official candidates generally. Once or twice it has helped a red-hot "clerical" candidate of the Opposition; but, on the whole, the "clericals" have felt that they had, somehow or other, so drawn upon themselves the hatred of nine-tenths of the nation, that they have rather preferred to retire a little from the scene of action, and watch events from a safe distance.

Correspondence.

The following correction should be made in the letter on "University Influence" in the Nation of June 24: Third paragraph, last line, read "hurtful" instead of "truthful."

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Is there not a tendency to give undue prominence to the expressions of men who claim to be representative men of a party? In your columns of the "Week" (No. 208), Senator Casserly, of California, is made to display no enviable figure. Doubtless Mr. Casserly represents, in some sense, a strong feeling in California, and in other States also. Yet it may be safe to say that his crude conclusions bear the same relation to the mature judgment of the thinking men of the policy of exclusion that the "blatherskite" of a certain school of politicians on finance and foreign relations does to the ultimate action of their own party. In both cases, there is a serious question to be considered; but the facility with which men in these times can "eliminate from their self-consciousness" all things, disposes to the rendering a judgment before an issue is formed.

That the "policy of exclusion" has merits I think can be shown from your admissions, or rather declarations. Your constant readers will remember the regrets expressed for the New England mechanic and the "granite" men of Massachusetts of former days, and the contrast drawn between them and their successors. The pressure has not only affected one class, it has extended to all. The tendency of "Americans" to quit day labor, the workshop, and the farm has crowded every avenue in the professions, in mercantile life, and in speculations. The places of these men are filled, or are to be filled, by what is called cheap imported labor.

Our American laboring men and mechanics, who were formerly our boast, might have been retained, much to our profit materially and morally, if half the pains had been taken to retain them that was to displace them.

Making all due allowance for class jealousies, there will be found good material and moral reasons for the exclusion of a Chinese immigration. The question beyond all others in our civilization is, that the quality of progress should be the test of its quantity. If immigration is to be encouraged, it should be of such a quality that we can adopt it at once; or, if not, only in such quantities that we can readily assimilate it. We are now running too rapidly to material considerations, and the higher education and higher morality of our country are neglected. There can be no certain progress founded on a fluctuating middle class, or on a degraded or despised laboring class. A desirable society is formed by preventing disturbing elements, and by consolidating the interests of all through encouragement and appreciation.

As a question of labor, the Chinese immigration is a doubtful experiment. All that may be said of their present good qualities as laborers does not give any assurance that they have their good traits so ingrained that they will not acquire the bad traits of other laborers. Their work on the Pacific Railroad presents no very bright prospect for the competition of American laborers. They certainly labored cheaply, if that is a consideration, and perhaps well; yet their living was of a low grade. Their houses, described as "dog-kennels," are certainly not the homes of American laborers.

Now it is well known that China could populate the Pacific coast more thickly than any of the New England States are populated, and scarcely appreciate the sending. This is not an impossibility, and presents no pleasing spectacle. It may be, for the time being, to the interest of those who desire very cheap labor; yet they are not the material from which can be manufactured anything approaching the ideal American citizen. The plain question is, Why should such immigration be encouraged?

Immigrants have their own reasons for coming to the United States. The latest reason assigned by newspapers of a certain school is, that the immigrant wishes to patronize a country which protects home industry by a tariff. Will not a committee of Congressional sociologists take the statistics of opinion among the "Johns," and tell us truly whether they wish to throw their moral force in the scale of protection to home industry, or desire to confer a blessing on this country by furnishing cheap labor?

Very respectfully,

G. W. Field.

Eddyville, Iowa, July 1, 1869.

Notes.

LITERARY.

MESSRS. FIELDS, OSGOOD & Co. announce that the "Autobiography of a Shaker," by F. W. Evans, which recently appeared in the Atlantic Monthly, will be printed, together with other interesting matter relating to the Elder's sect, and may be had on application to the author, who lives at Mount Lebanon, Columbia County, in this State.——Messrs. J. B. Lippincott & Co. announce "Soimême: the Story of a Wilful Life," which seems to be an American work; Mr. Mill's "Subjection of Women;" "Our Own Birds, or a Familiar Natural History of the Birds of the United States," by W. L. Bailey; "Ocean to Ocean," by the author of "Absaraka," who in this new work appears to be giving us a sort of a guide-book to the Pacific Railroad country; D. T. Ansted's "Earth's History," a geological text-book; "Anecdotes of the Old Testament," by J. Whitecross; "Moral Reforms," by Bishop Coxe; and a collection of Tunes and Songs, made by Mr. W. Walker—which he calls "Fruits and Flowers." The compilers of these collections have long been the most metaphorical of men.——We observe that Messrs. Appleton & Co., as well as Messrs. Lippincott & Co., announce Mill's "Subjection of Women. The same house have in press five more of the Mühlbach stories; Thackeray's "Yellow Plush Papers," uniform with the very cheap editions of Scott and Dickens, and, should it be one of a set, threatening to the prospects of the Harpers and the Fields & Osgood cheap Thackerays; "Mademoiselle Fifty Millions," a translation, by Adelaide de V. Chaudron of a novel by the "Countess Dash," a Parisian writer not known to Americans; "A Voyage to the North Pole," and "A Journey to the Centre of the Earth," by the author of "Five Weeks in a Balloon;" "The Women of Business," by an anonymous author; Dr. Moritz Meyer's "Electricity in its Relations to Practical Medicine," translated by Dr. W A. Hammond, who adds notes and other matter; "Hereditary Genius," by Dr. Francis Galton; and Dr. N. C. Burt's book on the sacred historical geography of Palestine, entitled "The Land and its Story," a title which seems rather too much like the title of another book on the same general subject.——It is now the season of guide-book literature, and Mr. James Miller announces guides for Saratoga; for Central Park, which needs them as much as it needs more seats and more shade-trees; for New York City, and for the Hudson River; while Messrs. Taintor Brothers issue a "Descriptive Guide of the Newport and Fall River Route between New York and Boston," a "Tourist's Map of New England and Eastern New York," and "The Catskill Mountains, their Scenery, Legends, and History."——Mr. William Gowans adds to his small but select list of books one with the following title: "A Character of the Province of Maryland in four distinct parts. Also a small treatise on the Wild and Naked Indians (or Susquehanokes) of Maryland; their customs, manners, absurdities, and religion. Together with a collection of historical letters, by George Alsop, in 1665." It is edited, with historical and biographical notes, by John G. Shea, LL.D.——Messrs. Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger announce a new translation of "The Arabian Nights' Entertainment"—whose we are not informed.

—The Round Table has been, or is to be, at the end of three weeks, merged in the Citizen, the paper bought by the late "Miles O'Reilly" of the Citizens' Association, and which in his hands, without being an authority in anything except New York City and State politics—in which it was apt to have very good information from the headquarters, especially the Democratic headquarters—yet devoted more or less of its attention more or less successfully to the duties of critical and general journalism. Soon after General Halpine's death, it was bought, report said, by some of our municipal Democratic politicians; and since then it has passed into the editorial charge of Mr. Robert B. Roosevelt, a sportsman of repute, who, while keeping it—to our mind—up to its old standard in other particulars, has given to it more than it had before of a character which makes it liked by that class of readers who care rather more for rod, and gun, and saddle than for politics or literature. Whether or not it is so much as it used to be an "organ" of our local government or any part of it, we do not know; such knowledge is too high for us. But we should judge from the appearance of its advertising columns that it is still on very good terms with the City Fathers; and that if any one would like to know Mr. Gideon J. Tucker's rank in Tammany, or how "big" an Indian Judge Dowling is, or whether Ex-Governor Seymour is any longer permitted at the council-fire or in the war-dance, the Citizen office would be not a bad place at which to apply. Doubtless, the merging in it of the Round Table will not give a tincture of literature to its politics.

—Dr. Nathan Allen, of Lowell, whose name is familiar to our readers for his writings on the causes of decline in the increase of native American population, is also a trustee of Amherst College. We learn this fact from a highly suggestive pamphlet just prepared by him at the request of his co-trustees, the circulation of which we shall heartily recommend and do our best to further. It is entitled "Physical Culture in Amherst College," and affirms of that institution a higher regard and provision for the health of its members than can be predicated at least of any American college, and which perhaps has nowhere been surpassed in an educational establishment. We know for certain that in Germany, even, the gymnasiums of the Gymnasia and high-schools are very much neglected, and for the reason that attendance is voluntary. It is voluntary with us, in all other places than at Amherst, we believe, and there the assignment of a fixed time and period in the day's course for exercise in the gymnasium is the novel and vital principle that distinguishes the college. The instructor in this department is not a boxer merely, or a fancy performer, but a "Professor of Hygiene and Physical Education," who deserves the name; a gentleman of culture, a college graduate, and a physician. His work is only half-confined to the gymnasium. He is the inspector of the health of the students, and confidential adviser, warning from vice, and enforcing sanitary habits, and keeping statistics that every year grow to be more and more valuable, by which the health-rate and rate of physical development of the students are accurately shown, along with their punctuality and fidelity in attendance, etc., etc. The gymnasium is open all the day, but for half an hour class-exercises are compulsory under a leader and in uniform; at night the building is closed, and it is never lighted. We presume this last to be a wise regulation, and yet exercise by night is only less beneficial than by day, and in theory the evening gymnasium should offer one additional guarantee against temptation to evil resorts. Dr. Allen not only gives the history of this scheme, but enters into general considerations of the comparative merits of various modes of exercise, with which we do not wholly agree, though what he has to say on the supposed antagonism between "light" and "heavy" gymnastics is quite to our mind. On one other point he seems not to have reasoned out the matter carefully:

(P. 21.) "An examination of the table showing the number of absences in the different classes from these exercises, does not speak well for the higher classes—that the absences should increase with each class—so that those of the Senior class are almost twice as many as those of the Freshman class."

Here he omits to take account of the elements of novelty, of enthusiasm, of a stronger sense of subordination, and of a real need for the exercises, on the part of the Freshmen, who are also least concerned about the careers to which they will be dismissed from college. And what is the result of this diminishing attendance?

(P. 27.) "But the most marked evidence of improved health is found in the diminished sickness of every class each year after entering college In a table giving the amount of sickness arranged by classes, it seems there has been for these eight years on an average more than three times as much sickness in the Freshman Class as in the Senior."

Does exercise, then, go six times as far with the Seniors as with the Freshmen? Assuredly not; but after three years of scientific exercise a man needs comparatively little to keep himself in better health than those to whom the discipline of the gymnasium is wholly new.

—There is also a "Lecturer on Hygiene" in Harvard University, whose place, however, we can scarcely fix, and whom we know best by his services to the public at large. Dr. George Derby is the author of an excellent work on the heating of houses, and is regularly employed to edit the annual reports of the births, marriages, and deaths occurring in Massachusetts. The Twenty-Sixth Report (for 1867) is now before us, and the editor has made of his portion exceedingly good reading. His general deductions are, on the whole, very encouraging, and indicate a rapid recuperation from the ravages caused in population by the war. The death-rate has been falling since 1864, and the birth-rate increasing to the standard of the years prior to 1860, and that in a State which must have lost by the war, says Dr. Derby, 25,000 men in the prime of life. Some of the statistics are worth condensing. In regard to Dr. Allen's specialty, the increasing of foreign over native births, Dr. Derby says that it is every year becoming more difficult to disentangle these classes, and he hopes the attempt will some day be abandoned, as being of no practical importance. Nevertheless, in 1867, the American births appeared to have diminished by 318, the foreign to have increased by 918, and this increase has revived after a cessation of three years, probably on account of emigration into the State that cannot be traced—especially from Canada. Although there are between fifty and sixty thousand more women than men in Massachusetts, the deaths of the two sexes differ very little, owing to the fewer number of male infants that survive infancy. The marriage-rate (1·141) is higher than in England, France, or Austria. Of marriages, as a rule, "the largest number is in the fourth quarter [of the year], including the 'Thanksgiving' season; the next largest is the second quarter, the season including the annual 'Fast' day; the first and third quarters being nearly alike." Of deaths, as a rule, the third (or summer) quarter shows the most, the fourth and first coming next in mortality. Births progress regularly in number with the quarters, so that those in the last half of the year always exceed those of the first half. The reverse is the case in England. In Massachusetts this fact is determined by the law of marriages already laid down. The graduating class at Yale, this year, we observe, consisted of 117, of whom 56 were born in the last six months of the year. More were born in August than in any month, and August is the complement of November, which would indicate for Connecticut the same propensity to marry during the Thanksgiving season. Finally, the tables show conclusively that even consumption is diminishing in Massachusetts. We observe nothing wanting in these admirable statistics—the like of which in any other State we should not know where to seek—except an account of miscarriages and abortions; of course the most difficult of all to obtain reports of, and yet to a large extent within the knowledge of physicians, and which might be ascertained, under a law requiring physicians to give, as definitely as might be, what information on those topics falls in their way.

—The Boston papers inform us that the Corporation of Harvard have voted that a University Professorship of Mathematics shall be established; that a Professorship of Palæontology be established in the School of Mining and Practical Geology; that the University Lecturers on Philosophy for the ensuing academic year shall be Mr. Ralph Waldo Emerson, Mr. J. Eliot Cabot, and Mr. John Fiske; and that the University Lecturers on Language and Literature shall be Professor W. D. Whitney, Mr. Ferdinand Bôcher, and Mr. W. D. Howells. These seem to be excellent appointments. Mr. Emerson, as a philosophical teacher, may perhaps not make and finish many disciples of any particular school, but the spiritual value of "divine philosophy" in general he will probably set before the young men as effectively as any one who could have been selected by the authorities of the University. Worse things might happen to the young men—whether or not they are thinkers—than to be impregnated by Mr. Emerson's idealism; and no doubt his criticisms of the various schools of philosophy will be of great value to them as students and thinkers, though it may be that it will not be as a thinker, strictly speaking, that he will speak. Mr. Fiske is probably known to all of our readers as the author of a little book, in which whether or not "it does pay to smoke," and "the coming man will drink wine," as Mr. Fiske maintains, there is at any rate no doubt that Mr. James Parton's negative answers to those questions are very conclusively shown to have been based on no sufficient knowledge of the subjects with which Mr. Parton undertook to deal. To a smaller number of our readers Mr. Fiske is known as a laborious student of philosophy, who, although a young man, has already won respect from the ablest philosophical students in this country and England. Of the other gentlemen named as lecturers, Mr. Whitney is known throughout the learned world as one of the few American scholars whom all philological scholars respect; Mr. Howells is admired as a literary critic, of acuteness and great susceptibility, and a humorous writer of very rare excellence, and his lectures will, no doubt, be a valuable contribution to literature; Mr. Cabot we know as a student of philosophy: and Mr. Bôcher has for some years been the collegiate instructor in the French language and literature. The infusion of new blood into the veins of our oldest university seems to be going on with every sign of a successful result.

—The gentlemen—mostly they voted for Mr. Seymour and General Blair, we fear—who were in doubt if Mr. Lowell did not make a mistake when he praised the "Reverend P. V. Nasby" as a genuine humorist, sometimes, no doubt, have Mr. Nasby on their side when they deny his claims to the place which Mr. Lowell gives him. But whatever else may be said of the pastor and postmaster and spiritual guide of "Confedrit Cross Roads," it cannot be said of him that there is not presented to us in his person a lively picture of the low Democrat of the South-west—or rather of the low Democratic demagogue of that region in the Union in which the cheapest sort of "doughface" was not a "poor white" in all particulars, but a "poor white" with some partially visible means of support, and some shadow of social equality with his masters, and some sense of the merchantable value of his lowness and degradation. Mr. Locke's humor is often enough of decidedly coarse fibre; and it is very often that he seems not to know when to cease bearing on hard, but harps away on one worn string. Still, we have more than once had testimony to the truth and force of the picture which he has painted. Indeed, it used to be told—it was during the campaign, to be sure—that our late President had received several letters in which politicians of the lower classes of the old school of politics remonstrated with him for allowing "Mr. Nasby" to speak out so plainly; he was a good Democrat, they knew; but they thought his contributions to the press let out too many party secrets, and pleased the Black Republicans too much. A correspondent in Milwaukee has just furnished us another piece of evidence that Mr. Locke's portraiture is truthful. He went out to "cuss Canaan" last month in several of the Western cities, and in one of them a lady who had taken her seat in the hall no sooner heard the president of the lecture association introduce him as Mr. D. R. Locke, than she left her seat, and walking out to the ticket office demanded her admission money, on the ground that she had come to hear Mr. Nasby, and Mr. Locke was no sufficient substitute.

—It may be because nowadays people do things for themselves instead of having things done for them, whether they will or no, by "the upper classes," or it may be for other reasons, but it is a fact we think that the laudator temporis acti is a rarer creature than he used to be. Or possibly may it be that the decay of the belief in an unspeakably miserable hereafter as probable at the end of this life may be disposing people to cheerful views of the future and disinclining them to look back to the past with a regret for it which gilded it? At all events, as we have said, we think fanatical praises of the past are less frequently heard nowadays than in the old times—a thing to be thankful for, inasmuch as almost every bit of new evidence that turns up goes to show that although every grumbler at present, looking backward, may find days when he individually was happier than age usually permits a man to be, nevertheless each grumbler may be made to admit that the great body of his fellow-grumblers must have been worse off in the old times than they would have been now. Some of the kind of testimony of which we speak has recently been printed in the Advance by Mr. Lewis Tappan, at present an aged resident of Brooklyn, but who was a youth in Massachusetts, in the Connecticut River Valley, when the century was born. He is a willing witness, too, and his testimony is not indirect, but deliberately directed to the point in question. A whipping-post and stocks, he reminds us, then stood in front of the justice's office, where, upon conviction, the culprit received instant punishment—whipping, branding, or cropping of the ears—while the people stood by and looked on, sometimes pelting the prisoner with eggs and addressing him with jeers. Women in that golden age were whipped on the bare back, sometimes publicly, sometimes in the jail yard. Thrashing their pupils, the punishment being often needlessly disgraceful, occupied a good part of the schoolmasters' time, and a good part of the rest of it they took up in mending and making pens. Girls it was not thought much worth while to educate. Impure and profane language was much more common sixty or seventy years ago than it is now, Mr. Tappan says; indelicate allusions were permitted if not too indelicate; and he mentions that the late Governor Strong of Massachusetts used to tell that, at a dinner party in Boston, at Governor John Hancock's house, that distinguished Signer of the Declaration made a remark so gross that the ladies of the company were constrained to leave the room, which they did amid roars of laughter from the gentlemen left behind. It may comfort some of the observers of the corruption which infects the Radical Congress of the present day, and some of the less inveterate mourners for the glorious days of "the giants who founded this Republic," now cursed by Radical misrule, that Mr. Tappan knows of Chancellor Livingston's saying to a friend of his, "Jay, what a set of damned rascals they were in the old Congress;" and we daresay they were; they were some sort of rascals, at all events, in "the glorious days of a Webster, a Clay, a Calhoun," twenty or thirty years afterwards, as anybody may see who will look at Mr. Gobright's amusing book of reminiscences, recently published. Party spirit, Mr. Tappan says, ran extremely high in those days; he remembers that even the women would have no social intercourse with the wives and daughters of their husbands' political opponents, and speaks of an advertisement in the Northampton newspaper, of a house to be let, with the warning that "No Democrat need apply" appended to the announcement of terms. This height of partisanship was hardly reached in most modern Northern communities even in the storm and stress of the civil war. The clergymen of that happy time—they used to preach, by the way, in their great-coats and mittens when the weather was very cold, for no stoves were in the churches—were not much better men, it appears, than the clergy of the degeneracy. One Batch, we are informed, kept a hatter's shop in Cornhill, Boston, in which the ministers and leading lawyers were accustomed to assemble once or oftener every week, and there would they make punch and drink it, and smoke, and listen to stories, and talk politics. Like shepherd, like flock; and in the little town of Northampton the shops used to retail annually fifty-six hogsheads of rum, or something like a gallon and a half to every man, woman, youth, and infant child in the village—to say nothing of hard cider and the spirituous and other liquors which were not sold in the shops. In short, the stupid old heresy that the world is the worse for all the work that has been done upon it gets no corroboration or countenance from Mr. Tappan, who would say as we would: "Say not thou what is the cause that the former days were better than these? For thou dost not enquire wisely concerning this."

—In the recent settlement by commission of the border-line between France and Spain, it was found necessary to ascend to charters ancient even for Europe, and in the eyes of an American almost absurdly venerable. Our owners of real estate, we congratulate ourselves, need go very little way back in their searches; nevertheless, for a new country, it is somewhat surprising to find litigation concerning titles and boundaries continued from the time of its earliest settlement down into the present century, and in fact to this day. How this has happened in New England is shown in a lucid and entertaining manner by Mr. Samuel F. Haven in a lecture before the Massachusetts Historical Society, last winter; the fifth of the series we have mentioned. Politics does not, we may remark, enter into this one, and it is neither an explicit nor implied vindication of Massachusetts against her detractors; but a purely historical investigation of a very intricate subject—"The Grants under the Great Council for New England," the source of all the subsequent confusion. In cataloguing these, and affixing the right dates, and showing how and why they were loosely drawn, and inconsistently one with the other, the lecturer relieves the natural heaviness of his theme by a preliminary sketch of "England's conventional title to American possessions," as acquired by the voyages of the Cabots, Sir Humphrey Gilbert, and Raleigh. The active part taken in discovery and colonization by the Continental nations during the sixteenth century is also described, with mention and due account of those humble ventures which brought great numbers of fishers and traders to these coasts before any permanent foothold was attempted. "The Great Council for New England" is at last reached, and its proceedings, as far as they appear in the records that are preserved, set forth in relation to each grant. Finally, in the appendix, a valuable table and summary of the grants is given, more perfectly than in any other work.

—The ancient branch of quasi-literature which is known as thieves' slang will always be sure of a number of curious students, for it has not only a sort of philological interest, but also possesses the more fascinating charms of secrecy to be penetrated, of out-of-the-way knowledge to be acquired, of the pleasure to be got from learning something of the habits of a strange and hostile species of human animals. The latest student of slang of whom we have heard is M. Maxime Du Camp, who has been giving the result of his researches to the Revue des Deux Mondes. Some of the sources of the argot in use in France M. Du Camp traces to the passwords of the free companies which infested all parts of the kingdom in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. The Gipsey tongue is of course found to contribute many words to the vocabulary of this patois, that homeless race naturally having relations more or less intimate with all wandering outcasts from society. Of course, too, many other languages have been borrowed from—the thief being cosmopolitan, and moreover, like the honest man, finding it much easier to borrow words than to make them. Some of the words which M. Du Camp has translated to us are these: meg, or mek, means "chief of a gang," and comes from the Latin magus, or the Arabic melek, if our enquirer's etymology may be trusted—a point as to which we leave the reader at perfect liberty. Berges, from the German berg, are "years"—"symbolizing the difficult ascent of the thief's arduous life." The executioner is called tollard—which we are told is derived from the Latin tollere, quia tollit e vivis, and a pardon is redam, from redimere. To speak is balancer le chiffon rouge—a phrase which illustrates well enough the constant tendency to metaphor instead of toward coining which all slang dialects exhibit. To betray a comrade is judacer, "to be a Judas;" an omnibus is "the common oven;" the policemen are "the dealers in lace" (lacet, a lace or a snare); the guillotine was l'abbaye de monte-à-regret, or "the abbey of sorrowful ascent;" "to deny" (nier) is "to go to Niort;" "le vol au poivrier," "the theft from the pepper-box," is robbery from a drunken man under pretence of assisting him; le moucheron is "the little gnat" of a boy who accompanies pickpockets and indicates the prey; while "the rat" is the youth who accompanies burglars. M. Du Camp goes into his general subject of the life, manners, and customs of the Parisian criminal classes at considerable length, and is worth reading. He attempts an answer to the question which agitates French students of social science as well as English, namely, "Why is this class of habitual criminals on the increase?" In 1857 the number of arrests by the Parisian police was 20,726; ten years afterwards, in 1867, this number had grown to 31,437, and in another year no less a number than 6,314 had been added. These figures, which, to be sure, afford the means for only an approximate estimate of the number of habitual criminals in Paris, are certainly alarming. M. Du Camp says their rapid growth is due to the fact that the excess of the country population flows more and more into Paris, and that the spirit of enterprise, finding there no sufficient field for honest exertion, is diverted into crime. To this the London Daily News replies that the true answer to the question is, that the thieves form a regular caste, which increases, as do the other classes in the community, by natural propagation. But it is not probable that the natural increase of the thieves is so great as that of the world outside of Alsatia; M. Du Camp's theory seems to come nearer to covering the facts. But the rapid increase in the numbers of habitual criminals in London is not thus accounted for.

—The entire number of the Bulletin de la Société de Législation Comparée for June is occupied with considerations on the civil service in all countries, and more especially with Mr. Jenckes's bill, which is translated in full. The principal paper is by M. Gonse, who reproduces Mr. Jenckes's arguments as contained in his speeches in defence of his bill, and concludes by fully endorsing the principle of that measure. Several other members joining in the debate, the state of the civil service everywhere is touched upon, M. Lamé-Fleury in particular offering a conspectus of the systems or want of system in the states of Europe, and referring to documents of all sorts useful to know of by those who are studying what he aptly calls the universal "order of the day." The English practice of competitive examinations is explained and criticised, that for the Indian service being most highly esteemed. One of the Vice-Presidents, M. Duverger, was of the opinion that university rank ought to be taken as a guaranty, without examination, of a certain capacity for civil functions. The discussion was not finished at the session thus reported (May 11), but was carried over to the June meeting. We ought to mention M. Lehmann's account of an Italian essay on the theoretical relation between the Government and its employees by M. Tango, which he describes as a comprehensive and very sagacious contribution to one of the most urgent questions now occupying the attention of united but not yet homogeneous Italy. We should quote, too, this sentence from the President of the session: "Italy has responded more quickly than any other country to the appeal of this Society, and we have from there almost all the elements of information we could desire," thanks to the correspondents then named: a list of the most respectable length and character. Among the correspondents from other countries we miss any American, and we are forcibly reminded how powerful an instrument of reform would be an American Society of Comparative Legislation that should even confine itself to the several States of the Union. This, we understand, is one of the branches undertaken by the American Social Science Association; but we hazard the opinion that the work is of such dimensions as to demand a separate organization and a publication of its own, nor do we doubt that this publication would be sustained if only by the lawyers and law-makers of the country.

MR. FREEMAN'S NORMAN CONQUEST.*

THE second volume of Freeman's "History of the Norman Conquest" contains the reign of Edward the Confessor, a period during which the causes that at last resulted in the Conquest were already actively at work, and which was therefore a direct preparation for this event. The Danish Conquest of 1016 was not only the forerunner of the Norman Conquest, it was in one point of view the immediate cause of it, since it drove the young Atheling Edward to take refuge in the Norman court, where he remained until summoned to assume the English crown. During these years of exile, he lost all genuine sympathy with his native country, and all practical knowledge of her institutions, and returned at last a Norman rather than an Englishman. And although towards the close of his life he seems to have felt somewhat more as an Englishman, yet the result of his reign, as a whole, was to give the Normans a foothold in the country, to familiarize them with the rich spoils it offered, and whet their appetites for their future prey.

* "The History of the Norman Conquest of England, its Causes and its Results. By Edward A. Freeman, M.A., late Fellow of Trinity College." Vol. II., The Reign of Edward the Confessor. Oxford: At the Clarendon Press. 1868. 8vo, pp. 651.

One hardly sees at first how so uneventful a reign as that of Edward the Confessor can afford materials for one thick volume even out of five, seeing that the events which immediately followed his death are reserved for the next instalment of the book; and it is true that this volume, on the whole, possesses less variety and interest than the first. Still, even in the somewhat monotonous chronicles that make up most of this period, the story possesses so much continuity, and is told with so much graphic detail and illustrated with so much fulness, that one is not often inclined to leave anything unread. Then there is the long chapter upon the early career of William the Bastard—one of the most interesting episodes of the Middle Ages, even apart from its special bearing upon English history. The insurrection of his haughty barons against the young upstart, as they deemed him, with its heroic incidents, culminating in the battle of Val-ès-dunes; the war with Anjou; the ecclesiastical affairs of Normandy—these make an exceedingly interesting chapter. The character of William is described with great skill and a remarkable degree of impartiality. Mr. Freeman is a thorough Englishman, a stanch supporter and a steady admirer of Harold; but this does not prevent him from passing almost a eulogium upon the character of Harold's great antagonist—upon his character, that is, before it was spoiled by success and rendered vindictive by opposition.

The same fairness is manifested in his judgment, p. 300, as to Edward's promise of the succession to William, and Harold's oath to support William's claim. "No English writer mentions either; but the silence of the English writers confirms rather than disproves the fact of both. All those Norman calumnies which they could deny, the English writers do most emphatically deny. The fact, then, that they never formally deny the reports, which they must have heard, that Harold swore an oath to William, that Edward made a promise in favor of William, may be accepted as the strongest proof that some kind of oath was sworn, that some kind of promise was made." But—deferring the question of Harold's oath to the next volume—he goes on to show very conclusively, from the nature of the English constitution, that Edward's promise, whatever its form may have been, was utterly without effect as regards any right to the throne; for England was even in those early times a constitutional monarchy. "All that Edward could constitutionally do was to pledge himself to make in William's favor that recommendation to the Witan, which the Witan were bound to consider, though not necessarily to consent to." William's claim, therefore, as resting upon the will of the last monarch—even supposing that will to have been most unequivocally expressed—was not a whit stronger than by hereditary title—as great-nephew of a queen-consort.

Mr. Freeman, therefore, although no blind partisan, takes a decided stand for the national side. He does not, to be sure, regard the Norman Conquest as a complete overturn of the English nation; on the other hand, he does not consider it as a mere change of dynasty. In his view, the right was decidedly with England; and he carries his reader to the England of that day, makes him understand her institutions and know her people—know also her invaders, and feel how vital was the struggle between English liberty and Continental absolutism, whether in state or church.

Thus he traces very carefully the ecclesiastical history of the nation, shows the changes of bishops and of bishoprics, and the contest which was coming up during Edward's reign between the national church, headed by Stigand and Eldred, and the Norman prelates, Robert and William, who leaned upon Rome. Lotharingian prelates were a kind of compromise, coming "from the border-land of Germany and France," but even these, "if not Normanizers, were at least Romanizers. They brought with them habits of constant reference to the Papal See, and a variety of scruples or points of small canonical regularity to which Englishmen had hitherto been strangers." By these foreign bishops there was introduced likewise, in some cases, a degree of strictness in the rules of episcopal chapters which tended almost to monastic austerity. The two principles which were here at issue are well illustrated in the famous foundations of the two last of the Anglo-Saxon kings. Edward's life was devoted to the establishment, or rather enlargement, of the monastery of St. Peter at Westminster—monastic institutions harmonized well with his own narrow pietism. But Harold founded at Waltham, not an abbey (as it was afterwards when transformed by Henry II.), but a church, with a college attached. "And the clergy whom Harold placed in his newly-founded minster were not monks, but secular priests, each man living on his own prebend, and some of them, it would seem, married. Education also occupied a prominent place in the magnificent and enlightened scheme of the great Earl. The chancellor or lecturer—for the word schoolmaster conveys too humble an idea—filled a dignified place in the college, and the office was bestowed by the founder on a distinguished man from a foreign land" (p. 442). This was Adeland of Lüttich, another Lotharingian.

The author's interest, as an Englishman, in everything that is peculiar to his country, is constantly showing itself in matters in themselves of trifling importance, but which he discusses in such a way as to inspire the reader with a sort of personal interest. Frequently a town—as Durham or Exeter—is described and characterized with great vividness; or a national usage or expression is briefly discussed. Such points as these abound in the book. The author is, perhaps, over-fond of historical parallels, although in these he is generally very happy. An illustration of the practice above-mentioned is found in regard to the English mode of fighting. Before the Norman Conquest the battle-axe, not the long-bow, was the English weapon (as was well seen at Hastings), and their armies fought on foot. "The English, light-armed and heavy-armed alike, were always accustomed to fight on foot. The housecarl, the professional soldier, with his coat of mail and his battle-axe, and the churl who hastened to defend his field with nothing but his javelin and his leathern jerkin, alike looked on the horse only as a means to convey the warrior to and from the field of battle" (p. 388).

It is interesting to find Macbeth, a man "who seems to us hardly more real than the creations of Grecian tragedy," removed from the region of the imagination, and restored to historical reality. "From what little can be recovered about them [Macbeth and his wife, Gruach], they certainly seem not to have been so black as they are painted. The crime of Macbeth against Duncan is undoubted; but it was, to say the least, no baser than the crime of Siward against Eadwulf; and Macbeth, like Siward, ruled well and vigorously the dominion which he had won by crime. All genuine Scottish tradition points to the reign of Macbeth as a period of unusual peace and prosperity in that disturbed land" (p. 54).

Mr. Freeman has a pleasant habit of now and then translating from the old chronicles, almost verbally, passages of genuine racy vigor. Thus, in the first volume, p. 324, in the account of the disastrous reign of Ethelred the Unready: "And when the ships were gathered together, there was only delay from day to day; the crews were harassed grievously; when things should have been forward, they were only the more backward; and in the end there was nothing for either the land-force or the sea-force but grieving of the folk and spending of money and emboldening of their foes." So in the Laws of Cnut, Vol. I., p. 481: "First above all things are men, one God to love and worship, and one Christendom with one consent to hold, and Cnut King to love with right truthfulness." And in a battle of William in Normandy, "the poet rises to an almost Homeric flight when he tells us how William smote the rebel below the chin, how he drove the sharp steel between the throat and the chest, how the body fell beneath his stroke, and the soul passed away" (Vol. II., p. 261).

The third volume, "of which a considerable part is already written," is to be devoted to the year 1066; the fourth, to the reign of William; while the fifth will trace in detail the results of the Conquest, down to the reign of Edward I. We gladly commend the work of this careful student and vigorous writer to all readers who would understand the course of English history.

FREESE'S TOUR THROUGH PALESTINE AND SYRIA.*

Mr. Freese has added a pretty well written, neatly printed and illustrated, and on the whole rather pleasant book to the daily-increasing stock of American tourist-literature. He does not claim to be a traveller, and has "no pride of authorship to subserve." And justly so—for he has spent altogether but forty-one days—in March and April, 1867—in Palestine and Syria, "the days on horseback and the nights in tents," besides a few days in Smyrna and Constantinople; and most of his chapters were written upon or near the spots described, originally in the form of letters for a journal. Besides, quite a considerable, and certainly not the least instructive, part of the volume consists of quotations from Burckhardt, Volney, Lamartine, Lindsay, Kelly, Robinson, Prime, and other travellers. These quotations refer, however, only to places and things seen by the author himself, while everything out of his way—as the principal parts of Philistia and Phœnicia, Gilead, Bashan, Palmyra, Aleppo, Antioch, and the whole valley of the Orontes—not to speak of Asia Minor, which he has hardly approached—remains undescribed and almost unmentioned. Most space is devoted to Jerusalem and its surroundings, the Jordan and its valley, the region of Samaria, Damascus, the Lebanon, Baalbec, the Druses and Maronites, and Beyrout. No part of the subject, however, is so treated as to give the reader full information on it—the historical notices being chiefly defective. This defectiveness is the most noticeable where the author easily loses himself in reminiscences of the lives of Jesus, the apostles, and other Scriptural characters—an easily-besetting sin of book-making travellers in Palestine, and a great sin. Whenever he can follow holy footsteps, these reminiscences almost exclusively absorb his attention, and his pages become half-filled with sacred passages with which every Christian reader is familiar. Not satisfied with alluding to the Biblical narratives and the pious legends, he enters into details, whenever a spot is pointed out to him as hallowed by the occurrence of a miracle. Even when he disbelieves the literal truth of a legend, he likes to linger in telling it, as, for instance, when he is shown "the spot where Lazarus lay while the dogs 'licked his sores,' and not far from this the house of Dives, 'the rich man,' who, when he lifted up his eyes in hell, only asked that Lazarus might be sent to dip the tip of his finger in water to cool his tongue, as he was in torment." The precise fixing of this locality Mr. Freese condemns as a superfluous work of monkish superstition; but why does he not tell us whether he regards in the same light the fixing of "the stone on which the cock crew when Peter denied his Master?" Altogether, his feelings concerning the correct identification of spots hallowed by miracle appear to be whimsical. He is "content to believe" that he has seen not only the town, but also "the very rock-hewn cave (then used as a stable)" where "Jesus was born of the Virgin Mary;" though "whether or not Jesus was born in the rock-hewn grotto pointed out as the place of nativity matters not a whit to us." But he don't know "in which of the fields near by the shepherds watched their flocks" on the night before the Nativity. As to the tomb pointed out as the Holy Sepulchre, he is "content to believe that this is the identical tomb in which the body of the Redeemer lay, and the rock near by the identical one in which, or upon which, the cross stood at the time of the crucifixion;" but "as to the spots pointed out where this, that, and the other event took place at the crucifixion and after the resurrection," he thinks them "all conjecture, though quite as likely to be right as wrong; and whether right or wrong makes no difference whatever," for a reason given but not at all satisfactory.

* "The Old World. Palestine, Syria, and Asia Minor. Travel, Incident, Description, and History. By Jacob R. Freese, M.D., United States Commissioner to Paris Exposition, 1867." Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1869.

In general, he is much more inclined to believe all kinds of tradition than to doubt, an inclination which, of course, belongs to those shades of religious disposition about which dispute is almost as useless as about taste. Our author's Christian fervor, however, somewhat transcends the sphere of piety or harmless superstitious sentimentality. Modern Jerusalem, for instance, inspires him with a feeling thus expressed: "Cursed of God and cursed with men; cursed within and cursed without; cursed in the rulers and cursed in the ruled; cursed in the past and doubly cursed in the present, Jerusalem sits like a widow in her weeds, with none so poor as to do her reverence." There is no city, however, which is quite so badly off as all that comes to. His manner is similar when he speaks of "the poor, down-trodden Jew"—Fould, we suppose, or Goudchaux, or Meyerbeer, or Halévy, or Montefiore, or Rothschild—"the curse of God still follows him, wherever he may be or whatever he may do." Still, for the Jew he has some pity; it is when he is dealing with the Moslem that he wholly discards that sentiment. The Moslems of Syria, at least—through whose country he runs, and whose language he does not understand—are to him men "with whom we can have no sympathies in common, and whom we fairly loathe for their lack of civilization and Christian courtesy." He is so convinced of their "consummate meanness and bigotry" that he exclaims, "Oh! that we had the power to wipe this people from off the land which they so much disgrace and pollute by their presence!" He admires the Crusaders, blesses the efforts of the Czars "to wipe Turkey from the map of nations," and exhorts all Christian governments to offer the Turkish Government the following alternative: "Either free access to every place of Biblical interest in Palestine, or utter extinction as a government," and that "without hesitation or delay." More than this, had he, at Machpelah, had "a dozen other Americans" with him, "each with a revolver in his hand," he would not have waited for a new crusade, but cleared his way "by threats if possible, but by bullets if necessary, to the tombs of the fathers," to which he was not admitted. Justice to the author, however, compels us to add that near the close of his volume he has given room to expressions of opinion on the Turkish character considerably at variance with his own conclusions, and that, as it appears, from a laudable sentiment of candor. On the whole, he has not spared exertion in order to become informed on the topics he treats of; and what he has learned from sight or books he expresses in plain, lucid, and often forcible words. His materials are good and his rendering correct, though inaccuracies of the more pardonable kind occur here and there. Thus Mehemet Ali is always called Mohammed Ali; the Samaritans (Cutheans and all) are designated as "the descendants of the Israelites who remained and were not carried into captivity;" Benjamin of Tudela, who flourished in the latter half of the twelfth century, is said to have "travelled before the time of the Crusaders;" the "disasters of Navarino" are placed (perhaps by misprint) in the year 1821 instead of in 1827; we read of temples "at Baalbec, Heliopolis, Ephesus, Cyclades," which ought to be "at Baalbec or Heliopolis, Ephesus, the Cyclades," etc.; "the archipelago" stands (p. 385) for "the Mediterranean." Accuracy in these matters, however, all the world has given up expecting of the tourist.

THE NEW WEST.*

We have long been of the opinion expressed by Mr. Brace that "there is nothing that California needs so much in developing her material resources as a little truth-speaking." The received style of discussing California has too long been that of undiluted—indeed we might say hyperbolic—praise. And yet not everything is lovely there. We hear of floods, earthquakes, and siroccos; of one flood (on the Sacramento) that converted a fertile country twenty miles wide and one hundred and fifty miles long into a great lake from two to ten feet deep for more than a month—of earthquakes of such frequent occurrence as to make San Francisco deny herself high buildings and tall steeples—of siroccos like that at Santa Barbara in 1859 (which was felt as far north as Sacramento), where a blast of heated air swept through the streets in which no human being could live, in which animals fell dead, and fruits, such as pears and apples, literally cooked on the trees and fell to the ground as though they had been roasted on live coals. And such siroccos recur more or less every summer. We know of the pest of grasshoppers, that come in millions and eat away the green face of the earth—of the gopher and other destructive rodents. Then, too, California's golden sands roll down desolation as well as wealth. Its rivers are ruined by the gold-washings. The fine salmon that once filled its streams are rapidly disappearing, and the prospect is that in a few years California will have no fresh-water fish. Beautiful farms and orchards established on the river bottom-lands are perishing. Hydraulic digging in the mining district is pouring down not tons, but hills and mountains of sand and gravel. The winter floods yearly bury thousands of acres of valuable land under a sandy and pebbly deposit of from five to twenty-five feet in thickness. In Yuba County an orchard of seventy-five acres, worth $60,000, has been thus destroyed. The celebrated Briggs orchard, the early fruit of which for years gladdened San Francisco with sanitary sweetness—an orchard worth $200,000—is now a bed of sand grown up in willows. The same fate has befallen many other valuable orchards and vineyards. Marysville, once the most flourishing inland town in the State, is suffering from the effect of these floods on the surrounding country. All the fertile bottom-lands along the banks of the Yuba for miles lie buried under depths of gravel and detritus, and the work of destruction still marches on over the bottoms of Feather River, below the confluence of the Yuba. And in all this there is a double destruction not generally understoood. The so-called hydraulic diggings are usually in rich, fertile land, with a substratum of gravel containing grains of native gold. To get at the gold these elevations, varying from two hundred to five hundred feet, must be torn down, and with them the covering of rich surface soil, with houses, gardens, and orchards upon them. Gold is to be got. How much, how little, no one knows. But to reach it the graceful landscape, the pleasant home, the productive farm, soon disappear under the operation of powerful water-jets at a pressure of two hundred feet, leaving naught but a pool of dirty water, masses of boulders, and mounds of gravel and sand. The Alta California (newspaper) says of such operations as these:

"The devastation could not be more complete if it were the last day, and the demons of destruction had been let loose to desolate the earth, that not a green thing should grow on it thereafter for ever! The price of this awful ruin is probably some ten or twelve millions of gold dollars per annum. It brings, for the present, a large equivalent for the sacrifice of the fine vineyard and orchard land it abstracts from the food-producing capacity of the State. But in the end it may be regarded as a poor compensation. The gold passes away, while the land, with the wealthy homes it has ruined, would have endured from generation to generation."

* "The New West; or, California in 1867-1868. By Charles Loring Brace." New York: G. P. Putnam & Son. 1869.

In May and June all California "dries up," and, says Mr. Brace, "few will ever permanently live in the interior of California that can help it." During summer and autumn most of the rivers sink into the sands, and the earth is dry and baked hard to a depth of many inches. "The interior [Brace, p. 45] is dry, hot, and dusty, with a parched landscape, where, except on the mountains, shade-trees grow with great difficulty."

Notwithstanding these and other drawbacks too numerous to mention, if the emigration that went into California had remained there, it would now be difficult to overstate its present population and wealth. After twenty years of what is generally looked upon as a career of wonderful prosperity, there are now about 350,000 white inhabitants in California, and the entire population is only 500,000, of which one-fourth—125,000—are in San Francisco. And yet more than 250,000 others have left the State and gone home during the last twelve years, fully 200,000 of them never to return. We cannot help thinking that if California had possessed one-half the permanent attractions claimed for her, she should now have a population of at least two millions. Society is still far from well regulated, and the condition of business is unsound.

There certainly must be something radically wrong in the financial and industrial condition of a country whose inhabitants are unwilling to invest in the main branch of its industry. Development of mineral wealth is sadly crippled for this reason. Taking Mr. Hittel's testimony, no San Francisco capitalist will buy a gold mine, lend money on one, or invest money in any gold-mining operation. A promise of ten per cent. a month would not induce him to examine such a proposition. He will tell you that all gold-mining is insecure, whether quartz mining, ditching, hydraulic, or sluice. They are to him all alike, and all equally dangerous. As a matter of course, San Francisco capitalists are not owners of stock in gold mines. They leave that fancy operation to Wall Street, and if, perchance, there should be found some California stockholders, their favorite amusement is said to be "freezing out" their foreign copartners. California State bonds are all sold in New York. Bonds of its towns and counties are all held abroad. There is no purchasable bank stock in the State. Titles of farm land are as a general thing insecure. There is no title to mineral land save occupation. Quitting or a failure to work a mine works relinquishment of its title. Taxes are high. In no county are they less than one per cent., and in some places four per cent. When streets are required in large towns, they sometimes amount to ten per cent.

During the last fourteen years California has exported seven hundred million (according to some, nine hundred million) dollars of gold, and yet what is there to show in the mining districts for all this immense wealth? Mr. Ross Browne's estimate of the amount of gold taken from the ground since the mines were opened is $900,000,000. Add to this the immense production from agriculture and other sources, and then look at the estimate of the whole taxable property of the State, of which nearly one-half is land—$180,000,000!

Its immense coast has scarcely more than one good harbor. The counties have no fine roads, no large or durable bridges. There are some admirable mountain roads, but they are generally private property, and supported by tolls on a very liberal scale. Enormously expensive flumes and ditches have been constructed, but they are not durable, and were undertaken solely for quick and immediate profit. There is scarcely an elegant county building in California. Three-fourths of the houses in the State are of wood—the other fourth, brick and adobes. Stone houses are so rare that there are not probably ten in the State. Any California mining town set down even in Ohio would be considered a very shabby village. The most important improvements are needed, but the money cannot be obtained to make them. Nearly all the insurance for California is effected in the Eastern States and in Europe. Six hundred thousand dollars per annum are sent away for premiums, while the total losses do not exceed $200,000, leaving a clear profit of sixty-six per cent. that should remain at home.

Now, all these things constitute only one side of the picture, to be sure; but they are things which it is well to remember when we are tired of hearing that the Land of Gold is all golden; and we are glad to see that there is a greater disposition to tell the truth than there has been hitherto.

Mr. Brace's book was first written, we think, as letters to a newspaper, and it still bears some traces of its origin, if that was its origin: it is a little desultory in arrangement; it is devoted in good part to the things of the day, as a correspondent's letters are apt to be; and it contains about the amount of philosophizing which is habitually done by the correspondent, whose business it is to catch something, at least, of the social, political, and other meanings of the phenomena which he observes, but who does not propose it to himself to be exhaustive. It contains, however, some statistics which must have been collected with a labor and considered with a care which it is not usual for a correspondent to bestow on his work, and it offers us some views upon Californian things which are evidently the result of reflection on observations made some time previously, and allowed to settle into their proper places and relations. Such books, when made by men of intelligence and good taste, practised in observation by experience of extended travel, are always interesting and instructive, and are all the more so when they relate to novel regions like this of the Pacific Coast, with "a different climate, a changed flora and fauna, a strange scenery and new outline of landscape, novel productions, and conditions utterly unknown to our branch of the human race." Mr. Brace's book, then, is both readable and instructive, and may be read as the latest word about California by a man more competent to speak it than most other travellers.

He has paid but little attention to the mines, concerning which we have had such oceans of talk already, but has looked for the California of the future, which he believes he has found in her vineyards, her grain-fields, her sericulture, and her fruit-growing. As if to confirm his opinion in this last particular, there is already talk in California of at once beginning to use the Pacific Railroad as a means of feeding all the Union this side of the Rocky Mountains with fruit of every description; for in the "divine climate"—the divine and the other kinds, we suppose—every fruit, no matter of what nature, tropical or frigid, can grow and ripen; and it is calculated by the hopeful San Franciscans that, even at the high tariff for freight which is now imposed, they can sell us fruit at half the price we have to give for what we import or raise. The wine of California has yet to be made, Mr. Brace thinks; but he has no doubt that it is to come, and that it is in a reasonably fair way of coming. The judgment which he pronounces on this head will not please certain of his Far Western readers; but he fortifies it all with fact and argument, and he is borne out also by official reports; and we may add that, so far as our observation extends, he is correct as to the status of California wines in New York. Their glory seems to have departed almost entirely; and, considering some of the stories which Mr. Brace tells, it is no wonder.

We have not space to follow our author through his interesting account of sericulture in California, where the climate appears to be the best in the world for the breeding of cocoons; nor into his calculations of the future agricultural wealth of the country; nor through his advice to intending immigrants as to the parts of the State best fitted for settlers; for we wish to quote a passage descriptive of the changes—frequently denied as occurring—which their changed conditions, climatic and others, are producing in the Americans of the Pacific Coast. Mr. Brace begins by admitting that all Americans, here in New York and elsewhere, are many of them very handsome already, and that all of us are growing handsomer all the time. Then he says:

"The same result, from more manifest causes, is taking place in California. Here picked men in the flush of life from most European races have gathered. They have mainly occupied themselves with vigorous pursuits, such as mining, or with outdoor occupations, such as teaming and farming. They have had the best food, plenty of both fruit and meat, and (on the coast) the best climate which the Anglo-Saxon has ever enjoyed; equable, sunny, cool, and invigorating. In the interior they have had a dry, mountain, Asiatic climate, with great extremes to struggle with, but which has not yet produced its natural effect on the physique, as the people so constantly emigrate to the coast.

"The effect of all these combined causes on the physical type of California is, that it is especially the land of handsome men. One sees great numbers of fine, manly profiles, with full ruddy cheeks and tall, vigorous forms. The spare, dry, nervous type of the Eastern American is not common in the interior. City residents, of course, are always inferior physically to the rural population; but even the San Franciscans begin to have an English look. I am constantly meeting young, ruddy, round-faced business men, whom I mistake for Englishmen, but who are Yankee-born. Still, the curse of this city, overwork, is telling on the physique of the people. The climate tempts to do too much, and, though there is little sickness, life snaps off suddenly. The principal diseases of the city seem to be rheumatic, and those which affect the throat.

"On the Sierras, especially at Virginia City, there seems no doubt that the rarefied atmosphere has expanded the chests of the people, even in these few years. The impression prevails generally in California that the climate favors the prolific power of both animals and human beings; both certainly mature earlier than in the Eastern States. Physicians, however, are inclined to trace the remarkable effect on women, observed here, as much to change of climate as to any peculiar power in it. I have heard of some very large families here—one of twenty-eight children, all of one mother. But it should be remembered that the great checks on increase of population are always artificial or economical, rather than want of physical power; and here luxury does not make children a weariness or poverty a burden.

"The children in the country, and from the wealthier classes of the city, seem more ruddy, healthy-looking, and prettier than ours in the East. Among the working people of San Francisco they are as pale, peaked, and nervous, with brains as much overworked, as in our cities. It is said that babes do not suffer from teething as do ours, and mothers do not dread 'the second summer' as at home."

"The young girls of the city show a great deal of beauty, and such rich bloom of complexion as we seldom see in the Atlantic border.

"The coast physique will, no doubt, be merely the American type improved. The inhabitant of the Sierras and the central river-bottoms will ultimately become more Asiatic or Arab-like in type—darker, sparer, and, on the whole, with less muscular vigor—for the common diet of the plains will more and more be the delicious fruits and vegetables of that region; and a fruit or vegetable-eating race is never so vigorous or energetic as a meat-eating.

"The south of California will tend toward an Italian or Moorish type, under the enervating influence of climate and a bountiful fruit diet. A 'southern' aspect is already very perceptible even in the pure Anglo-Saxons of Los Angeles and its neighborhood."

Speaking of the Chinese question, Mr. Brace gives some instances of gross oppression which revive the feelings with which we used to hear of the mild "discipline" of the patriarchal age in the Southern States. Without approving of the bestowal upon Chinamen of the privilege of suffrage, he of course pleads for their right to be heard in the courts, and, his special argument apart, his whole book is such an indirect argument in favor of justice to them that it seems as if it could not be long delayed. For it is impossible not to believe that the great want of California is cheap labor. With it, she can do almost anything; without it, the dark side of the picture which we pointed out in the beginning of this notice will long be dark, and will, perhaps, be the largest side. Yet the inoffensive Chinaman, who offers to bring it, she gives over into the hands of any ruffian who chooses to murder and rob him. This, however, is conduct that no American community will long continue to practice.

RECENT REPUBLICATIONS.

TAKING up again a book that one long ago had for a favorite, it is not unreasonable to suspect that a good part of the pleasure of re-reading it will come from its association with old times and scenes; and many, we dare say, of Mr. Dana's readers have opened this new edition of "Two Years before the Mast," not so much with the expectation of finding an interesting book, as with the hope of reviving the feelings of the days when they long ago sailed with him in "the brig Pilgrim, on her voyage from Boston, round Cape Horn, to the western coast of North America;" and took up their abode with him in the hide-house at San Diego; and fell in love, as he did, with the Ayachuco, and desired to ship in that craft; and ardently wished for the mutiny of the Pilgrims, and the immediate death of Captain Frank Thompson; and rode Mexican horses up and down the beach with the Kanakas; and were transferred with him and Stimson to the Alert; and fought their way with him round the Horn, when every rope in the ship was coated with ice, and everybody's hands were numb; and came out victorious into the Atlantic, the ice melting off the rigging as the ship went running like a race-horse, with "the Boston girls hold of the tow-line," and coming home again with a bigger ship's company, and one less willing to come home, than ever before or since made Boston Light.

But the man, we should say, will give as high praise to the volume as the boy did—even although it is possible that the criticism of the latter authority may have consisted in his running away to sea; or in his turning the barn into the Alert, homeward bound; or in his willingness for "meeting" on the Sabbath days when a collection was taken up for "such as go down to the sea in ships." Suddenly, we seem to remember, the "poor mariner" ceased, even on Sundays, to be the semi-mythical personage he had been of old—the son of a widowed mother, usually, who had become lawless, and whom, considering that he might at any moment be called into eternity, it was well to supply with good reading—and the contribution box got numerous coppers which the small donors mentally tendered as perchance to be expended in furnishing hot coffee to the Alerts when they should "come up with the latitude of the Horn" in some new voyage.

It would be a man without much critical discernment, or rather it would be a man who had formed false tastes, who should deny that Mr. Dana's record of forecastle life is very nearly perfect in its way. Genius, which does the unexpected thing, the thing almost unsuspected, might have done—one cannot say what, in the handling of such an experience as Mr. Dana's while he was a foremast hand; but we are bold to say that a realistic presentation of his sailor life could hardly have been better made. It bears the stamp of truthfulness; it is no less vivid than unpretending and straightforward; it is full of natural feeling—tender, as the longing of the absent for home, which so often is expressed in it, stern, as the indignation which is called forth by the sight of injustice and oppression, but always, whether stern or tender or whatever it is, perfectly unaffected and manly. On the whole, we do not know that we know a book which, trying it by its proper standard, it would be harder to find fault with. We think there is no other book that one could give to a boy with quite so much certainty that he would get from it good unqualified—such good as comes from increased knowledge conveyed in a pleasing and interesting manner; from the strengthening of the moral fibre which is given by the contemplation of courage and patience in full activity, and exercised for legitimate ends, and from the excitation of unselfish sympathies—of pity for the unfortunate, admiration for the brave and adventurous, hatred for the unjust and cruel, love for fidelity and loyalty and kindness—kindness all the kinder, perhaps, for being rough and refusing acknowledgment. We may well be glad to doubt if there is any book in the world which is surer of being read by many generations of boys than this book of Mr. Dana's.

Cassell's cheap biographies of Bright, Gladstone, Disraeli, and Queen Victoria are offered to the American public by Messrs. Felt & Dillingham, and we feel able to give them an amount of commendation which it is not usual to find merited by works of this class. Our American popular biographies, in particular, are usually done by writers of no reputation, for a catchpenny purpose; and an American writer of no reputation is apt to be a man of very little skill in his profession, and knows from the start that his deficiencies are to be supplied by the "book agents" of his publisher. Drearier reading than our ordinary volumes of "Lives of Distinguished Men" no man ever picked up from the table of a steamboat cabin or a farmer's stuffy parlor or a drowsy country tavern. Mr. John McGilchrist, the maker of these "Representative Biographies," has done his work very well, and has made what seem to us accurate little books, as certainly they are written pleasingly, with intelligence and good taste. Mr. McGilchrist's impartiality—which we confess seems to us to be a little more like that of the hack writer than of the philosophically indifferent observer of politics—is very noticeable, and a follower of Disraeli would hardly be more disposed to find fault with the way in which his chief is treated than a Gladstonian would quarrel with our author's Liberal politics—for he is a Liberal, apparently. Mr. Bernard Cracroft would hardly take pleasure in him as a narrator of Mr. Disraeli's wicked course during the Reform Bill agitation; but, although he follows Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Bright "fair and softly," after a fashion that obtains among some of his countrymen, still he does follow. In those newspaper offices, then, in which these brief sketches may profitably find a place, they possibly may do other good than supplement the dictionaries of contemporaries; the gentlemen who furnish us with notices of distinguished politicians of the other party may be influenced by them "to give this pettifogger a first-class notice" less often than now happens. Of course, in the life of the Queen, Mr. McGilchrist is loyal to a degree that will probably give the thoughtless American citizen a good deal of amusement. But he will not feel disposed to find much fault with it; Queen Victoria has been more praised than most women who have given away an equal number of flannel petticoats and displayed equal powers of mind, but the stern Republican will not forget the temptations to all kinds of iniquities which arise from the social position and large salaries of foreign despots. Mr. McGilchrist's tone in speaking of the Queen would, at any rate, seem to give effectual contradiction to the statement that British affection for her is less than formerly—so far, at any rate, as concerns the great body of her people.

"Tommy Try, and What he did in Science," is a curious book by Charles Ottley Groom Napier, of the famous Napier family, and illustrates very well many of the marked traits of the breed—its independence, its courage, uprightness, love of science, irascibility, good-nature, self-conceit, generosity, and a mingling of a sort of simplicity and frankness with more sense and shrewdness than belong to most men born outside of Scotland, and to most Scotchmen outside of the Napiers. "Tommy Try" is the Laird himself, and "what he did in science" is a record of his dabbling in a dozen branches of learning, during the years of his childhood, boyhood, and youth: and, mixed with this, numbers of stories of boyish adventure; keen criticism of everybody who happened to fall under the young gentleman's observation, much gossip, and an effort of youthful imagination in the shape of a queer story which he invented as a history of the original of Powers's "Greek Slave." On the whole, it is a loquacious, hearty, agreeable book—the talk of an old man who is still a boy in many respects—which boys will read with avidity, and which will do them good as well as give them instruction and amusement. It is a good book for parents and guardians to recollect at Christmas time. Its merit is increased by some forty or fifty pictures, mostly of objects of science, which are drawn and engraved in a better than ordinary manner.

It is with pleasure that we receive a new edition of Mr. Helps's "Friends in Council," and note the fact of its growing popularity. There are books —as, for instance, Boswell's "Johnson"—which are admirably fitted for the constant companions of our odd moments, which are nearly as good by the minute as by the hour, which are adapted by their form to the intellectual apprehension of a mind disengaged for only a short time, and which are adapted, also, to the moral requirements of the man who is pausing for a while between one duty done and another to begin; for they are morally sanitary in several of a dozen different ways, they give us a bit of vigorous sense, a strain of noble sentiment, an elevated image, a stroke of wit to chase away mental dulness, an effusion of humor, a wise aphorism, or a sparkle of gaiety. Mr. Helps's books have many of these qualities, and have much of the form of which we have spoken, although there is, perhaps, too much essay-writing in them to make what we have said as to this latter point perfectly applicable. We have found them, however, charming as reading for "between whiles," and we know few works better for such use after a thorough acquaintance with "the friends" has once been made, in which case there is no uneasy feeling of incompleteness if one happens to open in the middle of a lecture, and is obliged to leave off before he has followed the thread to the end. And then there are the conversations after the reading—always suggestive of ideas, and frequently full of kindly wisdom, often witty and mirthful, and often noble, and never unmanageably long. The American publisher is Mr. James Miller. It seems a pity that Mr. Helps's books are so scattered about among our publishers that a uniform set of them is not to be had with an American imprint. "Realmah," for example, which is enough like "Friends in Council" in its character to make it desirable that the volumes of the two should look alike, are unlike in every dimension. Indeed, this want of uniformity in our American reprints of English authors is a crying evil, and long has been.

The new Thackeray which Messrs. Fields, Osgood & Co. are issuing is a companion set of volumes for their Charles Reade; and the same things may be said of both as regards what is called "their external dress." The binding is a neat green cloth, with little gilding, and is about as solid and durable as cheap cloth binding usually is. The page is double-columned, and the type is smaller than it is wholly comfortable to read, especially at night; and the back margin—if that is the technical name of it—is so narrow that the book has to be opened wide, and held wide open, or else it is difficult to read the beginning of the lines of the columns next the stitching. This is a rather exasperating fault in a volume of the size which naturally would be held in the reader's one hand. However, the "Household Thackeray" will no doubt, in most of the households to which it goes, be used enough to prevent complaints of stiffness of the binding and incapacity for lying open flat. The merit of this new set of the author's works is—if we are not misinformed—that it will give the American book-buyer for the first time a set of Thackeray's acknowledged works in a uniform style—and that is a thing which could not be had before unless one paid for English editions. Indeed, we hear that the American edition will contain some of the author's writings which have never hitherto been put in book-form. If so, it will not be the first time that Mr. Fields has done better for an English author than the English publisher has done for him. As at first projected, the "Household Thackeray" was to contain, in six volumes, "Vanity Fair," "Pendennis," "The Newcomes," "The Virginians," "The Adventures of Philip," "Henry Esmond," and "Lovel the Widower," and if it contained no more, it would be worth having as a neat-looking edition to stand on the shelf and be consulted. A few volumes, making a companion set of the author's various miscellaneous matter in prose and verse, would have a good separate sale, we should think, and, if made in uniformity, would enhance the value and promote the sales of this set also.

Studies in Philosophy and Theology. By Joseph Haven, D.D., Professor in Chicago Theological Seminary. (Andover: Warren F. Draper. 1869. 8vo, pp. 502.)—This book is made up of eleven disconnected papers, most of which have already appeared in the Bibliotheca Sacra or in the New Englander. The philosophy of Dr. Haven is the current Hamiltonianism—the horizon of which mostly lies so far within the Scottish school that it can take no comprehensive view even of the Scotch doctrines themselves. We may gauge the author's philosophical power by the objections he makes to some of his master's theories. While accepting the "doctrine of the conditioned," he thinks it inapplicable to the question of causality. He denies the mind's inability to conceive the absolute commencement of anything, yet admits that we cannot comprehend the Deity's calling of creation into existence out of nothing, nor even represent it to ourselves in thought as taking place. He likewise objects to the similar treatment by Hamilton of the subject of free-will. Hamilton puts the following question: "On the supposition that the sum of influences (motives, dispositions, and tendencies) to volition A is equal to twelve, and the sum of influences to counter-volition B equal to eight, can we conceive that the determination of volition A should not be necessary?" To this Dr. Haven replies as follows: "That is precisely what we can and do conceive. Actual the volition A may be, and will be, in the case supposed—actual, but not necessary. The certainty of an event and the necessity of an event are two different things—a distinction constantly overlooked by Hamilton, in common with Mill and most writers of the necessitarian school, as well as many of the advocates of free-will. The certainty of an action may result from the impossibility of its not occurring, in which case the act is one of necessity; or it may result from other causes, in which case there is no necessity." The italics are ours. If we say that an event happens necessarily, we mean that it not merely happens in the present case, but that it would occur under all circumstances. For example: Socrates took hemlock and died; he need not have done this, perhaps, but sooner or later he must have died; that is, he would have died whatever course he had pursued. The certainty of a proposition has reference to the mode of reasoning or perceiving by which it becomes known to us; and to say that a fact is certain is to say that it is known by a way which never leads to error. There is, therefore, in general, a distinction between necessity and certainty; but there may, nevertheless, be cases in which this distinction vanishes. For example: if a proposition is stated in the form of a general rule, by means of letters A and B, it is expressly made unconditional, and the predicate is said to be true of whatever there may be which the subject describes; and, therefore, if such a proposition is true, it is the statement of a necessary relation. Moreover, to state a general proposition by means of letters A and B, is to represent it as a blank form which, upon being filled up, yields a true statement respecting a particular case. To state a proposition in this way is, therefore, to represent it as a maxim for ascertaining the truth in particular cases; and accordingly, by the certainty of such a statement is meant the certainty of deductions from it, or, in other words, the unconditional generality of the validity of the rule. In such a case, therefore, certainty and necessity are synonymous terms, and whoever seeks to distinguish between them only shows that he is sometimes capable of a sort of thought which goes no deeper than words.

The papers upon theology relate chiefly to natural religion, the Trinity, miracles, and original sin. They contain some statements of the different forms of Protestant opinion on these subjects which may be found convenient. In the most interesting of these essays, that upon natural theology, the author takes the hazardous position that natural theology cannot prove the existence of a God, unless natural science can prove that the world had a beginning. No doubt it is the opinion of physicists that this earth has not always been habitable, and most likely has not always existed; but this opinion is not a belief in a true beginning of the world, such as is requisite to infer a first cause, for it is consistent with the hypothesis that the present order was evolved out of a previous state of things by the operation of natural causes. If Dr. Haven's logic is correct, the fundamental proposition of theology ought to depend for its demonstration upon the truth of Professor Agassiz's views.

Norman Leslie: A New York Story. By Theodore S. Fay. (New York: G. P. Putnam & Son. 1869.)—It was not, we suppose, with the idea of encouraging the despondent, who fear that American literature is not improving so rapidly as it ought, that this novel of thirty or forty years ago was republished; yet no other end, we should say, can be answered by it. Beside the inanities and absurdities of its conception and execution, almost any one of our later works gains some character, and books like "Dr. Johns" and its congeners seem more than respectable.

In the face of Mr. Fay's scornful prefatory warning "to the lofty, minded critic," there is no use in asking him how he came to run the risk of seeing his book used as a standard of measurement for the slow but steady growth of our literature. But however he meant it, it is a sort of a service that Mr. Fay renders, and some degree of gratitude is perhaps due to him; and yet, for our own part, we would as lief have deduced from general principles the special conclusion which "Norman Leslie" warrants—the conclusion that in the Knickerbocker days we had a wonderfully poor literature—as from a re-perusal of this revived specimen of our preadamite days.

Typhaines Abbey: A Tale of the Twelfth Century. By Count A. de Gobineau, Ambassador of France at Rio Janeiro. Translated by Chas. D. Meigs, M.D. (Philadelphia: Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger. 1869.)—This is the story of an unsuccessful attempt on the part of the burghers of Typhaines to set up a commune in opposition to the wishes of their abbot. Dr. Meigs has made a readable translation; but the tale, except so far as it may be "a tale of the twelfth century"—a picture of the manners of that age—is of not much interest or importance. To our taste, the preface, in which the translator lays his work at the feet of the author, in token of the gratitude he owes him for the pleasure he has enjoyed in reading his scientific and historical works, is quite the best part of the book. It is certainly pleasant, for it is as perfect a bit of good-natured garrulity as we have seen in many a day.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Allen (Dr. N.), Physical Culture in Amherst College, swd	(Stone & Huse)
Beal (Rev. S.), Travels of Fah-hian and Sung-Yun from China to India, A.D. 400, 518,	(John Wiley & Son)
Bulfinch (Rev. S. G.), Studies in the Evidences of Christianity	(Wm. V. Spencer)	$1 50
Hood (Rev. E. P.), Lamps, Pitchers, and Trumpets	(M. W. Dodd)	1 75
Lettice Lisle: a Tale, swd	(Littell & Gay)	0 38
Meditations on the Suffering, Life, and Death of Our Lord Jesus Christ, Part I., swd.	(Robt. Clarke & Co.)	0 25
The Workshop, No. 6, swd	(E. Steiger)	0 50
Thackeray (W. M.), Henry Esmond, and Lovel the Widower	(Fields, Osgood & Co.)	1 25
Twenty-fourth Annual Report of the N. Y. Prison Association, swd	(Albany)
Tousey (S.), Papers from over the Water	(Am. News Co.)	1 50
Perinchief (Rev. O.), Sermons	(Wm. Ballantyne)
Whitney (Prof. W. D.), German Reader	(Leypoldt & Holt)	1 50

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO.

HAVE JUST ISSUED

HELPS'S LIFE OF PIZARRO.

The Life of Pizarro, with some account of his Associates in the Conquest of Peru. By Arthur Helps, Author of "Columbus," "Las Casas," etc. Crown 8vo, tinted paper, extra cloth, $2 75.

BLUNT'S KEY TO THE BIBLE.

A Key to the Knowledge and Use of the Holy Bible. By J. H. Blunt, M.A., Author of "Household Theology," etc. 16mo, extra cloth, $1.

EYRE ON THE STOMACH.

The Stomach and its Difficulties. By Sir James Eyre, M.D. From the Sixth English Edition. 16mo, neat cloth, 75 cents.

HINTS FOR

SIX MONTHS IN EUROPE.

Being the Programme of a Tour through parts of France, Italy, Austria, Saxony, Prussia, the Tyrol, Switzerland, Holland, Belgium, England, and Scotland, in the Summer of 1868. By John H. B. Latrobe. 12mo, toned paper, fine cloth, $1 50.

LIPPINCOTT'S

TREASURIES OF LITERARY GEMS.

Miniature 4to. Choicely printed on the finest toned paper and beautifully bound in extra cloth gilt and gilt edges. The Six Volumes in neat box, $4 50.

Contents.—I. A Treasury of Table-talk. II. Epigrams and Literary Follies. III. A Treasury of Poetic Gems. IV. The Table-talk of Samuel Johnson, LL.D. V. Gleanings from the Comedies of Shakespeare. VI. Beauties of the British Dramatists.

ALSO,

THE FOUR GEORGES, AND THE ENGLISH HUMORISTS. By W. M. Thackeray. With numerous Portraits. Standard Edition. 8vo, tinted paper, extra cloth, $3 50.

THE STARLESS CROWN, and other Poetical Selections. 12mo, tinted paper, extra cloth, $1 75.

SERMONS ON THE LORD'S PRAYER. By H. A. Worcester. New Edition. 12mo, tinted paper, cloth, $1 25.

 For sale by all Booksellers, or will be sent by mail, postage free, on receipt of price by

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO., Publishers,
715 and 717 Market Street, Philadelphia.

ZELL'S
POPULAR ENCYCLOPEDIA AND UNIVERSAL DICTIONARY.

The cheapest and most complete Encyclopedia ever published.

Sold by subscription, and delivered in monthly parts at 50 cents each. The entire cost will not exceed $25.

"We find it in the main both full and correct. The spirit in which the Cyclopedia is edited is what it should be."—The Nation.

"The articles are as carefully prepared, the engravings as well executed, and the general typography as perfect as the earliest sheets. Its sale deserves to be popular and extensive."—The Round Table.

"The work is evidently conducted with intelligent and conscientious industry."—N. Y. Tribune.

Address

T. ELLWOOD ZELL, Publisher,
17 and 19 South Sixth Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Or,

AGENCY OF ZELL'S PUBLISHING HOUSE,
7 Murray Street, New York.

LIBRARY OF EDUCATION.

LOCKE (JOHN), "SOME THOUGHTS CONcerning Education," Essays on "Study," "Reading," "A Tutor's Business," "Knowledge: Its Extent and Measure," "Error;" with a Life. 2 vols. 32mo, paper. Price 40 cents, or 50 cents by mail.

MILTON (JOHN), "A TREATISE OF EDUcation," being his letter to Master Samuel Hartlib; with a Life. 1 vol. 32mo, paper (Vol. II. of the Library of Education.) Price 20 cents, or 25 cents by mail.

MANN (HORACE), "ON THE STUDY OF Physiology in Schools," being his Annual Report for 1842; with a Life. 1 vol. 32mo, paper (Vol. III. of the Library.) Price 20 cents, or 25 cents by mail.

In Press, ready July 15:

MILL (J. S.), "ST. ANDREWS ADDRESS." 1 vol. 32mo, paper (Vol. IV. of Library.) Price 20 cents, or 25 cents by mail.

FROUDE (J. A.), "ST. ANDREWS ADdress." 1 vol. 32mo, paper (Vol. IV. of Library.) Price 20 cents, or 25 cents by mail.

CARLYLE (THOMAS), "EDINBURGH ADdress." 1 vol. 32mo, paper (Vol. IV. of Library.) Price 20 cents, or 25 cents by mail.

For an appreciation of the character and object of this series, see the Journal of the American Social Science Association, No. 1, just published by Leypoldt & Holt.

J. W. SCHERMERHORN & CO.,
PUBLISHERS,
14 Bond Street, New York.

RAPIDLY INCREASING POPULARITY.

The best teachers are all using it in preference to other methods.

CLARKE'S NEW METHOD FOR REED ORGANS.

By WILLIAM H. CLARKE.

Be sure and get the right book. It is not an advertisement for cabinet organs, but gives the greatest aid to those who wish to become good performers upon these pleasing instruments. Price $2.50. Sent post-paid on receipt of price.

O. DITSON & CO., Boston.
C. H. DITSON & CO., New York.

SABIN & SONS'

American Bibliopolist

(Published monthly) affords an excellent medium for ADVERTISEMENTS. It is useful to Librarians for the Lists of New English and American Publications. Book Collectors will find many desirable volumes in Catalogue of New and Old Books, which accompanies each number. Notices of Rare or Curious Books, and the Notes and Queries upon American subjects, will be interesting to every one.

J. SABIN & SONS, Publishers,
84 Nassau Street, New York.

J. S. & Son have recently received a very valuable Collection of American Books—perhaps the finest ever offered for sale. Many of the volumes are illustrated with extra plates, and superbly bound.

Just Published,

A NEW NOVEL BY CAPTAIN JAMES GRANT.

First Love and Last Love.

A Tale of the Indian Mutiny. 16mo, boards, 80 cents.

"No other writer of the present day possesses such a marvellous power of bidding Scottish chivalry and romance to start from their mouldering urn, and of clothing with a fresh and indescribable interest the scenery of our native land."—Scottish American Journal.

Also, now Ready,

A COMPLETE AND UNIFORM EDITION

OF THE

Novels, Tales, and Romances

OF

CAPTAIN JAMES GRANT,

In 24 volumes, half-bound in Roxburghe, cloth sides, gilt tops. Price, per set, $30.

A LIST OF THE VOLUMES:

The Romance of War,	Bothwell,
The Aide-de-Camp,	Mary of Lorraine,
James Seton,	Oliver Ellis,
The Scottish Cavalier,	Lucy Arden,
Philip Rollo,	The Captain of the Guard,
Arthur Blane,	Letty Hyde's Lovers,
Laura Everingham,	Second to None,
Frank Hilton,	The Constables of France,
The Yellow Frigate,	Cavaliers of Fortune,
Harry Ogilvie,	The Phantom Regiment,
Legends of the Black Watch,	The King's Own Borderers,
Dick Rodney,	The White Cockade.

CAPT. GRANT'S Novels may also be had separately, bound in red cloth, $1 per volume, or in fancy boards, uniform with "First Love and Last Love," at 80 cents per volume, and will be sent by mail, prepaid, to any address in the U. S., on receipt of the price by the publishers,

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS,
416 Broome Street, New York.

PRESERVE YOUR PAPERS, AND BIND THEM YOURSELF.

The Eureka Self-Binder

Is simple, and binds stronger and better than a book. No. 6 is adapted to the Nation. Price $1 25; or, if sent by mail, $1 50.

Address

SCHUMANN & LATHAM,
18 Dey Street, New York.

BINDERS FOR THE "NATION."

The Publisher of the Nation, considering the binder described above to be the best yet brought to his notice, has made arrangements for supplying it at the above prices, in cloth, to subscribers and others. The number of any volume will be stamped upon it without charge, to order.

Papers bound in this way really need no other binding for permanent preservation, and present the same appearance on the shelf as the usual bound volumes.

Volume VIII. of the Nation just ending, Volume IX. just beginning.

Address, with price enclosed,

PUBLISHER OF THE NATION,
Box 6732, New York City.

L. W. SCHMIDT.
GERMAN BOOKSELLER,
24 Barclay Street, New York,

Imports regularly all the leading Foreign Publications, including Periodicals.

Foreign works noticed in the Nation kept constantly on hand or procured to order.

M. W. DODD

HAS JUST PUBLISHED

THREE NEW BOOKS.

I.

LAMPS, PITCHERS, AND TRUMPETS.

Lectures on the Vocation of the Preacher. Illustrated by Anecdotes—Biographical, Historical, and Elucidatory—of every order of Pulpit Eloquence, from the great Preachers of all ages. By E. Paxton Hood, Lecturer in Spurgeon's Pastors' College. 1 vol. large 12mo, price $1 75.

A book of remarkable interest, overrunning with anecdote and out-of-the-way fact, and striking passages from the greatest preachers of all ages. Written in an uncommonly racy and vigorous style. It is a book of rare interest for all classes.

The following is the contents of one of the chapters (VII., on Wit, Humor, and Coarseness in the Pulpit):

The Functions of Humor—Singular Personal Applications—Story of a Welsh Preacher—The Devil and the Herd of Swine—The Foolish Preaching of Good Men—Robert South—The Sermon to the Fishes—The Pulpit Droll—John Berridge—Jacob Kruber—The Humor of Rowland Hill—Bold Tom Bradbury—The Folly of Learned Sermons—Humorous Juxtaposition of Ideas—Strange Freaks of Speech in the Pulpit.

II.

A BOOK FOR THE SEASON.

UNCLE JOHN'S FLOWER-GATHERERS.

A Companion for the Woods and Fields. By Jane Gay Fuller. 1 elegant volume 16mo, beautifully illustrated with nine engravings, price $1 50.

This beautiful volume has been prepared with great care, and will, it is believed, meet an acknowledged want. In an interesting narrative is given information such as children—older ones, too—will enjoy and appreciate about Plants and Flowers, and how they grow and bloom.

III.

PHILIP BRANTLEY'S LIFE WORK, AND HOW HE FOUND IT.

By M. E. M. 16mo, illustrated, price $1 15.

A very attractive story, suitable for the Sunday-school Library. It is a book of unusual merit, and much above the average of its class.

 A Descriptive Catalogue of all our Publications sent to any address.

M. W. DODD, Publisher,
506 Broadway, New York.

SEASONABLE BOOKS.

THE HABERMEISTER.
A Novel. $1 50.

SPIELHAGEN'S PROBLEMATIC CHARACTERS.
$1 75.

TAINE'S ITALY.
Two Parts. Per Part, $2 50.

MARTINEAU'S BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.
Third Thousand. $2 50.

AUERBACH'S VILLA ON THE RHINE.
Author's Editions. $3 50 and $2.

AUERBACH'S BLACK FOREST VILLAGE TALES.
$1 50.

POLKO'S MENDELSSOHN.
$1 75.

THE MENTAL PHOTOGRAPH ALBUM.
$1 50.

THE FISHER MAIDEN.
$1 25.

LEYPOLDT & HOLT, New York.

The American Freemason.

CONTENTS OF JULY NUMBER.

Man: A Poem. Our Monthly Record: Is the Use of "Mnemonics" Unlawful?—Why did he do it?—Division of Grand Lodge Jurisdiction. Correspondence: A Tub to the Whale—Grand Lodge Jurisdiction, No. III.—A Contribution to the Antiquity of Masonry—The African, or Prince Hall Grand Lodge. Our Monthly Masonic Chronicle: United States, Germany, Prussia, Hungary, Constantinople, France, Egypt. Review of New Books.

Sixteen quarto pages monthly, for one dollar a year.
Address subscriptions to

J. FLETCHER BRENNAN, Editor,
114 Main Street, Cincinnati, O.

VAN NOSTRAND'S ECLECTIC ENGINEERING MAGAZINE.

SELECTED FROM HOME AND FOREIGN ENGINEERING SERIALS.

NO. 7, FOR JULY, NOW READY.

CONTENTS:

Papers on Construction, No. III.; Traction Engines; The Spectroscope; The Paris Steam Road-Roller; Light vs. Heavy Locomotives; Cast-Iron Forts; Liquid Fuel in Metallurgy; On Rivets and Riveting; The Steam Carriage System; The Measure of Power and Force; On the Centrifugal Force of Rotating Shafts; Conservative Engineering; Calcination of Iron Ores; Revolving Soda Furnace; Pulleys with Leather Covering; Merchant Marine; The Bessemer Flame; The Manufacture of Sulphuric Acid; Nobel's Blasting Material—New Experiments; Condensation in Steam Engines; Malleable Cast-Iron; American Railways; Foundry Economy; Electricity as a Motive Power; Torpedoes; The Stability of Floating Docks; The Central Rail System; Passenger Steamships; The Æsthetics of Construction; The Corrosion of Boilers; Wire Roads; Raising Water from Mines; The Computation of Earthwork; Guibal's Ventilating Fan; Illuminating Power of Coal Gas; Enamelling and Polishing; Heating Cars by Steam; Paragraphs.

Terms:—Five Dollars per annum, payable in advance. Single numbers, Fifty cents.

An extra copy will be supplied gratis to every Club of Five Subscribers, at $5 each, sent in one remittance.

D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher,
23 Murray St. and 27 Warren St., N. Y.

 Copies of our new Catalogue of American and Foreign Scientific Books, 56 pp. 8vo, sent to any address on receipt of six cents in postage stamps.

BACK NUMBERS OF THE NATION.

The following numbers of the Nation are desired by the Publisher, and if sent to his address will be paid for, at the rate of twenty-five cents for the numbers in Vol. I., and fifteen cents for all others:

Vol. I. 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, 7.
II. 31, 55.
IV. 96, 104.
V. 106, 107, 112, 115.
VI. 131, 133.
VII. 158, 161, 165, 166.
VIII. 185.

LIFE AND LETTERS OF CAPTAIN JOHN BROWN. Edited by Richard D. Webb, and published by Smith, Elder & Co., London, 1861. In all respects the best life of John Brown ever written. Illustrated by a photographic portrait without a beard, showing perfectly the character of the lower part of the face. Cloth, 12mo, price $1 50.

Sent post-paid on receipt of price. Address PUBLISHER OF THE "NATION," Box 6732, New York City.

THREE DELIGHTFUL NEW BOOKS.

1. Walter Savage Landor.

A Biography. With Portrait and Illustrations. By John Forster. 1 vol. crown 8vo, nearly 700 pages, cloth, $3 50; half calf, $6.

"The book is a treasure of literary history and anecdote, such as few or no other biographies in the language can be, for it sweeps the field of a century, and covers the lifetime of three or four generations of scholars, poets, novelists, and statesmen. . . . It is hard to leave a topic so attractive. Mr. Forster's book, though immense, is not, as the Athenæum declares it, too long; on the contrary, the attentive reader will find it only too short. It is not merely the individual life of Landor which makes the subject; if so, we might find it tiresome with all its wealth of thought and incident. It is rather the magnanimous and exalted in all literature which is here portrayed, not without mean and shabby admixtures, for Landor was no saint, and scarcely so much as a Christian; but of a strain so distinguished and a generosity so prodigal, in the midst of all his petulance, that it elevates our conception of human nature thoroughly to understand the story of his life."—Springfield Republican.

"That it is worth reading, the name and fame of Mr. Forster afford sufficient guarantees. It covers the whole ground thoroughly, and brings Landor before us in all of his moods, through all of his eventful experience, and in all of his relations to the literary circles, of which such men as Wordsworth, Hazlitt, Southey, Carlyle, Emerson, Lamb, the Brownings, and a host of others were prominent."—N. Y. Evening Mail.

"One of the most Sensible of Travellers."

2. Our New Way Round the World.

By C. C. Coffin. Eighth Thousand. 100 Illustrations. Numerous Maps. Cloth, $3; Library style, $3 50; half calf, $5 50.

"The letters of 'Carleton,' written to the daily press descriptive of his journey to Cathay and the Orient, have attracted a large share of public attention, and the reading portion of the community will gladly accept this continuous account of his travels from Mr. C. C. Coffin in proper person. The book has been brought out by Messrs. Fields, Osgood & Co. in their most tasteful manner, and is profusely illustrated with woodcuts that we enjoy, from confidence they inspire in their truthfulness. Mr. Coffin had this great advantage over previous tourists and voyagers at the antipodes, that he saw the men and cities of the East just after they had been brought within the influence of modern civilization. His sketches of China and Japan possess in this respect a novel interest. The account he gives of that indefinable and shadowy superstition known as Fung Shuey, as the cause of the material and intellectual torpor of the Chinese empire, is specially striking."—N. Y. Evening Post.

3. Two Years Before the Mast.

By R. H. Dana, Jr. New and Enlarged Edition. $1 50.

"This is a new edition of 'Two Years Before the Mast,' with such additions as circumstances have made eminently pertinent, the chief of which is entitled 'Twenty-four Years after,' and which contains a very animated account of a visit he made to California in 1859. In the interval California had ascended to renown, under conditions that are known to all. Mr. Dana's account of what he saw in the new California—that California which had bathed in its own gold, and so had changed the wrinkles and feebleness of age for the smoothness and strength of youth—is as captivating as that which he gave us of California in her semi-barbarous state. The contrast is wonderful, and he has brought it out with the skill of a great artist. A man of his sensibility could not fail to be affected by the evidences of sweeping change which met him on every side, and he makes his readers share his feelings."—Boston Traveller.

 For sale by all Booksellers. Sent post-paid on receipt of price by the Publishers,

FIELDS, OSGOOD & CO.,
124 Tremont Street, Boston.

E. P. Dutton & Co., 713 Broadway, New York, Special Agents for F., O. & Co.'s Publications.

The Nation.

VOL. IX.—NO. 211. THURSDAY, JULY 15, 1869. { FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM / TWELVE CENTS PER COPY

THE WEEK 41

EDITORIAL ARTICLES:
The Virginia Election 44
The Coming of the Barbarian 44
The Morals of the Future 45
England 47
Right and Wrong in Italy 48

CORRESPONDENCE:
Why the Civil Service has Run Down .. 49

NOTES:
Literary 49
A Hindu Traveller in India 52
Two Books on the Adirondacks 53
New Testament Translations 53
Recent Republications 54

CURRENT LITERATURE:
Springdale Abbey.—Black Forest Village Stories.—Analysis of Civil Government 55-56
Books of the Week 56

Terms:—Five Dollars per annum, in advance; Clergymen, Four Dollars.  Remittances at the risk of the subscriber, unless made by draft, check, P. O. money order, or registered letter.

The date of expiration of each subscription is indicated on the printed label. A delay of more than three months in renewing subscriptions will endanger their continuance.

ADDRESS, PUBLISHER OF "THE NATION," BOX 6732, NEW YORK.

PUBLISHING OFFICE, 3 PARK PLACE.

The Week.

VIRGINIA has been carried by the "Conservative" candidate for Governor by a majority that will probably turn out to be not far from twenty-five thousand, and this in the heaviest vote ever cast in the State. Mr. Walker, the Governor-elect, is a New Yorker, less than forty years of age, bred to the law, once a "Douglas Democrat," and, since the war began, a Republican. He has been for some years a Virginian by residence, and is said to be much respected by his fellow-citizens of Norfolk. That he will make a good Governor there seems to be not much doubt. Since his election he has made a speech, in which he declared that his success meant the passage of the Fifteenth Amendment and the endorsement by Virginia of the negro's right to political equality. This we believe to be so. We have no expectation of seeing Virginians playing the game which the Georgians entered upon, but which now they seem inclined to give up. It is true that many of the white men who voted for Walker are still enemies of negro suffrage; perhaps most of them are; but their enmity wants the bitterness it had a year or two ago, and we shall hear all the less of it now that "Conservatives" have been willing to nominate negroes for office, and have voted them into office, and have been voted into office by former slaves. Four of the sixteen colored members of the House of Assembly are Walker men; and a portion of the colored vote so large as not to be at all fully represented even by this fact was cast against Mr. Wells. The Virginians—and this is the best thing they have done in this contest—have shown the South, with a forcibleness that the whole South will feel as it never felt Northern preaching to the same effect, that there is no reason why white men should fear black, whether the black men have the ballot or not. The reverse not being true, there is every reason why everybody should rejoice that the two races—or the pure and the mixed form of the one race—have been able to carry on political business in amicable partnership. Of the newly elected members of Congress, Mr. Segar, Congressman at large, is the best known. He is a clever, gallant man, and a consistent Unionist. Mr. Porter, of whom little is known, will be recognized, we dare say, by General Butler. The returns indicate that of the nine representatives five are Conservative and four Radical; and no doubt the Conservatives have a two-thirds majority in the State Senate and Assembly, which gives them the two United States Senators and the power to override the Governor's veto.

Politics elsewhere are stirring a little, but not much. At last the Ohio Democracy have consented to give up the attitude of defiance which they have maintained with more persistency than good judgment for so long a time. That is to say, they have parted with the defiance; their attitude is otherwise pretty much the same; and the nomination of General Rosecrans for Governor will not conceal from the eyes of any one who takes the trouble to look, that the planks of the platform which the candidate is put upon betray plainly the joinery of Mr. Vallandigham. Bond taxation, anti-negroism, and inflation seem as dear as ever to the Ohio "unterrified." We fear the General may be more successful as a candidate than he ever was as anything else—as general, or diplomatist at the Sulphur Springs, or Minister to Mexico. He has the reputation of being a well-meaning, indiscreet, not very able man; but still he has a reputation, and he will be a harder man for Governor Hayes to beat than some others would have been. A worse thing is that he imperils the success of the Amendment. In any case, however, the way is more open since his nomination for a change of base by the "Peace Democracy."

Rosecrans's nomination in Ohio may very probably be of some help to Hancock in the attempt to get the Democratic nomination in Pennsylvania; but from all we hear we should judge that the question of who shall be candidate in that State is mainly a question of money. Both Mr. Packer and Mr. Cass, who are spoken of, are men who can afford to pay for honors—whether or not either of them would; and that some paying must be done nobody appears to deny. Mr. Packer has the reputation, we believe, of having been very civil and of much service to certain young relatives of Mr. Jefferson Davis when they were in need of help, and, in virtue of their blood, were in bad odor; but, on the other hand, Mr. Cass is understood to be strong in the Pittsburg country, which, in its normal condition, is strongly Republican. Furthermore, it may be doubted if the "claim" of Mr. Packer's which we have mentioned would be a very strong one in the eyes of very many Pennsylvania Democrats. The pressure in favor of Hancock probably comes chiefly from outside the State; the party nationally would not object to seeing something like an available candidate for 1872. Some journals already talk about possible Republican nominees for that time—as Colfax, Sheridan, Boutwell, and others; but for the Democracy they seem to find nobody but the Chief-Justice. There is time enough yet between now and October to talk about Governor Geary's chances of re-election. His is a weak enough nomination, we suppose; but then the local tickets may make up for that, and, so far as we hear, though the Republicans are not doing well as regards these, the Democrats are doing no better. In Philadelphia, for example, they have a convict and blackleg among their nominees. And it is said that Mr. Robeson is found to be more "practicable" than his predecessor, and is helping his party to use the political leverage which the Navy Yard affords. As the Philadelphia vote is heavy, and the general vote may probably be light, this assistance from the Secretary of the Navy, and the badness of the Democratic local nomin ations may have an important effect on the election.

Elihu Burritt, who has in his day done some honor to the American name, and some service to his race, has been for some time consul at Birmingham, on a salary of $1,500, out of which he had to pay office-rent and clerk-hire, leaving him about $500 for his own use. One would think the place would not tempt the poorest harpy that ever "worked" in a canvas, and yet the old man has been turned out. What makes the performance seem at first sight more remarkable is, that Burritt rendered great service to the Union cause with his pen during the war. We are not at this moment acquainted with the name and antecedents of the gentleman who is to take his place; but, of course, we can have little doubt that he is a pious, virtuous, painstaking scholar, linguist, and statistician, of dignified manners and commanding personal appearance, who wants the small emoluments of the place simply to spend them in buying books for our public libraries, and helping young American artists while pursuing their studies. This being the case, old Burritt, instead of being dissatisfied, as he is, at being removed, ought to thank Mr. Washburne—if Mr. Washburne did it—for ridding the service of him.

We are glad to say that Philadelphia is just now the seat of great and increasing dissatisfaction with our friends "the politicians." In fact—if we can believe what we hear—the leading citizens of all parties are thoroughly disgusted with the manner in which appointments to the Civil Service have been made during the last six months. Luckily, too, their discontent is taking a practical form. They have drawn up a letter, couched in the strongest terms, addressed to the State Congressmen, requesting them to support forthwith Jenckes's bill, or something like it, that will put an end to the disgraceful scramble for office, and expressing their opinion that the continuance of the present state of things will not only endanger the existence of the Government, but go far to weaken the bonds of private morality. Most of the leading citizens are signing it, and we trust the movement will spread in the same shape to all the cities in the country. Nothing more disagreeable to the average Congressman than this mode of acting on him can well be imagined. If you go to Washington, and request him to "eschew corruption" and support the appointment to office of the pure and good, he will embrace you, invite you to take a seat on the Congressional sofa, and tell you that those have been his sentiments ever since he was a boy in a store; but if you say you want him to vote for a particular bill providing specifically for the exclusion of rascals and ignoramuses from office; or, if you ask him why he recommended Brown, the notorious horse-thief, for a United States marshalship, his countenance will assume an abstracted mathematical expression, and he will probably have to rush off to listen to Smith's great speech on the state of the Union, in order to refute that sophistical Copperhead's views on the configuration of the black man's skull and shins. Nevertheless, it is only by following him up steadily with names, dates, and circumstances, and specific demands, that he can ever be got to divest himself of the power of "taking care of his friends."

The Springfield Republican accuses us of having made a mistake in saying that Governor Claflin was a director of the Boston Railroad Company, but the only proof it offers is an assertion that it would be against the Massachusetts laws for him to fill that position. Now, if there be a law on the subject, its existence proves simply that he ought not to be a director of the road; that he is a director, we still affirm. The official list of directors published by the company for 1869 contains his name, and we have proof positive that to the carnal eye of those connected with the road, he is still on the board. If, therefore, in remaining a director, he is violating a statutory prohibition, so much the worse for him; if he is not violating a statutory prohibition, he is guilty of a great indiscretion; and if he allows his name to stand on the list when he is really not an officer of the corporation, he connives at a fraud—pious, it may be, but still a fraud. We do not, we repeat, impute any dishonesty or bad motives to him; but we do say that in these days, when railroads are so often great moneyed corporations, managed by speculators with a single eye to their own benefit, and in constant need of State aid either in "getting down to tide-water" or bolstering up their credit, the Governor of the State should have no official connection with them. We are also under the necessity of repeating, in reply to the Republican, that the Boston Advertiser did oppose the Massachusetts Central Railroad Bill, as may be seen by referring to the number of June 8.

A movement has been inaugurated in Cambridge, Massachusetts, in the results of which we profess a very lively interest. The scheme of co-operative housekeeping sketched out in the Atlantic Monthly by Mrs. C. S. Peirce, has been taken in hand, for practical experiment, by that lady, and, in part, now forms the serious undertaking of some twenty or twenty-five families. A clear and feasible plan has been elaborated, by which it is hoped to establish a co-operative store-room, a laundry, a bakery, and a kitchen, that shall relieve the home of the cares, expense, and untidiness of cooking and washing, and reduce housekeeping to simpler proportions, enabling families to dispense with servants altogether, or to be quite independent of them. The details of this plan were presented in a remarkably business-like address which Mrs. Peirce made last week to some of her neighbors, and which appeared in the World of Saturday. We understand that several other towns are already forming similar associations, and more are awaiting the success of the Cambridge experiment. This cannot be determined before the fall or early winter, but we expect to witness it. The ladies of Berlin have shown their capacity to found, maintain, and direct the "People's Kitchens," as they are called, or cheap restaurants for the working-classes; and we do not believe that American women are less practical than German. Mr. Mill asserts that practicalness is a feminine quality, and if it be, it is very certain that Mrs. Peirce is not quitting her "sphere." Their conduct of the Sanitary Aid Societies in the war did a great deal for women's business reputation; but the Sanitary Commission was a charitable organization; it had not to make ends meet, and was therefore not a complete test of the business ability of the managers. We want now to see if women can make a business enterprise pay, and everybody will, for this reason, watch the present experiment with the greatest interest. Its bearing on all sorts of social and political problems cannot be overestimated.

We see it asserted in one of the papers that the late defaulting cashier of the Central National Bank was brought to grief by unsuccessful speculations in Mariposa "Preferred Stock." If so, all we can say is that he is by no means the only person who was ruined by his confidence in "the new machinery" of that remarkable corporation. We have heard of more than one wretched victim whose all has gone down its auriferous shafts. A friend reminds us that when a piece of plate was presented, a month or two ago, to the enterprising president, in consideration of his services in forcing up the stock and otherwise bringing the simple-minded within the fowler's net, he modestly disclaimed all glory of the performance, and ascribed it, like a pious man, to an overruling Providence. We think he owes it to the public to acknowledge that he was mistaken as to the character of the agency which was manipulating the shares and crushing the quartz. He might surely now apply to the Mariposa Company what Colonel Pride said of the Long Parliament when he was "purging" that body.

General Blair was invited to the dinner of the "Army of the Gulf," presided over by Farragut, which took place at Long Branch last week, and took occasion, in making his few "remarks," to say that "the names of Lee and Stonewall Jackson would one day be as much on the lips of Americans as those of Sherman and Farragut," and to speak of them as "aspersed as rebels," of course by way of eulogizing the Confederate leaders; whereat the company took offence, and Admiral Farragut called him to order under the rule prohibiting the introduction of politics into these gatherings. General Blair then left the room, after having endured a fair amount of expressions of disapprobation. He excuses himself and abuses his hosts in a letter to the World, in which he says his object in praising Lee and Jackson was to compliment the men who had beaten them, and he ascribes the "perversion" of his meaning by those who heard him to their "having been taught by Butler to relish a different kind of steal" (pun).

The World comes to his rescue, on the ground that what he said was "the merest truism; that Browning glorifies Strafford; Bulwer Cromwell; French royalists Hoche, and French republicans Larochejacquelin; and that men who would have voted with Ireton and Bradshaw in a mysterious body, which the World calls "the Lay Parliament," now read of Falkland with moistened eyes; and that "our children will not sow Jackson's grave with salt, or build monuments to Ben Butler"—all of which may be true, but is not to the point. Time is of the essence of the question. Bulwer glorifies Cromwell, but Cromwell has been dead for two hundred years; and the moistness which comes over our eyes about Falkland is due with most of us to the fact that Falkland has for the same period ceased to be troubled by either church or state. Anybody who eulogized Rupert or Stanley at a Puritan dinner, three years after Naseby, would certainly have had a tankard of ale thrown in his face. One of the peculiarities of civil war, too, is that men do not feel much, if any, admiration for an enemy's bravery; they are too deeply moved by the quarrel to have any stomach for mere professional enjoyment of the spectacle of the foeman's prowess. Rupert was not to the Puritans a brilliant cavalry officer, as he is to us, but a blaspheming, plundering scoundrel, who deserved to have his throat cut. So that even if we acquit General Blair of all intention to offend, we cannot acquit him of the charge of having made an ass of himself in talking in a way which, according to the showing of his own friends, will not be appropriate for fifty years after he is dead. Public dinners are not the occasions on which to anticipate the judgments of posterity; anybody who talks at them is expected to talk the talk, and at least respect the prejudices, of his company, or else do what happily it is in the power of every man to do—hold his tongue.

Mr. Jackson, on whose removal from office in the Treasury Department we commented some weeks since, writes to us to say that he was removed under a "mistaken supposition as to his political affiliations," but that as soon as the mistake was corrected by the representations of his friends, he was reappointed, and has no reason to suppose that "his tenure of office is dependent on any other conditions than those implied in every appointment." The two young men, he says, who are learning their duties under him, were appointed in virtue of an arrangement between himself and the chief of his division, and without the knowledge of the Third Auditor, and their duties are, not simply those discharged by himself alone, but those of other places made vacant by dismissals and resignations. Both are lawyers of some experience, and in training them Mr. Jackson is only doing what the old hands have to do every time the general sweep is made after a change of administration. We trust Mr. Jackson will be more careful in future about his "affiliations." He regrets, naturally enough, our mention of his case and our criticism of his chief; and we regret having had to use him as an illustration. But we shall never be satisfied till he and all like him can "affiliate" as they please, as long as they discharge their duty properly.

The Emperor has apparently lost heart, and instead of appealing to the property-holders against the Socialists, or the Socialists against the property-holders, has quietly sent in a message to the Corps Législatif proposing to concede to that body the right of choosing its own president, of ratifying commercial treaties, of questioning ministers in their places, and to ministers the right to sit as representatives. In fact, it may be said that he is willing to accept a ministry responsible to the chamber. The much-abused parliamentary system is to be set up in France once more, pretty much as it was in Louis Philippe's time, plus universal suffrage. The immediate cause of the surrender is probably the resignation of the ministry, which found its position untenable, owing to the largeness of the hostile minority and its weight and ability. The great reason why a ministry responsible only to the sovereign cannot work in combination with a representative legislature is one that cannot be got over—that ministers are, after all, but men, with human nerves and susceptibilities, and will not sit and debate week after week, in a hostile assembly, with nothing to support them but the consciousness that a master in a palace some miles away approves of their conduct. After the proposed reforms are enacted nothing but the submission of press offences to the jury, and the subjection of functionaries to legal pursuit at the hands of individuals, will be needed to make France a free country; but without the last all the others are nugatory, because as long as nobody can prosecute a policeman without the permission of the council of state, every man's liberty and property are at the mercy of the government.

What has led the Emperor thus to abandon deliberately the Napoleonic system, which was the darling discovery of his life, and submit himself and his fortunes to the rhéteurs, is, probably, his age and physical infirmities, which render him no longer equal to a bold or desperate policy, such as a great socialistic experiment, or another coup d'état; the rapid decline in France of the military spirit, which has always been the sure support of his dynasty; the loss of prestige caused by the undeniable mistakes of the last ten years; and, though last not least, the consciousness that personal government is, in our age, not possible in the absence of personal loyalty to the sovereign. The latter is now so nearly extinct that all displays of it call forth a smile. In 1851, individual saviours of nations seemed not impossible; but the world has made prodigious strides politically since then. The fact is patent that the people all over Christendom are bent on governing themselves somehow, and claim the right of doing it badly if they please. The "good king" will soon be as extinct as the dodo. The Blatherskite is just at present making a vigorous attempt to take his place, but we shall before long see him displaced also; and then let us hope the dream of thirty centuries will be realized, and Right Reason, the only legitimate ruler of men, be placed firmly on the throne.

The Lords are returning the Irish Church Bill to the Commons without the provision which devotes the money of the endowment, about $100,000,000 currency, to charitable purposes—proposing to leave the disposition to future decision—and without the retention of the bishops in the House of Lords. They have tried during the debate various modes of letting the Church down easy—such as concurrent endowment—as they called it, "levelling up." Then they clamored for the reservation of the glebe-houses in perpetuity, and so on. None of their amendments have been important, or, in fact, have been introduced for any purpose than that of obstructing the measure, without seeming actually to oppose it outright, which they are afraid to do. The country and the House of Commons, however, regard all the leading features of Mr. Gladstone's bill as essential, and none more so than his plan for distributing the money; and it is not improbable that the Commons will be supported in rejecting the amendments by a fierce outburst of popular agitation.

Prince Hohenlohe, the Bavarian prime minister, has got into a state of excitement about the Œcumenical Council, which, in contrast with the somewhat contemptuous calm with which the other Catholic powers await its assembling, is somewhat ludicrous. He is evidently of opinion that, if left alone, it may issue some decrees that will throw the whole machine of state out of gear in Catholic countries, and he has accordingly issued a circular in which he calls on other Catholic governments to hold a convention and settle on some line of united action calculated to keep the Council in bounds. Austria, however, which is the chief Catholic power, replies, through M. de Beust, that it will simply look on, and only resist if attacked, which is what France is going to do. If the Council prescribes to either people or clergy any line of action in contravention of municipal law, all persons obeying it will be duly punished; otherwise no attention will be paid to its decisions. It will, by-the-by, interest the Christian world to know that the Rev. Dr. Cumming, of London, is going to attend the Council, and give the prelates a piece of his mind. He will thus, for the first time, see the Scarlet Woman eye to eye; and if the Pope does not abdicate after hearing the Doctor's views as to the meaning of the Two Beasts of the Revelations, all we can say is, that it will show him to be, what we have long suspected him to be, a hardened and irreclaimable old fellow.

THE VIRGINIA ELECTION.

What has happened in Virginia is this—that the new Constitution, drawn up by a very Radical Convention some time ago, has been submitted, by the President's order, to the popular vote; certain clauses, which were likely to prove specially obnoxious to a great number of the inhabitants of the State, having been submitted separately, so that the hostility of the Conservatives to them might not endanger the adoption of the rest of the instrument. The Constitution has been adopted by a large majority, and the proscriptive clauses have been defeated. At the same time, Mr. Walker, a Northern lawyer of high character and undoubted Unionism, has been elected Governor of the State by the same majority—a combination of Democrats and Conservative Republicans voting for him—over Mr. Wells, the present Governor, the candidate of the extreme Radicals, and a man less generally respected than Walker. The Governor, to be sure, is only a provisional Governor, after all, for the State is not yet in the Union; but the adoption of the Constitution by a large majority will doubtless bring it into the Union when Congress meets. The Constitution, too, as it stands, contains what is commonly considered the essence of reconstruction—that is, it accepts the results of the war, and establishes universal suffrage. Nevertheless, a great many people seem to be alarmed and troubled by the result, for the reason simply that Walker, the successful candidate, has received the support not simply of Conservative Republicans, but of that large body of Southerners who either participated in the rebellion or sympathized with it, and who until now have bitterly opposed the reconstruction policy of Congress. It is feared, and not unnaturally, that a constitution which such men suddenly approve of must contain something capable of being used to defeat the object of its framers, and that a Governor elected by them can hardly remain faithful to national principles and policy. It is undoubtedly hard to believe that Virginians of the type of the Hunters, Baldwins, and Smiths have suddenly become sincere converts to the doctrine of equal rights, or that a candidate of their choosing can prove a very jealous champion of such rights; but then it is difficult to see why what has happened should take anybody very much by surprise. A great many persons at the North seem to have cherished up to the present day the belief that in some mysterious manner the ex-rebels would undergo a change of heart as regarded the government of the Union and the doctrine of human equality, and that by keeping them two or three years out in the cold, they would at last come to bless what they once cursed, and turn into as good Radicals as any of us. As yet they have given no sign of this whatever, and have made no progress in our direction beyond expressing a willingness to accept the inevitable. The old feeling about the rebellion and its consequences is not changed, and there is no human means of changing it rapidly. The idea that it can be changed by any process of coercion is, of course, a hallucination. Time will do it, and the revival of industry and the fading of old memories, but nothing else; and if the Union is to be legally reconstructed within the next twenty years, it must be with the existing materials, of which "unrepentant" rebels, it must be remembered, form a large part. It need not surprise us in the least that they have not voted for Wells. Wells represents to them all that is odious in the reconstruction policy; and, if we let them vote at all, we must be prepared for their voting for men we do not like. In fact, calling on them to vote is calling on them to express an opinion—not the opinion we most like, but such as they happen to hold. If it do not suit us, so much the worse, but there is no use in lamenting over their obstinacy and blindness. The stage on which the South is now entering is one which must inevitably follow the abolition of military rule—a stage in which the old leaders will again raise their heads and gather their hosts; a stage in which negroes will be intimidated, or "influenced," or humbugged, and in which a great many obnoxious men will be put in places of trust, and a great many obnoxious principles be preached. But we cannot help it. The cause of it lies in human nature, and it takes a good deal of time and a good deal of trouble to change human nature. That Walker will be more or less influenced by the men who have voted for him, we think very likely; and that these men are still hostile, openly or secretly, to the North and its ideas, is doubtless true, but then these men compose the most active, energetic, and skilful portion of the Southern population. They cannot be killed or gagged or outlawed; they must, therefore, be endured.

To our minds, a great deal is gained when they have been induced to vote for a constitution which formally recognizes every other man's right to vote, and to vote for it, too, with enthusiasm. And we are not sorry to hear of their influencing the negroes. It is a good thing for the negro that he is worth influencing; intimidated, too, he is and will be; but this is the inevitable consequence of his poverty, dependence, and want of education. Wherever poor men vote, they are exposed to intimidation; and one of the objects of industry and political education is to raise them above intimidation.

On the whole, we think the political prospect at the South very encouraging. The acceptance of negro suffrage as the basis of the new political régime by the white Virginians and Georgians, who are in a majority, has set an example which Mississippi will probably follow; and we shall, within a year or two, see the colored men admitted to the political arena all over the South, and fairly engaged in the game of politics with their white neighbors. However they may fare at first, the mere willingness of the Southerners to play it on a footing of equality with them, shows that the worst is over, and that the North has done its work, because it has done all it can for them short of making them a privileged class.

THE COMING OF THE BARBARIAN.

Mr. Raphael Pumpelly, in a thoughtful and instructive article in the last Galaxy, foreshadowed, with the aid of personal experience of China and Chinamen, the probable extent and possible consequences of the immigration of Chinese with which the Pacific slope, if not the whole Union, is threatened, and there can be no question that it is not a minute too soon for us to look the matter in the face and provide for it. If nobody were likely to gain by the coming of the Chinese but the Chinese themselves, we might attach some importance to the efforts that will undoubtedly be made to prevent their coming. Their difference of manners, and of religion, and their peculiarities of appearance and personal habits, and their extreme inoffensiveness, not to say helplessness, make them just the kind of object which most excites the hatred and contempt of the Anglo-Saxon and the Irish variety of the Celt. That people can have any political or social rights, or be entitled to any respect, who are not able and ready on proper provocation to thrash him soundly, is to either of these gentlemen a doctrine so strange and forbidding that nothing but considerable mental and moral culture enables him thoroughly to comprehend it. The pleasant old Californian custom of robbing Chinamen as an amusement has, of course, been always confined to the brutal population of the diggings, but the feeling which underlies it has found expression amongst the educated, moral, and religious portion of the community in the exclusion of Chinese testimony in courts of justice; and Californians seem to be almost as sensitive to all criticism of this feature of their jurisprudence as our Southern friends used to be to criticism of the slave code. An attempt to admonish the Californian Christians on the subject was made at the last Presbyterian Assembly in this city, but was defeated, owing to the outspoken resentment of the Californian delegates. So that if all that was needed to stop the flow of Chinamen into this country was hostility of sentiment, especially on the part of the laboring classes, we might expect to see them kept out, or at all events only let in in very small numbers, in spite of the fact that, as has been well said, in opening up steam communication with China, and bringing so many of the people over already, we have made a breach in a wall behind which four hundred millions of human beings are struggling for more room, more light, more labor, and more food.

There are, however, two forces at work in the United States, at this moment, which, though very silent, are very powerful, and which will undoubtedly force admission for the Chinese in spite of any amount of popular prejudice. One is the demand of capital for labor, and the other is the demand of farmers and others, but especially farmers, for household service, or help, or whatever one pleases to call it. The settlement of the slavery controversy, and the consequent opening of the whole continent to every form of free industry, the wonderful impetus given to all enterprise by the rapid extension of the railroad and the telegraph, the discovery in every direction of incalculable natural wealth, and the increasing confidence of the civilized world in the permanence of American institutions, will doubtless make this country, during the coming century, the recipient of enormous quantities of capital, for which Europe no longer affords profitable employment, and which in Asia cannot find safe employment. We may be sure, too, that in spite of the ravings of some of our economical blatherskites about "foreign indebtedness," there will never come a time when Americans will be so wholly demented as to refuse to borrow money at four or five per cent. with which they can make from twelve to twenty per cent. profit without giving any more burdensome security for its payment than their word. Add to this the very large body of capital which is already accumulated here, not only in large but in small quantities, in the hands of mechanics as well as of millionaires, and which is eagerly seeking investment through the shrewdest and most indomitable speculators the world has ever seen, and you have a demand for labor which nothing can resist—neither prejudice nor prohibitory legislation, and which, during the next fifty years, will draw Chinamen here as fast as they are willing and able to come, and which would draw them far faster than the Irish and Germans, even if the supply of these were not already seriously impaired; because the Chinese will work harder and for less wages, and are more tractable. The moral and political objections to them we need not consider here, because capital will not consider them, and these, as Mr. Pumpelly shows, are probably greatly overestimated.

Coming to the second force—the demand for domestic servants—we touch on a point on which our opinions may seem to some persons fanciful; but we have little fear of any such judgment from those who consider the facts of American life apart from the theories of American progress preached on platforms. Probably the most puzzling phenomenon of the day to the sociologist is the growing tendency of the present generation of native Americans to abandon the country and crowd into the towns, to engage in trade and manufactures. The newspapers and poets are all busy painting the delights of the agricultural life; but the farmer, though he reads their articles and poems, quits the farm as soon as he can find any other way of making a livelihood; and if he does not, his son does. Much of this movement may doubtless be ascribed to the unnatural stimulus given to manufactures and speculation by the outrageous tariff of the last eight years; but the greater portion of it is undoubtedly due to the hardships and loneliness of farm life, even under the most favorable circumstances, whether on the New England hills or the prairies of Illinois. The farmer is worked to the utmost extent of his powers, and his wife is worked beyond her powers, and the result is bad food, bad health, and perennial weariness and disgust.

Of course, it may be said that the lot of the American farmer is not different from—is, indeed, in many respects a far easier one than—that of the European farmer; and the European farmer is a synonym for strength and health and sound sleep and contentment. But then the European farmer and his wife who do their own work are peasants; that is, persons without knowledge or ambition or tastes, with few desires above those of the ox in their plough. The European farmer's wife has no social aspirations, no silk dresses, no piano, no monthly magazine, and no dreams or hopes of genteel existence. She is a robust animal, who handles her pots and pans, and bends over her wash-tub, with thorough enjoyment of her work, and without a suspicion that she is capable of anything higher or better.

The problem which the native American farmer is trying to solve, however, is one which has never before been attempted, namely, the infusion into the agricultural calling of a degree of culture and refinement hitherto only witnessed in towns amongst any class, and never witnessed amongst our farming population at all. In fact, he is trying to live, while laboring with his hands, as only superintendents of labor live in other countries. To say that the attempt is succeeding or seems likely to succeed would be to fly in the face of all the facts. There rises from every farm-house, or at least from the women of it, a wail of discontent—a story of shattered nerves, worn-out muscles, lonely, joyless lives, which are made only the more unbearable by the glimpses which the literature of the day gives of the ease, polish, and excitement of city life, and he is a lucky farmer who gets his children to follow his calling one minute longer than they can help it. The efforts made in every direction to reconcile him to his lot, by contrivances for reducing the labor of housekeeping, and supplying him with substitutes for society and amusement, are numerous enough, but none of them seem to be of much value. The hard facts remain—that neither he nor his wife can get cheap and reliable labor, and that without it they must be drudges, hewers of wood and drawers of water, longing for higher things, but without the means of attaining them; and there is nobody who is familiar with farm-life in this country who is not seriously asking himself whether the experiment of having the fields tilled by enlightened citizens is not a failure, or whether the happy farmer must not be for ever, what he has always been since Adam's fall, the rude, unlettered peasant.

The same story might be told, mutatis mutandis, of that large class of dwellers in towns who are now able to keep no servant, or who endure the untold and unutterable agony of trying to get intelligent assistance out of one; and when once the chance is offered to this vast army of sufferers of hiring such servants as Mr. Pumpelly describes the Chinese to be—submissive, tractable, painstaking, economical, cheap, needing neither society, nor amusements, nor church, nor school; neither saucy, nor ambitious, nor restless—they will have them, though they had to go through fire and water to get them. Nobody who feels the public pulse can have failed to notice the thrill of delighted, eager expectation which has passed through it by the mere talk which we have already had of the approach of the barbarians. If the barbarians only knew what welcome awaits them, the Central Flowery Land would suffer a perceptible diminution of its population, teeming though it be, within the next ten years.

Of course, the presence of a large body of persons whose value lies in their fitness for servile duties and in their want of social ambition will give a severe blow to the American social ideal. But this ideal vanished for the present when an insensate eagerness to "build up" manufactures led to loss of faith in the inherent vigor of American society, and when successive doses of protection produced those great social tumors known as "centres of industry," swarming with a foreign population whom it is hard to absorb, and whom great speculators use as the pawns in their tremendous game. We cannot, if we would, go back to the early, happy time, when the mill-girls wrote poetry and read French, and the farmer's hired man could deliver a Fourth of July oration on a pinch. In any case, the question of domestic service is fast becoming a question of civilization itself. Marriage, divorce, childbearing, female health, the permanence and purity of homes, are all affected by it.

The probable influence of the Chinese on our politics affords, of course, matter for grave consideration. But does their arrival not promise an opportunity once more of proposing an educational test for the exercise of the suffrage with a better chance of a favorable hearing than we have hitherto had? The Fenian who now thinks every male has an "inalienable right" to vote without reference to the state of his intelligence, would probably support the exaction from the Chinese voter of a knowledge of the English language and of the principles of this government, and this might furnish the first step towards a formal recognition, applicable to all, of the absolute necessity of general education to the success of democracy. We notice as a favorable sign of the times that many of those who have during the last seven years been preaching, in the interest of the negro, the absolute sufficiency of mere instinct to enable a man to use the franchise both for his own interest and that of the community, are now accounting for the hostility of the Democratic party to all social and political reform by the enormous amount of ignorance in its ranks; which shows that the world moves.

THE MORALS OF THE FUTURE.

THE practical results of the discussion about the genesis of morals which has been raging for some time, and to which Mr. Lecky's book has given a strong stimulus, will perhaps prove more interesting to the mass of people than the discussion itself. Of course, it is to every intelligent and reflective man a question of great moment whence he draws his sense of right and wrong; whether he derives it from an inner light, or from revelation or experience. But to a man's friends and neighbors, and to legislators and philanthropists, the important point in his moral or mental condition is, after all, not so much how he came to have a conscience as whether he has one; and, if so, what kind of thing it is. There is in actual life, as Mr. Lecky has pointed out, little or no difference between a utilitarian and an intuitionist. The utilitarian who refrains from murdering his enemy under a rule drawn from human experience of the injurious effects of murder on the community at large, is just as valuable a citizen as the intuitionist who refrains under a rule prescribed by an innate moral sense, because it is found, on the whole, that one regards murder with about as much horror as the other.

But, then, the fact is that up to our time the mass of mankind have been, in their own estimation, intuitionists; that is, the generally accepted rules of morality, from whatever source they may have been derived, have been to them ultimate facts, behind which they did not go, and which they conceived to be incapable of modification. Nobody but a few philosophers has hitherto concerned himself with the origin of his dislike to theft. Everybody knew it was wrong; that it was disapproved of by the community; that the commission of it would be followed by disgrace, and perhaps by imprisonment and damnation. The old Scotch judge who warned the prevaricating witness "that the eye of Almighty God and of the police of Edinburgh was upon him," appealed to motives by which the great body of every community has always been influenced, no matter how, when, or where morals began. The popular belief has been, too, that the moral standard is unchangeable, and that the differences in the moral code of different countries are due not to external circumstances, but to difference in light.

One of the most striking phenomena of the last twenty years has, however, been the "popularization," as it is called, of all sorts of speculation. Everybody has taken to "dabbling" a little in everything, and some of the ablest scientific men of the day devote a large part of their time to providing pools and swimming-baths, so to speak, of philosophic water in which the common run of people can splash about without getting out of their depth. Instead of talking literature and art—"Shakespeare and the musical glasses"—parlor conversation runs on the spectrum analysis or the correlation of forces and "the science of religion;" and what is, perhaps, more serious than all—the old theological basis of morals having lost a good deal of its hold on the popular mind—great numbers of people who were formerly content with being good now occupy themselves with the enquiry, "What is good? and why should we be good?"—not, of course, novel questions, but novel as popular questions. It must be admitted, too, that the utilitarian test begins to be applied to acts by vast numbers of persons who are not competent to manage an instrument of so much delicacy. When a man like Mr. Lecky makes a mistake as to its very nature, we may guess what results it is likely to give in the hands of the masses when applied, for instance, to such obscure cases as the guilt or innocence of abortion, and many other self-regarding acts. Abortion was, though condemned by the Stoics, only converted into a crime by the Church; and wherever the transcendental morality of the Church declines in strength, and the utilitarian spirit gains ground, it seems to resume its old place amongst the acts of simply doubtful morality. We might, of course, multiply these illustrations almost indefinitely.

What will, perhaps, be most interesting to watch in the present crisis will be the effect on the popular mind of familiarity with the history of morals—familiarity which such works as those of Denis and Lecky are doing much to spread. It must be remembered, as we have said, that the popular impression in every country has been, down to our day, that the distinction between virtue and vice existed from the beginning as seen in our own day; that the line, though constantly disregarded, never disappeared; that, in short, as Mackintosh remarked, no additions had ever been made to the base of morality. Now, the history of morals, as recently written, does not show that there ever was a time when what we call wrong was called right by the moralists of the period; but it does show that the arrangement of the virtues—or, in other words, the ideal man—has varied greatly in different ages, and varied so much as, for practical purposes, to make serious modifications in the moral standard. In other words, it shows that there has been a fashion in virtues as in garments—one holding the first place in one age, and the other in another age. As Mr. Lecky has pointed out, dignity, courage, self-respect, and public spirit stood foremost in pagan Greece and Rome; gentleness, humility, self-abasement, and charity in the early Christian period; self-restraint and self-denial in the second stage of the Church's history. The rise of the Christian warrior in the feudal period, and the appearance of his offspring, the modern gentleman, again brought the pagan virtues to the front rank; but the gentleman once more begins to fall into the background, and the democratic age on which we are entering is setting up an ideal character of its own, which will differ in many important respects from any that has gone before it. What is to be feared now is that the popular belief in the binding force of all rules of morals, or in the absolute value of every type of excellence, will, for a while at least, be greatly shaken by familiarizing the popular mind with the evanescence of all types. We cannot invite the public in to assist at an analytical examination of the machinery by which the world has been kept in order without destroying the public reverence for it, without raising the suspicion in many minds that the vices of to-day may be the virtues of to-morrow; or, to adopt the theory of morals which the French moralists now preach with great freedom, and which carries them an immense way beyond Bentham—"that there is neither vice nor virtue, evil nor good, beauty nor ugliness; what goes under these names are traditions received, and usages adopted, by the society in which one lives," as one of them expressed it the other day.

We can already see under our eyes, to-day, the growth of the classification of virtues by which the world will probably live during the next century or two at all events. The virtue of brotherly kindness—or, to express it in a more familiar way, of good nature—is evidently to take the foremost place. It has already all but taken the foremost place in the Northern States of the Union at least. The just, austere, proud, and truthful man, who monopolized the admiration of the last two or three centuries, still, to be sure, receives a fair share of praise, but it is faint praise, and he becomes more and more an object of popular dislike. The kindly man, on the other hand—the man who is ready to help everybody, who speaks well of everybody, who shuts his eyes to people's faults, who avoids making distinctions, moral or other, between men—rises every day more and more into favor. If with this quality he combines energy, and, through success in trade or commerce, has the power of displaying his kindliness, he becomes the real paladin of our day—will be the good man of the twentieth century.

One marked peculiarity of the rising moral type is, that it eschews what we may call long views of a man's career. It insists on our taking him year by year, and judging him, say, by the last two or three years of his existence. When society was more settled than it is now, and classes rigidly defined, changes of residence and occupation rare—when men, in short, were born into what was called "their station," and seldom rose out of it—a man was usually judged by his whole history. The faults of his youth told against him in his manhood; the faults of his manhood blighted his old age; his antecedents, in other words, were all-important. But now that all positions are becoming attainable by all men, the maintenance of this rule is no longer possible, and it has become very unpopular, and is falling into complete disuse. The popular morality is, that is to say, adopting itself to the exigencies of modern society. The locus pœnitentiæ, instead of being confined to a few of the earlier years of a man's career, may be said to cover the whole of it up to the age of fifty; and the length of time which a man has to submit to public inspection in order to secure public confidence and respect may be said to be shorter the further one goes West. A good many years or equivalent deeds are still necessary in the Eastern States: but by the time one gets out to Colorado or Montana, one finds that it is considered cruel and unfair to bring up against a well-behaved man his thefts or forgeries even of the previous year.

The social advantages of this arrangement are obvious. There can be no greater incentive to reform than the possibility of occupying as good a place in the public estimation as if one had never fallen; and probably millions will be brought into the ways of virtue under the new democratic régime who, under the old rule, would have become irreclaimably vicious. On the other hand, it is doubtful whether specimens of the highest type of character will hereafter be as numerous as they once were. An age in which a man who has stolen and repented is held in just as much esteem as a man who at any time would sooner have died than steal, though, perhaps, nearer the Christian ideal, can hardly be expected to produce as many cases of the loftiest moral excellence as those more exacting ages in which society insisted on lifelong purity as the price of its respect. That nobody, as the Latin poet has said, ever became a rascal all at once, is a very good deduction from principles of human nature, but not a whit better than the corresponding maxim that no one becomes good all at once. Even those cases of sudden conversion, which do undoubtedly occur under religious influence, consist rather in the formation of a strong determination to resist temptation than in the hearty abhorrence of evil. If we can imagine—to employ a rough illustration—the effect on chastity of a state of things in which a woman who had lost her virtue, but afterwards began to live well, should stand as high in the popular estimation as a woman who had always lived purely, we may get an idea from it of the probable effect on truthfulness, honesty, and justice of a state of things in which penitent thieves and liars and defrauders will count for as much as those who never stole, lied, or cheated. In short, the number of hopeless cases of vice will be greatly diminished, but the number of brilliant examples of virtue may also be diminished; and even those who shrink least from the future, and have the most confidence in the fortunes of the race, must confess that these were after all God's noblest works, and those of its glories of which humanity can worst bear to be shorn.

ENGLAND.

LONDON, June 25, 1869.

THE House of Lords, as I ventured to anticipate, has passed the second reading of the Irish Church Bill, to the satisfaction of moderate men and the disappointment of extreme parties. It is difficult to say whether its rejection was most ardently desired by those who fancied that the decision of the country might be reversed, or by those who wanted to see a collision between the Lords and the country, with a view to the possible consequence of some decided change in the constitution of the former. For my part, I rejoice with many people in the event, for the simple reason, which I have frequently expressed, that time enough has been already wasted on a measure which, though important, is not of the most vital importance, and has occupied too much attention. We are soon to be relieved of a nightmare which has been weighing on our spirits for two years. Moreover, had the measure been rejected, I cannot think that it would have led to more than a good deal of bluster on both sides, and a final giving way with some loss of prestige, of the House of Lords.

The debate demands some notice, though I am not about to follow the arguments alleged for the hundredth time. It was remarkable for the talent displayed on both sides; and the observation has been made that the Upper House, in spite of all that has been said against it, can yet deal with a great question worthily, and can make a better show of eloquence than its rival. The discussion of so threadbare a topic was a great trial; yet the Lords succeeded in investing it with a new interest, and once more reviving a controversy which seemed to have died into hopeless languor. The bishops won some of the chief successes. The two foremost were the Bishop of St. David's (Dr. Thirlwall) and the Bishop of Peterborough (Dr. Magee). Dr. Thirlwall is almost the only representative on the bench of a variety of ecclesiastic which was common in earlier years. A thorough scholar, an eminent historian, and a man of conspicuously vigorous and liberal understanding, he is almost alone among his brethren. We no longer make bishops of such material. The bench is generally ascended by good parish clergymen with a genius for respectability and an instinct which guides them safely through the various shoals of heresy on the right hand and on the left. They are good men of business, excellent parish priests, of most unimpeachable morality; but not calculated to take a prominent part in the intellectual contests of the day. Dr. Thirlwall is, I fear, almost the last representative of an older and manlier type; and he spoke with singular force in favor of the bill. The Archbishop of Canterbury, who is universally respected for his zeal and liberality, but by no means equally remarkable for intellectual power, was the only one of his brethren who voted on the same side. The Bishop of Peterborough, who is a recent appointment, gained immense applause by his speech in support of the Church. He has long been known as a popular preacher and a good speaker on platforms. His speech the other night raised him at once to a very high rank as a Parliamentary orator, and, though the argument was rather ingenious than profound, excited extraordinary enthusiasm. The galleries, forgetting the ordinary decorum of the House, burst into applause, and all subsequent speakers vied with each other in paying compliments to one of the most effective speeches of modern times. Many other speakers were worthy rivals of these ecclesiastical orators. The law-lords, especially Lord Cairns and the Chancellor, Lord Hatherley, spoke well and weightily. The regular party leaders were perhaps scarcely up to the mark. Lord Granville was plausible and conciliatory as ever, but a little afraid of his audience; Lord Derby shows that the fire for which he was once distinguished has begun to yield to age. The only telling part of a long and rather extreme speech, in which he even suggested that the Queen should interpose her veto, was a peroration referring to the approaching end of his political and probably of his natural life. An exaggerated expression of loyalty, to the effect that he had received favors from the Queen which deserved the devotion of his whole life, was not out of character nor ungraceful, though it would be very difficult to say what favors the Queen has bestowed which he could not have naturally demanded. However, one must not look too closely at the loyal sentiments of an aged peer. The Marquis of Salisbury raised his high reputation by one of the ablest speeches in the debate, which, indeed, went far to settle the question; when so staunch a Conservative declared that the verdict of the late elections must be accepted, it was evident that resistance was hopeless. It is needless to continue the catalogue of speakers; but, in addition to those I have mentioned, there were many able orators, and the general level of the debate was undoubtedly high—probably indeed much superior to that in the House of Commons.

If, however, any one should argue from their excellence as orators that the peers are likely to exercise a corresponding influence, he would be making a very rash inference. They have perhaps raised their reputation for talent, but not for power. The highest compliment we can pay them is to say that they have had enough common sense to know the practical limits of their authority. Indeed, when we look a little closer, it will not appear that a vote in the House of Peers is entitled to much respect, in spite of individual talents. It may be true that there are as many men of ability in the Upper as in the Lower House; but the ablest speakers in the recent debate, with two or three exceptions, were the bishops and the lawyers; that is to say, men whose seat in the House has been the reward of some kind of personal eminence. If the hereditary peers alone had spoken, there would not have been half-a-dozen orators deserving of notice. This, the debating excellence of the House, is the product of its least characteristic part—of the men who have only life-seats (the bishops) and of those who have won their entrance by the hard battle of professional life. This minority of distinguished members enables the House to make a creditable display on grand occasions, but it cannot atone for the fact that the great majority are men who have no other qualification for legislating than that of being their fathers' children. A legislative body cannot have much moral weight, however able some of its members may be, when we know that its decisions may be swayed by a mass of respectable game-preservers and landed proprietors, who often do not enter its doors once in a session. A stupid member in the Commons at least represents the opinions of a fraction of his fellow-countrymen; but a stupid peer represents nothing except himself. It is plain that the main weight of a body with no constituencies at its back must come from its claims to the possession of superior wisdom. Now, some peers may be wise, and many clever; but the mass are as stupid as the House of Commons, much less devoted to business, and with no body of public opinion behind them. Consequently, they go to the wall, and find, every time they suffer that process, that their importance has been sensibly diminished.

Mr. Bright has got into trouble by expressing these sentiments with a frankness more characteristic of his own temperament than of his ministerial position. He wrote a letter, stating very distinctly that if the peers did not give way, some very unpleasant consequences might follow. This was understood to amount to a threat that if the peers did not disestablish the Church they might have to look after their estates—a new land-law might be still more awkward than a law directed only against the Church. The letter was imprudent; and especially imprudent because it was obviously true. The peers could not but take it as a threat, and, so long as they possess the privileges of an independent chamber, they could not but resent threats. Therefore, I wish he had kept it in his desk or put it into the fire. The only defence has come from the Spectator, which has a love of sentimental paradoxes, and declares that no one but a flunkey could object to the letter. No one but a flunkey, it is true, could deny the truth of its opinions; but there are times and seasons to be observed even in expressing truth. Nothing, at any rate, could be less desirable than to rouse unnecessarily a spirit of opposition in the Lords, just as they were beginning to eat their leek quietly and comfortably; a man should be allowed to perform that process, when he has set about it, with as little disturbance as may be; he need not be unnecessarily reminded that if he does not eat it, he shall be made to eat it, and perhaps have something else into the bargain. Mr. Bright, however, will not lose much by his frankness; for, after all, it is pleasant to see that he is in no present danger of being muzzled by his tenure of office.

One good bill has managed to get through the House of Commons this session, and is destined to become law. Mr. Forster has succeeded in passing a fragment of a bill on endowed schools. The object of the measure, as originally devised, was to establish something like a system of secondary education. The grammar-schools of the country possess very large sums, which have been grossly wasted, owing to the want of any superintending power. There are numbers of schools which have ceased to correspond to the changed requirements of the country, and not a few in which the funds have been systematically jobbed. It was proposed, in the first place, to overhaul the existing endowments, to provide new regulations, and to do away with the innumerable abuses which have grown up; and, in the next place, to appoint a central board, which should hold examinations, and inspect the endowed schools and any others which might be willing to come under the regulations. The first proposal, in spite of some private opposition, has been carried with general applause. The other is beset by some of the characteristic difficulties which hinder so many much-needed reforms. The cry was immediately raised of centralization, and it was declared, very absurdly, that Mr. Forster wished to drill all our schools on a uniform system, so that, as in France, every boy in England might be doing the same lessons at the same hours. I regret to say that this cry is still so strong that a most moderate scheme of school-inspection seems to have a doubtful chance of adoption. Meanwhile, the great schools, such as Eton and Harrow, had been exempted from its proposed operation, lest their opposition should be too powerful. The other schools have objected to come in so long as this distinction was made, and these schools thought themselves much too perfect to need any interference. The matter is therefore pretty much at a stand-still; but I hope and believe that something will be done before long not only to get rid of outstanding abuses, but to provide something like a decent system in future. The fragment of the bill which has been passed is perhaps the most useful result likely to be got out of the session.

RIGHT AND WRONG IN ITALY.

LEGHORN, June 10.

IT is precisely twenty years since the Austrians, under General Crenneville, took possession of Leghorn, in the name of the Grand Duke of Tuscany, who, like the Pope, had fled to Gaeta. To be ruled by an Austrian proconsul in those days was perhaps the hardest fate that could befall an Italian town; and even those who had grown tired of the political extravagances of the Tuscan democrats could feel no relief in such a change. For Austrian rule was an iron rule; or, to use a truer metaphor, a leaden and hempen rule. Shooting and whipping for the resisting, imprisonment for the suspected, espionage and vexation for all. And as, in passing judgment, the Austrians relied like women on their intuitive powers, they often dispensed with the tedious preliminaries of a trial, and their hand struck, like the hand of fate, the guilty and the innocent. Moreover, who could help being guilty, when cowards and traitors alone were thought innocent?

It is needless to dwell on the changes that have taken place since those memorable days. Austria has become a free country; is shaking her fist at the Pope, and has fraternized with Italy. Emperor and King have exchanged decorations and special missions. General Möring has been lionized at Florence; and, if no "offensive" alliance has been concluded as yet, there can be no doubt about the entente cordiale, which is an established fact. Now, then, is the time for seeing the old places again, thought old Crenneville, and started on a tour through the Peninsula, which, of course, he could not leave without having had a peep at the place where he once was king, and more than king.

And why should he not? Unless he carries about Vienna sausages in his portmanteau, he may freely pass even the gates of Leghorn. Those useful documents, where the length of one's nose and the color of one's beard were registered, and on which the General himself must have shed much ink in his palmy days, have long since become relics of the past; and, except in Rome, Russia, and Bavaria, no gatekeeper seems to care nowadays for the traveller's name and rank and personal appearance, or even for his religion or the "Zweck seiner Reise." So the old General—disguised, of course, in a simple civilian's suit—made his entry into the town. Perhaps his paternal heart rejoiced at finding that, notwithstanding some outward changes in the aspect of the streets, the grinding tooth of time had left so much unchanged in the manners and habits of the people. There were the same slovenly women as of yore—unkempt, unwashed, and unshod—still sweeping the filthy streets with their majestic cotton trains, and making the air resound with the wild clatter of their wooden slippers. And their dolci accenti, successfully vieing with the yells of numberless children, have lost nothing yet of that vocal energy which seems to be the summit and the sum of all Italian energies. Some of the cafés, however, are new to the General (and an Austrian has a keen eye for cafés); so he steps in, and, putting on his eyeglass, looks enquiringly around, perhaps inwardly enjoying the advantages of his incognito. But, alas! some memories are long. Somebody has recognized that German face among so many Jews and Greeks and Italians. It may have been the son or brother or friend of one of those whose death-warrant the Austrian signed in 1849. Or, it is possible that somebody else, while sipping his coffee in that same room, felt the wounds on his back smart again—wounds inflicted by the same hand twenty years ago. Certain it is that, from that moment, the General's movements were watched from morning till night, and his incognito was at an end.

I think Count Crenneville never did at Leghorn what Haynau and Radetzky did in Milan—he never inflicted corporal punishment upon women; but it is well known that he did not spare the backs of the Leghorn men, not knowing or not duly considering that of all punishments this is the one which an Italian will not brook. You may flourish your knife or point your revolver at an Italian with some chance of success; but if you give him a blow or a slap he will "bite his thumb" at you, like Rigoletto, and go home to whet his poniard. I am at a loss to explain this; not because the trait itself, taken in the abstract, requires any explanation, but because this trait is found among the essential features of the Italian character, which is not conspicuous for pride or manliness, or even for that parody of manliness called chivalry.

The increased frequency of duels lately observed goes far to show that the natural character of the Italians is, like everything else in the Peninsula, undergoing certain changes, and it would be false philosophy to deny that, in history, change means progress, and that duelling is a vast improvement on the time-honored use of the dagger and the poisoned ring. But I feel convinced that most of these Italian duels are due to a certain youthful love of éclat, or, more frequently still, to a want of moral courage and an undue regard for public opinion. The incidental circumstance that the nucleus of the Italian army was Piedmontese, that, like Garibaldi's volunteers, it represented a political party, accounts for most of the duels fought in Italy since '59. But this is accidental and transient, and I venture to predict that the duel will never take root in Italy. The Italians are too vindictive to find gratification in the tardy and subdued excitement of a duel, and too shrewd to stultify themselves with the belief that its uncertain issues could ever afford any satisfaction to the injured party. When the now habitual contempt for law and for authority has died out (which it must in a generation), the lawyer's nature which lies dormant in every Italian will come out in full force, and offended honor may then learn to seek and to find satisfaction in the courts of justice. That mediæval aristocratic pride which invented the so-called code of honor can never have been a characteristic feature of the Italian character. You seldom hear the word pride in Italian conversation, and the "onore" of the lower classes seems to come nearest to the "honor" of the helots of Lacedæmon. It is not easy, therefore, to account for the maddening effect of a blow on such a people, and we are forced to admit here the existence of a real national idiosyncrasy, which, like all idiosyncrasies, should be treated by everybody with judicious consideration.

But what did an Austrian general of 1849 know or care about Italian idiosyncrasies? Like a Russian drill-sergeant who distributes the band instruments among the recruits, fixing the precise date on which the son of the steppe must have learned to play the clarionet or the cornet, the Austrian martinet dealt out his Teutonic penalties among a race which may, in truth, be called a race of spoilt children, unused to any discipline or chastisement, though sorely standing in need of both. He did it at his own risk. He sowed sticks and reaped daggers. The soil on which such a crop grows must indeed be black, and the atmosphere that can preserve it unwithered for twenty years must be ungenial and cold, like the air of catacombs. Yet these things are, and it is no bravery to act as if they were not. The General was duly warned by the authorities of the danger to which a prolonged stay in Leghorn would expose him. He continued, however, to show himself in the streets and in the cafés for several days, and at last left only for Pisa, possibly from sheer regard for the Leghorn authorities, who had taken the trouble of appointing an invisible body-guard of detectives for the General's protection. But what of that, poor Crenneville? You may find it easy to elude the Italian police, but you cannot elude that man with the sore back who has been dogging you all these days; for he can afford a journey to Pisa as well as you.

In a day or two Count Crenneville came back to embark for Genoa. M. Ingherami, the Austrian Consul-General—an old, venerable man, who is said to have had no enemies in Leghorn—accompanied his countryman to the landing-place. There the assassin struck his intended victim, who fell to the ground bleeding and fainting, though not dead; and the Consul, while stooping over him, received four stabs, levelled by no means hastily at different parts of his body. The General escaped with a slight though disfiguring wound. The Consul died in a few minutes. The murderer, it is needless to say, was not caught.

Now all this is perhaps very stale news on your side of the Atlantic, even though it may not have been deemed worthy of the honors of the Cable. The facts are, at first sight, of no extraordinary interest. Nor have they any political bearings, and will no doubt, in the present state of international relations, lead to nothing but official condolences and promises and renewed assurances of good-will. But to the psychologist, or to the student of national character, this case, with all its concomitant circumstances, cannot fail to be interesting. The papers say that a few days after this event several persons were arrested. Whether they had anything to do with the bloody deed, or whether they are to act as international scapegoats for a few months, I know not. It is averred, however, that the murderer is among them, and that he is one of those who, twenty years ago, were made to feel the rod of the Austrian provost-general. If my ideas on the Italian idiosyncrasy of aversion to corporal punishment are correct, the intended vendetta in this case is accounted for and psychologically intelligible. But what could have prompted the murderer, who must have thought his victim dead, to stab deliberately an innocent old man, whom he knew to be there in his official quality as Austrian consul, I am quite unable to guess. All I can conclude is, that this man must have deserved the whipping which he received in 1849, and that his parents probably never gave him half his due when the brute in him was still a toothless and clawless cub.

Highly characteristic for Italy is the way in which such events are viewed and spoken of by the public and by the press. There is, of course, no lack of indignation and sincere regret, but it is often expressed in such a canting manner, and in the form of such trivial truisms, that it produces on the foreign hearer or reader not seldom a ludicrous effect. When, last autumn, murders were committed at Ravenna at the rate of one or two a week, the citizens of Ravenna had a long and eloquent protest published in the papers, lest they might be thought so many abettors and accomplices. Qui s'excuse, s'accuse. Probably they never heard of the California vigilance committees and their silent doings. The Leghorn people, too, have "protested," though I can hardly make out against what or whom.

Nevertheless, there was on this occasion an ill-concealed and perhaps not altogether unjustifiable disposition on the part of the press to give prominence to the extenuating circumstances of the case. Particularly amusing was the disguised pleading of the Nazione, an ably-managed and respectable paper. "When General Haynau" (so the article began) "was assailed and maltreated by the workmen of a London brewery, a general feeling of indignation prevailed throughout Europe." "How much greater" (the writer went on to say) "must our indignation be on this occasion!" I should think so. But if the writer wished to insinuate that Italy was, after all, not the only country where the Austrian heroes of 1849 cannot travel with safety, his rhetorical trick cannot have misled many readers. I am at a loss to find a tertium comparationis between the two cases. Haynau was a whipper of women; Crenneville was not. Haynau was whipped; Crenneville was stabbed. The London brewers administered their paternal chastisement in broad daylight; the Italian wreaked his vengeance in the dusky twilight of a rainy evening. The sturdy brewers committed a rough act of poetic justice for wrongs done to others; while the Italian only thought of himself, and, apparently having tasted blood, became altogether a brute, not knowing where to stop. Perfect confusion of ideas and perverseness of sentiment would alone enable one to detect any similarity in the two cases, except, of course, the fact that both victims were Austrian generals. Nor is the Nazione right in saying that Haynau's fate excited anything like general indignation in Europe. "Served him right!" would be a far more accurate expression of the then prevailing sentiment; and the writer knows this too.

But if such looseness of thought and sentiment may be found among the best of the land, what can you expect of the lower and lowest orders in Italy? It may be fairly doubted whether those seventeen millions of citizens who can neither read nor write, but only vote (though they won't do even that), have any tolerably clear idea—not of what is right and wrong (for that is often a puzzling question), but what the words "right" and "wrong" mean. It is painful to have to make such a remark; but it is more painful still to see the incredible perversity and the vitiated instincts of this undoubtedly gifted people. The only rule which seems to guide an Italian mob in deciding which party is right and which is wrong—that is to say, which party is to be applauded and protected, and which to be hooted and bullied—is simply this: The prosecuting party, especially when an authority, is always in the wrong; the defendant, especially when a transgressor of a police law, is always in the right. For instance, a woman wishes to smuggle some salt meat through the San Miniato gate of Florence. The meat is ill-concealed under her clothes. The excise officials catch and detain her; whereupon the woman begins to scream so frightfully that a large crowd gathers quickly around the gate. The merits of the case are quite clear. King Mob disposes summarily that the woman must be set at liberty, and the loyal officials, for the sake of peace, obey at once. But this act of complaisance does not suffice to calm the multitude, whose moral sense had been outraged by the arrest of the smuggler. The crowd increases, and, for strategical reason best known to themselves, they begin a regular siege. The frightened officials take refuge in the tower which crowns the gateway, and, having waited there for half an hour in the natural but vain hope of being released by the police, they at last resolved on firing a couple of blank pistol-shots high up into the blue air, which had the remarkable effect of dispersing the besieging multitude in less than a minute. Still, the crowd had had their will, and the piece of salt pork was on the wrong side of the city wall.

It is the same in cases of real crime. The sympathies of the Italian populace are with the murderer because he is, in their eyes, the victim of the authorities. One exception I remember, and it is but fair that I should mention it here. When a respectable tradesman in Florence had killed his neighbor (about three months ago) the populace actually hooted and hissed him even at the moment of his arrest. But then, the prisoner had killed the lover of his wife; and is not that a crime too?

Correspondence.

WHY THE CIVIL SERVICE HAS RUN DOWN.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Your thoughtful article in this week's Nation on "The Wages in the Public Service" errs in saying that "the Comptroller therefore now gets $3,600" by the addition of twenty per cent. to his salary. That per centum ceased with the year that gave it birth; the law expired by its own limitation at the end of the fiscal year. The Comptroller now receives nominally $3,000, the same salary his predecessor received in 1790; but he really gets but $2,900, as Government retains five per cent. tax on the excess of all salaries over $1,000.

Two causes have operated to deteriorate the Civil Service since 1860. The first is the large employment of soldiers. There is no connection between the bravery of the field and clerical ability. The qualities that compose the latter are antagonistic to those that form the other. The second is the low wages. The average pay of a Washington clerk is $1,450, from which the tax must be deducted; and that in a city where the expenses of living are higher than in any city on the American continent. It is impossible for a clerk to maintain a family decently on that sum. The bricklayers of this city, whose social expenses are much lower than the clerks', receive $4 50 and $5 per diem, or as high, or higher, wages than the clerk. The effect of this low class of wages is twofold. Private business tempts the best clerks away by higher pay; the poorest, who are unable to earn as much out of office, all remain. And most existing vacancies are filled up by unmarried young men completing their studies. The law and medical classes of Columbia College, Georgetown College, and Howard University are mainly composed of clerks who are paying their way while completing their education. Contemplating only a two or three years' residence here, they do not have that interest in their occupation that those do who take it as their life-work. W. R. H.

Washington, July 10, 1869.

Notes.

LITERARY.

The occasion of dedicating a monument to his memory gave the friends of the late Fitz-Greene Halleck an opportunity to testify their admiration for his genius—for he had genius—their respect for his fine character, and their affection for him as a friend. The ceremonies were simple. A poem written by Dr. O. W. Holmes was read by General James Grant Wilson, for many years an attached friend of the poet, and recently his biographer; then an address was delivered by Mr. Bayard Taylor, who also was one of Halleck's familiar acquaintances. Mr. Taylor began by declaring that he for his part rejected the claim that we have an equal share with the English in Chaucer and Shakespeare; they belong to our language, but not to us as a people. The literal fact is, no doubt, that they are poets neither foreign to us nor domestic, but between the two; and it is only as a nation and not as "a people" that we can be said to have no property in them. Mr. Taylor went on to show how it is that America could not be expected to produce a poet during her first struggle with the severe duties of clearing the wilderness, and spoke of the nearly simultaneous rise of Dana, Halleck, and Bryant more than a century after the country was possessed by white men. Of these three earliest of American poets who were poets in fact as well as in name, Halleck was the first to die; it was peculiarly fitting, then, that a monument should be raised to his memory. Mr. Taylor then proceeded to a vindication of the office of the poet; spoke happily of Mr. Bryant and Mr. Dana, and happily, also, of Halleck, though without any parade of accurate criticism; and so closed an address which was, perhaps, a little too fine in places, but was nevertheless successful. A hymn having been sung at the end of the oration, the company dispersed. The monument is an obelisk of white granite, about seventeen feet high, standing on a pedestal on which is inscribed the poet's own words: "One of the few, the immortal names that were not born to die." On the front of the shaft is his name, the dates which tell the years of his birth and death—"1790—1867"—a laurel leaf, and the letters Alpha and Omega; and on the other sides of it respectively are a harp and lighted torches, the names of his parents, and the name of a brother who died in infancy. Thus the monument to his honor as a poet may be said to commemorate also the family affection which was a marked trait in his character. His only sister, whose name is familiar to the reader of Halleck's correspondence, survives him, and is eighty years old.

—By a mistake of the proof-reader we were made to say in the last Nation, speaking of the Citizen, that the merging of the Round Table in it would not give a tincture of literature to its politics. The sentence should have read, "Doubtless the merging of the Round Table in it will now give a tincture of literature to its politics."

—The authorities of the Boston Public Library are trying to make a collection of all that was anywhere printed in relation to the recent Jubilee. They want everything—book, newspaper, broadside, pamphlet, engraving, music, what not—and will, without blenching, preserve the most dastardly of the attacks that were made upon the festival and the city by foreign detractors, and also the defences and rebukes which were put forth by the local press. Melancholy it was to some devoted friends of Boston to hear the querulousness of the town which they had never before doubted was the Hub of the universe and not "provincial" at all. But to the shaming of local posterity, all these expostulatory utterances are to be preserved for ever. The authorities of the Library also inform librarians that a certain circular, containing thirty questions relative to library economy and experience, which they sent to libraries in this country and Europe, remains unanswered by seventy of the American institutions to which it was addressed. It is to be hoped, says the notice to which we are indebted for our information, that all libraries interested in tabulating information which will be published for the benefit of all, may be willing to assist in collecting it. And no library is so small that its statistics are not of some value—if to no one else, to those who are managing similar institutions, and to those who contemplate providing some such, and wish to know exactly what it is best to do.

—The Long Island Historical Society—an active and enterprising body, by the way, which puts to shame some older historical societies that could be mentioned—has issued a circular, in which it calls attention to the fact that it has received a communication from the committee of the "Palestine Exploring Fund" of London, which requests that a society with the exploration of the Holy Land for its object should be formed in this country. The English society is not yet rich enough to do anything like the work which needs to be done, and wants assistance. All the region beyond Jordan, and Phœnicia also, are imperfectly known to the student world, and still, says Mr. Emmanuel Deutsch, have additions to make to our knowledge of the Hebrews, Phœnicians, and other Semitic peoples. Then, too, the fauna and flora of the country, its geology, the surveys for maps, and the identification of sacred cities, all invite attention. To this part of the proposed work, however little they might be interested in the more scholarly part of it, our American congregations might very likely feel disposed to give one sermon a year, we should say, and one Sunday's "collection," and it would be well if those who wish to see a society formed were to call the attention of the religious world to the matter. Meantime, till a society of some kind shall be in existence, Mr. George Hannah, Librarian of the L. I. Historical Society, consents to forward to the London committee any American contributions that may be made. Lieutenant Warren, at work in Jerusalem, ought to have at once a force of laborers ten times greater than he has been employing, but instead of that he has recently been compelled to dismiss half his people.

—A clearer case of the veteran lagging superfluous on the stage was never afforded than in the existence for the last few years of the National Intelligencer—once, and not long ago, a name that had almost as much of the solidly venerable about it as a full-bound volume of Statutes at Large. Many a Whig child grew up to youth, twenty and thirty years ago, with an unexpressed, vague feeling that, failing Congress and the President, the National Intelligencer could carry on the Government alone, and would be able to make it a successful copy of the best features of the Spartan and Athenian and Roman commonwealths, of which it used to tell us in its own dignified, weighty, and statesmanlike, not to say fearfully stupid, periods. Founded in 1800 as a weekly paper to support Jeffersonianism, it at once became an "organ," and an organ it remained to the end of its days—never being of any value as a newspaper, but speaking with potential voice the texts on which party orators enlarged from the stump and party editors from the sanctum, giving cues to caucuses, publishing the "efforts" of the "most distinguished men of our country," giving us the President's messages, and, generally, being ponderously political after the fashion of the old times. It was in 1807, if we are not mistaken, that it became a daily paper; and it was not till 1824, after the days of Madison and Monroe, that it became definitely Whig, following the fortunes of Henry Clay, and doing not a little to make them so far as they were made; for there is no doubt that in those days the political essays that we should find unendurable were a power in the land. It was in Madison's time, by the way, that Admiral Cockburn assisted to sack and burn the Intelligencer office, being extremely angry with the journal because of its bitter attacks on him personally; it held him responsible for all the maraudings of the British sailors who used to come ashore in Chesapeake Bay. Mr. Gales—"Old Joe Gales"—and Mr. Seaton, his brother-in-law, co-proprietor and co-editor, were the managers of the paper from the beginning. It is told of the former to this day, and once it used to be told reverentially, that "on a certain occasion Daniel Webster pointed to Mr. Gales, and said, 'There is a man who knows more political history than any other man in this country;'" which was probably true, for he knew all The Founders; may very probably have chewed, smoked, snuffed, and drunk with every one of them who indulged himself in these particulars, and in one way or another he was a part of nearly all the political intriguing and combining that was done in the United States. The stories he might have told us are a great loss to the political history of the half-century before the war. Besides his intimate acquaintance with our politics and politicians, it is no doubt true that he was a writer of ability, and that he made his paper good of its kind. But, by and-by, the Democratic party got itself pretty firmly fastened into the places of power; the editors began to get old, the old times began to fade away; there seemed to be a time coming when the world would not be parcelled out precisely into Whig and Democrat, and the Intelligencer began to languish and decay. By the time Mr. Buchanan was installed, the Whig child above-mentioned may very likely have known the name of his National Intelligencer better as a familiar means of testing the sobriety of drinkers than in any other way. For the last eight years, during which it has been in the hands of Mr. Coyle, it has been slowly dying—without influence and without anybody's respect, though it had the good offices of Mr. Johnson and Mr. Seward. It was hopelessly out of joint with the times, and no one will regret it unless the Oldest Resident of Washington, and the gentlemen in the Courier office in Boston, and here and there an old Southern Whig who still hates a Democrat in a way which proves that we are not all of us humanitarianized into milk and water.

—Of late English books in Theology, none is at once of general interest and of marked ability. "The Gospel in the Law," by Mr. Charles Taylor, is "a critical examination of the citations from the Old Testament in the New." The Hulsean (Cambridge) Lectures for 1868, the work of J. G. Stewart Perowne, are now published in book form, under the title "Immortality." "The Corean Martyrs" is the title of a book which records the lives, works, and sufferings, among the fiercest of the Chinese heathen, of nine French Roman Catholic missionary priests who, with some of their disciples, were murdered by the natives some three years ago. The second series of Mr. G. S. Bowes's "Illustrative Gatherings" has reached a second edition. It is described as a commonplace-book made up from the works of serious and religious writers. Such books are best when made by one's self; and it is a pity that the manual labor of writing is so great that most people depend for them upon printed works like this of Mr. Bowes's, which, however good they may be, want the vitality of interest which belongs to one's own selections. This same matter of the manual labor of writing as a hindrance to the progress of civilization, has not had sufficient consideration, or some sort of a machine might have been devised, one would suppose, to relieve us of the burden. Perhaps—to leave Theology, which this month offers us nothing more than we have mentioned—we may find that a Mr. Murdo Young is the benefactor for whom we have been wishing; among the works to be classed as Miscellaneous we notice a book of which he is the author, and of which the title-page runs as follows: "Readable Short-hand Self-Taught: being a System by which People can teach themselves to write the longest word without lifting the pen, read what they write, and correspond with friends at home or abroad, on pleasure or business: it embraces a double set of Vowels, with liquid Consonants grafted on the other letters, together with a Diagram of Dots and a Combination of Words in most familiar use into Ready Sentences: the whole forming a system of Readable Short-hand Shortened." To teach one's self "to write the longest word without lifting the pen," does not seem to be very much, to be sure; and for people to be able "to read what they write" seems not very much more; still the book may probably be worth attention. It is a little two-and-sixpenny duodecimo. Other miscellaneous books are these: Mr. Elihu Burritt's "Lectures and Speeches"—a volume containing many of the works of that gentleman since 1869. We are pleased, by the way, to see that there is to be a new and complete edition of Mr. Burritt's books, which are all pleasant, in virtue of their author's good qualities of character. And, by the way again, it was not very agreeable news which came a week or two since, and informed us that Mr. Burritt had been removed from the consulship which he has held for so many years, and—if we may say so, without having personal knowledge of the facts—which he filled in a satisfactory manner. Messrs. W. Gartin & Co. publish a volume of reports on the patent nekrozoic process of embalming—if embalming is the word to apply to a process which consists in merely washing over the tissues which it is desired to preserve. The reports represent the antiseptic liquid as being very efficacious, and we believe they could hardly err on the side of too great positiveness in this respect; it was last summer, if we recollect, when some of our American surgeons tested the process severely, and pronounced it perfect. The New Jersey editors who are interested in the question of reclaiming the better part of that State from the ocean, may perhaps find matter for reflection in the "History of the Fens of South Lincolnshire," by Mr. W. H. Wheeler. Jewellers and engravers would doubtless profit by reading Mr. D. E. Berri's "Monograms, Historical and Practical," and other decorative artists and artisans may get something of good from Eastlake's "Hints on Household Taste." Mr. Banting's "Letter on Corpulence"—which became famous in England at a rate that was a little surprising to us emaciated, atrophied Americans—has gone into a fourth edition—very large editions, too, some of them have been—with prefatory remarks, and a number of letters from grateful correspondents whom the author induced to "bant," and who found much benefit in so doing. One lady, we are informed, is "full of gratitude and thanks because she has lost a double chin" by following out the alderman's judicious dietary system.

—In English Fiction there is nothing very noticeable. Mr. W. Ralston, our novel-readers will be glad to hear, has translated "'Liza" from the Russian of Ivan Turgeneff; and there is a new book for children which merits mention among the books for the elders, because it contains illustrations by Oscar Pletsch, whose children are always excellent. Mr. Bracebridge Hemyng is said to have made a success hardly to have been expected in his novel of "The Favorite Scratched; or, The Spider and the Fly"—a story that will please the lovers of "Guy Livingstone" and the like. In History and Biography we have Mr. H. R. Fox Bourne's and the Earl of Dundonald's life of Cochrane, the celebrated seaman who was tenth Earl of Dundonald; Max Müller's translation and explanation of the "Rig Veda Sanhita;" and the long-promised diary of "Henry Crabb Robinson," which, no doubt, will turn out to be a mine of biography approaching in interest the Life of Landor, which has just been republished here by Fields, Osgood & Co., as also this diary will be. Mr. G. Pascoe Hill, who seems to be a naval chaplain, has written a Life of Napoleon III., which is said to be good enough in passages where it deals with such events of the Emperor's life as are known to everybody, and poor enough when it deals with what it finds—and leaves—obscure. It is laudatory. Of books of Poetry we have one or two of interest. Mr. Matthew Arnold, whose poetical works command rather more attention now than ever before, has been revising—and injuring, it is said—the volumes of his which had previously appeared; and now his complete works may be had in a two-volume duodecimo edition. Mr. Austin's satirical poem entitled "The Season"—a sharp attack on the follies and vices of London society, in the manner, now perhaps too much disused, of the days of Pope—is put forth in a new edition. It has been for some years out of print, and is the work of a clever man who does less in literature than his early success and his abilities had led his friends to expect. Mr. Longfellow's poetical works are published by Mr. Moxon in a two-volume edition, with a prefatory essay by Mr. Buchanan, who kindly admits his protégé to be something of a poet. However, the conjunction is not so bad as Mr. Swinburne on Coleridge, which we are soon to have—a "Coleridge" that it will be a painful thing to own, as it is to own the "Blake" which Swinburne edited for purposes of his own. The critic of the London Times, by the way—Mr. Dallas, we believe it is—talks about Mr. Swinburne, we see, as one of the great poets of the age. Messrs. Macmillan & Co. have just issued their three-and-sixpenny "Globe" edition of "Pope's Complete Poetical Works," which is spoken of as the best "Pope" ever published, as well as one of the cheapest. It has good notes by various hands, and Mr. Adolphus William Ward's onslaught on the poet and his school—an attack that perhaps more needs to be made in England than in this country, and perhaps hardly much needs to be made anywhere now. "Kathrina, her Life and Mine," by Dr. J. G. Holland, is republished in England by Messrs. Sampson Low, Son & Marston; and we shall probably soon be hearing something more about American literature from the Saturday Review. "Bitter-Sweet," strange to say, has never, it appears, been published in England, though it has gone through thirty-odd editions here, and may probably go through some more.

—In our review of Mr. Baldwin's "Pre-Historic Nations," we mentioned the following Phœnician and Carthaginian names as Semitic: Asdrubal, Byrsa, Cabiri, Cadmus, Carthage, Cirta, Gades, Hamilcar, Hannibal, Laish, Melcarth, Sidon, "Sydyk the Just," Tyre, Zama. The Worcester Spy doubts the soundness of our view; and as that paper is edited by a writer of merit, we make good our assertion by the citation of leading authorities. It is true, that to tell a tribunal of Orientalists that Hannibal or Carthage, for instance, are Semitic words—the one meaning "Favor (or Favored) of Baal," and the other "New City," would be like telling Indo-European linguists that Gotthold, Gottlieb, and Godfrey are names of Teutonic origin; that John, Jan, Jean, Juan, Johann, and Johannes are modified forms of the Hebrew Johanan—"Favor (or Favored) of Jehovah;" that Neuburg, Neuenburg, Nyborg, and Newburgh are of common derivation and meaning; or that Naples, Napoli, and Nablous are derived from the Greek Neapolis, which means "New City." But as only a small portion of our readers may be presumed to be familiar with Semitic languages and antiquities, and some might be inclined to regard as Greek whatever presents itself to them in a Greek garb, we shall escape the reproach of proving what is universally known. As regards our authorities, we suppose no competent judge would object to our choice. In reality, Gesenius's "Phœniciæ Monumenta" alone ought perfectly to suffice, but we make use here and there of the more recent testimony of Kenrick, Renan, Smith, and Fürst. Want of space compels us to abridge our quotations, and the interest of the general reader to use the Latin letters instead of the Semitic. We omit none of the words mentioned in our review:

Asdrubal. Gesenius: "Evidently=Heb. Ezro-Baal, whose aid is Baal; compare the Hebrew names Azriel, Azaryah" (whose aid is God). Renan: "=Azriel and Azaryahu" (Azariah). Smith's Class. Dict. quotes Gesenius. Our readers will remember that the Hebrew Ezra, too, is changed into Esdras.

Byrsa. Renan: "Name of the citadel of Carthage = (Syriac) Birtho, fortress." Kenrick: "The name, which, from its resemblance to the Greek word for hide, gave rise to the story of Dido's purchase of as much land as a hide would cover, is Phœnician, and denotes a fortress." Smith: "A mere etymological legend arising from the Hellenized form of the Phœnician name." Compare the Aramaic Birtha (capitol or capital), applied in Ezra (vi. 2) to the acropolis, or possibly to the whole, of the capital of Media.

Cabiri. Gesenius: "=Heb. Kabbirim, the mighty, θεοι μεγαλοι, by which name they are often designated." Fürst: Kabbirim (in Sancho-niathon . . . Καβειροι), a name of the seven sons of Tzadik . . . . in Phœnician mythology."

CADMUS. Gesenius: "A Phœnician of fabulous antiquity . . . Compare Heb. Kedem, meaning both East and ancient time." Compare also the Chaldee kadmay, eastern, and the name of the Cadmonites, a people "of Phœnician race" (Fürst), who, like the Beney Kedem, seem to have been renowned for their genius, for even David quoted a "proverb of the Cadmonite" (meshal hakkadmoni, falsely translated, "proverb of the ancients," 1 Sam. xxiv. 14).

CARTHAGE. Gesenius: "More ancient form, according to Solinus and Stephanus of Byzantium, Carthada, or New City." He compares the KRTHDST of the coins of ancient Panormus, which Fürst, s. v. Kereth (Heb., city) reads "Kereth Hadesheth (New Town, Neapolis), Carth-ada(s), an old name for Carthage." Kenrick: "New City." Smith: "New City . . . This etymology is confirmed by Solinus, who says: Istam urbem Carthadam Elissa dixit, quod Phœnicum ore exprimit Civitatem Novam."

CIRTA. Fürst: "= Kereth" (Heb., town). See his interesting comparisons.

GADES. Gesenius, Kenrick, Fürst: "Originally Gadir = Heb. Gader, enclosure."

HAMILCAR. This name is generally brought in connection with that of Melcarth, the Phœnician divinity; but it strikes us it would more naturally be derived from the Semitic hamal, to be tender, to pity, to spare, and kar, sheep; according to which the compound would signify "Fond of sheep," or "Merciful to sheep." By a remarkable coincidence the two words occur in the same connection in the Hebrew narrative of Saul's sparing the sheep and other live booty taken from the Amalekites (1 Sam. xv. 9). As one of the historical Hamilcars was the son, and another the father, of a Mago, the famous agricultural writings of the unknown Mago may perhaps be taken as an evidence of a fondness for rural pursuits in the founders of the Carthaginian family or families that boasted of those names. The apparently kindred names of Bomilcar and Himilco, however, might possibly be used as an argument against our view.

HANNIBAL. Gesenius: "In inscriptions HNBAL (favor of Baal) comp. Heb. Haniel" (favor of God). Renan: "=Johanan." Smith quotes Gesenius.

LAISH. In Heb., Layish, lion. Gesenius: "Arabic and Chaldee, Layith." Fürst: "Name of an originally Sidonian colonial city. . . . Laish (Phœnician, Lesh, Lish), i. e., the lion, was sacred to Eshmûn (i. e., Æsculapius), denoting the principle of warmth and life. Eshmûn . . . was worshipped as Ασκληπιος λεοντοῦχος even in Ascalon."

MELCARTH. Gesenius: "The Hercules of the Phœnicians; in inscriptions and on coins, MLKRT, King of the city." "Heb., Melekh Kereth." Kenrick and Smith: "King of the city." Fürst, s. v. Kereth, city: "Μελικαρθος, i. e., Milkart (=Milkh-kart), the name of Hercules among the Phœnicians."

SIDON. Gesenius: "Heb., Tzidon, fishery." Renan: "=Tzidon, fishery." Fürst: "Phœnician, Tzidon." Sidon and Zidon are formed from Tzidon, as Sion and Zion are from the Hebrew Tziyyon. Compare also the following.

"SYDYK THE JUST." Renan: "Σνδνκ (δικαιος)=Tzaddik," in Heb., just. Fürst, s. v. Tzadok, "just," compares the forms Σνδνκ and Σεδεκ with Heb. tzedek, justice.

TYRE. In the O. T. Tzor. Gesenius, Renan, Fürst: "= Heb. tzur, rock."

ZAMA. Gesenius: "Original form in Ptolemy, Atzama, fortified" (Heb. atzam, to be strong).

A HINDU TRAVELLER IN INDIA.*

THE account of a Hindu tourist's journey through British India ought to possess something of the piquant interest belonging to a picture of the man by the lion. We have had a plenty of descriptions by British travellers, showing us the weaknesses and vices of the native population, and the immense benefits which accrue to it from submission to a foreign yoke; and even when they have contained confessions of a contrary kind, there has always been room to suspect the ingenuousness of the story told us. Here, now, is a work of another character—one which should enable us to see how the structure and working of Indian society appear when looked at through Hindu eyes.

But if such are the anticipations with which we open Bholonauth Chunder's volumes, we shall find ourselves in some measure disappointed. Its author is a very thoroughly Anglicized Hindu—a product of the European civilization which holds sway in Calcutta almost as in a European city. When we stumble upon "Neptune and Æolus" upon the very first page, and discover them to have been the deities who smiled upon the traveller's starting, our illusions fade, and we realize that we must not expect here anything really racy; the flavor of the soil is overpowered by what has been planted upon it. Our author is more a citizen of the world, and less a citizen of India, than we could wish. He speaks slightingly of Brahmans and Pandits; the poets he quotes most freely are Byron and Milton, Shakespeare and Scott; he refers to "the Redeemer" as if he were a Christian, and to the Deist, who "shall yet laugh at us all," as if a free-thinker. He writes English with much ease and correctness, although now and then betrayed by his striving after an idiomatic and familiar tone into inelegance or slang—blemishes which, along with an occasional inaccuracy of expression, have been very properly left unremoved by the English publishers, as constituting a part of the author's personality, and authenticating his work in its detail. His political sentiments are wholly English; he does not protest against, or even apparently deplore, the rule of the Westerner; his denunciation and detestation are reserved for the Moslem, whom the other came to dispossess. This is, indeed, a most natural state of mind for one who knows the past history of his country, and has freedom of judgment enough not to be prevented by the irksomeness of a present yoke from contrasting it with an earlier crushing oppression such as that which India suffered for centuries at the hands of the Prophet's followers. Yet Bholonauth's anti-Mohammedan zeal, we should add, does not forbid him to do justice to the brilliant and noble qualities of the great Mogul emperor Akbar. In matters, again, that concern the mutiny, his sympathy is with the foreigner; he regards it, not as a popular struggle for independence, but as a military revolt, which the old Mussulman dynasty endeavored to turn to its own advantage; and he laments the cruelties and excesses of the mutineers—none the less heartily, doubtless, because his countrymen of Bengal were almost equally obnoxious to them with the English.

By describing the spirit of the work and its author as different from what we might have expected, and could have wished, we have no thought of reflecting upon either. There is nothing ungenuine and nothing slavish about Bholonauth Chunder; he is just what the circumstances of his life have made him. And it is by no means uninteresting to see how capable the Hindu is of accepting and wearing, in its entirety, the civilization of Europe. If a prominent example, he is yet only an example of a pretty large class. The different Asiatic societies of India have other members besides him who investigate and write like Europeans—some of them like European scholars of a very high type; and who have received from all parts of the world tokens of recognition of their contributions to the knowledge which the West seeks to have of the East. By his choice of the subjects which he dwells most upon, and by the manner in which he illustrates them, our author shows himself a true student of the antiquities, the history, and the present condition of his country. No one who is interested in any side of Indian life, ancient or modern, will fail to draw a notable amount of information and entertainment from his pages. He presents us a lively picture of the Santhals—the aboriginal tribe whom Mr. Hunter has recently brought prominently into notice. The revival of Hindu learning, of which Nuddea was the seat, receives his attention, and he dwells upon the reforming activity there of Chaitanya in a manner which almost leads us to suppose him a sectary of that eminent saint and avatar. An instructive sketch is given of Benares, the headquarters of Hindu orthodoxy. At Agra, it is the magnificent architectural remains of the Mogul empire that form the chief attraction; Brindabun and its environs call forth a host of notices of the legendary history of Krishna, the latest accession to the Hindu Pantheon of a divinity of highest rank. Bholonauth Chunder accepts the repeatedly suggested theory of a powerful influence exerted by Christian ideas, mythical rather than moral, upon the development of the Krishna-worship—a theory which Weber has recently sustained in a learned essay before the Berlin Academy. For the traces of Buddhism in the land where it so long reigned triumphant, though now crushed and exiled, he is always upon the lookout. And Delhi, the remotest point of the traveller's wanderings, occupies him through nearly three-quarters of his second volume, with its old remains and newer wonders, with its most eventful history, the struggles for the mastery of all India which have taken place in or about it—the last of them, and the most desperate and heroic, being that which within a few years re-established British authority, and overthrew for ever the throne of the Great Mogul.

* "The Travels of a Hindoo to Various Parts of Bengal and Upper India. By Bholonauth Chunder, Member of the Asiatic Society of Bengal. With an Introduction by J. Talboys Wheeler." In 2 vols. London: N. Trübner & Co. New York: John Wiley & Son. Crown 8vo. 1869.

We cannot but praise the modesty with which our author keeps personal adventure in the background, and is always more intent upon what is about him than upon his own relation to it. We have read his work with real satisfaction throughout, and heartily commend it to the attention of all who love a good book, and seek from it instruction along with amusement.

TWO BOOKS ON THE ADIRONDACKS.*

It would be hard for the honest lover of woods and waters and forest sports to find a book concerning them which should not please him more than Mr. Murray's. And it would be harder for the person with tolerable taste in literature to find a book the tone of which would very much more displease him. "Loud" is the word that we might perhaps best apply to it; that usefully descriptive slang term is often applied to styles of dress and manner that are the spiritual equivalents, so to speak, of Mr. Murray's writing concerning himself and his shooting and eating and boating. The whole book is written in falsetto, as we may say; is screechy from the beginning to the end, and does not inspire confidence. Still it is not without its attraction. There is some vigor—overlaid as it is by exaggerated words, and fuller of Mr. Murray than of trout-fishing—in this description, which may be taken as a fair specimen of the better part of the book:

"I love the rifle, and I have looked along the sights and held the leaping blood back by an effort of will, steadying myself for a shot, when my veins fairly tingled with the exhilarating excitement of the moment; but if one should ask me what is my conception of pure physical happiness, I should assure him that the highest bodily beatitude I ever expect to reach is, on some future day, when the clear sun is occasionally veiled by clouds, to sit in a boat once more upon that little lake, with John at the paddle, and match again a Conroy rod against a three-pound trout. That's what I call happiness!

"Well, as I said, I struck; and, as we afterwards discovered, the huge salmon-hook was buried to the shank amid the nerves which lie at the root of a trout's tongue. Then came a fight for the mastery such as never before had I waged with anything that swims. Words should have life in them to depict the scene. Quick as a flash, before I had fairly recovered my balance, partially lost by the energy with which I struck, the trout started, and before I could get a pressure upon the line, not twenty yards were left on the reel. A quick stroke from John, and the boat shot one side—" and so forth. It goes on for three or four pages, and ends with these probable remarks from the guide, whom Mr. Murray, in the heat of the battle, observes gazing affectionately at the marvellous rod:

"These fly-rods are delicate things. Like women, they shouldn't be put to heavy work if you can help it; but they are able to bear a heavy strain if necessary. But with all I could do I thought it was gone once. I don't think I ever came so near breaking this paddle as on that last sweep. It made my flesh creep to hear the old rod creak. I really believe my own back would have snapped if it had parted."

The advice as to outfit which the author gives to persons who intend making a trip into the Adirondacks seems to be sensible and worth taking; and we should think that the effect of the book might be good as leading a good many people to forsake watering-places and "loafing," and try the shanty life of hemlock-bough beds, and trout and salt pork for breakfast, and long tramps and longer sleeps in perfectly sweet air. It would spoil the woods possibly; but it is a pity and it is a wonder that our counting-rooms and offices do not more entirely empty themselves into the Adirondacks every summer and fall. There is yet room, by the way—large room—for a good book on the Adirondack country; and in the interest of overworked American humanity, it is to be hoped that some one may speedily make it.

Mr. Street's work we opened first at an unfortunate page, and when we began at the beginning afterwards and read it through, we confess that it was with something like a prejudice against it. Yet, in spite of some very absurd passages, the book will be found to be, upon the whole, a good one. It is of some value as a guide-book—though the reader will do well to remember that Mr. Street habitually exaggerates the difficulties and terrors of the climbings and wanderings which he undertook—and is also of some value as a truthful description of the impression made by the mountainous part of the Adirondack country upon every beholder of its savage grandeur. The reader might be excused for shutting up "The Indian Pass" who should open it at any one of the numerous passages where Mount Marcy talks rhapsodically, in blank prose, to Wall-face, or Mount McIntyre, or some other mountain, with many "thees" and "thous," and "slaves" and "vassals"—in short, with much silliness, as it must be called for want of a word more civil and equally accurate. As bad as the rhapsodies are such things as this:

"Hark! a loud boom! Has the Iron Dam severed itself from the river, and taken to flying, like Loretto's Chapel, through the air? Why, no! it is only a bumble-bee! Boom-m-m-m-m! It will waken all the echoes in the village! Methinks this very butterfly, wavering along, hums in his smooth, velvet flight! Hark! a tremendous sound this time! a galloping—a rising dust! Halloo! what on earth is here! a charge of cavalry, or rather *calves*alry, from the hillside, through the openings between the houses, down the street of the village! The three calves have let themselves loose, and are charging with sabres, or rather tails, in air, full tilt upon us! How the trumpets, or, not to put too fine a point upon it, their ba-ba's sound! Mercy! what shall we do? But lo! an opposing charge by the colt solus, full gallop against the coming foe! The parties meet midway, the colt's heels flourishing like a couple of carbines. I am sorry to say the calves show the white feather, and their white tails at the same time, flourishing, in turn, a swift dozen of heels in ignoble flight up the street, towards Lake Henderson. And this reminds me—I must visit Lake Henderson."

But the love of wild nature which Mr. Street shows in his poetry, and the faculty for presenting its aspects with a somewhat confusing minuteness, but still not without vividness, he shows in this book, and, as we have said, its exactness of information makes it a good guide-book.

* "Adventures in the Wilderness; or, Camp-life in the Adirondacks. By William H. H. Murray." Boston: Fields, Osgood & Co. 1869. Pp. 236.
"The Indian Pass. By Alfred B. Street." New York: Hurd & Houghton. 1869. Pp. lviii., 201.

NEW TESTAMENT TRANSLATIONS.*

Noyes's "New Testament" and Folsom's "Four Gospels" are valuable contributions to American ecclesiastical literature. Both are works of competent scholars, both products of independent research, and both based on the text of Tischendorf—as far as published; in other respects, however, they differ materially. Noyes's translation presents itself to the public at large, Folsom's is elaborated for students. The chief aim of the former translator was "to make a version more free from wholly or nearly obsolete words and phrases, more intelligible," and "less encumbered with Greek and Hebrew idioms," though, at the same time, "more critically accurate, and on the whole even closer to the original, than that of King James's translators;" the chief aim of Mr. Folsom was to render and expound the text, in all its original distinctiveness, strictly, and as accurately as the imitative power of the English idiom in its more modern stage of development would permit. The former sought to express the inner meaning of the sentences in the plainest, most correct, and perhaps Biblically familiar English form; the latter "weighed every Greek word and sought to give its exact equivalent," with more regard for the niceties of the original expressions than for those of the living tongue. Dr. Noyes, satisfied with faithfully rendering the sense, and little mindful of slight variations of reading, "thought it best not to interpose" his "own judgment in regard to the Greek text," and strictly to follow Tischendorf, even where, exceptionally, their opinions did not coincide; Mr. Folsom, devoting years of labor to a close and minute collation of readings, allowed himself, when sustained by sufficient critical authority, some departures, though but few in number, from the leading text. Reference to parallel passages, or to the Old Testament, and brief notes containing various readings, different renderings, or explanations of the chosen phraseology, are all Dr. Noyes saw fit to add to his translation—for "exposition, interpretation, or argument formed no part" of his design; Mr. Folsom not only gives the various readings—to which an "Account of Manuscripts" is added—fully and elaborately, but also copious explanatory and expository notes designed to sustain and illustrate the translation, as well as the inner truth of the books—though not to serve as historico-critical dissertations of an introductory character.

A comparison of a few connected passages in the two translations with the original will probably suffice to illustrate our preceding remarks, as well as the respective merits of the rival versions—if we may so call them, the scheme and the sphere of the two being in fact different. We choose Luke vii. 24, et seq.:

Noyes has: "What have ye gone out into the wilderness to see? the reeds shaken by the winds?" Folsom has: "What have you gone out into the Desert to view? A reed, shaken by [the] wind?" The text has θεάσασθαι (to view), κάλαμον (sing.), and ανέμου (sing.) N.: "A man clothed in soft

* "The New Testament: Translated from the Greek Text of Tischendorf. By George R. Noyes, D.D., Hancock Professor of Hebrew and other Oriental Languages, and Dexter Lecturer on Biblical Literature, in Harvard University." Boston: American Unitarian Association. 1869.
"The Four Gospels: Translated from the Greek Text of Tischendorf, with the various readings of Griesbach, Lachmann, Tischendorf, Tregelles, Meyer, Alford, and others; and with Critical and Expository Notes. By Nathaniel S. Folsom." Boston: A. Williams & Co.

raiment?" F.: "A man attired in soft garments?" Text: ἐν μαλακοῖς ἱματίοις (pl.) N.: "Lo! they who wear gorgeous apparel, and live luxuriously." F.: "Behold, they who flourish in splendid apparel and luxury." Text: ἰδοὺ οἱ ἐν ἱματισμῷ ἐνδόξῳ καὶ τρυφῇ ὑπάρχοντες—which is excellently rendered by Mr. Folsom. N.: "A prophet? Yes, I say to you, and more than a prophet. "F.: "Yes, I say to you, and a great deal more than a prophet." Text: περισσότερον (more than superior) προφήτου. Both translators refer the following Old Testament quotation to Mal. iii. 1; but F., in a note to the parallel passage in Matthew, has two erroneous references; neither attempts to explain the striking discrepancy between the words of the prophet and those of the apostles, who add "before thy face," and change "before me" into "before thee." N.: "Among those born of women there is no greater prophet than John." F.: "A greater prophet among women-born than John there is none." Text: ἐν γεννητοῖς γυναικῶν . . οὐδείς ἐστίν (there is none). "Among women-born" is unnecessarily strained. N.: "But he that is least in the kingdom of God is greater than he." F.: "But the lesser in the kingdom of God is a greater than he." Text: ὁ δὲ μικροτερος (the lesser). N.: "And all . . . acknowledged God as righteous by being baptized with the baptism of John." F.: "And all . . . ascribed righteousness to God, having been baptized with the baptism of John." Text: ἐδικαίωσαν τὸν θεόν, βαπτισθέντες τὸ βάπτισμα Ἰωάννου. Noyes's rendering is obviously more in accordance with the sense, if not with the grammatical form of the Greek, which in the Gospels is, after all, not the Greek of Hellenes but of Jews. In the negative sentence following, his rendering seems still more preferable. N.: "They are like children." F.: "They are like young children." Text: παιδίοις (little children). N.: "We piped to you, and ye did not dance; we sung a dirge, and ye did not weep." F.: "We played on the pipe to you, and you did not dance; we made lamentation, and you did not weep." Text: ηὐλησαμεν (we played on the pipe), ἐθρηνήσαμεν (we cried, lamented). N.: "But wisdom is acknowledged by all her children." F.: "And wisdom received justification from all her children." Text: ἐδικαιώθη (was justified).

We shall not trouble the reader with a continuation of this parallel—which we have done to some extent—though it would certainly strengthen the conclusions drawn from the above—to wit, that Noyes has sacrificed somewhat of the necessary accuracy to the desire of being plain and readable and retaining "what may be called the savor and spirit of our old and familiar version;" that Folsom shows an equally pronounced leaning to the opposite side, which makes his diction occasionally rather awkward; and that both have well executed their respective tasks, of which that of Mr. Folsom was decidedly the more arduous.

RECENT REPUBLICATIONS.

PERHAPS the most disagreeable of all the sorts of writing which English literature exhibits is one which attained its greatest popularity in England in the time of the first two Georges. The lesser "wits" of the Anne-Augustan age, emulating the conversation of the French salons, were adepts in it; and the plays of the comedians and the essays of the essayists, from Charles the Second's time on down to the days when Sheridan flourished, and on down to the later days when English provincial literary coteries and American literary coteries kept Sheridanism on its legs after the life had mostly gone out of it, are nearly all disfigured by a smartness and pertness and wooden impudence born of self-conceit and of contempt, which once were thought to be very French and epigrammatic, but which we now find ourselves thinking very British-French, or even brutal and stupid—displeasing not only morally, but also intellectually, and in every other way. Mr. Colley Cibber "roasting" a critic or a dunce—if roasting was the term in his time—would not be a spectacle that would much delight any of us nowadays; the "taste of the town" has changed, that old gentleman and his friends would discover; and it is now a countrified taste which the laureate and Mr. Foote and Mr. Cumberland and Mr. Boswell and Dr. Syntax and the followers of Mr. Pope and our own "Croaker" and "Croaker Junior," and the rest of the "men of parts about town," would hardly be able to hit at all. "Mecænas," says one of them, giving definitions—"Mecænas: a man who employs his riches in such a way as to attract the admiration of fools." Another, contorting his solid countenance where his French exemplar may have made a shadow of a grimace, speaks thus of morality: "Morality: keeping up appearances in this world, or becoming suddenly devout, when we imagine that we may be shortly summoned to appear in the next." Another one thus causes the mind to revert to the "stout oak stick" which Doctor Johnson was going to buy for Mr. Sam Foote, and which it seems a pity that Mr. Foote's whole school could not constantly have had the benefit of: "I wish to consult you upon a project I have formed," said a noodle to his friend; "I have an idea in my head." "Have you?" interposed the friend with a look of great surprise; "then you shall have my opinion at once: keep it there—it may be some time," etc., etc., etc. Certainly, some of the grumbling at Fortune—as to the kind of people on whom she proverbially bestows her favors—may well enough have been stopped by little tales such as this; the unluckiest of men cannot have been so unlucky as not to side with our noodle against our "man of wit." These remarks we make after turning over the pages of "The Tin Trumpet"—a book now thirty or forty years old, and which the Appletons have just republished for a second time. The American editor of the work, revising and adding, has improved on his English forerunner; and we do not say that the Englishman, either, when he dumped his commonplace-book, shot out rather cheap wit only, for he shot out also some wisdom and good-nature with his rubbish. What about him, except that he seems to have been a Doctor Paul Chatfield, we cannot say; apparently he was a rather splenetic physician, well read in the British classics of half or three-quarters of a century ago, and with a turning to satire and smartness, though without too much of a natural turn for it. (His manner, by the way, is contagious.) His American follower seems to have been a man of somewhat better culture and wider mind. Still, the two of them together have made a book not very much less depressing than a jest-book. "Point" seems to have been a chief end with them both; and the ass with his thistles—to adapt a joke from one or the other of them—may serve to represent the delighted reader of their book and the kind of food he will be most apt to get from it. The full title is, "The Tin Trumpet; or, Heads and Tails for the Wise and Waggish." A dozen or more of John Leech's most vulgar designs—none of them apropos to anything in the letterpress—are scattered through the volume, and are, perhaps, as bad as anything in it; certainly, there are much better things in it.

It is not doing friendly service to the memory of the late General Halpine to collect from the newspapers the verses which he wrote sometimes on "occasions" of a festive character and more often for no better cause than that the printer wanted copy. Nothing that he wrote, except two or three of the "Miles O'Reilly" pieces, is worth preserving; and it is not for their intrinsic merit as literature that any good judge would ever think of preserving these. His amatory verses, and those that he wrote in seriousness, have it for their chief value that they help one to understand and illustrate a literary type of which the specimens are far more numerous than pleasing. The manner in which Mr. Roosevelt has performed his task as editor and biographer is valuable rather for good feeling than for any other commendable quality.

We spoke some time ago of the one-volume edition of "The Spectator" which was edited by Mr. Henry Morley, and which gave in small compass as good an edition as we have of Steele's and Addison's classic. Of the same size is a volume containing in less than seven hundred octavo pages of good print Sterne's works—the "Tristram Shandy," the "Sentimental Journey," some select sermons, and all of his published letters. But the editorial work is very much inferior to that of the distinguished scholar and very agreeable writer who gave us the cheap "Spectator." Instead of a good life of the author, and a good critical estimate of him, we are put off with the brief sketchy autobiography which Sterne put together for his daughter; and of critical estimate of his writings and character there is none, or next to none; there is merely some laudation by unknown contemporaries of his. To be sure there is lack of good criticism of this most self-conscious and sentimental of all great humorists, and probably there may long be such lack; but it is a pity—considering how full is his revelation of himself, and how sure he is of continued reading, and how corrupting his influence may easily be—that any more editions of his works should be put forth without some tolerably sufficient aid to the proper understanding of him. Then, too, one feels, at each new appearance of him, that so interesting a character ought not to go undissected and unexplained. Apart from the way in which they have allowed the editing to be done, Messrs. Routledge & Sons have made a valuable addition to the list of cheap books which happily is getting to be so long in England and America—though America does less to lengthen it than could be wished, and less, as we believe, than she might. Some one of the many American publishers who employ "book agents" and flood the country with worthless books and with obsolete editions of good ones, might, we feel sure, make himself a national benefactor and put money in his purse by doing for us what Chambers and his imitators have done for the Scotch and English—namely, offer us, with some confidence in our sense and good taste, books that we ought to read if we read at all. Take one year with another, and there is no more reason, we doubt, why "The Vicar of Wakefield" or "The Interference Theory of Government" should not be spread over the West than why Mr. Headley's "Sacred Mountains" should, or Mr. Abbott's "Napoleon."

So many thousand copies of Miss Phelps's "Gates Ajar" have been sold, and so much has been said about it, that its author is in some danger of being tried by a standard not applicable to her and of being asked to be a woman of genius. But if the reader will forget the better known work, or will remember that in virtue of its peculiar relations to religion as it is taught by the New England churches, it has met with an acceptance among persons whose taste is undiscriminating, and, if thus remembering or forgetting, he will bring an unprejudiced mind to the perusal of the volume before us, "Men, Women, and Ghosts," he will be likely to receive considerable pleasure, though little of it will be unmixed. Miss Phelps has much power of feeling—of feeling far too often morbid—and she has undeniable power over the feelings of her readers—a power to which the reader would more willingly and might more properly yield if it were not for the unhealthy and immoral morbidness of much of it. And besides a sort of sprightliness, which seems "'stericky"—as they say in her part of the country—and as morbid as a good deal of her pathos, she has a fine store of genuine fun and humor, which we for our part find to be often very pleasant. Moreover, she has the power—if she would or could more frequently use it—of going out of herself, a little way at all events, and almost giving us other people, although it is too true that she seldom or never gives us others pure and simple and without any tinge of herself—herself, as religionist of a certain school sometimes, as mere woman very often, as various other persons now and again. Of her faults some, no doubt, are those of youth and inexperience, some of natural limitations of character. Of her merits, none—not even her occasional high spirits or gaiety—seems to be necessarily youthful merely; and we should say that a constant improvement in her work may be looked for, and that it will not seldom have high merit. More self-satisfaction—if that is possible—a little less intensity, a cooler and more self-restrained way of handling her subject, so as to avoid "the mingling of the subject and the object"—as, no doubt, they say at Andover—would certainly be of service to Miss Phelps in her writing; and all these things may probably be attainable. Whether or no they are, the writer of the miserably painful story of the "Pemberton Mill"—a story of a kind that no thoroughly "healthy" person would write, we think—and of "Kentucky's Ghost" and "In the Gray Goth" is certainly a writer of considerable power and of decided cleverness.

Messrs. Roberts Brothers have republished, in a cheaper form, their fine edition of Mr. Barnes's "Rural Poems"—poems charming enough to be laid within easy reach on the everyday table of any lover of the country and of poetry—of the simplest and purest pleasures. How a painter might delight in Mr. Barnes the first six verses of this "Brisk Wind" may show; and that others, too, as well as painters, will find something, the last two verses may be taken as evidence:

> "The burdock leaves beside the ledge,
> The leaves upon the poplar's height,
> Were blown by wind-blasts up on edge,
> And showed their under sides of white;
> And willow trees beside the rocks
> All bent gray leaves and swung gray boughs,
> As there, on wagging heads, dark locks
> Bespread red cheeks, behung white brows."

Most of us, perhaps, may have to unlearn a little to get the taste of condiment and high food out of our mouths before we care much for such plain fare as this best of all the rustic-rural poets sets before us; but it will not be long before Mr. Barnes's faithful reader will be very glad that he ever was led to make his acquaintance.

The same house republish, in the same pretty form—that of "The Handy Volume Series"—Mr. W. Stewart Trench's "Realities of Irish Life." They are not realities that strike one as very real. In fact, Mr. Trench may well enough be suspected of doing Irish life in something of the way in which Mr. Edmund Kirke did life "Among the Pines." Both we suppose, put a little more "life" of the desired sort into a given number of pages than any of us would find if we were to go in person to North Carolina or to Derrynane and the parts adjacent. Nevertheless, the book is very readable and interesting, and has some scenes melodramatically exciting. Most watering-places might be the better for it, we should think.

Springdale Abbey: Extracts from the Diaries and Letters of an English Preacher. Edited by Joseph Parker, D.D. (Philadelphia: Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger. 1869.)—In so far as this book can be said to have any settled and definite object, its purpose seems to be to institute unfavorable comparisons between the clergymen of the Established Church of England and those of that body of Dissenters known as Independents. We do not know that we have any objections to such a purpose, considered in itself, but the way in which it is here proposed to accomplish it strikes us as being at once clumsy and ineffectual. The book being autobiographical in form, the author represents himself as a Church clergyman having the utmost devotion to the idea of church and state and the profoundest contempt for all bodies of Dissenters. "I always choose the word 'ignominious,'" he says, "in preference to any other when I wish to express the uttermost contempt; it looks in its right place when it comes before the word 'Dissenter.'" He takes care, however, to represent himself and all of his clerical brethren as utter fools in comparison with a Dissenting preacher whom he first sees at a Bible Society meeting, where his feelings as a "parish priest" are unutterably shocked by finding that the "fellow" talks grammatical English and uses logical arguments. "At that meeting I learned for the first time, and greatly to my amazement—for where there is knowledge there is sin—that Dissenters read the Bible. Certainly I had never understood this before, and it assuredly revealed to me an unimagined depth of human depravity; that an unbaptized Hottentot should be a Dissenter is tolerably clear, but how a reader of the Bible can be one passes my comprehension. This, however, is but a passing reflection." The Dissenter appears constantly throughout the book, and always vanquishes his antagonist in argument, who, however, always congratulates himself on having had quite the best of the encounter. The book is probably the work of some lay Dissenter, desirous of "poking fun" at the Establishment, who should have crammed more carefully on clerical topics before assuming the clerical character. However, it is not for the purpose of discussing the idea of the book that we refer to it, but simply because it contains a good deal of very amusing reading. The author has an eye for the very obviously humorous in matters both lay and clerical; and though he writes unskilfully and always wastes overmuch strength in giving blows that after all tell very lightly, yet his sketches have the look of having been studied from nature, and only need a good deal of condensation to make them in many respects really admirable. As it is, the book will be found readable, and in parts extremely amusing. This is solely on account of its humorous quality—as a weapon either for Dissent or against the Establishment it is at once too blunt and too weakly handled to be of any service. We give an extract from an account given by this zealous clergyman of what he confesses to have been the only visit he ever paid to his parochial school. It seems to have given him much the same kind and degree of amusement which it would have afforded the most godless layman, and to have excited about as much serious reflection. He is conducting an examination in the New Testament, and the pupils have already come to much grief, which we must pass over:

> "I turned to the book and called loudly for the next verse. 'And when the Sabbath day was come, he began to teach in the synagogue, and many hearing him were astonished—'
>
> "'Stop there,' said I, 'and let us see if we understand it so far. Now tell me which day was come.'
>
> "All heads were bent upon the lesson, and after a pause a bright little fellow answered, 'Please, sir, the Sabba day.'
>
> "'Sabba day, my boy,' said I, 'is that the way to pronounce the word? Who told you to say it so?'
>
> "'My father, thank you, sir.'
>
> "'Well now, think a moment, and then tell me what we do on the Sabbath day.'
>
> "All the scholars exchanged looks of surprise, but not one of them hazarded an answer. Descending from generals to particulars, I fixed upon one boy, and said, 'Tell me what your father does on the Sabbath day.'
>
> "'Please, sir,' was the ready answer, 'he puts his top-coat on, thank you, sir.'
>
> "'And does he only put it on once a week?' I continued, forgetting that it was an examination on the Scriptures.
>
> "'Yes, thank you, sir, because he's frightened of getting it wet, and mother says he mustn't.'
>
> "Christy examined the maps again, and I called out vehemently, 'What do you mean by people being astonished? You read that the people who heard him were astonished.'
>
> "'Please, sir, when they are frightened at a boggle,' a boy answered.
>
> "'No, sir; when they are hungry,' another suggested.
>
> "'Please, sir, when they are sleepy,' a third confidently explained.
>
> "'All wrong,' said I. 'I shall ask you no more about that at present. . . . Now let us go to the Catechism, and see what can be done with that. All of you get your slates out, because I wish you not to speak, but to write your answers. Now put down on your slates your answer to the question, 'What is thy duty towards God, and thy duty towards thy neighbor?' . . . . I took up the first slate, which contained almost a duplicate of the answer made to the same question in another parish:

"'My dewty tordes Gode iz to bleed in him, to fering and to loof with old yewer hards, withold my mined, withold my sold, and with my sernth, to whirchp and give thangs, and to putt my old trewst in him, to call pon him, to onner his old name and his world, and to save him truly all the days of my lives end. My dooty tordes my naybors to love him as thyself, and to do to all men as thou wed they shall do and to me, to luv onner and suke my farther and morther, to onner and to bay the Queen and all that are pet under a forty under her, to smit myself to all my gooves, teeges, sportial pastares and marsters, to oughten myself lordly and every to all my betters, to hut nobody by woode nor deede, to be true in jest in all my deelins, to beer no malis nor ated in your arts, to keep my ans from packin and steel, my toong from eeval speckin, lawing and slanders, not to covet nor deesyr othermans good, but to lern layber trewly to git my own leeving, and to doo my doty in that stay of life and to each it please God to call mens.'"

One pretty strong mark of a clerical origin the book does indeed bear, since its author, who is a bright man, yet concerns himself in no way with any wider affairs than technically religious ones. Still, his knowledge and his interest even here seem to be very slight; and it is only the humorous and ludicrous side of matters which get any hearty attention from him.

Black Forest Village Stories. By Berthold Auerbach. Translated by Charles Goepp. Author's edition. Illustrated with fac-similes of the original German wood-cuts. (New York: Leypoldt & Holt. 1869.)—These are the stories which first brought Auerbach into general notice in Germany, and although they were written nearly thirty years ago, they do not compare unfavorably with his later works. As studies of peasant life they are said to be very faithful, and the shrewd and kindly observation of human nature which distinguishes them makes them very pleasant reading. Thirty years ago, Auerbach's tendency to use his art in great part at least for putting into tangible shape the speculations which occupied his own mind was nearly as marked as it is now, and he thought on very much the same topics. "Ivon" is a story of religious doubts and struggles, and in the "Lauterbacher" we have Erich Dournay's prototype, and find him on the whole more agreeable and less priggish than in the later elaboration.

Mr. Goepp's translation is readable, and in the main faithful to the original. It has, however, some bad faults, which come apparently from a singular misconception on Mr. Goepp's part of what the duties of a translator really are. In his desire to give a spirited and vigorous rendering he is frequently inexcusably vulgar, and gives, in this, an utterly false impression of Auerbach to his readers. To people who read these stories only in the present version, the criticism which is made upon them—that they soften down the actual coarseness of peasant life and show it through a poetic veil, will lose a good deal of its force. Mr. Goepp's worst fault, however, is his habit of interpolating passages of his own wherever and whenever he pleases, without giving either in his preface or his foot-notes the slightest intimation that there is nothing of the kind to be found in the original. These interpolations are of all descriptions—now a short dissertation on the differences between European and American prison systems, which is readily enough detected as spurious even by readers unacquainted with the German text; and again a bit of moralizing, as if Auerbach himself were not quite safe to supply enough of it, or a bold general remark on German habits, the insertion of any of which is an inexcusable impertinence. Occasionally too he perverts, in what seems a wilful manner, the obvious meaning of the original—as, for instance, in the story of Florian and Crescenze, where, in speaking of the use which Florian made of his smattering of French, he says that the French language "is the most respectable dress for immorality that was ever fashioned." By what process he contrived to get this meaning from Auerbach's own expression—"denn das hat immer etwas Lockenderes und Vornehmeres für viele Leute"—literally, "for that has always something more attractive and more distinguished for many people," we find ourselves at a loss to imagine.

This translation was first published about a dozen years ago, and is the only English version we know of except one by Mrs. Taylor, which was issued in London more than twenty years since. It did not contain all the stories, and in those which it gave was nearly as remarkable for its omissions as Mr. Goepp's for its interpolations.

Analysis of Civil Government. By Calvin Townsend, Counsellor-at-Law. (New York: Ivison, Phinney, Blakeman & Co. 1869.)—Mr. Townsend's "Civil Government" has so much that is good that we wish it had more. It undertakes to give not only a full commentary upon the Constitution, but all the important legislation upon its provisions; and much of this work is excellently well done, much very insufficiently, much, again, with altogether too great fulness of detail. Thus, there is a valuable and well-executed statement of the laws in regard to surveys and disposition of the public lands; but all the changes of law in regard to the compensation of members of Congress—a very unimportant matter—are given in so much detail as to occupy nearly a page, while the Bankrupt Law is barely mentioned, with no description at all of its provisions; and there is no allusion to legislation upon the decimal system of weights and measures. Again, there is an able and conclusive argument—much more detailed indeed than is necessary—against giving an Acting President of the Senate, as Mr. Wade last year, the title of Vice-President; and the recent law in regard to the election of Senators is fully given. But under Art. 1, § 9, clause 1, there is no allusion to the bargain by which this provision was secured; neither is there any definition of Navigation Laws, nor, in the Glossary of Legal Terms, of Eminent Domain. It is thus a book of very unequal merit, and ought, by judicious omissions and additions, to be made very much better than it is. But, at any rate, it is far too bulky, and contains an immense amount of "padding." Imagine an ingenuous youth being taught, at the present stage of our national career, that "we cannot too much admire the wisdom, purity, and sagacity of the great and good men who framed the Constitution, in their efforts to withdraw as far as possible from the framework of our Government all motives to selfish and dishonest legislation." Surely he must ask what would have happened if these great and good men had not, etc., etc.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Austin (Mrs. J. G.), Cipher: a Tale	(Sheldon & Co.)
Bamberger (L.), Count Bismarck: from the German, swd.	(B. Westermann & Co.)
Bonghi (R.), L'Inchiesta sulla Regia Cointeressata dei Tabachi, swd	(Milan)
Bourne (H. R. F.), Famous London Merchants: a Boy's Book	(Harper & Bros.)	$1 00
Clarke (Rev. D.), The Oneness of the Christian Church	(Lee & Shepard)
De Mille (J.), Cord and Creese: a Tale, swd.	(Harper & Bros.)	0 75
Fourth Annual Report of the National Temperance Society	(New York)
Fuller (Jane J.), Uncle John's Flower-Gatherers	(M. W. Dodd)	1 50
Haven (Rev. E. O.), Rhetoric: a Text-book	(Harper & Bros.)	1 50
Hazelton (M.), Aunt Mattie and her Young Friends	(D. Lothrop & Co.)
Johnson (Prof. W. W.), Elementary Treatise on Analytic Geometry	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)	2 00
Keble (Rev. J.), Miscellaneous Poems	(Pott & Amery)	2 00
Leavitt (Rev. J. M.), The Siege of Babylon: a Tragedy, swd.	(Hurd & Houghton)
Littell's Living Age, Vol. XIII., April—June, 1869	(Littell & Gay)
Lunarius	(Nat. Temperance Society)
Mill (J. S.), The Subjection of Women	(D. Appleton & Co.)
" " "	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)	1 00
Newbury (H.), May Bell: a Child's Story	(D. Lothrop & Co.)
Parker (Prof. J.), The Three Powers of Government, etc., swd	(Hurd & Houghton)	0 75
Philip Brantley's Life Work: a Story for Boys	(M. W. Dodd)	1 15
Pollard (E. A.), Secret History of the Southern Confederacy	(Nat. Pub. Co.)
Redfield (I. F.), The Law of Carriers	(Hurd & Houghton)	6 50
Roberts (D.), Treatise on Admiralty and Prize	" "	7 50
Simmons (C.), Scripture Manual, 36th ed.	(M. W. Dodd)	1 75
Spalding (Rev. A. T.), The Little Gate, and How to Enter it	(Gould & Lincoln)
Thackeray (W. M.), The Yellowplush Papers, swd.	(D. Appleton & Co.)	0 50
The Adventures of Philip, swd.	(Harper & Bros.)	0 75
The Play School Stories, for Little Folks, 2 vols.	(Gould & Lincoln)
The Merchants and Bankers' Almanac for 1869, 3d ed	(I. Smith Homans, jr.)	2 00
White (Rev. J. T.), Complete Latin-English and English-Latin Dictionary	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)	4 50
Woolsey (Rev. T. D.), Essay on Divorce and Divorce Legislation	(Chas. Scribner & Co.)	1 75

SABIN & SONS'

American Bibliopolist

(Published monthly) affords an excellent medium for ADVERTISEMENTS. It is useful to LIBRARIANS for the LISTS OF NEW ENGLISH AND AMERICAN PUBLICATIONS. BOOK COLLECTORS will find many desirable volumes in CATALOGUE OF NEW and OLD BOOKS, which accompanies each number. Notices of Rare or Curious Books, and the Notes and Queries upon American subjects, will be interesting to every one.

J. SABIN & SONS, Publishers,
84 Nassau Street, New York.

J. S. & SON have recently received a very valuable Collection of American Books—perhaps the finest ever offered for sale. Many of the volumes are illustrated with extra plates, and superbly bound.

BACK NUMBERS OF THE NATION.

The following numbers of the Nation are desired by the Publisher, and if sent to his address will be paid for, at the rate of twenty-five cents for the numbers in Vol. I., and fifteen cents for all others:

Vol. I. 1, 2, 3, 6, 7.
IV. 90, 96, 104.
V. 106, 107, 112, 115.
VI. 131, 152.
VII. 158, 161, 166.
VIII. 185.

CRITICAL AND SOCIAL ESSAYS. Reprinted from the Nation, and supplying in some measure the first two volumes of that paper, which are now obtainable only with difficulty. Cloth, 12mo, price $1 50.

SLAVE SONGS OF THE UNITED STATES. A Unique Collection of Original Melodies—words and music—obtained among the negroes of the South; preceded by an account of these Songs, and an Essay on the Negro Dialect, as observed at Port Royal, by Prof. W. F. Allen of the University of Wisconsin. Cloth, 8vo, price $1 50.

POLYDORI VERGILII DE RERUM INVENTORIBUS. The last publication of the Agathynian Club. Superbly printed, paper cover, 8vo, price $3.

LIFE AND LETTERS OF CAPTAIN JOHN BROWN. Edited by Richard D. Webb, and published by Smith, Elder & Co., London, 1861. In all respects the best life of John Brown ever written. Illustrated by a photographic portrait without a beard, showing perfectly the character of the lower part of the face. Cloth, 12mo, price $1 50.

Sent post-paid on receipt of price. Address PUBLISHER OF THE "NATION," Box 6732, New York City.

The Nation.

VOL. IX.—NO. 212. THURSDAY, JULY 22, 1869. { FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM / TWELVE CENTS PER COPY

THE WEEK 61

EDITORIAL ARTICLES:
Congress and the Civil Service 64
The Existence of the Lobby 64
The Difficulties of Economical Discussion 65
Work for the Trenton Convention 66
Art-Study in the Imperial School at Paris.—No. V 67

CORRESPONDENCE:
What our Congressman says of the Civil Service Bill 69
Mr. Worman and his "Endorsers" 69

NOTES:
Literary 70
Mr. Mill's Plea for Women 72
Thomassen's Unveilings of Primeval History 73
Roscoe's Spectrum Analysis 73
Recent Republications 74

CURRENT LITERATURE:
The Sacristan's Household.—The Old Testament History 75-76

Books of the Week 76

Terms:—Five Dollars per annum, in advance; Clergymen, Four Dollars.  Remittances at the risk of the subscriber, unless made by draft, check, P. O. money order, or registered letter.

The date of expiration of each subscription is indicated on the printed label. A delay of more than three months in renewing subscriptions will endanger their continuance.

ADDRESS, PUBLISHER OF "THE NATION," BOX 6732, NEW YORK.

PUBLISHING OFFICE, 3 PARK PLACE.

The Week.

THE new Atlantic Cable is the property of an Anglo-French Company—Messrs. Erlanger, the broker of the Confederacy, and Mr. Reuter, the telegraph operator, being the principal concessionaries—and they have got from the French Government the exclusive privilege of laying cables for twenty years, and have secured a charter from the State of Massachusetts, taken out in the name of Massachusetts citizens, allowing them to land the American end of their line in that State. Attorney-General Hoar thinks, however, and Congress thinks so too, that to land a foreign cable on American soil you must have the leave of the United States, the leave of the State, and the leave of the man who owns the ground on which it is landed. Of these the new company has only got the last two, and apparently does not care whether it gets the first or not. A very sensible and moderate bill was brought into Congress in the last session, though too late to be passed, fixing the conditions on which foreign cables might be landed in the United States, and one of them was that the Government of the country from which it started should be prepared to give Americans the same privileges on its soil that its own subjects or concessionaries asked for on American soil. In the present case there is no reciprocity whatever. No American company would be permitted to land a cable in France. The French Government has refused the old Cable Company the privilege of carrying their line from Valentia to the French coast, and will not even let them open an office in Paris. All talk of "illiberality" on the part of Congress or Secretary Fish in opposing the completion of the new enterprise, therefore, is sheer bosh. So far from opposing the interests of civilization, they are helping them. We want as many cables across the Atlantic as can find work to do, and for this reason everybody ought to be allowed to lay one freely who can find the money to do it with. The new company is, however, a monopoly of the strictest kind, and should, for that reason alone, be opposed, even if it were not making a rather audacious attempt to use American soil for the purposes of the monopoly, without regard to the prohibition of the Government. Let it waive its exclusive privileges on French soil, and we imagine there will be little opposition, and no effective opposition in any quarter, to its operations in America; but the proper time to oppose a monopoly, like many other evil things, is at the beginning.

Since the Pennsylvania Democrats have held their convention, the prospects of the Republicans in that State are a little brighter than before, for neither the name of Mr. Packer nor the substance of the platform is ominous of Democratic success. It is said, however, that Mr. Packer is to give a million dollars for the necessary expenses of the canvass. Hancock's name was received with great enthusiasm, but a friend of his discovered a letter in his pocket—dated May 21—in which the General peremptorily declined a nomination. It was a friend used to conventions, we may suppose, and one who would refrain from reading letters until it seemed advisable to do so. Hancock was probably sacrificed to the money of the two leading candidates, and it is not necessary to accuse Mr. Hoffman and Mr. Chase of "killing him off" in view of the possibilities of 1872, nor likely that they could have done so had they tried their utmost. The platform is the old structure which has so often been erected—much as the same gallows is put up for successive hangings; and the dissatisfaction with Geary and the last Legislature, or the disgust of the McClures with Grant, or the apathy of the Republicans—or all these things—must be great indeed if the Pennsylvanians can be made to seem to accept it. It affirms that the ratification of the Fifteenth Amendment must be repealed; that the whole Reconstruction policy is tyrannical; and that the negro should not have the ballot. It has, to be sure, one good thing in it—our soldiers should not be forgotten, it says; but the Republicans say that, and moreover avow their intention of protecting the pensions of the widows of the survivors of the war of 1812 and of the Revolutionary war. The adjurations to "harmony" were frequent and earnest enough to make it doubtful if the platform and candidate are not both distasteful to a large number of the delegates. Meantime, "a Jacksonian Democrat and a Pioneer Republican" writes to the City Item that Mr. W. B. Mann has been nominated for Governor by a Progressive-Reform party, of which we have seen no other mention.

Elsewhere political affairs are dull, except as Mr. Stokes, Mr. Senter, and the temperance men are making them as lively as they can. Mr. Samuel F. Cary—a "workingman's friend" whom the workingmen do not appreciate—is engineering a Prohibition party in Ohio, which has State candidates in the field, and which begins early to exhibit a characteristic of "moral" parties—that is, of speedily having in some of its high places certain battered demagogues whom the parties not moral have succeeded in shaking off. In Illinois, Michigan, Maine, and this State, the temperance men are also in motion. In Virginia, Mr. Walker was elected Governor by a majority of about 15,000, it appears, and not by the much larger one which was at first thought. This is all the better for the negroes, for certainly without colored votes he could not have carried the State, nor could the constitution have been expurgated, we suppose, without the negroes' assistance—a fact that Virginians, taking them at their own valuation, will be the last men to forget.

On the 13th of the month, and the two following days, the leading Southern agriculturists were in convention at Memphis, considering the feasibility of employing Chinese labor, and the prejudice of color either did or did not cause them to take a sensible course on the subject. Not impossibly, the Southern willingness to pay off the black man may have something to do with the Southern willingness to admit the yellow one. However that may be, it was voted by the convention, after it had listened to reports and to sensible speeches from Chinese delegates from Louisiana, and a great coolie contractor from California, to open subscription lists in all the Southern States till one million dollars' worth of stock should be subscribed for, and then importation from the interior of China is to begin. It is estimated that the cost of an able-bodied laborer will be about $10 a month and his board—the Chinaman to give a mortgage upon his wages for the expenses of his trip hither. This is very good news for the national creditor, and the Secretary of the Navy, and the taxpayer—strictly as creditor and Secretary and taxpayer; what kind of news it may be to them as moralists, social and political philosophers, or citizens of the republic, we can courageously wait and see.

The liquor troubles in Massachusetts promise before long to be once more at their height. The new liquor law is in operation, and all kinds of intoxicating drinks, except cider, are, if exposed for sale, passing into the possession of the constables. But he would be a very knowing man who should tell what is going to happen next. The moderate drinkers and the confirmed drunkards all say they can get as much liquor as they want, and that the law is all but universally evaded, to the great promotion of fraud and deceit and the great diminution of popular respect for legislative authority. The temperance men, on the other hand, are satisfied as usual that the year of jubilee is at hand, or, at all events, that criminal offences will greatly diminish, and the peace and good order of the State be greatly increased—an expectation for which, we believe, a good deal of support has been, or can be, got from statistics. Making drinking difficult, dear, or inconvenient must probably, for a time at least, lessen its amount, and proportionately lessen the number of crimes of violence; but then this is after all not the whole question. Part of it is whether it is possible to enforce a prohibitory law for any long period, and whether it can be done without promoting vices hardly less injurious to the State than hard drinking. In Massachusetts, the peculiarities of the politicians make the fight between the prohibitionists and the no-license-law men a curious kind of game, in which one, as if by some hidden rule of alternation, gets the upper hand one year, and the other the next. We explained the process some time ago in our columns, and it is amusing, but not edifying. Some of the prohibitionists are in favor of excepting lager beer, as well as cider, as a judicious concession to the enemy; but once they do this, they virtually surrender the field. To a sincere total-abstinence man, beer differs from whiskey only in being less intoxicating; but it is, nevertheless, one of the stages on the road to drunkenness, if it be that the moderate drinker is the material out of which the inebriate is made. It is to be hoped that Massachusetts will reach a settled policy on the matter some time during the lifetime of the existing generation.

Attorney-General Hoar is perhaps wise in entering into a stipulation, as it is said he has done, with Yerger's counsel, for the purpose of bringing the legality of his trial by Military Commission up before the Supreme Court for adjudication next October, and the President is perhaps wise in agreeing to stay proceedings before the court-martial, and simply to hold the prisoner in custody until the court has given judgment; but if so, somebody else, and as far as we can make out, the framers of the Reconstruction Act, were not wise. The Reconstruction Act, it must be remembered, set the military forces of the United States to govern certain districts militarily, and directed military officers to perform all sorts of civil functions amongst a bitterly hostile population. Now, no government has a right to set soldiers to do work of this kind unless it is either sure that it is lawful for them to do it, or has determined to protect them in doing it whether it is lawful or not. Colonel Crane was brutally murdered by a desperado for discharging a duty imposed on him by an act of Congress; his murderer has undoubtedly the sympathy of the local population; were he tried by jury, he would be acquitted; and should the Supreme Court declare his trial before a military commission illegal, there will be a total failure of justice; and if other murders of a similar kind do not take place, it will be because the "unrepentant rebels" have undergone some sudden and unprecedented change of heart. It seems now even as if it would have been well to find out a year ago what the Supreme Court thought of the Reconstruction Act, or else made sure that the opinions of the courts would not affect its execution. At present, the United States officials at the South are in a curious position, and we should think the "friends of the Constitution" in Texas, say, would improve this period of suspense by stabbing and shooting a good many of them.

The Cuban Revolution in this city is in anything but a flourishing condition. The most hopeful sign in its favor that we have seen during the week is that on Tuesday evening, at the Academy of Music, a competent orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. Anschütz, gave or were to give a concert in its aid. Two hundred Cuban volunteers in full uniform were at the front, "casting a glamour of war over the whole scene," while Mr. H. Anderson was to preside at the piano, Mlle. Baretta was to dance, and Mr. Mattheson and Madame La Tuer and a chorus to sing. But the other indications are not of this encouraging character. The Perit, which has come back from her clandestine trip, has been seized by the collector of the port; District Attorney Pierrepont has been clothed by the President's commission with full powers to use the naval and military force for the suppression of filibustering or other violation of the neutrality laws; deputy marshals have been put aboard the revenue cutters in the bay and harbor; the two tugs which were captured in the Sound the other day are under detention; a descent has been made upon Gardiner's Island, and a hundred and twenty-four of the men of Colonel Ryan's command were captured and taken to Fort Lafayette. Ryan himself, with several fugitive companions, betook himself to inexpugnable fastnesses, but they have since abandoned the island. On Monday evening a Cuban "camp" on the plains of the Hackensack was captured by Marshal Barlow, and a fresh batch of prisoners obtained for Fort Lafayette. And finally, the Junta has vanished from 71 Broadway, leaving itself open to reproach even from its friends of having misappropriated the funds entrusted to it.

Meantime, and very naturally, under so much cold water, the efforts to write up the cause have been without effect. "A certain weekly paper," the Tribune says—which? we wonder—has been denying the existence of American sympathy with Cuba, "has even been saying the 'alleged'" American sympathy with Cuba, and in so doing has been misrepresenting the facts. But we are inclined to think it has not. We have had in the journal that has been the most assiduous of the friends of Cuba—the press, generally, say little about the revolution—much hard knocking at the American heart, on the ground of the arrest and the incarceration in a "New York Bastile," and in "filthy dungeons" and "loathsome cells," of the men who were captured on Saturday last; but there are no tokens whatever that the heart is opening and softening; and who of us all, except some of the reporters, are in any grief about the "cause," we are not able to see. No fault is to be found with one of the reporters, at all events. He declares that Fort Lafayette on Sunday "threw Andersonville in the shade;" that the prisoners were packed into cells "like sardines in a box," "driven at the point of the bayonet" into "dungeons which the rats have long ago forsaken"—a dungeon without rats being worthy of the darkest ages of despotism—and otherwise misused in a manner that ought, it seems, to have roused our whole population. If he were as entirely to be depended on for veracity as for enterprise, this gentleman's account would seem to show that there has really been great carelessness in regard to the quartering of the prisoners. Of his "enterprise," this is a specimen: "While our reporter was in the fort conversing with the prisoners, an orderly approached Major Maynadier and handed him a sealed package. The Major began its perusal," and our friend "happened to stand behind him at the moment and contrived to inform himself of the purport of the communication." But his veracity, we suspect, is hardly up to this mark; and in spite of his appeals to us we are going to imagine that, what with the privilege of free converse with members of the press like himself, and the same food as the soldiers at the fort are eating, and the fresh air of the harbor, the prisoners are as comfortable as could reasonably be expected. We must not expect to violate all laws and endanger the peace of nations, and then, on capture, have "panned oysters," like Jefferson Davis, and all the delicacies of the season.

There is a very pleasant rumor afloat about "representations" to be addressed to the Spanish Government by our own on behalf of the Cubans, looking to an amicable settlement of the present troubles and the concession to the Cubans, if not of national independence, of autonomy. There is every reason to believe that the men now in power in Spain only need to be enabled to yield with dignity to yield a great deal. Nobody is so well fitted to play the part of mediator as the United States, and the exceeding courage, loyalty, and integrity with which she has enforced the neutrality laws will give additional weight to all she may say.

The Radicals who misrule this country—and who curse the neighboring republic of the Confederacy with a double share of their "government"—while they are howling over the spoils at Washington, suffer some of the most important objects for which our fathers founded the republic to lie neglected and forgotten. Why are the people kept in ignorance? Why is an expedition not fitted out to explore the Connecticut River Valley from Springfield in the Massachusetts up as far as Colonel Bellows's Falls, or even on to White River Junction—which point might easily be reached if the expeditionary force were put under command of a Democratic officer? The traveller could then enter this region with full information as to its climate; the character of its natives, whether friendly or hostile; the settlements which have been made; its game, the greater and lesser; its navigable streams; its soil; the productions which may be expected when it shall have been fully opened, and so forth. Now we are dependent on the press for this and similar information. How long will it be before we shall have from a Government commission as full an account of the shore of the Sound which lies between Long Island and Connecticut, and of the Valley of the Connecticut or Long River, as the Times gave us the other morning? "Starting from the depot at the corner of Fourth Avenue, Twenty-seventh Street," the explorer will come first to the eastern boundary of the Central Park, an enclosure which "embraces nearly a thousand acres, and is being rapidly finished in a style equal to any park in the world." Then comes High Bridge, "one of the most magnificent in existence," and next are New Rochelle, "a flourishing little town;" Mamaroneck, Rye, Greenwich, Stamford, Norwalk, Bridgeport, Milford, and other thriving towns. Springfield —where years ago Longfellow wrote the poem beginning "This is the arsenal"—Holyoke, Northampton, Brattleboro'—"a comfortable old town on the Connecticut River"—and many other places, which the report we have mentioned describes with a fulness that people who have never travelled to the north of Twenty-seventh Street will find more instructive than entertaining.

It is announced that the Grand Jury are gravely considering indictments laid before them against several noted Wall-street brokers for lending money at usurious rates of interest during the late crisis—the rascals, or "victims," as their friends pleasantly call them, who borrowed it and agreed to pay the rates demanded, being the prosecutors, or, at all events, witnesses. We sincerely hope the bills may be found, and the culprits brought to trial. The usury laws, both of this and other States, being absurdities, are never enforced, and are apparently kept on the statute-book for the gratification of the ignorant, both in town and country. If this was the only result of their existence, there would perhaps be little to say against them; but their retention, even as a dead letter, keeps up the delusion that they are good things, and that, if the officers of the law could only be got to do their duty and enforce them, the community would be the better of it. The mere existence of the statutes, therefore, is a hindrance to the economical education of the people. It is, therefore, much to be desired that they should be carried out rigidly, and their outrageous absurdity thus brought home to the popular comprehension. The fellows who rush into "the Street" and borrow money when they are in distress at rates which express its value to them, and then turn round and sue the lenders, are the only class of persons whom laws of this kind ever benefit, and of course they cannot benefit them more than once.

The Hale-Perry scandal has been advanced another stage by the publication of a long letter from Mr. Perry, meeting Mr. Hale's charge that, owing to his own ignorance of the language, manners, and customs of the country to which he was sent—indeed, of everything, as he naïvely confessed a month or two since, which a diplomatist needs to know—Mr. Perry imposed upon him, and got him into his custom-house and other scrapes. It now appears, however, that the only free passes which Mr. Perry asked for were those which are always granted to foreign ministers; and that, in addition to these customary importations, Mr. Hale entered into arrangements to pay his debts to Madrid tradesmen by getting their goods passed free of duty under his name; and the remorseless Perry produces a letter from a carpet-dealer, of the name of Bonifacio Ruiz de Vlasco, showing that, in consideration of passes of this kind, he had squared a carpet account of his own with our minister, and, in consideration of a promised pass for more carpets, had paid an upholsterer's bill for our minister; but, on his excellency's getting frightened and declining to furnish the promised passes, the enraged dealer telegraphed to London to suspend the shipment of the goods, and demanded from his excellency the repayment of the upholsterer's bill. Considering the Spanish experience of Mr. Hale, and considering the accounts they will read in the papers of Mr. Hale's successor, the Honorable Daniel E. Sickles, we can hardly help wondering what kind of notion the darkened mind of the Spanish Romanist will form of the morals and manners of the official class of Protestant America.

The Lords amendments, as was anticipated, have all been rejected in the Commons, namely, the concurrent endowment, the retention of their seats in the House of Lords by the bishops, and the indefinite postponement of the disposition of the Church funds. The latest telegraphic report is that the Lords will now recede from all of them except that regarding the disposition of the funds, which would, however, take from the measure all character of finality, and furnish a bone of contention to the various sects which might last for generations. The divisions have, however, shown Mr. Gladstone's strength to be unbroken, and he announces his determination to make no compromise, but to use all his strength in and out of doors. Of course, the result can hardly be doubtful or long delayed. There is nothing remarkable about the new French Ministry which has just been announced except that it is a new ministry, and that the change is the result of a check received by the Government in a particular direction, which is the same as saying that French ministers are now responsible to the people. None of the radicals or even liberals appear in the new Cabinet. Indeed, this was hardly to be expected. Emperors more than other men need to be let down easy; and the step from the purely personal government of a "saviour of society" to a constitutional monarch, surrounded by and advised by his bitterest enemies, is too long to be taken in a month.

In the midst of the Emperor's present troubles, the North-German public is entertaining itself with a recent disclosure relative to the Prusso-Austrian war of 1866, and Napoleon's hopes of extending the borders of France, whichever way the contest turned. The information was given through the Weser-Zeitung, which vouches for its authenticity, and is to the effect that a treaty existed between France and Austria, based on the anticipated defeat of Prussia in the approaching struggle, and the consequent aggrandizement of Austria in Germany. There was great ignorance, it is alleged, at the Tuileries in regard to the military preparations of Prussia, and not only a general belief that she would be worsted, but even a fear that she might be crushed. Although, therefore, it was agreed that, for Napoleon's moral sympathy and seemingly neutral attitude, Austria should allow territorial compensation—meaning the left bank of the Rhine—the French Emperor had determined to interfere at the opportune moment to save Prussia from utter abasement, and thus to make her gratitude as well as her weakness his security in absorbing the Rhine country. The same authority asserts that, before the outbreak of the war, Austria had renounced Venetia in favor of France; but as this statement rests on the proof supposed to be furnished by La Marmora's make-believe war (Scheinkrieg), it is not to be taken without allowance. The Zeitung's principal revelation appears to have been much commented on, but nowhere contradicted.

CONGRESS AND THE CIVIL SERVICE.

We suspect our correspondent "Clericus" would have the experience which he reports in another column with more Congressmen than a few. It is amongst Congressmen that the real obstacles to the Civil Service reform are to be found; but few of them will attempt to make speeches against it—they will simply squelch it whenever it comes up. As to the arguments of "Clericus's" friend, they are very characteristic. The evils of the present system are not "light" to any man who holds the code of morality which prevails throughout Christendom, and who believes that the theft of the fourth part of the public revenue is a matter of any material consequence. The evils will not of themselves grow less. The number of officials will doubtless be diminished somewhat when the public debt is paid, but that will not be for many years yet, under the most favorable circumstances; and even if it were paid, the number of United States officials will go on increasing as the country grows, and the powers and duties of Congress are enlarged; and the number of candidates for office will increase in a greater ratio than the offices. In the meantime, there will always be only one President, and the fight round him will every year grow fiercer and fiercer, and the opportunities of humbugging him greater and greater. Moreover, we may any year be involved in another war, and have to resort once more to internal revenue for taxation. Our Congressman does not know whether it would be "preposterous" to apply the principles of the bill outside Washington or not. There is nothing new in the principle of the bill, and it was applied to all parts of the country for forty years after the foundation of the government. The present arrangement was a novel one invented by an unscrupulous demagogue for the annoyance of his enemies. Moreover, it is the duty of all Congressmen to act and talk on the supposition that what the people want is good government, until they get instructions from their constituents to the contrary. If the principle of the bill be based on reason, experience, and sound policy, it is his business to support it till the people say they are opposed to it. Whether they would submit to it or not, he cannot tell till he tries it. If the people do not like the new régime, they can get it abolished, so that our Congressman need not be afraid that in supporting it he would be inflicting irreparable damage on them. He does not know what the people believe on any subject on which they have not been consulted, and not over three per cent. of the population have any direct interest in the patronage, or ever expect to derive any advantage from it. "The people" who make the most fuss about the patronage are a small band of lazy, disreputable adventurers, of whom the real people entertain a very low opinion. The talk about the young man preparing himself in Government offices at Washington for the government of territories, sounds like a poor joke. If serious, the answer is that, as a matter of fact, men do not prepare themselves for governorships in this way; and if they did, they would not get them. The officers at present are not responsible to the people, and the Congressman knows they are not; he might as well say they were responsible to the solar system. They are responsible to a few political managers, who care nothing about the people; and their tenure of office does not depend in the smallest degree on the manner in which they perform their duties. The assertion that the shortness of the terms prevents fraud, while it excites our admiration for his character, leads us to fear that our Congressman is too sweetly simple to be long left in this wicked and cunning world. How he can have preserved his innocence in Washington passes our comprehension. We infer, however, from "Clericus's" report, that our Congressman has never properly examined the question of Civil Service reform; that he knows little or nothing either of the defects of the present system or of the virtues of any other; that he has not read any books, papers, or documents on the subject, and, if he has, has failed to comprehend them; and finally, that he has contracted the bad habit, so common amongst politicians, of saying the people will not submit to any measure those gentlemen themselves dislike, and which led to our being so often informed during the last seven years that the people would not submit to the draft; that they would not submit to taxation; that they would not pay the national debt; and that they would not do anything except what the principal rascals in the community thought would be agreeable and profitable.

An attempt was made two years ago to break down the public credit on this very ground. The people, it was said, would never consent to fulfil their agreement with the public creditors; and Senator Sherman and several prominent journals advised the public creditors to accept a compromise at once, lest a worse thing should befall them; and a majority of the House of Representatives, led by General Butler, voted for a special tax on the interest coupons of the Government bonds. All this while the people had never been consulted; when they were, they elected to follow the rule of honesty. To say now that if it is shown, as it can readily be, that the present system of appointment to office is carrying corruption into every department of public life, and rendering all public offices the prey of gamblers, the people will deliberately persist in maintaining it for the sake of the infinitesimally remote chance that each man has of getting a place in the post-office or custom-house or a foreign consulship, is to say that popular government on this continent is a failure. No public man has any right to act or talk on the assumption that the people are either fools or knaves. Any people whose judgment was permanently clouded could not possibly maintain a political system like that of the United States. Mr. Jenckes's bill may not be the best remedy for the evil, but it certainly contains the principle of the remedy. This Government is based on a recognition of the human nature there is in man; and one of its objects is to call out and encourage what is best in human nature. The present mode of appointing to office calls out and encourages what is worst in human nature as effectually and as carefully as if it had been framed by the devil himself. To see the system pushed to its logical conclusion, we must look to the State and to the various State officers—such, for instance, as those connected with the administration of justice. This is probably as bad a sight, to any one with a proper notion of what the functions of government are, as ever was witnessed. When one sees seats on the judicial bench offered as stakes to political gamblers, and the wardenships and inspectorships of prisons placed at the disposal of the worst class in the community, and the poor prisoners delivered to them as their prey, as any one may see who reads the last report of the Prison Association in this State, one must conclude either that the whole human race has been mistaken from the beginning as to the foundations of human society, or that the prolongation of the present state of things must end in breaking down the Government.

We do not deny that the reform would at first probably shock a good many people in the country districts. The present generation has grown up in familiarity with rotation in office, and many would probably at first be disposed to look on permanent officials as usurpers. A bad habit is of course not to be destroyed in a day; but it is not indestructible. The spoils system has diffused a spirit of gambling through the whole political class, which it will take time and trouble to repress, just as if the Government had relied for half a century—as many European governments have done in part—on the lottery business as a means of raising the revenue, and had thereby corrupted the morals of the community, and made steady industry distasteful. A proposal to substitute regular taxation for the lotteries would be met by precisely the same arguments as the Jenckes bill. It would be said that it might be very well for monarchical governments to raise money by taxation, but our people were not used to having the tax-gatherer coming to their houses, and would not submit to it; that the drawing of prizes furnished a source of excitement to the country districts, which, right or wrong, they would not lightly surrender, and surrounded the collection of the revenue with agreeable associations which it would be dangerous to remove; that the calculation of chances in lotteries prepared young men for the more complicated operations of commerce and industry, while the constant exposure of the holders of tickets to violent alternations of hope and disappointment fortified the character for the vicissitudes of American life, and prevented our young men stagnating into contented humdrums like the downtrodden inhabitants of the European monarchies.

THE EXISTENCE OF THE LOBBY.

The correspondent whose letter on corruption in Massachusetts we published in our issue of July 1, in the course of his remarks used the following words with reference to the existence of the lobby:

"There are undoubtedly evils attending this; but as long as it is not only the right but the duty of legislators to get information from any proper source—from newspapers or from their constituents—and as long as committees do not report the evidence presented to them, or the reasons on which they act, and as long as amendments to bills are acted upon without going to any committee, some kind of lobby will continue to be a necessity. No modern legislative assembly ever existed without it, and it is safe to say that none like ours ever will."

This defence of the lobby—that it exists for purposes of necessary information—is often made, and is, we believe, without a shadow of foundation. In order to see on what grounds it rests, it is worth while to examine into the character and constitution of the body in question; and in doing this, let us say beforehand that we do not refer to it as it appears in legislatures confessedly corrupt, but as it reveals itself in those States where the lawgivers are only suspected. Of course, in such cities as Albany its existence is easily enough explained. But in Boston, or Lansing, where corrupt legislation is not yet recognized as a legitimate mode of acquiring fame and wealth—is the lobby there simply a means of furnishing information to members?

This body, which is said to perform so important a function, is composed of men absolutely unknown, except to that small portion of the community which needs their assistance; and those who do know them have the lowest opinion of them; for an acquaintance with their careers generally brings to light transactions of the most questionable (or unquestionable) character. Sometimes they have formerly sat in the legislature in which they now lobby, and, having failed of a re-election, seek to turn to account the small knowledge of the weaker side of members which they learnt there. Sometimes they are "prominent journalists," who have an interest in financial operations, and who turn a penny every now and then by hints as to possible revelations of uncomfortable facts. The professional lobbyist is a man whom everybody suspects; who is generally during half the year without any honest means of livelihood; and whose employment by those who have bills before a legislature is only resorted to as a disagreeable necessity. More than this, the lobbyists are men, as may be imagined, whose knowledge of facts connected with bills on their passage must be of the scantiest; whose only knowledge, in fact, is confined to what they can pick up from hearing members converse and debate. We may say, therefore, that the only office they can perform is to tell one member what they have heard other members say they were thinking about.

Yet it is to men like these that our correspondent would have us believe members must go in order to obtain information. So far from going to them, any one in search of information on which to base his vote would avoid them as utterly unreliable. Not before judges find it necessary to call in "professional witnesses" in order to decide cases, shall we believe that legislators require the aid of professional lobbyists to enable them to decide on the merits of bills. To say that legislation must be based on information furnished by one of the least respected classes in a State is not to defend that class, but to attack the reputation of the men who seek the information. The statement of our correspondent, that no modern legislative assembly ever existed without a lobby, is a mistake; the thing was unknown even forty years ago. In those days, political ambition was still an honorable one; then every young American of public spirit looked forward to a political career as the crowning glory of a well-spent life; then men were elected to office because they were needed by the public, not because a salary was needed by them; character and intelligence and experience were recognized as among the tests of fitness; "soundness" on this or that issue was not the only test. In those days, men who should have undertaken to make a business of "furnishing information" to members, in consideration of small sums paid them by railroads or manufacturers or ship-builders or other great "interests," so far from finding their information heard with attention, would have found themselves very summarily ejected from their field of operations. In fact, however much we may have improved in other respects, in the character of our politicians we have degenerated. Though we take as great an interest in politics as ever, the interest we take is in "questions" and platforms and "issues;" no longer in the men who make them. Politics has become the profession of a class; "politician," for some reason, has come to mean something very like trickster—or, as we heard it put the other day, "one who has made it the study of his life to make himself acceptable to infamous men;" and out of this decay the lobby has sprung up.

Those lawgivers of to-day who seek the aid of the lobby do so because improper motives influence them in their votes. By "improper" we do not necessarily mean corrupt; there is every shade of impropriety. What we mean to say is, that a member who votes for a bill to-day is apt to do so not upon any profound investigation of its nature and probable effect upon the welfare of the State, but after a thoughtful enquiry on such points as whether it will injure or advance his chances of re-election; whether it is a dangerous bill, or a party bill, or a bill which has some connection with some other bill which may bear on his re-election? Who favors it, he wants to know? Does any one favor it who is prominent "inside of politics?" and so on. These are the questions which a legislator asks to-day; and it is out of the answers to these questions that the lobby makes its living—not furnishing this necessary information to the legislators, but to those interested in the bill.

THE DIFFICULTIES OF ECONOMICAL DISCUSSION.

The World the other day ridiculed a professor for desiring to see the tariff question taken out of the arena of party politics and treated simply as a scientific question, which it really is, and the Evening Post protests in somewhat similar terms against the notion that anything can be accomplished towards reforming the tariff, or anything else in a free country, except through politics. All this is quite true; but then the object the tariff reformers have in view is to place the tariff legislation on a scientific basis, and this cannot be done unless the question has previously passed through a scientific stage of discussion; and Mr. Bonamy Price, in his recent book on the currency, sets down as one of the greatest difficulties attending the study or practice of the science, the general impression that political economy is the same thing as statesmanship, and that a man who knows political economy is sure to be a good legislator. It is hardly ever considered purely as a science, and it will be a long time before it can hope to be so considered under a popular government; and there is, perhaps, no problem of political economy which has less chance of scientific treatment than the best mode of raising revenue, and this for the simple reason that "there is money in it," as the lobbyists say. No matter what may be the motives of the general public in putting on protective duties on foreign commodities, the result of doing so is to create a large class who have a pecuniary interest in maintaining the duties, and, this class called into existence, farewell to science or scientific treatment. When the question of continuing the duties, the question whether they have not been in existence long enough, or the question whether they ought ever to have been imposed at all, comes up for discussion, it is invariably mixed up with a great variety of considerations, some economical, some social, some moral, some religious, and some personal. It will be said that the tariff ought to be maintained for the elevation of the workingman; for the purpose of preparing the country for a foreign war at some indefinite period; for the purpose of diversifying industry and so improving the mental faculties of the population; for the purpose of punishing some foreign power for bad behavior; for the national honor and glory, and so on.

Not one of these considerations has anything economical about it, or is one on which a scientific economist has any opinion to offer; they are things for the consideration of the politician, properly so called; but a great misfortune of the times is that the distinction between the spheres of the two men is entirely overlooked. Lord Derby, for instance, when he was opposing free trade in corn in order that England might not become dependent on foreign countries for food, and in order that the landed interest might be maintained in health and prosperity, thought he was talking political economy, but he was not—he was talking politics; and half his hatred of free trade was composed of the land-owner's jealousy and distrust of the manufacturer. So it is here; anybody who takes the trouble to read the curious essays Mr. Greeley is presenting his readers in the Tribune, under the name of a treatise on political economy, will find hardly a trace of the science in them. They consist of a collection of political and social theories and personal reminiscences. In fact, there is something really remarkable in his own faith that he is talking science. For instance, he declares the object of political economy to be the conversion of good-for-nothing non-producers into moral and industrious producers, which, if true, would make it the principal business of political economists to establish jails, industrial schools, and reformatories; and anybody who differs with him he pronounces a blockhead or "bleareyed pedant." Some of the weapons he employs in the discussion, too, are very curious. Mr. Wells having produced some facts which seem to controvert Mr. Greeley's theories, he declares solemnly that in his opinion Mr. Wells is bribed. He publishes a long list of income returns, furnished him by revenue officers, whose accuracy, it seems, he does not take the least trouble to test, for the purpose, as he alleges, of exposing those who evade paying their dues to the Government; and although under the law the return is no evidence whatever of the amount of a man's income—the interest or dividends of money invested in the stock of corporations having the tax deducted by the corporation—he holds up to execration those whose names do not appear in his columns, or whose returns do not seem to their neighbors to account for their expenditure. This is bad enough; but he also tells us that he publishes the list partly by way of supporting his political economy—that he reveals the incomes of such editors and public men as advocate direct taxation in order that, if their returns seem small compared to their style of living, they may be brought to shame, and their opinions on direct taxation receive no more attention. In like manner, he who is advocating the interests of men who have millions dependent on the maintenance of the tariff, gravely calls on the public to disregard the advocacy of free-trade principles of anybody who is either engaged in foreign trade or has relatives engaged in it; he always treats a European's, and especially an Englishman's, opinions on economical science with the same mixture of amusement at the man's impudence and hypocrisy as one might treat a pauper's preaching in favor of a community of goods, or a liquor-dealer's opposition to temperance. Nevertheless he is the social and political guide, philosopher, and friend of half a million of voters, and a score of free-trade papers have to keep diligently replying to him and showing him up. Now to get an idea of the distance which separates us from scientific discussion of the question, we ought to fancy ourselves discussing chemical, or astronomical, or even metaphysical questions in this way, rejecting one doctrine or treating it with suspicion because the founder was a Frenchman; trying to throw discredit on another because the author lived on bad terms with his wife; vigorously preaching the truth of another because, if adopted, it would promote temperance or early rising; and insisting with regard to another that any man who held it must have been paid cash for doing so. Suppose the leading chemists, mathematicians, and astronomers, or even jurists, went to work in this way, what kind of world should we be living in, and what kind of future should we have before us? Suppose our acceptance of the law of gravitation had been delayed by the war of 1812, or our belief in the atomic theory shaken by the Alabama case, or Laplace's Theory of Probabilities discredited by the invasion of Mexico?

Of course political economy makes no approach to an exact science, but it is a system of discoverable laws, and the discovery, statement, or illustration of these laws is a work distinct from that of the legislator, who is to make them the basis of his legislation; and this distinction ought to be kept constantly before the public mind. The question of how far the laws of political economy shall be applied in legislation is one which will always rouse passion and prejudice. This cannot be avoided; it comes home too nearly to every man's business and bosom. If I have $100,000 invested in a mill, you cannot get me to talk calmly and philosophically about a proposition to sacrifice me to the free working of those principles of human nature which make buying in the cheapest market and selling in the dearest the best mode of increasing the national wealth; and if I am paying two dollars a yard for cloth when with open ports I might have it for one, you cannot get me to listen to the domestic cloth manufacturer's statement of the protectionist theory as the statement of a philanthropic scientist. But by college education, popular lectures, and the distribution of books and pamphlets, the great mass of the people can be taught that there is a science of political economy; they can be taught what its laws are, how the knowledge of them has been arrived at, how they may be tested, and how totally independent they are of political feeling, and how ridiculous it is to mix them up with purely moral or political considerations. This done, a basis will be laid for sound and rational legislation on the subject; charlatans and quacks will cease to get a hearing; and people will cease to confound, as they do now, the outlay of money for a moral good with the increase of wealth for its own sake.

WORK FOR THE TRENTON CONVENTION.

Mr. Beecher has well said that we seem to be entering upon an educational era; at no time in our national life have questions of culture, moral and intellectual, occupied so large a share of the public attention; a great part of the people seems to have advanced to the consideration of matters subsisting in a higher plane than that of mere politics. Just now education affords to writers and speakers before the people topics of great interest; and the interest with which the Trenton meeting of the 16th of August will be generally regarded, will depend chiefly upon the attention given by the National Teachers' Association to questions of vital moment which have already for some time been urged upon the notice of the thinking friends of education.

We speak advisedly in saying that at no time in the history of the Government have educators had stronger assurances of comfort and aid in their work from heads of departments and other officials in high places. This leads us to mention the Department of Education at Washington as a matter calling for some special effort on the part of educational men. It has barely escaped destruction at the hands of politicians, having passed through a very severe trial during the last session of Congress. But there is good reason for believing that the worst is over; we look with confidence to the present administration to uphold and encourage the Department until it shall have acquired such character and influence as will give it permanence as a Governmental agency. But friendly officials will look to literary men, and especially to teachers, for assistance in removing wrong impressions that may have prevailed respecting its functions, and in putting the whole matter in such light as will win the favor of an intelligent public. Surely this will not be difficult to do. The idea of founding it originated with the schoolmasters of the country, and they should be the last to allow their only medium of influence in the Government to be destroyed in its infancy. It is, perhaps, true that under the present management much less has been done for the cause it represents than was hoped for by its particular friends. It may be that the management has not been all that it should have been. If so, there is a remedy, and teachers have it in their power to secure the adoption of specific means to this end, and there ought to be no hesitation for the sake of persons. But whatever may have been the cause of a seeming failure of the Department, educators will certainly not so soon relinquish their views respecting its powers and capacities to serve the highest interests of the public. On the contrary, it is in the minds of many able men to ask at the hands of the General Government a much larger recognition of educational interests than is now provided for in the Department with its restricted powers. And if, through the various associations, all literary men, including editors, authors, college professors, teachers, clergymen, and publishers could be persuaded to make common cause for such large recognition of education, there would arise a most powerful agency for the promotion of interests which are common to them all. An "expression of opinion" by the teachers at Trenton, however earnest and strong, will not alone suffice for their part of the work. But careful consideration should be given to the question of how best something definite and to the purpose may be done in the matter—something to be recommended through the press, and vigorously advocated in public, with a view to securing legislation at the coming session of Congress. This is one of that class of measures which will in the end justify the hardest work in its behalf, and we trust the convention may be in the mind to make a beginning at it.

The objects aimed at by Mr. Jenckes's bill are akin to those pursued by the Department of Education. Indeed, the purposes of the Civil Service Bill might well be made a part of the offices of the Department of Education. But, whether or not they differ in practical operation so far as to render their efficient working under one head impossible, yet both are alike matters of concern to all intelligent and honest men, inasmuch as both seek to incorporate into the Governmental machinery an element of intelligence that shall be an eye to the public, observing and discriminating in the control of affairs. And perhaps nothing could contribute much more toward increasing the demand at large for the labor of the schoolmaster than the adoption by Government of a measure making intellectual ability a qualification for office. This great measure then ought, we think, to receive the hearty approval of the convention, which should forward it by all the means in its power.

The intellectual wants of the freedmen claim the especial attention of every person particularly interested in carrying on the work of popular education. Not alone for the reason that, as a people, we are not secure with an enfranchised ignorant class among us. There is a peculiar phase of the matter that deserves notice. The idea of popular intelligence carries with it the largest liberty of thought on all subjects open to human consideration. And this is as applicable to religious thinking as any other. While it is eminently desirable that the black race should be educated, it is not so desirable that, pliant as it is, its education should fall into the hands of sectarian teachers—especially into the hands of the teachers of that sect which is working hardest for the control of the entire country. The question of the education of the freedmen ought, in our judgment, to be removed wholly and at once from the power of sects to determine and control. We believe that the strictly popular and free basis which has already worked so well in the United States, is the best basis of a common-school system; and we have no desire to repeat on any scale the experience of England, where the sectarian system has for its result an ignorance on the part of the children of the state not only of everything else, but even of the creed itself to which so costly a sacrifice has been made. The convention should strenuously advocate the free-school system, with State normal schools and their appropriate adjuncts, for all the States South, and it should take steps for aiding by every possible means in making them efficient. There is still abundant room for philanthropic effort in this direction. The National Association of Teachers can, if it will, thwart all attempts to change the appliances of education into agencies for proselytizing.

The general question of the relation of the Roman Catholic Church to the schools is one which the educators of the country, noted for their tolerant views, would doubtless rather avoid if they could honestly do so, but which the Church insists on forcing upon the public attention, and which it seems determined to have settled in its favor. We are not slow to acknowledge the many good things of Catholicism; but we confess to being more devoted to the free-school system, as being the support of good government, the foundation of national and individual intelligence and efficiency, than to almost any other earthly establishment; and when that system is attacked with a view to its final overthrow, we regard whosoever or whatever makes the attack as one of the worst enemies of the commonwealth. Have we such an enemy? No one doubts it who reads the Romanist press. Said the Catholic Telegraph of Cincinnati, recently: "It will be a glorious day for Catholics in this country when, under the blows of justice and humanity, our school system will be shivered to pieces; until then, modern paganism will triumph." This is but a plain expression of the sentiments uttered by the Bishop of Baltimore in his letter to the Church, entertained by all consistent and intelligent Catholics, and that are to be entertained by all the rest when the time comes for their general promulgation. There is no reason for avoiding the discussion at this time, and good reason for desiring it; the conflict cannot but result in a final settlement of the question of sectarian legislation. We know of no better way than for the body of intelligent men assembled at Trenton to give the whole matter a clear but temperate setting forth.

ART-STUDY IN THE IMPERIAL SCHOOL AT PARIS.

NO. V.

"STYLE" AND "QUALITY"—THE ROUTINE OF WORK—EUGENIE.

Our académies, or studies of the figure, after all the care they receive, finish by kicking about the studio, by being used for wrappers and envelopes, by serving as palimpsests of a variously burlesque and disrespectful nature, and, generally, by being handled without gloves. And then the professor—his Saturday comments, when the copies are finished for inspection, are often accompanied with illustrative lines, where the crayon deeply drives its plowshare over the most dainty surfaces, leaving devastation and disfigurement behind. Of course these impolite diagrams become the elements of value in the picture; but it is striking at first to see the relish with which the professional weapon will scathe and blacken the best dandyisms of the stump or brush.

"Bad. Bad. Strongly bad. Bad as to design. Bad as to movement. Bad as to feeling. Bad as to color." This minute damnation, enforced with a repudiating gesture that set the disciple's easel reeling, was perhaps the dreadfullest I have heard. It closed with a look—the professor musing upon his pupil, while his passionless eye sank deliberately into that of the unlucky youth. It was the scapegrace son of a quite famous cattle painter and etcher; but the young reprobate has a regard like a Malay's, peeping from under a shadowy, treacherous eyelash that is never fully lifted and not often lowered; but the piratical black flag was struck at this signal encounter, and young Jacques soon slunk off to reappear no more that day. The terms of criticism most commonly heard from M. Gérôme are themselves picturesque and subtle signs of discrimination. "Too insipid, too molle;" this is said of the flesh, or, as the French say, the skin: "inlaid;" this condemns our anatomy, when it has the look of being patched on the surface rather than woven under from the bone: "false sentiment;" this stricture is not necessarily applied to a Della Cruscan elegance, but has been heard over a drawing of the Laocoön expressing too much passion and motion instead of the wonderfully-caught rigidity of the original: "you have not seized the movement;" this is one of the commonest of our difficulties; the word may apply to the most inert things, as the sweep of a lock of hair; the lay of a fold of drapery, or of patterns on the fold; the expression of a supine hand, etc.

Outside the walls within which M. Gérôme's opinion reigns as law, I believe the work of the master himself forms food for the worm of envy or detraction. "That spreader of sticking-plasters," "those figures painted with currant-jelly"—such are the disparagements I have heard applied to the limner of the Dead Cæsar. I confine myself to quoting the opinions of painters, who usually restrict their comments to a brother artist's technique, without verging at all upon the broad question of his morale. The public at large is probably the better critic of the influence of that striking succession of drama-tableaux which have been issuing for the last twenty years from under his firm hand. I have seen them nearly all, from his first painting, a Madonna that out-Raphaeled Raphael in self-conscious maidenliness and repose. His principal pictures, as my reader is aware, divide themselves into two classes; there is the class in which a murdered corpse lies in the extreme foreground, in company with the spectator, with the wounds carefully bleeding; and there is the class in which Gérôme's peculiar enamelled woman stands "beautiful for ever" on her rostrum, thrown at the beholder in the same raw way. I have my opinion, in common with the world of the external public, of the didactic quality of these representations, while still preserving the disciple's enthusiasm for the mysterious ability with which they are executed. The mercantile freshness and "condition" of all that reeking butcher's meat; the insulted nakedness of that perpetual woman, who is never innocently nude or unconscious of raiment, but always stripped exceptionally, whether she be the Almeh, or the Cairene slave, or the Queen of Lydia, or Cleopatra emerging from the roll, or Phryne unveiled by Hyperides—this active killing and skinning for the sensation market is, I believe, very coolly estimated among the co-citizens of the painter, who is husband to the daughter of a great picture-merchant, while the bullet of another woman's jealous husband remaining in his arm attests the sincerity of his experiments in both of his principal genres. I touch upon these patent or notorious facts as lightly as possible, and confine my attention to the masterly, orderly narrative-power of Gérôme—a power, I think, akin to that of the ablest dramatist or sonnetteer, or whatever writer makes his business the expressing of himself fully and neatly within his limitations. Has figure-painting ever been so skilfully welded upon literature-painting, since the day of Veronese, as in the "Death of Cæsar?" Have figures and architecture, treated with a sense of landscape, ever met so gracefully as in the "Gladiators?" Is there another such stylist living?

In adjacent rooms, Cabanel teaches quality and Gérôme style. The pupils have perseveringly opened peep-holes in the partition between the two ateliers, though I believe not so much with views of exchanging and catholicizing the propagandism as from certain inferior motives. When a model of Cabanel's is doing up her hair, there is always a benevolent watcher on our side ready to spread the news and allow the Gérômanists to con the lesson. Through these crevices we can, if we choose, get the benefits of instruction from the neighboring professor. Cabanel, who could have learned from Gérôme a better disposition of the leading lines in his "Paradise Lost," which has been compared to a sprawling panel of paper-hangings, teaches splendor and texture; Gérôme, who could never have painted the fingers of Cabanel's faun sinking into the white side of the nymph, explains anatomy with admirable insight and system. The pupils, unknown to the official oversight, have opened out a community of schools. There is even the means of personal and bodily communication. No rule is more strict than that which forbids the inmates of one atelier to visit the interior of another. Yet, by means of certain elevated and unnoticed windows in the dressing-rooms, a transit can be effected by persons of a daring and gymnastic turn. The first time I was aware of this was one morning when I happened to be working in view of the lofty casement of our little vestry, which aperture was suddenly filled by a living figure; it was the apparition of a singularly handsome young man, who chose for his visiting-costume the uniform in which Adam is supposed to have done his horticulture. This figure descended like a Mercury, came into broader light among us, smoked a cigarette with one of our fellows, had a good chat, and vanished like a moonbeam at some alarm in the corridor. It was a favorite young model. The openings aforesaid make us privy to any interesting noises that may be going on in the atelier Cabanel. There are fights, in which we sometimes mix, descending like martial gods from the empyrean; there is, besides, a wonderful baritone, a church chorister, among the acolytes of the painter of Venuses; when he sings, our room is hushed as death. Once this lyric creature was good enough to visit us, with a train of singing-boys. It was odd to see them drop one by one from the high window, each preserving with the utmost care a lighted match. With these held out for tapers, they then made a procession among our company, softly singing a beautiful mass. Alas! they had miscalculated, and the anthem came near ending purgatorially. They had not remembered the day, and Gérôme entered just as they were passing around the external circle of our pupils. Nothing, fortunately, came of it. The lights were cleverly dropped, the visitors transformed themselves into attentive pupils glued to hasty pieces of work, and then, while Gérôme was attending to the inner group of pupils with his peculiar absorbed energy, our choir managed to pass around one by one into the dressing-room and soar like silent spirits out at the window. It was the only time the pupils of qualité ventured to attend at the renseignements du style.

Certainly, these are not quite the most ordinary sights in life. Apollo in the zenith, gathering his neat limbs for a spring; or a file of spectral choristers, startling as the ghosts of the wicked nuns in "Robert," coming down threaded and lighted from the ceiling, and vociferating Mozart as they drop—these obviously are not conventional, but they are not very striking in the atelier. They are quite within its atmosphere, and do not perturb the quiet diurnal order there. The better conditioned of the students have attained a Buddhistical tranquillity and absence of nerves, and will sit cross-legged on a color-box, in front of the pile of joss-paper on which is delineated the sacred ideal, through all the uproar of mundane revolutions. It is a school where no one need attempt to study who cannot concentrate himself upon his task while the company around shall be fighting, disputing, engaging in games of skill, or perhaps throwing the whole force of its lungs into an abominable cat's-chorus. In the midst of Pandemonium the harmonious structure of his art must rise like an exhalation. The true events of school life are the schooling and the advance; not the describable things, not the holidays and junketings, not the diversions and recreations I have attempted to portray. What is really the week's affair to the Beaux-Arts man is his "academy." On Monday he hits the pose, which is always vigorously pronounced and spirited, on the model's part, when first assumed; the dash that may be thrown into the attitude while the figure is perfectly fresh can never be caught up again if missed at the beginning. By Tuesday the artist has become absorbed in the complications of light and shade. On Wednesday the master comes, and perhaps rejects nearly everything that has been done, disfiguring and blotting the sketch from one margin to the other. The model, drooping upon his daïs, may bear little resemblance to the elastic attitude of the drawing, and the student is accused of attempting to idealize. You have been trying to modify nature from your reminiscences of the antique; you have ennobled the head, braced the shoulders," etc. The study is altered, in the spirit of realism, until all the stark and pitiful ugliness of the model's lassitude is expressed. One of the difficulties of a life "academy" is that, although the example before you is a moving, changing object, now braced, now drooping, now turned a little to the right and now a little to the left, your copy of it is expected to show all the purism of the photograph. If you were putting the same model into a historical picture, you would be expected to elevate the attitude and expression; and you would then begin to hear from your critics a great deal about the difficulty and responsibility of borrowing from nature, what to take and what to leave. "Only Phidias and Da Vinci," I have heard declared, "and perhaps Michael Angelo, deserved to have received the revelations of anatomy." If, on the other hand, you were copying the antique, you would have the full luxury of refining your line and your form, with no limitation of time and with a rigid model. The life "academy," then, is expected to avoid the imaginative qualities of picture, and to win, from a constantly deteriorating example, the accuracy which is so fascinating a quest in copying from statuary. A felicitous study is therefore a very desirable treasure, and old forgotten ones by Couture or Flandrin are preserved in the ateliers where those painters have studied, used as paradigms by teachers, or sold as something of unique value in the color-stores.

Another trouble is the variation in the color of the air on different days. "The patron has accused me," an energetically protesting youth will cry, "of seeking the silver tint of Terburg; it was as far from my thoughts as silver from my pocket. But I established my key of color on Thursday, when there was a solid gray rain like slate-pencils; and the Italian turned blue and chattered; and how will you expect the tones of Titian in such a climate, mes frères?"

On the closing day of the week I have known an incorrigibly gay lad to exhibit a canvas almost completely expunged by the blottings of the professor. "This was to have been my masterpiece. I meant it for the altar of the church where I was baptized, whether as a St. Michael or a John in the Wilderness. The outline was good until Auguste changed it into a caricature of the Prince Imperial. Then Sarat must needs employ my poor 'academy' as a shield in his redoubtable duel; the sword went through, in such a way that my poor figure is décolletée. But that is not the worst; the canvas became loosened, and vibrated to my touch as I worked. Shall I tell you what is bad for the eyesight? It is when a figure trembles in the stretcher like a spider in the middle of her wheel, and the eye is forced to dart in and out to catch it like the eye of a snail. Then my picture was glued to Eugène's as they were cleaning the room—and you know how much an artist gains by contact with Eugène. Here, Eugène, take back the obligation!" And the picture was broken over the head of the young man, abundantly unctuating his hair and finally resting on his shoulders.

The daily routine is as humdrum as any course of study in the world, and the jokes of the Latin Quartier, very striking at first, soon manifest their character of old traditional Joe Millers, repeated time and again. French wit seems, to an American, wanting in audacity, invention, and flexibility. A circle of Yankee boys will make a far greater number of incongruities spring up from the occasion than can their more polished Gallic contemporaries. The toilsome days wear on, relieved by the alleviations of use and wont, and finding their best comfort in the culture and improvement they have brought. One day, however, we had a genuine sensation. It was after hours, and the great room was only sparsely occupied by those frugal youths who have a habit of using it in the afternoons instead of a private atelier, and by a few boys whom the professor had set to copying casts. The Industrious Apprentice had left, and Tom Idle reigned supreme. It may be confessed, however, that the raff remaining in the afternoons is the most companionable and amusing; and I often stay for a little study of character. These idlers are the buffoons of the class; they are the ones who receive the comic nicknames; they are the obliging souls who will give you lessons with the foils or in the French wrestling lutte. They are the worst dressed, the most imperfectly purified, the handsomest, the most agreeable rascals of the whole crowd. A bare half-dozen of this sort of objects, in as many picturesque eccentricities of costume, were gathered around the Lapin, who had cocked over his long nose a sailor's crimson bonnet, and whom the rest were burlesquing, teasing, and copying; the cocked-hat from outside the door suddenly entered, followed by its owner, who was cringing, bowing, and positively blushing at the rarest chance that had probably illuminated his life up to the date. The Empress!

Eugénie entered rapidly, smiling and ejaculating, with the air of a woman charmed to be doing something sly and uncommon. The Emperor was examining another part of the building, and did not enter the painting ateliers. A stout gentleman, plainly dressed and of the easiest possible manners, waited on his imperial mistress, and received her frequent sallies and jokes.

A pretty boy, who sat in front of the Lapin, with his back to the door, had not observed the sudden invasion. Before he knew what was happening, a little blue-gloved hand had touched the down on his chin, and a kind question about his work had the effect of frightening him nearly speechless. It was a room never entered by an honest woman, and a youth who had never, scarcely, conversed with a lady. "Why, you see, la dame, the Lapin brought a red nightcap, and I thought there would be no harm——"

His awkwardness provoked a pretty ringing laugh. The stout gentleman then laughed in basso, and our boys in various broken falsettoes according to their age. The Empress gave an amused glance at the caricatures with which the wall was tapestried, and in a minute her graceful figure and delicate face were gone again. One of the immortals had appeared, and alone.

Correspondence.

WHAT OUR CONGRESSMAN SAYS OF THE CIVIL SERVICE BILL.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: The principles underlying the Civil Service Bill are so self-evident, and their presentation in the Nation has been so forcible, that I became just a little over-confident. Happening in company with our Congressman, I introduced the subject to him. Now, I am a clergyman, and, like an editor, am not in the habit of being interrupted when I am speaking. But this M.C. spoke right out in meeting. I will tell you what he said, and you will doubtless be gratified to see how successful you were, not long since, in prophesying the burden of the speeches the coming session. But some things you will find here that were not in your prophecy. Lest another vision should fail to reveal them to you, I send it all along.

In the first place, he said, the evils which the Civil Service Bill aims to remove are now at their height, and will of themselves grow less; for we expect to pay our public debt and come down to a comparatively moderate expenditure. And then it would be entirely preposterous to attempt to apply the principles of the bill anywhere except in Washington. The people would not submit to have a class of office-holders snugly ensconced in all the places of trust and emolument at the disposal of the Government. The people believe, and believe truly, that the Government should extend the blessing of its patronage to as many as it wisely can.

When I suggested that the English submitted to it readily, and that they were peculiarly a liberty-loving people, he denied that the cases were at all parallel, asserting that the people did not rule in England as they do here.

And then as to the clerkships at Washington, he said no aspiring young man wanted one for any great length of time. But it was a great advantage for a young man who wished to fit himself for the governorship of a territory, or some other high trust at the disposal of the Executive, to spend a time at Washington, where he could have the advantages of its law school and breathe its political atmosphere.

As to the service the country might get, he affirmed that it would be likely to be worse than now, under the Civil Service Bill; for the officers under this régime would not be responsible to the people, as they now are. And he said the most of these offices required only duties with the routine of which one could be very readily made familiar, and, except in some of the more responsible positions, raw hands do about as well as experienced. Besides, clerks are more honest for short terms than for long; for they have not time to become adepts in fraud before they are turned out. And, finally, it is good for young men to change frequently. It gives them broader characters.

This, Mr. Editor, is not a fancy sketch, but a bona-fide representation of our Congressman's views. He stated his views more eloquently than I have done; but here you have the substance. So you may know what to depend on. And this Congressman is an educated man of large business capacity—not one of the leaders in Congress, it is true; neither one that is "thunderin' eminent for never bein' heard on."

If they won't receive the "Civil Service Bill" as part of the canon, where can I get a text to preach from next time?

Clericus.

MR. WORMAN AND HIS "ENDORSERS."

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Allow me, through the columns of your paper, to confess a mistake, and perhaps to redress a wrong I have unintentionally assisted in committing.

A few months ago the publishers of Worman's Grammars sent me a specimen copy of Worman's "Complete German Grammar;" afterwards, also one of his "Elementary Grammar," fourth edition, revised. From Prof. Worman I received a note, asking me for my opinion, etc. Not having the time for an accurate examination of the books, I merely glanced at the tables of declensions, paradigms, etc.; noticed the excellent type and some other external features, as, for instance, the use of larger type for the endings of declined words, etc.; and thus received, as I must confess, a very favorable impression of the book. It is true I was struck with a few singular blunders which I accidentally noticed, but had no idea that there would be any more of such than are generally found in many American text-books. Accordingly, I sat down to write a short complimentary note to Prof. Worman, in which I expressed myself in terms usual on such occasions. In this consists my mistake, for which I have reason to be very sorry indeed. I should hesitate to confess this publicly, were it not that the book has since received its due at the hands of a competent scholar, Prof. Gustavus Fischer, and that the very just criticisms of this gentleman have elicited a most scandalous and preposterous reply on the part of the publishers, Messrs. Barnes & Co.

Prof. Fischer's thorough and accurate review of Worman's book, in the May number of the American Educational Monthly, settled clearly and unmistakably the following points: namely, that Prof. Worman undertook to teach before he had himself been taught; that he set up as an author before he had made himself master of his subject; and that, hence, he is guilty of the charge of charlatanism. How any accurate and competent student of the German language can doubt this—how any respectable teacher of German can dare to risk his reputation by trying to smooth over the almost incredible superficiality of the author of the book reviewed—I am at a loss to understand. Against such proceedings I feel it my duty to protest, and I appeal to those of my colleagues who, for similar reasons, have placed themselves in the same false position, to give openly their verdict against shallowness and pretence.

That verdict cannot be affected in the least by the fact that the revised edition of Worman's "Grammar" contains fewer mistakes than the first. The mere idea of a man's writing a book for general use, without having first made himself master of the subject, is so preposterous and so essentially arrogant that no true man or teacher can have any patience with those who entertain it. It requires no learning to copy from existing books those portions which are generally considered indispensable—namely, the paradigms, tables of declensions, etc. It is also very easy to make a motley collection of rules and illustrations in a similar manner. If this was all, there would be no merit in the work. But who can fail to see that the real work is something very different, and that it consists in something more than a mere reproduction of other works, with only so much originality added as will make it unfit for the use of the student?

Messrs. Barnes & Co. have the boldness to inform the public that even of the most imperfect of the Grammars some 100,000 copies have already been sold. I consider this a frightful evidence of the necessity of just such criticisms as Prof. Fischer has given. If it should be possible for a mere dilettante to succeed at such a rate with his immature productions, without receiving even as much as a public rebuke from the pen of an honest critic, what hopes would there be left for the success of accomplished scholars like Prof. Whitney and others, whose slow and conscientious scholarship is no match for the rapid superficiality of their unworthy rivals? What a premium on quackery if no critic could be found bold enough to face the wrath of the ignorant and to call a literary abortion by its right name!

In conclusion, I would say that a careful reading of Prof. Fischer's article in the May number of the Monthly has satisfied me of the correctness of Prof. Fischer's charge, and of the entire absence in the article of any attempt at quibbling or unfair fault-finding. Prof. Fischer has the very best authority in favor of his criticisms, and those who differ from him—except as regards one or two minor points which may be considered debatable—only prove that they are not competent judges. Prof. Fischer's criticisms need only be read in order to be appreciated by scholars, and none else have a right to be heard in this matter. Respectfully,

CHAS. A. EGGERT.

IOWA STATE UNIVERSITY, IOWA CITY, July 8, 1869.

Notes.

LITERARY.

THE University Publishing Company make announcement of "a book by General Lee," which, however, is hardly to be so described, as it is a new edition of General Henry Lee's "Memoirs of the Southern Campaign"—in the Revolutionary War—which General R. E. Lee has annotated and revised, and for which he has written a biography of his father. The work will contain new steel portraits of General Henry Lee and General Nathanael Greene, and engravings of Marion crossing the Pedee, and Cornwallis surrendering his army at Yorktown, together with original maps and plans. One is reminded again, by this conjunction of biographer and subject, how the fighting of the Revolution—"a war of skirmishes"—has been dwarfed by the war in which Henry Lee's greater son made his celebrity.——Mr. Carleton will publish next week "Claude Gueux" and "The Last Day of a Condemned Man," from the French of Victor Hugo. The two works will be in one volume, and will repay the attention of such of our opponents of capital punishment as are opposed to it on the more sentimental grounds. The same publisher—who is himself a comic draughtsman of some merit—issues a brief prospectus of a new serio-comic magazine—the Kaleidoscope—which will be issued intermittently. It is to be profusely illustrated.

—The Philadelphia Library Company have not rejected, but on the other hand have not accepted, the bequest of the late Dr. Rush. We understand the causes of their hesitation to be two: first, perhaps, the proposed location of the new building, on South Broad Street, on a lot left for the purpose by the testator; and secondly, the smallness of the fund that will remain after half a million of dollars (or more) are expended on the building according to the terms of the will. We do not pretend to know more about this controversy than the Philadelphians themselves, though we cannot help regarding both these reasons as insufficient. It is true, the city is not extending southward, but to the west and north; yet the site in question, which Dr. Rush's executor insists on retaining, is not so far away from the centre or from down-town as the Astor Library is from the same points in this city. It is true, moreover, that the surplus of the legacy, when taxes and building expenses are deducted, and even after the annuities begin to fall in, will be comparatively a small amount; yet what library is too rich to accept the slightest positive accession to its resources? Besides, for the sake of a proper fire-proof building, which may also be an ornament to the city, the bequest ought to be accepted, if for nothing else. It is as notorious as that the Philadelphia Library surpasses all others in Americana, that it is kept in the merest tinder-box, and may any day be consumed. It is scarcely less well known that its management, being in the hands of a few very respectable but not remarkably literary or scholarly families, is slipshod and behind the requirements of so great a city, and that its foreign purchases are made by a gentleman on the other side of the water who seems to have little better claim to so important an office than is furnished by the fact of his father—and perhaps his grandfather—having done the same thing before him. What the friends of culture and popular education, in Philadelphia and out of it, would be glad to see, is the acceptance of the Rush bequest even on the terms assigned, and the most made of it; and what might be made of it is a revival of interest in the present library, a change of direction, and such improvements generally as would enable Philadelphia to compare favorably with New York or Boston. In time, it would probably seem wise to make the library free to the public, but at all events it would be—when their owners die—the natural depository of those private libraries for which Philadelphia has a high repute, just as the Public Library has proved to be in Boston.

—Two correspondents in the latest number of the Historical Magazine give some facts concerning a subject but little known—the American Version, so called, of the Bible. It seems that in 1847 the "various readings" of editions of the Bible published in Great Britain and in this country having attracted the attention of the American Bible Society, that body referred to its Committee on Versions the subject of collating its editions with those issued in England and Scotland. The committee, which was composed of Dr. Gardiner Spring, Dr. Thomas Cock, Dr. Edward Robinson, Dr. John McClintock, and other scholars of equal weight, went to work with a will, and, taking the Society's royal octavo Bible as a standard, they were not long in discovering about twenty-four thousand variations in text and punctuation between that copy and Bibles printed in London, Oxford, Cambridge, and Edinburgh. To be sure, many of the variations were slight, but many were not, and in some instances to leave them uncorrected left the reader a nonsensical version. This, however, seems to have been less of a trouble to certain members of the Society, and to an influential part of the public which the Society aims to satisfy, than the fact that correction of mistakes in the rendering of the original seemed to lead to the unsettling of faith, and to threaten a shaking of confidence in all the vernacular editions of the Scriptures. And, no doubt, it was the opinion of the intelligent that if changes are to be made in our authorized versions, inadequate as these may be, the work of making them should be done not "in hugger-mugger," nor by men more or less carelessly selected, but by some carefully chosen body of scholars, representing, at the least, all the scholarship of some one of the great divisions of Christendom. Possibly, too, there may have been a suspicion, more or less vague, that as regards a matter which evokes so much feeling as the rendering of the Hebrew Scriptures, the chances are so few in a million that we shall soon get a critical, perfectly uncolored translation, that it is best to leave ill enough alone. Such has been the way of founding different forms of belief, and such has been the way of supporting them, that it would be as hard to find among the scholars who are believers in Christianity a body of translators that could command the complete confidence of the Christian world, as it would be to find such a body among the learned who are professors of learning simply, and not of learning and religion both. At any rate, for whatever cause, the version which was made by Dr. Spring and his associates, after it had been accepted by the Society, was at last rejected because of demands from various quarters, and has never been in use; so to-day American Bibles are like English Bibles—that is to say, all English-speaking people are using Bibles which are full of mistakes. It would be curious to know how many sects would vanish away if once we could have a translation of the Scriptures which should not to some extent illustrate the saying that translation is apt to be travesty.

—One of our publishing houses which does a large business in what is called the miscellaneous book trade has for some time been obliged to use a printed circular for the purpose of carrying on one branch of its correspondence with authors, or semi-authors. It reads as follows, and is not encouraging to the translators, nor the translated, nor the publishers—though we hope, for the sake of the latter at least, that the account of sales here given is a little exaggerated, the more to terrify the letter-writers: "The fact that we have had to get a blank printed to answer the large number of letters we receive regarding translations, will show you better than anything we can directly say how very much the supply of such work exceeds the demand. Not one translation out of twenty that are made is ever published, and not one out of twenty that are published ever pays more than its mere cost. In view of these discouraging facts, you will appreciate that there is nothing personally uncomplimentary in our saying that we can do nothing with yours."

—Mr. Charles Reade writes to the publishers and the public at large a letter in these words, which have been lithographed for the Galaxy, and figure as a full-page illustration of the August number of that magazine: "The publishers of the Galaxy pay me a liberal price for 'Put Yourself in His Place.' If I were a mechanical inventor instead of a literary inventor, this payment would secure them the sole legal right. In the present iniquitous, partial, barbarous, and brainless state of law, it only secures them a clear moral right. But I hope all respectable publishers will respect that moral right, will put themselves in their place, and will forbear to reap where they have not sown." Then in the latter part of the magazine we have an equally characteristic "card," in which Mr. Reade delivers himself as follows: "In reply to recent applications for his autograph, Mr. Charles Reade begs to say that this number of the Galaxy contains a fac-simile of his writing, such as it is, and his sentiments into the bargain. This being printed and on sale for one shilling, Mr. Reade will never again pen an autograph for any lady or gentleman with whom he has not the honor to be acquainted." So that point is settled. As to the moral-copyright part of the matter, we hope to see Mr. Reade's wishes and Messrs. Sheldon & Co.'s rights respected; and we hope, too, that Messrs. Sheldon & Co. may see fit to give us this last story in a volume uniform with the set of its author's other stories which Fields, Osgood & Co. have just printed. Most book-buyers in America are agreed in favoring the passage of an international copyright law; but the way in which the publishers fling us their authors in all shapes and forms, making us own a novelist or a poet in three or four or a dozen volumes of two or three or half a dozen different sizes, is a constant temptation to us to pardon the piratical invader who offers us uniformity and attacks a monopoly so exasperatingly exercised. For the rest, Mr. Reade's handwriting is as bold and clear as himself, and habitual "making copy" has not affected its legibility.

—The fortnightly summary of books published or to be published in England contains a good many interesting titles, but we shall wait some time before we see the volumes to which some of them belong. In Theology, we find one more of perhaps the most profitless kind of works that any theology ever fathered—the Rev. Mr. M. Baxter's "Louis Napoleon, the Destined Monarch of the Whole World." The present is the second edition, too. Considerably more cheering to the reader interested in sweetness and light, and even to him interested in dry light and not over-mindful of the sweetness, is the announcement of a new translation—conjectured to have been made by Keble—of "The Imitation of Christ." It is one volume of a set of five, of which the others are Jeremy Taylor's "Holy Living" and "Holy Dying;" Bishop Wilson's—"good Bishop Wilson's"—"Short and Plain Instructions for the Better Understanding of the Lord's Supper;" and William Chilcot's "Evil Thoughts." The latest Ritualistic publication is "Little Hours of the Day, according to the Kalendar of the Church of England," "a series," we are informed, "of day services, doubles and greater doubles of the first and second class." The compiler does not give his name, but "it is easy to see to what school he belongs," as his critics say. Mr. Baxter aforementioned may take pleasure in "Poems by 'Josephine,'" which are advertised, under the title of "Maranatha, 'the Lord is at Hand,'" written in "the firm belief in the near approach of the 'times of restitution of all things' of which God hath spoken." We may mention here that of their "Child's Bible"—illustrated, expurgated, and inclining towards monosyllabism—Messrs. Cassell, Petter & Galpin have already sold more than fifty thousand copies.

—As interesting as any new thing in the world of English Fiction is the announcement that the author of the agreeable and successful Scotch novel of "Blindpits" is Mr. Joseph Hatton, who wrote "The Tallants of Barton," and who is now about giving us a story called "Christopher Kenrick, his Life and Adventures." "My Insect Queen," "Simple as a Dove," "Wise as a Serpent," "Only a Woman's Love," "Ropes of Sand," are other names, some of them curious, of novels just come or coming. The fashion for phrases and sentences as titles is not going out among the English novelists. It never obtained over here, where we seem to stick to the old custom of personal names as titles with a tenacity that suggests some of our other qualities as novel-writers. Allied to fiction is a new book from Mr. John Ruskin, rather fancifully christened "The Queen of the Air," which is a study of the Greek myths of cloud and storm. Tennyson's new poem is announced as "The Quest of the San Greal," but more than that we do not hear of it—whether it is long or short, or how it treats the subject. It seems almost a pity that he could not have left the subject as he left it in "The Holy Grail." Mr. Charles Edward Stewart, who claims to be de jure King of England, and whom we make out to be on duty at the British Museum Library in some capacity, has written a book of "Poems" which will attract some slight attention. Mr. Richard Morris, known for his editorial labors, has his edition of Spenser nearly ready. Professor Max Müller dedicates "to the memory of Colebrooke, Rosen, and Burnouf, the first friends of Vedic scholarship in Europe," his "Rig Veda Sanhita, the Sacred Hymns of the Hindus Translated and Explained"—and translated and explained for the first time, Professor Müller thinks he may say. Everybody will be willing to hear that a forthcoming book in the field of Biography and History is an autobiography of Miss Martineau. Lord Strangford's writings, or selections from them, have appeared in a stout octavo of seven hundred and odd pages. Mr. J. A. Doyle's "American Colonies previous to Independence" is an Oxford prize essay. A Mr. Richard Brown has written a "History of the Island of Cape Breton, with some account of the History and Settlement of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Zealand." What the discovery of New Zealand has to do with Canadian history it is not easy to see. Cape Breton, it may behoove us, as manifest-destinarians, to make ourselves acquainted with; but a book about the Provinces which will attract more American readers is Captain Campbell Hardy's "Forest Life in Acadie"—a record of sporting experiences by a man of the kind who, after all, make almost the best books of sport—British army officers bored in some British colony. To return to the History and Biography, we may force under that head, in virtue of a scrap of biography which the preface furnishes, the fifth edition, with additions and corrections, of Mr. Darwin's "Origin of Species." The author gives a historical sketch of the motive of the work. Five editions of such a book in a period a little short of ten years, is a fact to be noticed. Messrs. Longmans & Co. have in press a one-volume edition—for students' use—of Macaulay's "Historical and Critical Essays," and—of better omen for the boys—a similar volume of Sydney Smith's contributions to the Edinburgh Review—the best things, no doubt, that ever appeared in that periodical. Lady Holland's "Memoir of Sydney Smith" goes into a second edition. "Historical Gleanings"—a series of sketches of Lady Montagu, Walpole, Adam Smith, and Cobbett—is by Professor J. E. Thorold Rogers. A new edition of Sir Joshua Barrington's amusing, if not especially edifying or agreeable, "Sketches of his Own Times" is announced, and will contain much new matter by the editor, Doctor Townsend Young, of Dublin. "The Life of Oliver Cromwell to the Death of Charles I." is a new book on an aged theme, by J. A. Andrews, a barrister. About as little known as any passage of contemporary history—any whose occurrence is known of at all—is the war between Paraguay and the allies. An aid-de-camp to President Lopez—Lieutenant-Colonel George Thompson, Civil Engineer—has written a book that may serve to supply the want. "The Paraguayan War" is the title of it, and it is just published by Longmans & Co. "The Oxford Reformers—Erasmus, John Colet, and Thomas More—a good book, has entered its second edition.

—Of works of Travel and Miscellaneous works that are on the English publishers' lists these are some: "A Catalogue of the Reference Department of the Free Library at Birmingham"—the great rival of the Boston Public Library. The catalogue shows nearly 386 lines of titles relating to the "History of England" alone; there are a still greater number of titles of works relating to Shakespeare; and almost every play, it is said—from the tragedies of Æschylus to Tom Taylor's latest—may be consulted. "Woman" occupies a prominent place in current literature. For this fortnight we have—in addition to the tireless magazines and papers—"Woman's Culture and Woman's Work," by Miss Frances Power Cobbe and some coadjutors, and a pair of lectures on "The Education of Girls and the Employment of Women," by W. B. Hodgson, LL.D. "Sketches of the South and West; or, Ten Months' Residence in the United States," is by Mr. Henry Deedes, a gentleman of whose sentiments and opinions we are not informed; but his publishers are Messrs. Blackwood & Sons, and we fear a damaging attack on the credit of the United States, and a showing of us up in our true colors generally. Dilke's "Greater Britain" goes into a third edition; and—to tell the British plenty about us—Brace's "New West" appears in the English market. "Protoplasm" is a book which illustrates with colored plates Professor Huxley's recent lecture. It is done by Mr. "L. S. B.," of the Royal Society. "Arms and Armor in Antiquity and the Middle Ages" is a work avowedly based on the French of P. Lacombe, by Mr. Charles Boutell, who seems to be more sensible than most heraldic antiquarians, and who has some remarks to make on the contemporary coat armor of the English, and, if we are not mistaken, on the more curious than creditable arms of most of our American States, the newer of which have nobly disregarded tradition and law. The immortal James Howell's "Instructions for Forreine Travell" has been reprinted, under the editorial care of Mr. Edward Arber, who collates with the edition of 1642 the edition of 1650, making of it an octavo pamphlet of eighty-odd pages. Mr. Arber has also just done More's "Utopia." And perhaps some of our readers may like to know that Mlle. Riego Branchardière, or Madame Branchardière, née Riego, has prepared a thirteen-page pamphlet containing "The Point Lace Sampler; with Complete Instructions for the Stitches, with the Original Registered Designs."

—A recently discovered inventory of Molière's library shows it to have contained in all about four hundred volumes, among which the classic and especially the Latin historians, poets, and playwrights occupied a considerable space. More than one-half, however, consisted of various French, Italian, and Spanish comic works. There were besides a treatise on physics (Rohault), on the soul (Cassiodorus), two volumes of Seneca, a work on Roman antiquities; a few modern books of poetry, histories, books of travel; several dictionaries, etc.—on the whole, a list pretty strictly accessory to the department of letters illustrated by its possessor. Part of it, and by far the largest, was kept in Molière's lodgings in the Rue Richelieu; the remainder at his home in Auteuil.

—M. Taupin's identification of the Man of the Iron Mask has at length been made public, though not with all his proofs. To the long list of competitors for the honor of having been this distinguished state prisoner M. Taupin adds no other, but sustains the claims of Avedik, Patriarch of the Armenians, well known to have been kidnapped by the French ambassador at the Porte, M. Ferriol, of whom and of the Jesuits he was the enemy, and a persecutor of the Catholics. According to M. Taupin, Avedik died some years after the date commonly assigned to the death of the Iron Mask; in 1711, and at liberty. In the first months of that year he went daily to the church of St. Sulpice, in Paris, to say mass, and on July 21 he received the last sacrament from Catholic priests. A still more dramatic coincidence was the return of Ferriol, mad, from Constantinople, during the lifetime of his victim, for whose fate he seems to have had some remorse. His royal master publicly affected surprise and sorrow for the sufferings of the Armenian; and, considering the Turkish power at that time in Europe, the theory of M. Taupin seems a not improbable solution of the fantastic mystery.

MR. MILL'S PLEA FOR WOMEN.*

THE case of the advocates of women's rights has never been so ably stated as in the little volume before us, and probably nearly everything they will say hereafter will be said simply in amplification or illustration of Mr. Mill's arguments. His first chapter is devoted to showing that woman's position in society is conventional and not natural; that her subjection to man is simply one of the few remaining results of the régime of brute force by which the world was once governed. The relations of men with one another, he maintains, have been gradually based on abstract justice and equality, but the relations of the sexes are still governed by rules established when superiority of physical force constituted the only recognized title to authority. The continuance of this state of subjection on the part of women, their failure to follow the example of all other subject classes, and rise against their oppressors and throw off their yoke, he ascribes to the elaborate pains which the masters have taken to enslave their minds as well as their bodies by their mode of education; to the natural attraction between the opposite sexes; to the wife's entire dependence on the husband for every principal object of human pursuit, consideration and all objects of social ambition being only attainable through him. This great means of influence over the minds of women an instinct of selfishness has made men avail themselves of to keep women in subjection, by teaching them that meekness, submissiveness, and resignation are an essential part of sexual attractiveness. Had similar machinery, he thinks, been brought to bear on the education of young plebeians and serfs, by way of fixing their relations to the patricians and seigneurs, their emancipation would never have taken place. In fact, Mr. Mill asks boldly whether, had this been done, "patricians and plebeians, seigneurs and serfs, would not be as broadly distinguished at this day as men and women are," "and would not all but a thinker here and there have believed the distinction to be a fundamental and unalterable fact of human nature?"

In order to make this question a "poser," however, we have to admit that sex has in no way affected the relations of men and women, either by way of increasing women's readiness to be subjected, or men's disposition to subject them. Unless Mr. Mill can fairly say that the patrician would have found in the young serf precisely the same material on which to try his educational prowess as man has found in woman, he can hardly ask anybody to admit that it would have produced the same startling effect on the one as on the other; and in this question we find what we consider the source of whatever weakness there may be in Mr. Mill's whole argument. Is there such a thing as sex? and does sex influence character, and to what extent? are questions which must be answered fully and fairly before the ground can be considered cleared for a complete discussion of the extent to which woman's subjection is artificial. If sex does influence character, all comparisons of woman's position and that of other subject classes must have a serious flaw in it. Mr. Mill admits that the natural attraction between the sexes has rendered it all the easier for the men to keep the women in subordination, but what we need to know is whether this has been its only effect. Is anybody quite sure it has had no other? Is it fair to assume, as Mr. Mill does, that it has had no other?

Coming to the question whether the nature of the two sexes adapts them to their present functions and position, Mr. Mill denies that anybody knows the nature of the two sexes, as long as they have only been seen in their present relation to each other. Consequently, he denies also that men know women; the nature of women, or what passes by that name now, he says, is "an eminently artificial thing, the result of forced repression in some things, of unnatural stimulation in others." The only way, he says, of getting at a knowledge of the natural difference between the two sexes is by means "of an analytic study of the laws of the influence of circumstances on character"—a work which is in its very nature almost impossible of accomplishment, as Mr. Mill has himself shown in his "Logic." The whole of the circumstances by which character is influenced are never in any individual case within any investigator's reach, nor can he calculate the exact force of any one of them, so that, no matter how much care he took, his conclusions would be little better than guesses. If we cannot know woman from an examination of her as we find her—that is, as a member of society—neither can we know men. The character of men is also highly artificial The natural man, or man in the abstract, uninfluenced by the circumstances which surround him as a member of human society, none of us have ever seen or will ever see. So that, if we refrained on this account from forming any judgment about his rights and duties, and acting on it in legislation and usage, we should bring the social machine to a dead-lock. In assigning a man his position in society, we do not take into account what he might have been if he had had a different father or mother, or been differently brought up, or had been born in a different church or in a different civilization. All this would furnish interesting matter for speculation, but for practical purposes—for the purpose of deciding whether we shall or shall not make him a judge, or a legislator, or a teacher, or the captain of a seventy-four—we have to consider him just as he stands—the product of a thousand agencies, known and unknown, which we did not create and cannot modify.

We may say the same thing of woman. If all that Mr. Mill wishes to deduce from his denial that we know her, is that no restriction should be placed on the play of her faculties by legislation, he will carry most persons with him; but if he wishes to base on it a positive assertion of her equality with man in capacity, we do not well see how he is to carry anybody with him. We are willing to study woman in vacuo—but how is the vacuum to be obtained? A writer in Appleton's Journal last week very neatly compared this part of his argument to that of a celebrated vegetarian, who denied that the propensity of man to eat meat, or the form or arrangement of his teeth, proved that he was meant to be carnivorous, because we only knew him as a traditional meat-eater, and did not know what he would do in a state of nature, uninfluenced by "circumstances."

Thus far Mr. Mill has been talking of woman's right to equality in the family. In his third chapter he discusses her admissibility to all the functions and employments hitherto claimed as a monopoly by the stronger sex; and he expresses his belief that the disabilities here are only clung to in order to maintain her subordination in domestic life. Here he argues simply from observations of woman in domestic life, and has comparatively easy work; but he marks out her right to the suffrage as a right entirely independent of any question which may be raised concerning her faculties; and her competency to exercise it he deduces à fortiori from the fact that law and usage already admit her competency to choose her husband, who is to govern her to the end of her life. As regards fitness of women for office, he is willing to leave that to be decided by experiment. If women are not fit for various callings, they will not succeed in them and will soon cease to follow them; and there is therefore no need for, and may be great injustice and great waste of power in, legislation excluding them from such. His analysis of woman's faculties, as revealed by history and everyday experience, is of course masterly and interesting, though the effect of the argument is somewhat weakened by the extent to which his eagerness diminishes the candor which is one of the great charms of his writing. For instance, by way of accounting for the fact that, though a great number of women are taught music, there have been no great female composers, he says: "Women are taught music, but not for the purpose of composing—only of executing it; and, accordingly, it is only as composers that men in music are superior to women." Now surely this is not a fair statement of the case. Women are not taught music for the purpose solely of executing it any more than men. Both are taught music in the hope of a result of some kind—money, fame, or pleasure. If, amongst the thousands of children who learn it, the teacher should light on a genius, that child becomes a composer, no matter what the intentions of the teacher may be; and that many such geniuses have presented themselves amongst the comparatively few men who are taught music, and none amongst the many women who are taught, is surely a fact worth serious consideration. To be sure, Mr. Mill seeks to account for this by the circumstance that the great male composers have all appeared in Germany and Italy, where the women are in a low state of culture; and this circumstance is no doubt worth consideration also; but he urges it with an air of eagerness to make the most of it which is not characteristic of him.

* "The Subjection of Women. By John Stuart Mill." New York: D. Appleton & Co.; Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co.

The book will probably be read by everybody who reads at all; and it is, therefore, needless to attempt anything like a condensation of his whole argument. It displays the dialectical skill, the mastery of style, the breadth and force of thinking, which have won Mr. Mill his high position both as a social and mental philosopher; and the tinge of passion which runs through it, though it has in places somewhat damaged the work for the philosopher, will increase its attraction to the general reader. We have endeavored simply to point out what are, it seems to us, two serious defects in the very basis of the argument. No discussion of the woman question will ever satisfy the public mind, or settle woman's position on a new basis, in which the fact of sex is ignored, or its influence on character and on social and domestic life left out of consideration, and treated lightly; and yet to the charge of doing both these things every leading advocate of woman's rights (Mr. Mill included) is more or less open. As long as woman's case is argued as if she were simply a small and weak man, we shall not get much nearer to a final solution of the great problem of her condition. Everybody knows, as a matter of fact, that not only is sexual attraction one of the strongest of all the social forces, but that its apparently excessive strength is at once one of the greatest puzzles of the world and one of the greatest sources of human misery; and that the question of controlling it or diminishing its force, without affecting injuriously either health or morals or population, has been in every age the question that went deepest down towards the foundations of order and duty—which is simply another mode of saying that marriage is the most important feature of human society; and in marriage woman plays the principal part. Any discussion of her rights, therefore, which treats her relation to marriage as but a subordinate and secondary incident in her career, must be incomplete. We say this in the spirit of an enquirer. Of the evils of her present position we are profoundly sensible; all attempts to improve it have our cordial sympathy; but it cannot be really and permanently improved without treating her maternal function as her principal and highest one, while making ample provision for the happiness and activity of all those who are prevented, by either inclination or fortune, from undertaking it, or who are conscious of the possession of gifts which can be made of more value to society and the owner in other departments than that of rearing or educating children.

THOMASSEN'S UNVEILINGS OF PRIMEVAL HISTORY.*

A MANUAL of prehistoric times, in which the results of recent scientific research in archæology and palæontology should be systematized with reference to some general conclusion, but with no speculative bias toward a particular school or theory, would enable the intelligent reader to form a judgment of the real value and tendency of discoveries which are often discredited by the crude and extravagant hypotheses that they are made to support. Sir Charles Lyell, in his "Antiquity of Man," is clear and candid, as is his wont, in the statement of facts; yet he so intermingles conjecture with fact, and is so inconsequential in his conclusions, that his book is more fitted to confuse than to instruct the general reader. The Duke of Argyll, in his "Primeval Man," has given a fair outline of the enquiries touching man's antiquity and origin; and, while conceding that chronology may require to be extended indefinitely into the past, makes some good points against the Darwinian theory of development as applied to the origin of the human species. But the book is fragmentary and apparently hurried in composition, and is altogether inferior in vigor and logic to the author's "Reign of Law." The essays of Professor Karl Vogt, now in course of publication in the Anthropological Review, approach more nearly to an authoritative summary of the science of man's antiquity; but Vogt leans with marked partiality to Darwin's theory, and even attempts to find in Microcephali the transition-point from the Chimpanzee to the human species—that is, according to this naturalist, the abortions of humanity were really its crude beginnings, and the ape worked himself first into an idiot in that struggle for existence which eventuated in the development of man.

Dr. Thomassen has attempted an impartial résumé of the prehistoric science of man, and has given us an essay worthy in some respects of being reproduced in an English dress. In his preface, he avows the purpose to keep himself as far as possible in the "objective state," and merely to arrange facts, so that every one can readily draw his own conclusions; but in reality he betrays a strong subjective tendency toward certain theories, which leads him into a good deal of special pleading. At the same time, he lays down general principles for the conduct of such enquiries which are worthy to be set as mottoes over the door of every scientist and every theologian so long as the changes shall be rung upon "Genesis and geology:" "He who honestly seeks for truth should not complain of that which startles him out of the jog-trot path of stupidity." "The true spirit of enquiry has this only tendency—to seek the Truth; and in this path it moves unerringly forward." "Science, in so far as it seeks after truth, is itself an integral part of religion." At the same time, Dr. Thomassen is fully alive to the fact that this enquiry into the primeval history of mankind is no mere diversion, but has a most intimate connection with all social questions.

In popularizing the science of anthropology, he has been remarkably successful in rendering its facts and principles intelligible to any fair understanding. Starting with the twofold division of the subject into the Natural History of the Race and the History of Civilization, he defines accurately those points of zoölogical structure which, on the one hand, resemble man to the lower animals, and, on the other, distinguish him from them. He argues that the derivation of man from the ape must ever remain a question of probabilities; that not even Karl Vogt assumes to have demonstrated it; and that to insist upon certainty in such a matter is much like attempting to settle the problem so much discussed at Zürich by a learned convocation of the seventeenth century, "Whether Christ wore clothing after his resurrection." Dr. Thomassen devotes his first chapter to discoveries relative to the stone age; recounting in brief the investigations of Schmerling, Tournal, Christol, Bize, Fuhlrott, Boucher de Perthes, Prestwich, Abbé Martin, Lartet, Karl Vogt, and other leading naturalists. Separate chapters are given to the men of the glacial epoch and of the reindeer period, to the findings in peat and in the kitchen-middens, to the pile-habitations and their remains, to mounds and giants' sepulchres; in all which the facts of discovery are lucidly arranged, with the authorities for each. When, however, the author attempts a chronological classification of these remains in a regular succession, he overlooks the facts that, even in historic times, inferior types of humanity have been contemporaneous with a high civilization—the stone age of Britain, for instance, with the luxurious art of the Roman empire; that the tendency of mankind has ever been toward barbarism in the more advanced posts of emigration; and that the vast plateau of middle-western Asia, the historical seat of the human family, has not yet been explored for prehistoric remains.

In a chapter on the origin and development of the human species, the author follows Schaffhausen in applying Darwin's theory to the physical organization of man, and in his closing chapter he seems ready to go even the length of Vogt in allying man to the ape. Yet, like Darwin himself, the author keeps aloof from materialism by holding fast the distinction between the physical and the spiritual. "The investigations of natural history do not concern themselves with the divine, the heavenly derivation of man, but only with the earthly, the natural. And why should it be deemed unworthy of man to regard him as the last and highest development of animal life? Did he come forth any the less good from the hand of the Creator if in the dark womb of untold ages the animal type was more and more ennobled until that human form was attained which man regards as the image of his maker?" So devout a scholar as Professor Tayler Lewis, in his notes to Lange's Genesis, takes substantially this view of the plastic development of the human body, in distinction from the divine inbreathing of the spirit.

* "Enthüllungen aus der Urgeschichte, oder: Existirt das Menschengeschlecht nur 6,000 Jahre? Die Ergebnisse der neuesten wissenschaftlichen Forschungen über die Ur- und Entwickelungsgeschichte der Menschheit, in allgemein verständlicher Darstellung. Allen Gebildeten gewidmet von Dr. J. H. Thomassen." Leipzig. 1869.

ROSCOE'S SPECTRUM ANALYSIS.*

THE sudden impulse which spectroscopic researches received in 1860, and which has resulted in several brilliant discoveries in chemistry and astronomy, affords a singular problem in the history of scientific progress. There was nothing absolutely new in the method of Kirchhoff and Bunsen. It consisted essentially in observing the spectra of the colorations imparted by different substances to the non-luminous gas-flame generally used in laboratories. Colored flames had been used since an early period in the history of chemistry for distinguishing the different alkalies and alkaline earths; and J. F. W. Herschel in 1822, H. F. Talbot in 1826, and W. A. Miller in 1845, had made some study of the spectra of these flames with reference to chemical analysis. The black lines of the spectra of some of the stars had been examined by Fraunhofer, and found to differ from those of the spectrum common to the sun, moon, and planets. The absorption-lines produced by some gases had been studied by Brewster; and

* "Spectrum Analysis. Six Lectures delivered in 1868, before the Society of Apothecaries of London. By Henry E. Roscoe, B.A., Ph.D., F.R.S., Professor of Chemistry in Owens College, Manchester." New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1869.

Stokes had pointed out the use of absorption-bands in detecting certain metals in solution. The coincidence of the bright line of incandescent sodium vapor with the D line of the solar spectrum had been noticed by Fraunhofer; and Stokes and William Thomson thence inferred that sodium was contained in the atmosphere of the sun, because a substance can only emit what it is capable of absorbing.

These investigations appertain to all parts of spectral analysis. Why, then, did they remain comparatively unfruitful while the very first memoir of Kirchhoff and Bunsen created a sensation such as the scientific world had not felt since the discovery of Neptune? Kirchhoff himself seems to think that it was because he and Bunsen first clearly showed that the positions of the spectral lines depend solely upon the chemical constituents of the glowing gases. No doubt, the effect upon the imagination of so broad a proposition upon a new matter of science is great, yet the habitual reliance by chemists upon the flame reaction of sodium seems to show that this law had been implicitly assumed upon all hands to be true in practice. Perhaps the chief causes of the profound impression produced by Kirchhoff and Bunsen's papers were these three: 1st, The flame of the Bunsen burner, which was employed by them, was capable from its intense heat and small lighting power of giving much more satisfactory results than the alcohol flames used by the early experimenters; 2d, The new investigations were conducted with a tact and thoroughness which commanded admiration; and 3d, Bunsen had the good fortune and the skill to detect by the new method two metals—rubidium and cæsium—before unknown, in some mineral water he was analyzing, the mixed chlorides of these metals being contained in the proportion of about a drachm in twenty tons of the water.

Bunsen not only discovered these elements, but studied them so well (working partly in company with Kirchhoff) that they are now among those whose chemical relations are the best understood. They have been found to be somewhat widely distributed through the mineral kingdom in very small quantities. An Italian mineral, which had formerly been analyzed by the celebrated mineralogist Platner, has been found to contain 34 per cent. of the oxide of cæsium, which had been mistaken for potassa. Platner's analysis did not add up 100 per cent. at all correctly, owing to the great difference in the combining numbers of potassa and cæsium. Many a chemist would have been ashamed to own such an analysis; Platner was willing to publish a work which there was no other reason for condemning than one which was perfectly patent, and the result is that time has shown that his experiments were correctly performed. In 1861, an English chemist, Crookes, hardly known before, discovered by means of the spectroscope another metal (thallium) of very singular chemical characters; and this is a discovery which may lead to others, for with thallium a glass has been made which is reported as wonderfully adapted for prisms. In 1863, a fourth metal—indium—resembling zinc was discovered by means of the spectroscope in the zincblende of Freiberg.

The study of the celestial spectra has afforded important information concerning the sun, the stars, the nebulas, some comets, and the aurora borealis. We have learned that many chemical elements which are found upon the earth exist in the atmosphere of the sun, including nearly all of those which form a large proportion of the earth's crust. We have also ascertained, what might have been known à priori, that the most elastic of the gases (hydrogen) extends higher from the sun's centre than any of the other substances. The solar spots are getting examined; and if some observations lately reported are confirmed, we shall have some of the theories upon this subject brought to a test. In the stars have been recognized a number of the chemical elements which we know; yet in many of them some of the commonest substances here, and those most essential to life as we know it, are altogether wanting. A displacement of one of the hydrogen lines in the spectrum of Sirius is held to prove that that star is moving rapidly towards our system. The nebulas have been found to be of two entirely different kinds; for the spectra of some of them have been found to consist of isolated bright lines, showing that these nebulas are gaseous, while by far the larger proportion show the continuous spectrum which is seldom produced by an incandescent gas. This difference between the spectra corresponds strictly to a difference between the ordinary telescopic appearances of the nebulas. This is the more interesting, as the first proposition upon which Sir William Herschel founded his nebula hypothesis was that there was no natural classification among nebulas. None of the nebulas have been proved to contain any substance otherwise known to us. Several minute comets have been subjected to spectroscopic examination, and two of them have been shown to contain carbon in some gaseous state. The spectrum of the aurora, as usually seen, consists of a single yellowish-green line, which belongs to no substance with which we are acquainted. As the aurora is held to be above the ordinary atmosphere (and this is confirmed by its showing no nitrogen lines), it follows that there is some unknown gas reaching above the other constituents of the atmosphere. According to the laws of gravity and of diffusion of gases, this substance must extend down to the surface of the earth. Why, then, have not chemists discovered it? It must be a very light elastic gas to reach so high. Now, the atomic weights of elementary gases are proportional to their density. It must, then, have a very small atomic weight. It may be as much lighter than hydrogen as hydrogen is than air. In that case, its atomic weight would be so small that, supposing it to have an oxide on the type of water, this oxide would contain less than one per cent. of it, and in general it would enter into its compounds in such small proportions as almost infallibly to escape detection. In addition to the green line usually seen in the aurora, six others were discovered and measured at the Harvard College Observatory during the brilliant display of last spring, and four of these lines were seen again on another occasion. On the 29th of June last, a single narrow band of auroral light extended from east to west, clear over the heavens, at Cambridge, moving from north to south. This was found to have a continuous spectrum; while the fainter auroral light in the north showed the usual green line.*

Professor Roscoe's book contains an interesting and very thorough account of spectrum analysis. The paper, ink, type, and plates are beautiful. In his style, Mr. Roscoe neither aims at sensational effect, nor so strains after simplicity as to verge upon baby-talk. And these are the two commonest faults of popular science. The only exaggeration which we have noticed is in the chromo-lithograph of the spectrum of a nebula. If the book be taken into a nearly dark room, so that at first glance nothing is seen but the dark oblong shapes of the whole spectra of that plate, the figure in question will "serve to give some idea of the peculiar beauty of the phenomenon in question." The lines in the spectrum of Sirius, on the same plate, are made much too distinct, both absolutely and relatively to the other stars.

The practical spectroscopists will find here an exceedingly convenient repertory of facts. Kirchhoff's chart of the solar spectrum, with the extension of Angström and Thalén, is very beautifully reproduced in miniature. Huggins's maps of the metal lines are given in a form far more convenient for use at the spectroscope than the two folding sheets in a huge quarto in which alone they have hitherto been published. The numerical tables in full accompany both sets of maps. It is much to be regretted that Dr. Gibbs's important tables for the comparison of Kirchhoff's, Huggins's, and the Normal scales have not been given. We should also have been glad to have Thalén's metallic spectra. At the end of the book there is a "List of Memoirs, etc., upon Spectrum Analysis." This is certainly valuable, and appears to be full. We observe, however, the omission of Stokes's paper upon the absorption-bands as a reagent, and also of Secchi's catalogue of the spectra of the stars. As the work contains little about the spectra of particular celestial objects, the last-named paper might well have been translated and inserted in full, with notes.

Professor Roscoe's book may truly be said to be popular and scientific at the same time. And we call it scientific, not only because it is a thorough account of the facts, but also because it contains long extracts from the original memoirs of the serious workers in this branch of science. There is, doubtless, a vast difference between that knowledge of scientific research which comes of actual practice and that which recommends this book to general readers. No one need be scared by a fear that it is mathematical, for everything which borders upon that subject is omitted. There is nothing about the angles of prisms, the theory of exchanges, or the theory of the displacement of lines owing to the motion of the source of light.

RECENT REPUBLICATIONS.

We have already on several occasions spoken of Mrs. Austin's novel of "Cipher," as it appeared in the Galaxy, and have been able to speak well of it, as being cleverer than most of the novel-writing of the magazinists, although deformed by improbabilities, or impossibilities, as well as by sensationalism and a general falseness to the real truth of human nature. We refer to it, now that it appears in book-form, chiefly for the sake of remarking upon an indifference in its publishers which has made them allow themselves to give us so ill-made a book. The plates of the magazine pages have been taken and used again, and, as a result, we have

* We have received permission from Prof. Winlock to state this singular fact, which has not been published before.

chapters beginning at all parts of the page, sometimes up just under the running title, sometimes half-way down the page, sometimes down at the bottom of it. The general effect is that of great slovenliness; and we are sorry to see a fashion which already is too widespread spreading any more widely.

One of the English papers has recently been proving by the simple process of writing out one of his most comical pieces in ordinary English that Mr. C. G. Leland is no humorist. We might thus prove, no doubt, that he is not a humorist of the highest class. It would not be possible, for instance, to take any one of Mr. Lowell's "Biglow Papers," and cause it to evaporate so entirely as Mr. Leland's seems to do under any such treatment as that to which the Pall Mall Gazette subjected "Hans Breitmann gife a barty." The residuum of wisdom or, at least, s und sense—a necessary ingredient in true humor; of pathos—a usual c ncomitant of it; and of wit—which is not a necessary ingredient, though it is perhaps a usual concomitant, at least in the case of great humorists—this residuum, when all the Yankeeisms of speech in Mr. Lowell's pieces had been boiled off, and when the curious bits of clerical pedantry of speech had been made to give place to Mill's English, say, in the writings of Parson Wilbur, and when the peculiar Yankee flavor of character had been taken out of the personality of Mr. Sawin and of Mr. Biglow,—this residuum of wit and sense and occasional pathos and wisdom would still leave the "Biglow Papers" a high place in literature, or, at any rate, would leave Mr. Lowell high in the esteem of the reader. But still, we should have lost one of the best parts of his work; we should have lost the vivid portraiture of those personages—types at once and unmistakable individuals—which is, to our mind, the great achievement of the "Biglow Papers" after all. It is more—as being more difficult and rare, and more delightful when done—to have created Hosea Biglow and Birdofredum Sawin, and the Pastor of the First Church in Jaalam, than it is to have put into the mouth of any one of them the sharpest and truest things that any of them has said. And no unimportant part in the making of them was rightly to employ the dialect—of speech and thought—which they severally used. Indeed, when this coloring is gone the person vanishes, and almost we have a book—good as you please, but a book—instead of having our old acquaintances before us. Now, Mr. Leland, who is not a man of genius, but only a man of susceptibility to the influences of genius, and who is not a man of force or depth of thought, and apparently not a man of much strength or delicacy of feeling, has yet had the good luck to study carefully and accurately a very amusing creature—our lager-beer drinking, simple, sentimental, misty, mildly intoxicated, good-natured, thumb-witted, yet shrewd and even cunning, imported fellow-citizen; and he has reproduced him with considerable exactness, though not with too great nicety, as he is, obviously, in his "bier-garten" and in his place among the "bummers," political and military. And, doing this, an artistic aid not to be slighted—indeed, eagerly and gladly to be sought—is certainly the language of the man—the dress of the inner man. It is almost purely a comic figure that Mr. Leland has depicted. Even the German sentiment—beery or not—is always apt to strike us as not particularly touching; and the philosophizing in this book is designedly as laughable as cheap parody can make it. Indeed, the book is very farcical in many places. Nevertheless, it is humorous; and that some of the humorous effect is produced by the use of a queer dialect is a thing not in itself a fault. Anyhow, you do not prove that it is not humorous at all when you show that the humor largely consists in the words; you only show that it is not humorous after the fashion of the best and most enduring humorists; though, from Aristophanes down, hardly one of these latter is to be found who has disdained to use the device condemned by the English reviewer.

It was last October that we reviewed Ludwig Bamberger's political biography of Count Bismarck, which, written in the fall of 1867, had appeared first in the Revue Moderne of February, 1868, and in book-form in June of the same year. In the following September the author superintended its translation into German, and added a supplementary chapter, together with one which should serve as a preface. The work, thus enlarged and slightly revised, has been rendered into English by Mr. Charles Lee Lewes, and comes to us in nearly the well-known Tauchnitz shape and typography (New York: B. Westermann & Co.) In reviewing his judgment of Bismarck, and the part played by him in the regeneration of Germany, Mr. Bamberger states that the lapse of twelve months and an intimate knowledge of affairs as member of the Customs Parliament, have only tended to confirm his original speculations. The prime minister remains for him the shifty aristocrat, wise enough to compromise with progress when it serves his ends, which are never those of personal ambition. "We continue to see the same pilot steering, now to the left, now as much, or even more, to the right, as winds and waves, or even his own fancy, may direct." What was his full plan in the attack upon Austria is settled by the letter of Count Usedom to General La Marmora, which the author reproduces with proper respect as official evidence, while showing that a just fear of interference on the part of France had early induced Bismarck to accustom his thoughts to the line of the Main as the immediate fruit of victory. The new preface treats of "Germany, France, and the Revolution," and contains an acute analysis of the causes which united Frenchmen of whatever party against the threatening aggrandizement of Prussia. As the most liberal and intelligent Frenchmen could not trust themselves even to converse with Germans at the time of the Luxemburg affair, this part of Mr. Bamberger's work is especially deserving of study, and enables us to recommend the whole as the best presentation of the character and political motives of Count Bismarck, the nature of the revolution achieved at Sadowa, and the grounds of misunderstanding and jealousy between the two great powers divided (in more senses than one) by the Rhine.

Under our general head, it will be proper to mention here such bound volumes of periodicals as Harper's Bazar (Vol. I., 1868), Harper's Monthly (Vols. XXXVI., XXXVII.), Harper's Weekly (Vol. XII.), and Messrs. Littell & Gay's Living Age (Vol. VIII. of the Fourth Series). The Bazar, far from being the trivial paper that one might hastily suppose, is an excellent one. Like all the periodicals which the Harpers publish, it is almost ideally well edited, and the class of readers for whom it is intended—the mothers and daughters in average families—cannot but profit by its good sense and good taste, which, we have no doubt, are to-day making very many homes happier than they may have been before the women began taking lessons in personal and household and social management from this good-natured mentor. Then, apart from its claims to feminine respect and liking, the more important part of humanity and creation may properly be much obliged to it for its services to the great cause of dressing well, and particularly for helping on the cause of dressing well at not too great an expense. No doubt, a certain appreciable percentage of the beauty which to-day makes American women the envy of the foreign feminine world, and a chief glory of our native land, is due to little hints that they get from the Bazar. Of the Weekly and the Monthly there is nothing that our readers need to be told.

The Living Age, too, as our readers know, we hold in esteem, as being, on the whole, the best of all our "eclectic" publications. It covers very well the field of English periodical literature, and reprints nothing—barring some of its stories and some of its poetry—that does not strike us as being worthy of the honor either in virtue of its value or its current interest.

From the Messrs. Harper we get also the second volume (C, D) of the "Biblical Dictionary" of Messrs. McClintock and Strong. Of the merits of this dictionary we spoke at length, apropos of the appearance of the first volume, in the Nation of June 20, 1867, and we need only add, in noting the progress of the work, that it appears to be more carefully edited and more accurate in detail than when we last examined it. The American edition (Messrs. Hurd & Houghton) of "Smith's Dictionary of the Bible"—which we at that time compared with this work, though it does not cover the same field—continues to exhibit a remarkable ability and freedom from error; it has reached its nineteenth part, and is in the midst of the title New Testament. Mr. Zell's Cyclopædia closes with Batrachus Part Sixth of its monthly issues. Finally, one may now obtain the "American Annual Cyclopædia" for 1868 of the Messrs. Appleton—a work assuredly not edited with the learning or precision of the general cyclopædia which it in a manner continues, but nevertheless a useful compilation for many purposes, and as yet without any to compete or compare with it.

The Sacristan's Household: A Story of Lippe-Detmold. By the author of "Mabel's Progress," "Aunt Margaret's Trouble," etc. With illustrations by C. G. Bush. (New York: Harper & Brothers. 1869.)—What with the translations of German novels, and the novels which, though written by English people, have their scenes laid in Germany, readers of fiction seem in a fair way to become as wise in the matter of German manners and habits and traits of character as they may be presumed to be already in the details of English domestic life, the trials of governesses, the secret disquietude of clergymen, troubled either by growing unbelief or an irresistible inclination toward candles and auricular confession, and such other suggestive topics as have for so long supplied the novelist's staple. To tell truth, we find the change of scenes and topics an agreeable one, as we suppose most readers with ordinarily good memories do. The old themes have been handled so often by indifferently good workmen as well as by masters, and seem so inevitably to entail the same incidents and the same stock characters, that we fancy that the only people, of discreet years, who have for a long time been able to get any sensation of pleasure or novelty from the ordinary English novel have been people blessed with the faculty of forgetting a book as soon as they finish reading it. Fortunately for the happiness of confirmed novel-readers, that is a faculty soon acquired in their case.

In these German stories, however, there is always a certain freshness, coming, in the case of translations from reputable authors, in great part from the kind of thought and speculation with which they are occupied; and in the case of studies of German life made by foreigners, from the novelty of the manners, the household customs, and the ways of looking at life which they describe, which generally makes them interesting reading. To our taste, one of the pleasantest of the latter class is the "Sacristan's Household." It is written with a great deal of grace and spirit, the love story is prettily told, the characters are sketched in cleverly, and the life of a little German village, with its homely heartiness, its petty economies, and its small punctilios, is described in a way that makes the reader understand how carefully the author has studied it, and how thoroughly she has enjoyed it. Then, too, there is no dull or irrelevant matter to be skipped; and although the characters are not specially remarkable for originality, nor analyzed with any great subtlety, they have a certain vigor and vitality, and are uniformly interesting. In its way, which is a very good one, though not the best, the book seems to us to be quite successful.

The Old Testament History. From the Creation to the Return of the Jews from Captivity. Edited by William Smith, LL.D., Classical Examiner of the University of London. (New York: Harper & Brothers. 1869.)—This history, of which Dr. William Smith calls himself the editor, not the author, is one of the many valuable compilations and abridgments which have made the name of that scholar a household word with every student of antiquity, in this country as well as in England. It is both an abridgment and a compilation, consisting of narratives abridged from the Bible, and accompanied by the necessary references and remarks of an explanatory character, and of appendices, notes, and illustrations—historical, geographical, and literary—drawn from the respective articles of the editor's "Dictionary of the Bible." Genealogical and chronological tables, tables of weights and measures, maps, and wood-cuts are added. Nor is a general index wanting.

It is hardly necessary to state that an "Old Testament History" is not meant to be an independent and critical history of the Hebrew people and its ancestors, from Adam to Ezra. But neither is the book before us—what we should naturally expect it to be—a faithful reproduction, in an abridged form and with the necessary explanations, of the narratives contained in the Hebrew Scriptures agreeably to the words and spirit of that Biblical collection alone. Reflecting throughout the semi-critical and orthodox Christian tenor of the "Dictionary of the Bible," it gives us the Hebrew stories in a form modified both by timid attempts at rationalistic conciliation with the results of modern science and criticism, and by additions, explanations, and theological views drawn from the New Testament or its expounders.

Thus—to give a few instances—instead of explaining the story of the temptation of Eve by the serpent as a more or less allegorical legend current among the Hebrews, and for some reason adopted by the author of Genesis, or else plainly reproducing it, according to the words of the original text, as an account sanctioned by inspiration, the erudite compiler presents us with a learned disquisition on the question whether "the serpent, prior to the fall, moved along in an erect attitude" or not—a disquisition including remarks on the structure of serpents in general, on the saurophis tetradactylus, the chamæsaura anguina, of South Africa, and the fossil ophidia; tells us that the serpent "was a well-known type of the chief of the fallen angels, the evil spirit . . . called Satan . . . and the devil;" that Eve fell into "the threefold sin of sensuality, pleasure, and ambition—'the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life;'" that "the threefold appeal of the tempter to the infirmities of our nature may be traced also in the temptation of Christ, the second Adam;" that "the curse upon the serpent and the promise to the woman pointed clearly to a Redeemer who should be born of woman, and, by his own suffering, should destroy the power of the devil;" and, after some mention of similar traditions of Greek, Buddhist, and Chinese origin, asserts a belief in "the most literal truth" of the Hebrew narrative. The six days of creation are, of course, represented as periods of indefinite duration, and the difficulty created by the mention of evenings and mornings is removed by "the supposition that the work of creation was unfolded to Moses, in vision, as a series of pictorial scenes, divided by intervals of darkness;" so that "it may be safely said that modern discoveries are in no way opposed to the great outlines of the Mosaic cosmogony." We also learn that "the agent in creation was the Son, the Word." Concerning the one hundred and eighty-five thousand Assyrians of Sennacherib whom an angel of the Lord slew, "in one night," our history believes in the agency of a secondary cause employed to achieve the miraculous destruction; it cannot suppose that the angel stabbed them with his sword one by one; but it has no hesitation in believing that the 185,000 victims of that night "may have been suffocated by the hot wind of the desert, or . . . fallen by tens of thousands before 'the pestilence that walketh in darkness.'" Apparently in confirmation of the view that they perished by a wind—hot or pestilential—two lines from a well-known poem of Byron are quoted. But we remark that they are not quoted as they were written by the noble bard, who made "the might of the Gentile" melt away "in the glance"—and not "'at the blast'"—"of the Lord." This error—or voluntary substitution—is, of course, of trifling import, as the author of the "Hebrew Melodies" is not mistaken by many people for a weighty authority in matters of belief and exegesis.

There are, however, discoverable in this book inaccuracies which, though mostly unimportant, and certainly not surprising in a compilation, ought to have been more carefully guarded against in a publication concerning Biblical matters and edited by Dr. Smith. Some of those inaccuracies may be owing to imperfect revision, such as "shema" instead of "shem," as the Hebrew for "name;" and "multitude" instead of "mortal," as the translation of the name Enos. Others are slight oversights of the compiler; an instance of this kind is the placing of Nazareth and Capernaum, the names of which nowhere occur in the strictly Hebrew Scriptures, on the map of "The Holy Land divided among the Twelve Tribes." Less pardonable are the contradictory statements embodied in the "Map of the Distribution of the Human Race, according to the Tenth Chapter of Genesis," and the paragraphs explanatory of that chapter, to which the map is appended. The map shows Gomer in Cappadocia, and Tarshish in Cilicia, identifying the latter with Tarsus, while the text identifies Gomer with the Cimmerians, and Tarshish with Tartessus in Southern Spain.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Bastian (A.) and Hartmann (R.), Zeitschrift für Ethnologie, Nos. 1, 2	(L. W. Schmidt)
Dorsey (Mrs. A. K.), Nora Brady's Vow, and Mona the Vestal: Tales, 1 vol.	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)	$1 75
Fownes (Prof. G.), Manual of Elementary Chemistry, Am. ed.	(Henry C. Lea)
Ocean to Ocean: a Guide-Book	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)	0 50
Shelton Mackenzie (Mrs. A.), Married against Reason: a Tale, swd	(Loring)	0 50
Silber (W. B.), Elementary Grammar of the Latin Language	(A. S. Barnes & Co.)
Smith (Dr. Wm.), Dictionary of the Bible, Am. ed., Part XIX., swd	(Hurd & Houghton)	0 75
Thackeray (W. M.), The Adventures of Philip	(Fields, Osgood & Co.)	1 25
Townsend (Miss V. F.), The Hollands: a Tale	(Loring)	1 50

SABIN & SONS'

American Bibliopolist

(Published monthly) affords an excellent medium for ADVERTISEMENTS. It is useful to LIBRARIANS for the LISTS OF NEW ENGLISH AND AMERICAN PUBLICATIONS. BOOK COLLECTORS will find many desirable volumes in CATALOGUE OF NEW and OLD BOOKS, which accompanies each number. Notices of Rare or Curious Books, and the Notes and Queries upon American subjects, will be interesting to every one.

J. SABIN & SONS, Publishers,
84 Nassau Street, New York.

J. S. & SON have recently received a very valuable Collection of American Books—perhaps the finest ever offered for sale. Many of the volumes are illustrated with extra plates, and superbly bound.

S. R. WELLS,

389 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Will Publish on Saturday, July 24:

WEDLOCK;

OR, THE RIGHT RELATIONS OF THE SEXES.

A Scientific Treatise, disclosing the Laws of Conjugal Selection, and showing who may and who may not marry. By the author of "New Physiognomy," "How to Read Character," etc. 1 vol. 12mo, extra cloth, price $1 50; full gilt, $2.

 Orders from the Trade should be sent in at once.

THE

Phrenological Journal

FOR AUGUST

CONTAINS:

Rev. John P. Newman, D.D., Chaplain to the U. S. Senate; J. Edgar Thomson, President Pennsylvania Railroad Co.; James A. Whitney; Henry J. Raymond; The Wallachians; Small vs. Large Heads; Reading Faces on the Rail; Marriage Customs; How to Become a Christian; A Well-balanced Mind, etc., with Portraits. 30 cents, or $3 a year. Newsmen have it.

S. R. WELLS,
389 Broadway, New York.

MADDEN PUBLIC LIBRARY

The Nation.

VOL. IX.—NO. 213. THURSDAY, JULY 29, 1869. FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM / TWELVE CENTS PER COPY

THE WEEK 81

EDITORIAL ARTICLES:
Shall the Republican Committees of New York City Unite? 84
Illustrations of our Public Service 85
The Case of Colonel Yerger 86

England 87
France.—The Emperor's Hesitancy 88

CORRESPONDENCE:
Another American View of China 89
Varro, St. Augustine, and Mr. Lecky .. 91

NOTES:
Literary 91

Renan's "St. Paul" 92
Magazines for August 94
Books of the Week 97

Terms:—Five Dollars per annum, in advance; Clergymen, Four Dollars.  Remittances at the risk of the subscriber, unless made by draft, check, P. O. money order, or registered letter.

The date of expiration of each subscription is indicated on the printed label. A delay of more than three months in renewing subscriptions will endanger their continuance.

ADDRESS, PUBLISHER OF "THE NATION," BOX 6732, NEW YORK.

PUBLISHING OFFICE, 3 PARK PLACE.

The Week.

WHEN the American General Jordan gets his force of six thousand picked men "in that condition of efficiency he wants it to be in, he will sweep down unexpectedly upon the many scattered detachments of the over-confident Spaniards, and is hopeful of capturing them in detail." But meantime we have only skirmishes of small importance. Each one illustrates the barbarity with which the Spanish race carries on war. Both Cubans and Spaniards reproduce the scenes of the old guerilla warfare against the French, and of the fighting of the Carlist troubles. Murdering cruelty worthy of pirates seems to have got thoroughly worked into the blood of the race, and volunteers and insurgents alike kill prisoners, as regularly as they catch them, with what seems a needless ferocity, which to an Anglo-Saxon is revolting. However savage he can be on occasion, when something or somebody is to be stamped out, and however brutal he may be in the treatment of his living enemy, that form of ferocity, which seems as if it must have something of essential cowardice in it, which leads one to put one's enemy to death after his offensive powers are gone, is not among the Anglo-Saxon's faults. But the American Spaniard does it from Mexico to Chili and Havana, and the European Spaniard has a bad reputation in the same respect. The Americans not long since captured near Santiago de Cuba were at once shot, and the commandant at that place could give no better account of himself to Admiral Hoff than that the volunteers forced him to execute the men, although he was unwilling—an answer which called forth a reprimand from Admiral Hoff, and ought to call forth a demand for the commandant's removal and disgrace, whatever may be the "custom of the country." Nothing more is heard of expeditions from this country, and the Junta seems to be entirely disbanded, which leaves out of employment a number of fine officers whose exploits strongly remind one of the achievements of the late military and fiscal departments of the Irish Republic. The men who were taken at Gardiner's Island have been released and sent away with good advice. Such of them as were sick (from eating unripe fruit on the island) were not sick at their departure; so we may as well believe that their stay at the American Bastile was not so full of hardship as it might have been. Mr. Charles S. Spencer, and our other friends of the Republican General Committee, who wanted General Barlow removed for his failure to let them manage his appointments for him, and who have been believing that they saw a favorable sign in the fact that it was the District Attorney who received the President's commission to see that the neutrality law was strictly enforced, will be grieved to see that the General is commissioned in like manner, and that as yet there are no indications that "our best workers" would have any "show" at the Marshal's office.

Dr. A. G. Mackey, of Charleston, we take to be the gentleman who, in the days when a great figure could be cut on a small capital of the right sort, made some figure here in the North as an original Union man, who, at the risk of his life, had preserved a Federal flag and remained true to the Union cause. He has been prominent in Charleston politics since the war, was made collector of the port in that city, and is understood to "swing the negro vote" in that region. Apparently, he is fighting Senator Sawyer, the leader of the Northern white Republicans, and Congressman Bowen; and these two have been too much for him in Washington, and have caused his official head to be cut off and his office to be given to a Mr. George W. Clark. Dr. Mackey stigmatizes Mr. Clark as a third-rate sutler; and when that gentleman forcibly effected an entrance into the collector's rooms, the doctor more than hinted that he did not believe him to be over and above honest. At all events, he avowed his intention of keeping the office himself till he had made an inventory of all the public property in his hands, and received a receipt. This looks business-like and proper, and it may have been so; but we do not profess great faith in the doctor, we may admit, and are inclined to think it would have taken him a good while to make his inventories. We are not believers in Mr. Clark, either, for that matter. The fact is, we suppose that both the one and the other of them are tolerable specimens of a class represented by men like Hunnicutt in Virginia, Bradley in Georgia, "Jack" Hamilton in Texas, and others, of whom there are dozens in every Southern State, and of whom all the good any one can say of them is that they were flaming Radicals once, and of whom the latest bad anybody living at a distance can say of many of them is that they have "sold out" their former friends with as little scruple as ever they showed in speech or action. However that may be, Clark and Mackey had a long wrangle, after which Mackey ordered Clark out of the room; Clark claimed to be the only lawful collector, and Mackey finally called in his boat's crew and used a certain amount of force to eject his successor—all to the credit of the party, and to the great honor of the system which grants offices of prominence to men like Bowen to be bestowed on men like Mackey—original Unionist though the one may be, and repentant rebel the other. We for our part freely forgive the Southerners all that percentage of the contempt that some of them feel for Northerners which has sprung from a knowledge of the practices of these gentry. And we are willing to wait in hope for the action in Virginia of the party which, under the lead of Mr. Walker, has got the better of the Wells party—the first victory of importance over as bad a plague as ever infested Southern politics.

Still these Mackeys and Clarks have some excuse for existing in honor and importance; or, rather, it is easy to see how their task of doing so is made comparatively easy for them. At a little place in Barnwell District, on the Georgia border, there has just occurred a display of partisan hatred and violence which will do something, we may be sure, to delay the day when the colored Radical majority in South Carolina shall feel disposed to loosen their hold on the white minority. The State has recently been divided into townships after the New England fashion, and an election took place last week for the office of township clerk at the place referred to. The Radical candidate was a young white man, of good standing, very popular with the negroes—a Mr. Pickens Woodward; the Conservative candidate was a Mr. John Greene, who was defeated. The election took place at a cross-roads store, and after it was over Mr. Pickens Woodward and two of his brothers found themselves in company with Greene, his son, his son-in-law, and two men of the name of Tyler. One of the Tylers remarks that he doesn't blame the niggers for what they have done; but what he does blame are these damned white scalawags who consent to run on a nigger ticket. Upon this, A. P. Woodward says his brother ran on such a ticket, and demands that Tyler shall retract. Pickens Woodward, hearing this, steps into the group with his revolver drawn, and John Greene tries to knock the pistol out of his hand; hereupon he is shot dead by A. P. Woodward, and the same person, turning, shoots young Holland—Greene's son-in-law—who appeared to be on the point of interfering. The affair then becomes a mêlée, in which everybody is engaged, and in which, when the pistols are emptied, the knife is used till every man in the room is wounded, more or less seriously. Holland, lying on the floor, succeeds in getting out his pistol while the affray is going on, and shoots A. P. Woodward through the kidneys, inflicting a probably fatal wound, after which he himself dies. As usual, the comments of the press are rather worse than the atrocities commented on. All the parties, says the Augusta Chronicle and Sentinel, are "highly honorable and of undoubted social standing;" Mr. A. P. Woodward "is a man of good character, and a capital shot with a pistol."

From the rest of the South there is no better news than that the crops—corn, long-staple cotton and short-staple—are all doing well. The heat has been rather too great for corn, but cotton has weathered the caterpillar, we hear, and may be called safe, even in the Sea Islands, where the cotton-worm seemed to have become a regular resident, and where he had nearly abolished agriculture. This is particularly good news, because nearly all the South had invested heavily in fertilizers, and bad crops would have been not only a loss of money but a great discouragement to the Southern agriculturist—never too much disposed to adopt new methods—and would have discouraged still more the negro, who is a natural conservative in all things. In Texas, Hamilton, "the Andy Johnson of Texas," seems to have the better of his antagonists, who, however, will work hard, although talking Radical Republicanism to Texas negroes must be dangerous business. The ex-governor has been playing into the hands of the Conservatives for some time, and though his day will no doubt be short when once they have done with him, his new alliance is likely to give him a gubernatorial term. Louisiana seems to be perfectly quiet. In Mississippi, some of the Republicans propose to elect Judge Dent on a platform like that of the Virginia Conservative Republicans. Judge Dent being a relative of Grant's, there has, of course, been talk to the effect that it was by the President's favor that he is to be nominated and elected; but a very good authority—the best among the Washington correspondents, who tells what we have no doubt is the truth of the matter, and who has very good means of knowing it—says that Grant is averse to the scheme, which certainly did not originate with him and as to which he was not consulted. And, by the way, the talk about Grant's nepotism has for its principal value the fact that it shows on what slight things adverse criticism has to fasten. The World gave the other day a list of seven of Grant's relatives, besides Judge Dent, who hold office. But of these, as the Times points out, four hold appointments given them by President Johnson; and of the other three, one is an old appointee of Mr. Johnson's, and the other is not in office. It may well be, however, that there were not many applicants for places held by known connections of the Grant family, and that secretaries were not very forward to remove these. In the other Southern States there is hardly a ripple of news. Excitement seems to have risen high in Wilmington at a recent election, and threats were freely made, but nothing came of them. Virginia is still gratulating herself on the result of the late contest, and looking about for Senators—who are to be Virginians, it appears, and not Northerners of any kind—which we suppose is right enough; but what will Colonel Forney say to it?

The French Cable was landed at Duxbury on Friday, and has been found to be in good order in every part of the line. Its arrival at this quiet port, which has been in rather a decaying state of late, created less excitement than might have been anticipated; but with the aid of Boston, the event which is to give the place a new life was celebrated on Tuesday, in a fitting manner. The neighborhood of Plymouth, and another historical "landing," and even Daniel Webster and Marshfield, were duly remembered by those who spoke. Apparently, at least, Massachusetts is nearer the Old World than she was a few days since, and those good Bostonians who, when they die, go to Paris, have now a new consolation in living. The Cable has come in duty free, we see it announced, and, on the whole, cannot complain of its welcome. Reference to the bill reported in January by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, regulating the rates and privileges of ocean cables, which stipulates that there shall be absolute reciprocity between the governments connected by and using them, will make manifest the propriety of Secretary Fish's warning to the French company. The written assent which he is reported to have obtained to whatever conditions Congress may impose, corresponds to the provision of the bill which demands "a written acceptance of the terms and conditions" imposed by the act, before the Cable can be laid or established. Practically, the question of reciprocity, as between one Government and the other, may not arise before Congress meets and makes the bill a law; but, as we pointed out last week, we are dealing with a Government which consults nothing but its own pleasure in regard to telegraphic communication within and from its domain, and makes to its own citizens concessions which it denies to Americans.

It is of good omen to the Harvard men who are going to pull against Oxford that the not first-rate crew which they left behind them has beaten the best crew which Yale has turned out for years—has ever turned out, it would probably be better to say; but we believe it is treason to say anything against the pre-eminence of the "Wilbur Bacon crew." All the reporters seem to think so, at all events. This year's Yale crew was certainly an exceedingly good one—heavy, of good age, experienced in racing, sedulously trained, if not well trained, in good condition by all accounts, and with a confident hope of victory—which in itself is very much. But, as it happened, they drew the outside position, which if the competitors go up the course abreast necessitates a longer turn at the stake-boat, and they made a splashing start, while the Harvard crew made a clean one, and were rowing with good style from the word "go." The innovation of keeping the men waiting some seconds between the order to make ready and the order to start, seems to have had the effect of flurrying them, probably dividing their attention between the oars, which should have had it all, and the judge's voice. As it turned out, Yale could not afford either of these disadvantages. Less was known of the Harvard crew than of their opponents, and less is known now, for they seem to have been somewhat reserved in their conversations with correspondents. But evidently they are a very good crew indeed; their time—18 m. 2 s.—has never but once been beaten on the Lake, and five years ago would have seemed fabulous. It is the opinion of experts that the stroke is the one point in which the Yale men were not superior to their antagonists, the latter feathering low, pulling quickly through the water, with a "kick at the stretcher," or foot-board, at the finish, and with a long reach forward, but only a little bending back. Yale feathers higher, pulls about six fewer strokes to the minute, and bends further back. This is the style of the Wards, and is probably better for heavier men and heavier boats than the colleges use. Main strength has played a greater part in the Wards' races than it ever has in those of the collegians; and, anyhow, it would be better, we fancy, for Yale to discard professionals altogether and throw herself, as Harvard does, on a body of boating tradition, no link of which is ever broken, and which is always increasing. There were no Junior or Sophomore crews on either side, we are sorry to see; but the Yale Freshmen, to whom we wish better luck next time, were, like their elders and betters, defeated by Harvard, who certainly gives promise of beating Oxford if anybody in England takes the trouble to see that the American four gets what we should give an English four who should come here—namely, a clear course. We see, by the way, that the trainer of the Yale crew was allowed to row near them on the home-stretch and speak to them—an example which is not to be followed, it is to be hoped, as being confusing to spectators, to say no more of it. By-and-by, however, the practice would become a fruitful parent of fouls.

What everybody that knows anything about prison discipline has been predicting for years has now come to pass, and the prison at Sing Sing is in a condition of almost complete disorganization. Disobedience, rioting, escapes, and occasional murders on the part of the convicts; inefficiency, alternating with cruelty, on the part of the officers, are the order of the day. This state of affairs is the result of making the prison a political institution, so far as regards its officers; and then letting officers and contractors together, from inspectors down to the favored convicts who keep the books for contractors, make all the money they can out of the State and out of the prisoners. Cruelty, inefficiency, and greedy money-making together have so mismanaged the prison that the rascality of the Democracy in this city is really no more a shame to the citizens than the rascality of the officials who have had Sing Sing in charge has been a shame to the Republican party, which has largely had the appointment of them. It is a pity that the Prison Association, incorporated some twenty-odd years ago, and whose charter empowers it to take evidence and to make thorough inspection, does not publish its testimony in some better form than the bulky volume which at present it has chosen. The appendix to the last report, containing the evidence given before them by Mr. Locke, ought to be in the hands of every voter. Mr. Solomon Kohnstamm, the bounty swindler—whom, by the way, Mr. Johnson pardoned out because his health could not bear confinement—sitting comfortably with his wife in a nicely furnished room, with a closet full of cigars and brandy by his side, and shelves of boxes around him full of little articles of merchandise which he can dispose of to convicts and officers at a small profit, is a figure which it would be of service to the best interests of the prison to have generally known. So is the figure of the convict who, if they will get him a pardon, offers to show two prison officials where they can dig up some stolen bonds, for the return of which a reward of five thousand dollars is offered; and who is taken over to Connecticut by them one night, and does not find the money because they have not got the pardon, but who consents to go again with them on their really getting it and showing it to him. So is the figure of the keeper who was discharged for refusing to falsify the books, and who was told he could have his place again by paying one hundred dollars to a certain inspector. The whole place is a dark place of the earth, and full of the habitations of cruelty—a place for demoralizing criminals.

Mr. Mill's assertion of a widespread discontent with their legal condition among intelligent women has been confirmed, almost upon the appearance of his book, by the petition presented last Thursday in the House of Commons by Sir Charles W. Dilke. It was signed by 25,000 women, and asked for the franchise. The force of it is to be measured not by the number of signatures, but by its relation to the movement as a whole in England, where was witnessed last year a resolute though unsuccessful effort to obtain suffrage through the courts, under the auspices of a "National Society for Women's Suffrage," which issued instructions and blank forms to intending claimants. In Paris, a few days before, a meeting took place, which, perhaps, will not prove barren of results, as surely it should not. The editors of a newspaper, Droit des Femmes, gathered some sixty kindred spirits, none notable, together, and after speech-making by both the men and the women, a programme was read and distributed for adhesion. The substance of its claims for women is "civil rights," or a legal existence, and we presume it does not ask the suffrage. The Code Napoléon offers steady work for some time to come, and it will be long before suffrage can be made the logical order of the day. But it is not found that the successes of reform always wait for the logical sequence.

The conflict between Lords and Commons has ended in a compromise involving no substantial sacrifice on the part of the latter. The test vote on the preamble, after the Irish Church Bill came back from the House, produced a pause, which was taken advantage of for a conference between Earl Granville and Lord Cairns, with the effect of bringing about an understanding that saved the bill. The date of disestablishment was retained at 1871, and while the words of the preamble relating to the distribution of the surplus were struck out, the Government plan of distribution remained, modified only by the requirement of distinct and separate sanction from Parliament at every step. In short, the principles of the bill have achieved a complete triumph, and the threatened crisis been indefinitely postponed. The indisposition of the Lords to better themselves by making fresh accessions to their body, which was shown by their rejecting the Life Peerage Bill, even against the support of it by so eminent a Tory as Lord Salisbury, has been regarded with complacency by that wing of the Liberal party which has no desire to stave off the ultimate abolition of the Upper Chamber. For their purposes, the greater the stupidity, obstinacy, and indifference of the Lords to public business, the better. On Monday, the bill consigning the telegraphs to Government control, under the auspices of the Post-office, passed in committee by an emphatic majority. The monopoly is to be permanent; and for those to whom this word is odious in any connection, the Economist suggests that as between the Government and any private monopoly, to which the tendency is inevitable, it is wisest to choose the responsible and controllable one, and not opposed to the general interest. The collection and distribution of Cable messages will be one of the new duties of the Post-office.

In France, the expected senatus-consultum has been prepared by the Ministerial Council and submitted to the Emperor; but, whatever may prove to be its nature, it is a programme to which the Liberals do not look forward with eagerness. Their outraged feelings are far from quieted, and their unrest is increased by a want of perfect agreement among themselves. Their meeting to protest against the prorogation has had no other effect than to show, what has been more than once demonstrated, the unfitness of M. Thiers to be their leader or to share the progressive ideas of modern Europe. Silence, the policy advocated by Jules Favre, alone appears practicable until their tongues are loosed again in October. Across the border, in Spain—or, rather, at the border—the Carlist disturbances have been renewed with so much energy that martial law has been proclaimed from Madrid; and several engagements, in some of which the Carlists attacked the town garrisons, have taken place. The reports are unfavorable to the insurgents, who are said to be instigated by Don Carlos in person. Other Continental news is of no great consequence, unless Bismarck's temporary retirement from office, on account of his health, be an exception. Some recent talk of his with a Herald correspondent has been published, and shows a ruffled temper towards the late Parliament, and a certain contempt for its capacity to grasp the necessities of the country and the times. He would appear to anticipate some difficulties for them in managing without him, and in order that they may have the chance he has vacated for a time the head of the Ministry. In Bavaria, the fruit of Mr. Bancroft's urgency last fall is beginning to be realized, and the corollary of free expatriation—the abolition of penalties attaching to that act—is now contemplated. Negotiations have been had with the Bavarian Consul at Chicago, by which the Ministry and leading members of the Diet have pledged their support to a bill legalizing in all respects marriages contracted by Bavarians in this country without the previous consent of the home government. The right of citizenship alone is not to be immediately conceded to the wife if an alien; but she ceases to be in the eye of the law merely her husband's mistress, and her children become legitimate, while both may inherit property bequeathed to him, as they could not do heretofore. This legislation is a very proper accompaniment of the late Liberal development in Bavaria, and of Prince Hohenlohe's attitude towards the Œcumenical Council.

SHALL THE REPUBLICAN COMMITTEES OF NEW YORK CITY UNITE?

THE Republican politicians of this State have for some years past been greatly interested in various attempts to reorganize the party in this city. It has been reorganized several times, without being much improved or enlarged by the process; but as there are now two separate "Republican General Committees" in the city, efforts have been frequently made to unite them, and to organize afresh. We do not suppose that these movements have very profoundly stirred the public mind; but as they have attracted some attention, and are certainly interesting to active politicians, a brief exposition of the case may afford instruction to enquiring minds.

The Republican organization, like all other party organizations, tended from an early day to become corrupt. Although the party was always a small minority in the city, it has never, since its formation in 1854, been entirely without power in the State, and has for most of the time had as many offices at its disposal, even in this city, as the Democratic party has had. A party out of power may be honest; but a party in power never can be—at any rate, in this vicinity. When the Republicans swept the North in 1860, and the Custom-house and Navy Yard passed into their charge, the rush of spoilsmen into the local committees drove out what little decency and honesty had continued in them. And here begins our story.

The Republican management in this city is confided to a General Committee, consisting originally of five members from each ward, but now, we believe, of five from each Assembly district. In several of these districts the number of Republican voters is less than 500, and the number of these who have attended primary elections has, of course, been very much smaller—say from ten to fifty. Naturally enough, a still smaller knot of men have found great advantage to themselves in maintaining a residence in these districts, and electing themselves delegates to the various committees and conventions, where their votes were just as valuable as if they had come from St. Lawrence or Chautauqua; and they have managed their votes with such discretion as to have impressed the dispensers of patronage with the conviction that their services would be highly useful to the State. Thus it has come to pass that some dozens of these patriots, each controlling from three to seven votes, have secured snug berths in the Custom-house, Navy Yard, or Internal Revenue offices. The head-centre of the undaunted Republicans of the Sixth Ward (whose vote ranges from 150 to 350, though, under tremendous pressure, it has reached 400) has been for many years a harbor-master, making $10,000 a year himself, and distributing offices among the faithful twenty or so who rallied at his call to the primary meeting. Indeed, so fat were his pickings that a rebellion broke out against him among his neighbors, and the Republican Association of the Sixth Ward actually split asunder. For a year or so two rival associations were maintained in this ward, each with a full complement of officers and delegates, although there never were one hundred Republicans who attended its primary elections—if, indeed, there were fifty. The reader will please pause and reflect upon the stern integrity with which the twenty-five O'Dwyers rallied to the rescue of the Republican organization from the insidious frauds of the twenty O'Brennans, who, though actually in a clear minority of five, had regularly and unblushingly counted themselves in by a majority of six. After the reader has sufficiently meditated on this example, he will perhaps be prepared to learn that this controversy, which shook the party to its foundations, and at one time threatened it with destruction, was happily compromised, with honor to both sides. The great Brennan retained his harbor-mastership, but the leader of the O'Dwyers was made an Internal Revenue assessor, in which position he has well feathered his own nest, without quite neglecting the young eagles of war who followed him in his darker days.

Such heroic souls are plenty within the limits of this municipality. There is the lawyer, whom some call "shyster," who by managing one ward—which gives only 3,500 Democratic majority every time it votes—has made himself a register in bankruptcy, in which position he is ready and anxious to take any little tribute of esteem, from a house down to an old coat; the red-faced rough, who, representing at the utmost a hundred nominal Republicans, has pushed forward until he has obtained a place where the life of the Republican party is at his mercy; the sleek official who took up $80,000 to buy the nomination of his patron for the highest office in the gift of the State, and rent the heavens with his cries against corruption when he found that his candidate was beaten; these, and many more, whem we must not stay to describe, are the offspring of the small and select constituencies which have long held the balance of power in the General Committee of this city.

But, taking a more general view of this choice institution, now grievously rent by divisions, what does the reader suppose he will see in the hall of a Republican General Committee? Stand at the polls and watch the men who vote the Republican ticket in this city. Nine out of ten, at the very least, are respectably dressed, clean-faced, intelligent men; not two in ten bear the slightest trace of liquor in their faces; not one in fifty looks as if he had ever been actually drunk; not one in a hundred looks like a "fighting man." Now go to the first meeting of the Republican General Committee. Behold a shouting, smoking, hard-drinking, swearing, riotous mob of men, two-thirds of whom are red-faced, blear-eyed, dirty, obscene, shoulder-hitting wretches, who look like a cross between bar-keepers and prize-fighters. How, in the name of decency, did they get there? The answer is simple. In the few districts where respectable men have a majority at the primary elections, they make up their tickets with an allowance of two-fifths to the roughs from motives of policy. In the rest of the districts, the delegations are made up of one scoundrel in a good coat and clean shirt, and four scoundrels not so bad inside as he, but having an external appearance more in keeping with their nature. Thus it comes about that, no matter what faction may be uppermost, the roughs are always in a majority.

From 1860 to 1866, this process went on without interruption. Mr. Weed having the ear of the President, the faces of the office-holders were turned toward him, and his word was law in the General Committee. Our picture fails to do justice to the character of the institution during most of that period. The processes of election had become thoroughly corrupted, and fraud in the choice of the delegates was the rule and not the exception. The meetings being held in Twenty-third Street, the Committee was familiarly known as the "Twenty-third Street Gang." In 1866, Mr. Weed broke, finally, with the Republican party. The State Convention being appealed to, and assured that the organization in this city was in the hands of Mr. Weed's devoted friends, ordered a new registration and election, which was carried out—the Weed men generally abstaining from taking any part, and refusing to recognize the new committee. The old rooms being leased by one or two individuals, who adhered to Messrs. Johnson, Seward, and Weed, the new committee was obliged to hire new rooms. A minority of the old committee met at the old quarters, shut out all anti-Weed men, and expelled them from the committee by a unanimous vote, after which they ratified the nomination of Mr. Hoffman for governor. But Mr. Hoffman was defeated, and the author of "My Policy" was repudiated on all sides. The old committee-men found that they had made a deplorable blunder. The Tenure-of-Office law removed all scales from their eyes, and they threw themselves at the feet of their lately despised foes, imploring reunion. But they had lost their hold on the party machinery; and the anti-Weed men, who had rushed in when the others deserted, found the taste of power sweet, and would by no means let it go. For more than two years, the groans of the superseded Weedites have failed to move the hearts of the triumphant Fentonians.

One of the self-appointed leaders of the faction in power is a character worth describing, inasmuch as he has been a chief spokesman of that wing of the party, and a most zealous opponent of reunion. He is a noted "Tombs lawyer;" not absolutely the very worst of his class; we do not award him precedence over two or three other members of the New York bar. But still he is capable of much. In power of speech-making generally, in obscenity particularly, in that horrible profanity which surpasses all others—in using which a man about as capable of conceiving of religious sentiment as a hyena uses the holiest and most feeling terms of religion—our Republican leader is "equalled by few and excelled by none." His description of his escape from his house during the riots of 1863, delivered in a State Convention two years ago, is worth reproduction for the audacity with which it affects piety: "Then, sir, in the dead of night—driven from my house by a blood-thirsty mob bent on my life, for no crime but that of having loved humanity and struggled for universal freedom—I fled for safety, leaving all my cherished household goods to the mercy of the mob, and clasping under one arm my innocent babe, and under the other my sainted father's old family Bible!" He always winds up his speeches, on any triumphant occasion, with a touch of Scripture, and gives out the Doxology at the close of meetings on election nights. And the people sing it! Two thousand people, most of them moral if not positively religious men, and many of them pious women, actually accept the lead of this gentleman—seem to be, nay, are, moved by his piety, and follow him in "Old Hundred" with a will. We read the biennial account of this incident with a profound sense of our want of language to do justice to the subject. The Devil sprinkling holy water is nothing to it.

The great question that is now supposed to be agitating the Republican party in this vicinity is whether these rival committees shall be consolidated. The intelligent reader may by this time go near to suspect our opinion of the magnitude of this problem. It belongs to a class of questions which, we should say, do not wring the mind with anguish very much if it attempts to grasp them. Shall all of the Honorable John Morrissey's places of entertainment be united in one? Shall all the pretty waiter-girls keep one hotel? Shall Mr. McCoole and Mr. O'Baldwin, the Irish Giant, go into partnership? Shall Reddy the Blacksmith unite his fortunes with the gentlemen in court who were so excessively astonished at his disappearance? Shall the burglars consolidate with the pickpockets? These are questions that will doubtless agitate the country when it takes them into consideration; and equally momentous to the interests of the Republican party and the human race is the question, Shall the two New York General Committees unite?

ILLUSTRATIONS OF OUR PUBLIC SERVICE.

Since the publication of our recent article on "The Wages in the Public Service," some facts connected with that article and the public service have been laid before us which will be instructive if known.

The Comptroller of the Treasury, it will not be to his discredit to say, is a gentleman of moderate means and blessed with that somewhat old-fashioned blessing, a patriarchal family. For these reasons, and on account of the smallness of his salary, it is no secret that he has wanted to resign for some years, but has been induced to remain in office by the promises of committees and members of Congress. At the last session his salary was raised to $5,000, but till then—promises to the contrary notwithstanding—it obstinately stuck fast at $3,500. When the first (supposed) test cases under the "20 per cent. resolution" were awaiting the decision of the Court of Claims, a certain person appeared before the Comptroller to know, if these five test cases should be decided favorably by the Court, would he, the Comptroller, consent to countersign the warrants for all the rest of them? for, if he would, this person would immediately buy them all up, and divide the profits with the Comptroller, or with the Comptroller's wife, or with his eldest son, or with his brother or his brother-in-law, or anybody he might choose to name.

Now the Comptroller was the only officer of the Government who had raised an objection to the payment of these claims, and he was the last officer whose consent was necessary. They numbered over 2,200, and amounted (by a rough estimate) to upward of $600,000. The Comptroller was not asked to stretch the law, nor to rob the Treasury. He was merely to say that he would follow the decision of the proper Court when it came, and at most divert a small percentage of the money not justly due to these claimants to himself, who had been most unjustly dealt with by Congress. Very plausible reasoning. Is there one man in a thousand, smarting under a sense of Congressional wrong, harassed by the pinchings of family economy, who would not have struck out, partly from revenge, "which is a sort of wild justice," partly from want, and done this thing?

And if it had been done, no scandal would have come of it; nothing would have been said; nothing would have been done. The supposed test cases were decided in favor of the claimants; the Comptroller was overruled by the Court in regard to them. Subsequently, they turned out to be no test cases at all, but nobody knew the distinction then. The Comptroller might prettily have said that he but obeyed the law as laid down by the proper tribunal; he might have ceased to be obstinate, and gracefully yielded; and it would have been rather "chivalrous" to have been amiably overruled by the Court of Claims. Finally, he would have made "a good thing out of it." The taxpayers of the country would have had $600,000 and more of their money paid away to people to whom they didn't owe a farthing; but then they would have saved $1,500 a year on one official's salary. As for the Thirty-ninth Congress, which passed this "20 per cent. resolution," it was dead and gone and forgotten, and no one would have wasted a kick on it. The only odium that would have fallen on anybody would have gone to the unfortunate Court of Claims for daring to decide the five little supposed test cases according to law, and paying no regard to the large outlay behind them. The Congressional lobby, and those members of Congress who somehow are ever innocently co-operating with the lobby, would then have had plenty to say about the folly of keeping a court to make decisions according to law against the Government, when they and their committees stand ready to do it for nothing. And, above all other advantages, the Comptroller would have learnt the lesson of making money—not out of the Government, of course; but, somehow or other, out of his office; and, having learnt the true value of his office, it would then be necessary for him to pay something to keep it—to subscribe to political loyal leagues—to travel round the country attending to his duties of making blatherskite harangues and of proving himself sound on the main question.

And now, another word or two in regard to a case recently stated in these columns: The letter of Mr. Jackson, informing us that his reappointment is not a sham and cheat, made for the cruel purpose of getting him to educate his successor, relieves the Treasury Department of an unfounded charge and relieves the subject of a side-issue. We doubly regret that the charge ever found its way into the Nation, because, in the first place, it was an unintended injustice to the Secretary; and, in the second place, because side-issues always distract the eyes of the jury from the main one, which alone is what we need care about. The main issue in this case is not disproved, is not denied—is, indeed, confessed; and it will do no harm, but good, to press it home.

That issue is this: A citizen of this country, having respectability, health, and a well-acquired professional position, abandons his business and his family from patriotic motives at the beginning of the rebellion and serves manfully through the war. Toward the end of the struggle, four years of unusual hardship and exposure in the miasmatic districts of the Carolinas break down an iron constitution, and the soldier is carried to a military hospital. The malarial fever goes to the brain; for weeks he is delirious, and, months after hostilities have ceased, he is discharged from the hospital and the service insane. His mind, however, is restored in time, but his physical health is impaired and his nervous system shattered. Physicians testify that he cannot return to his practice of the law; that he cannot enter into any active pursuit; but that he must, nevertheless, be kept occupied by some regular employment, free from much responsibility or care. A clerkship in the public service fulfils the precise terms of the physicians' prescription—without it, a gloomy insanity may return; with it, he may earn a meagre subsistence for his family. On these facts, Secretary McCulloch, to his honor, appoints him to an inferior clerkship in the Treasury; on these facts, Secretary Boutwell, to his shame, turns him out.

When the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States—by nature a patriotic, just, kind-hearted man—has accomplished this work (under a military President, too) of driving the broken soldier from the public service, eminent gentlemen in New York write to friends in Washington to "see the Secretary about it;" Mr. George Stuart, of Philadelphia, whose name is a guarantee of what is honest and good, writes to another Secretary, and ministers are called out of the pulpit and judges away from the bench to run about among different members of the Cabinet, and much priceless public time is spent over one little second-class clerkship, in getting this cruel wrong righted.

It was righted. But it was committed! And the men who righted it are not the officials who committed it. They are private citizens, who were compelled to take time which belonged to themselves or to philanthropic works, and to go or send to the seat of government, and beg, and push, and importune, as they would not have done to serve themselves, in order that what it was a disgrace to their country and a shame to their party to do might be undone. The heart and judgment of the Secretary doubtless co-operated with these gentlemen, but he was still the slave of a vile system, and in that slavery he had done this injustice. And we doubt whether human ingenuity could frame a worse charge against the system and against the Secretary than this case discloses—of a public servant ruthlessly robbed of what was to him both subsistence and reason, yet who was so capable that his immediate superiors said they did not know how they could dispense with his services, and who at the same time presented such a sad and honorable record of a soldier's sufferings and sacrifice.

It is the honest effort to overthrow such a system which our "men inside politics" term "chimerical" and "theoretical" and "visionary," and "aristocratic."

THE CASE OF COLONEL YERGER.

THE facts of Yerger's case, as developed in the trial, disclose not a single mitigating feature. The murder was most brutal in manner, was deliberate and unprovoked. The very enormity of the deed has suggested the only possible defence—that of insanity. If the culprit be insane, his mania is of such a character as to demand his close confinement in the most secure ward of a mad-house. If he is sane, and we have seen no evidence that he is not, hardly the most sentimental opponent of capital punishment will object to his execution. But the case presents a legal and constitutional question second in importance to none which has ever come before the Supreme Court—a question which involves on the one hand the extent and compulsive force of those restraints established by the Bill of Rights as a protection for the civil liberty of the individual, and on the other hand the power of the General Government, and particularly of Congress, to ignore and destroy these time-honored provisions. This question must be met. It will not do to shut our eyes to the consequences because the offender in this particular case is confessedly worthy of punishment.

The circumstances are few, and admit of no denial. Immediately after the murder, Yerger was arrested, and has been detained by military order, and has been tried by a military commission, although there are State tribunals in Mississippi as well as the United States District and Circuit Courts. This was done by virtue of a provision of the Reconstruction statutes which requires the military district commander to punish or cause to be punished all criminals; "and to this end he may allow local civil tribunals to take jurisdiction of and try offenders, or, when in his judgment it may be necessary for the trial of offenders, he shall have power to organize military commissions or tribunals for that purpose." The prisoner has lately applied to Chief-Justice Chase, at Washington, for a writ of habeas corpus; and the motion was elaborately argued, both upon technical points and upon the merits. The Attorney-General, on behalf of the United States, raised a preliminary objection, which was probably considered fatal to that application. This objection was founded upon the peculiar organization and restricted powers of the Supreme Court, and was, in substance, that the Chief-Justice sitting alone has no jurisdiction over matters arising outside of his own circuit. Such a position could never have been taken in reference to a judge of one of the superior courts in England; but because our supreme national tribunal and its members have no inherent common-law powers, but derive all their jurisdiction from statutes, we are decidedly of the opinion that Attorney-General Hoar's point was unanswerable. At all events, the application to the Chief-Justice has been withdrawn, a stay of proceedings has been promised on the part of the President, and the matter will be brought up anew on the merits before the entire Court at its next session. We may then expect that the question will be presented in the most solemn form, be discussed in the most exhaustive manner, and decided finally and irrevocably. As the subject is of vital importance to us as American citizens, the whole issue being public rather than private, we will briefly examine the merits of the controversy, and indicate what in our opinion the decision should be.

At the outset, it must be carefully observed that the validity of the Reconstruction measures as a whole is not now impugned; the status of the Southern States and the power of Congress over them are not now necessarily involved. The statutes passed by the national legislature, taken together, form a symmetrical scheme for reorganizing the lately insurgent societies and restoring them to their normal position in the nation. Whether this scheme in its unity is in accordance with the theory of the Constitution, whether Congress had any power to interfere, or whether it has exercised that power in a lawful manner, are questions of great political import, but they will never be examined by the courts. Political results have been reached which can never be disturbed by the judiciary. But the particular provision, that offenders of all classes may be tried and punished by military commissions, was not essential to the integrity of the scheme nor to its complete success. This clause might be struck out, might be declared a nullity, and still the process of reconstruction go on to the desired end. But it is this very provision, interfering with the private rather than political rights of the citizen, which furnishes occasions for the interposition of the judiciary, and which has given rise to the present controversy. Should the military be deprived of their judicial authority over civilians, the only result would be that the civil courts, local or national, would be at once restored to their complete functions, as in all the organized States and Territories. We may then limit the discussion to a single issue. Is the provision in the Reconstruction acts permitting the trial of civilian offenders by military tribunals valid? has Congress transgressed the limits of its authority in adopting this measure?

We need not now stop to examine the status of the revolted districts. They may have been left as States with all their rights and duties under the Constitution; or they may have lost all of their original character and been reduced to the condition of Territories; or they may be mere conquered provinces, the acquisitions of a successful war. We will assume, for the purposes of our argument, that they are to all intents Territories, as completely under the legislative authority of Congress as are the District of Columbia or any of the Western Territories which were purchased by peaceful cession or wrested by force from Mexico. This assumption grants all that the most determined supporter of the Congressional policy can ask—concedes enough to satisfy the disciples of Mr. Sumner or the late Mr. Stevens. But what are the powers of Congress over the Territories and the District of Columbia? Are they unlimited? Certainly not. While legislation may be directed to all possible objects, the choice of means and measures by which these objects can be attained is plainly curtailed. Thus, provision may be made for the trial and punishment of all criminals within the Territories and the District of Columbia, but not for their trial and punishment in any possible manner. In respect to these portions of the United States, the Congress possesses all the attributes which belong to it as the legislature of the nation, together with those which belong to the legislatures of the several States. But in all of its acts, whether directed to that portion of the entire domain which is organized into States or to that portion which is left in the inchoate condition of Territories, it is restrained by the provisions of the Bill of Rights: "No person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." "No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service." "In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury." Such are some of the muniments of civil liberty provided by the Constitution. These clauses are mandatory; they require no statute to make them effective; any statute, or part of statute, which conflicts with their prohibitions is a nullity. This is conceded on all hands to be true when the law operates within an organized State; it is no less true when the law operates within a Territory, or anywhere within domains belonging to the United States. The latter doctrine was expressly affirmed in the Dred Scott case; and however much we may dislike that celebrated judgment in its application to slavery, it is certainly a binding authority and sound law to the extent we have indicated. The inhabitants of the Territories and of the District of Columbia are citizens of the United States, and as such are entitled to all the immunities which the organic law provides. If it were considered necessary to surround the Congress with a cordon of positive prohibitions in respect to its legislation for the States, where its power is confined within narrow bounds, much more are these prohibitions necessary in respect to its legislation for Territories, where its power is otherwise unlimited. It would be monstrous to assume that the Government may deprive a citizen of life or liberty without due process of law, and without a regular judicial trial, in a Territory where its legislative attributes are supreme, and is only forbidden to do so in New York, where the individual is under the protection of a local judiciary. These seem to us unanswerable conclusions.

Are there, however, any exceptions? Are there any occasions when these clauses of the Bill of Rights may be disregarded and Congress be left unrestrained? It is well known that an affirmative answer has been given—based, as it is claimed, upon the overwhelming necessities of war. Fortunately, the Supreme Court has determined the exact extent to which this claim can be admitted. We refer of course to the case of Milligan, the facts of which arose during the agony of the rebellion. Milligan was engaged in a widespread conspiracy, intended to aid the rebels and thwart the military designs of the Government. He was a citizen of Indiana, was there arrested, tried by a military commission, and imprisoned by its order. An application for his discharge was brought before the Supreme Court, and all the proceedings against him were declared null and void. A majority of the judges held that the restrictive clauses of the Bill of Rights applied to him, and that military trials of civilians can only be resorted to during an internal war, at the very scene of hostilities, where armies are collected and opposed, and all civil administration is thereby for a while suspended. In such an exceptional case, in order to preserve society and punish the guilty, an appeal to the summary processes of the soldier is inevitable. Mr. Justice Davis, speaking in the name of the Court, said: "If in a foreign invasion or civil war the courts are actually closed, and it is impossible to administer criminal justice according to law, then on the theatre of active military operations, where war really prevails, there is a necessity to furnish a substitute for the civil authority thus overthrown, in order to preserve the safety of society; and as no power is left but the military, it is allowed to govern by martial rule until the laws can have their free course. As necessity creates the rule, so it limits its duration; for if this government is continued after the courts are reinstated, it is a gross usurpation of power. Martial rule is also confined to the locality of actual war." The dissenting judges did not differ from the majority in respect to the controlling principle of this decision; they simply denied that the necessity need be as stringent as was demanded by the opinion of Mr. Justice Davis. They maintained that offenders might, under some circumstances, be justiciable by military tribunals in portions of the country which were not the theatre of actual hostilities, and in which the courts were not closed; but they, no less than the majority, required an internal war in actual existence. The Chief-Justice stated this doctrine as follows:

"We by no means assert that Congress can establish and apply the laws of war where no war has been declared or exists. Where peace exists, the laws of peace must prevail. What we do maintain is that, when the nation is involved in war, and some portions of the country are invaded, and all are exposed to invasion, it is within the power of Congress to determine in what States or districts such great or imminent public danger exists as justifies the authorization of military tribunals for the trial of crimes and offences against the discipline or security of the army or against the public safety."

The substance of the Milligan case would seem to be, that, when a war is in progress within the United States, when the Government is engaged in this internal struggle and to that end must maintain and marshal its armies, a civilian who should interfere with purely military movements, who should throw obstacles in the way of the final success of our arms, may be treated as a military offender. The majority of the Court, however, would limit this power territorially to the very regions where the hostilities are actually raging, and in all other regions would leave the criminal to the civil tribunals. These doctrines of constitutional law must be taken as finally established, and, as we have seen, they apply to the Territories, which are entirely under the control of Congress, as well as to the States, which are under that control only for certain well-defined purposes.

We well might ask, then, what possible foundation is left upon which to base the clause in the Reconstruction statutes which permits military trials of civilians? The ground seems to be entirely cut away from under it. Mr. Attorney-General Hoar evidently feels this difficulty, and has been driven to rest his claim, not upon any legal argument, but upon an assumed fact. In a late opinion in reference to a similar case in Texas, and in his recent argument before the Chief-Justice, he is forced to maintain—and he gravely does it—that war still exists in the three unreconstructed States. He argues that, as in the year 1865 there was a war within those districts, the Congress may treat that war as still continuing; in short, that it does continue until the legislature declares it ended. It is a sufficient answer to this position that the Supreme Court does not sanction military trials of civilians in any portion of our domain merely because there is a legal condition of war within the country, but only suffers them in those districts occupied by armies and which are the scenes of martial movements and actual struggles. But apart from this consideration, the assumption of the Attorney-General is most plainly opposed to all the facts of our recent history. If there is now a war in Mississippi, there is one also in Virginia. Who are the enemies? where are the hostile armies? under what authority do they act? what military movements are in progress? The local courts are open in these districts; United States judges hold their circuits within them; elections have been held; conventions have sat; constitutions have been proposed; society as such is quiet; the only disturbances and breaches of peace are individual and sporadic. If this be war, we do not understand the meaning of terms. But it is useless to argue. We might as well attempt to demonstrate an axiom. It may well be that there is some ill-will among the Southern people. It may well be that convictions are hard to obtain from Southern juries. These are grave evils, but they always must for a while follow the suppression of a great rebellion. It is better to endure them, and to await with patience the soothing effects of time; it is better that a few wretches like Yerger should escape their merited punishment, than that a weapon should be put into the hands of some future Government which may be effective in destroying the liberties of the nation.

ENGLAND.

LONDON, July 9, 1869.

THE British public is at the present moment licking its lips over a delightful bit of scandal. The fates of governments and parties may ostensibly occupy its mind, but in private society the one absorbing topic of interest is the history of Mr. Grenville Murray. Although your readers will hardly take that interest in the matter which is felt here, and the affair is not as yet at an end, it is sufficiently characteristic to deserve a few words. One summer evening, then, to begin in the correct style, a gentleman might have been observed leaving the door of the Conservative Club. He was a man of feeble stature and somewhat advanced in years. On the steps he was encountered by a fresh-colored, well-built young man, bearing in face and figure the unmistakable marks of belonging to the aristocracy of England. The youthful nobleman straightway collared the elderly gentleman and administered a certain number of blows with a horsewhip; but how many or with what degree of vigor is still gravely disputed. Whence this wrath in celestial minds? The muse must answer that for some months past there has been appearing a well-printed periodical, selling for the high price of sixpence, and called the Queen's Messenger. The mode in which its subscribers were really recompensed for their outlay was by a series of articles on the hereditary legislators of England. In these, every scandal concerning various noble families was raked up with extraordinary diligence and research; and though feigned names were given, and particular care taken to evade the laws of libel, they were not the less insulting and irritating. Lord Stanley, the Duke of Cambridge, and other men of rank and honor, were ferociously assailed. The resentment expressed not only by the persons outraged, but by everybody who has some regard for the honor of the press, was bitter; no such outrage upon decency has taken place for a generation; and people only refrained from putting the libel laws in action because it was supposed that by so doing they would in fact advertise the paper. The last person assailed was Lord Carrington, who, it seems, is in the habit of driving a four-in-hand, and whose father's infirmities were pleasantly called up for the occasion.

And what has Mr. Grenville Murray to do with it? Ah! that is the mystery of this wonderful history, as the poet has said, and I wish that I could tell. However, Mr. Grenville Murray was lately dismissed from the consular service under some imputations from the Foreign Office authorities, of which I know little. And the main object of the Queen's Messenger was to attack certain officials in the Foreign Office under cover of the general assault upon the nobility. Mr. Murray endeavored to deny having anything to do with the paper; but it seems that he lives in the same chambers with his son, who is the registered proprietor; his solicitor admitted in court that he had contributed to it; and, in short, every man in London believes, rightly or wrongly, that he is the really responsible person. He summoned Lord Carrington for the assault, and a singular scene ensued. The assault, of course, was easily proved, and, in fact, not denied. However, the magistrate allowed Lord Carrington's counsel to cross-examine Mr. Murray at great length as to his connection with the paper, and to charge him with downright and systematic lying. A certain box was brought into court by the defendants—how procured is still a mystery—containing the MSS. of the Queen's Messenger; and various documents from it were placed before Mr. Murray, in order to ask whether he had written them. After the decision of the magistrate, who committed Lord Carrington for trial, this box became the object of intense interest. How it happened is not quite clear, but it seems that some of the writers in the Queen's Messenger endeavored to rescue it by physical force; the lords and gentlemen in court rushed to the rescue; the police joined in; and a free fight took place, which lasted for several minutes. Dukes and costermongers, it is said, met in deadly combat, and the majesty of British law was outraged by a spectacle never before witnessed in a court of justice. The box was at length successfully defended, order was restored, and the magistrate administered a dignified rebuke, which would, however, have been rather more dignified if it had quelled the battle instead of following it.

That the story is thoroughly disgraceful may be easily admitted. The question of the mode in which disgrace should be distributed is not quite so plain. There is, however, a very general sympathy with Lord Carrington, and an agreement that, if he had got hold of the real criminal, it would have been desirable to give him rather more chastisement than less. As the whole matter must come up again before long, I shall not dwell upon this point at greater length. Neither, I am glad to say, is the Queen's Messenger to be taken as an ordinary specimen of English journalism. It is a rare exception, and a return to an older order of things. There has, it is true, been a singular outbreak of cheap newspapers lately. Several comic illustrated papers seem to possess a certain amount of vitality, and one of them, the Tomahawk, first attracted notice by some audacious attacks upon distinguished people. It has, however, survived the follies of its youth, and except that it has occasionally some rather vigorous drawings, is as harmless and humdrum as most of its contemporaries. Another paper which trades to a certain extent upon the public curiosity about notorieties is Vanity Fair. The remarkably clever caricatures of eminent statesmen which an Italian artist has contributed to that paper are drawn from the life, instead of photographs, as seems to be the fashion of most of our modern caricaturists; and if any of your readers wish to know the outward appearance of Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Disraeli, Mr. Lowe, or Mr. Forster, they cannot do better than refer to its pages. There is, however, nothing scandalous in it, and I imagine that the originals of its portraits take them as on the whole complimentary. One of the gentlemen I have mentioned went into a shop on seeing his own speaking likeness, and ordered half-a-dozen copies; he was much hurt when the shopman failed to recognize the gentleman who gave him the order. On the whole, I wonder daily at two or three things about the British press: at its cheapness, its general respectability, and its equally general dulness. One very respectable evening paper, called the Echo, is now published for a halfpenny; it is calculated that the paper alone on which it is printed costs nearly four-fifths of that sum; and I should think that it was the cheapest halfpenny work in existence, for it is really well written and contains a good deal of matter. The Pall Mall Gazette, which has made a great position for itself during an existence of three or four years, has just lowered its price from twopence to a penny, so that the Times is now the solitary daily paper which costs more than that sum. Its circulation has, I believe, diminished of late years in consequence of the competition to which it has been exposed; and it has no longer a monopoly of public opinion; but I imagine that on the whole it is still the most influential, though far from the most widely circulated, paper.

I must turn again to the irrepressible Irish Church Bill. The Lords, having given way on the second reading, have been giving themselves a little liberty. They have in fact so maimed and mauled the bill that its own parents scarcely know it. They have largely increased the endowment left to it; in fact, so largely that more than half of the surplus intended to remain after paying off the Church would be absorbed if their scheme were adopted. Further, they have resolved that the distribution of such surplus as is still left shall be left unsettled for the present, in the hope, as some of them avow, that it may be used by way of what is called "concurrent endowment." The House of Commons will of course disagree to these amendments, and I presume that ultimately the Lords will retreat, with probably some compromise to pacify them. The only point worth mentioning is this: the Times has lately performed one of its usual circumgyrations, and has come out as the advocate of concurrent endowments; it proposes that the clergy of the Established Church should be left in possession of their houses and glebes; but that, to make things equal, the clergy of other sects should be provided with a similar endowment from the surplus funds. This plan was ably supported by Lord Grey, whose peculiar mission it is to speak awkward truths, or at least to propose plans which are at once plausible and impracticable. Personally, I am strongly inclined to believe that the course proposed would be the wisest in the abstract. There are, however, difficulties which will probably prevent its ever coming into operation. In the first place, the Liberal majority in the Commons have pledged themselves against it; in the next, the Tory majority in the Lords, who were quite willing to secure the houses and glebes of the Established clergy, are entirely opposed to giving anything to the Catholics or Presbyterians. In short, one party is resolved to take away endowments from every sect; the other is equally resolved to give nothing to any sect but one; and the notion of giving endowments to all, reasonable or unreasonable in itself, affords no ground of compromise between both antagonists. It would not be a case of both sides giving and taking; but of both sides agreeing to do something to which they are equally opposed. I therefore look forward to a little more blustering and sputtering, and talks about dissolution and autumn sessions, succeeded by some arrangement which will disestablish the Irish Church, but leave it a little better off than was originally proposed. In short, Lord Stanley's programme will have been carried out, and as much as possible have been saved from the fire.

FRANCE.—THE EMPEROR'S HESITANCY.

PARIS, July 9, 1869.

IT is impossible to describe the state of animation and agitation in which people are living here now. Nothing is talked of or thought of save the political aspect of affairs; and as to the objects and occupations of society in quieter times, they have passed away from men's minds—and women's, too, for that matter. The look of the Chamber is enough to show you what intense interest the situation excites. Every tribune is crowded; and, from under the laces and flowers of the bonnets, you see eager faces bending down and ardent eyes fixing their bright hold upon this or that deputy's movements. Time out of mind, the genuine Frenchwoman of the educated classes has been a first-rate and eager politician; but all her natural instincts, all her higher aspirations, all her predominant intellectuality have been more or less extinguished by the Empire. As with the clergy (when laboring to supplant the free-minded, enlightened Gallican by the flat-souled, obscurantist Jesuit), so with the women of France has Louis Napoleon endeavored to deal. Instead of trying to raise the feminine standard by the example of his Court and of the "ways of life" of those around him, the Emperor has encouraged its being lowered; and from the Tuileries and Compiègne have sprung the school of overdressed noisy, fast women known by the denomination of "les Cocodettes." It is no use mincing the matter: "la Cocodetterie," like the restoration of Jesuitism and the almost universal degradation of art, are all direct consequences of the establishment of the Second Empire, and they are so instinctively felt to be such by the whole Imperial throng that they are persistently, passionately encouraged and fostered.

Well, the change is already visible. The women who crowd into the Chamber of Deputies are not the fashionable dolls who fill official ball-rooms or skate on the "Lac" in winter; they are quite well-dressed, lady-like women, whose faces are unfamiliar to the crowd of mere empty pleasure-hunters. They are the wives, sisters, mothers, friends of the men whom reawakening France is sending to vindicate her rights; and for a stranger they are a positive study, for he finds that (unless he happens to be lancé in real French society) he has to ask the name of nearly every successive face. These spectators of the political drama come from all points of the territory, and neglect country amusements, or travelling, or the charms of distant watering-places, to watch what the representatives of public feeling in this curious nation are going to do with themselves. As to the interest, assuredly nothing can surpass it, and it is the most living drama that ever was enacted. Hardly a debate can go by without some word or other recalling the past, and showing how unforgotten are the links of the chain which bind to that past. A day or two ago, M. Estancelin, the Orleanist deputy par excellence, made the Chamber quiver by one word. M. de Forcade, the Minister of the Interior, somewhat superciliously tried to put down this gentleman in a discussion, by saying that he was "new" in the House, and did not know its usages. "Moi, nouveau!" exclaimed M. Estancelin; "M. le Ministre se trompe; je ne suis pas un nouveau, je suis un revenant." It is impossible to translate the phrase, for it would lose all its sharpness. Its effect lay in the fact of M. Estancelin's having been one of the last electors at the close of Louis Philippe's reign, and of his return to this present parliament seeming almost like the ushering in again of the Orleans dynasty.

What will happen immediately?—namely, within the next few months; what will be the details of what we may expect?—these are questions which none can answer. The great outlines are clear enough, and can mislead no one; the filling up is a problem, and depends on individuals. The "great outlines" are these: France is resolved to participate in the work of government; resolved, above all, not to let her money be scattered about, as it has been, wilfully, sinfully, and secretly. The Emperor, like all men who have wielded sovereign power in modern times, is ready to submit to the decrees of popular opinion in the last resort; but, like all his brother sovereigns, he suffers himself to be deceived as to the genuineness and intensity of the popular will. This is, in fact, the one distinctive characteristic of all European rulers since the French Revolution of '93. The English Revolution taught them nothing, nor did even Charles Stuart's fate impress them; but from the moment of the wholesale executions of the "Reign of Terror," they learnt thoroughly one lesson, if no more, that, namely, of obedience to the "people" when the "people" ordained. But here is the hitch. Sovereigns (of no matter what origin) being, after a very few years of activity, more or less shut out from free intercourse with the mass of intelligent, educated individuals, grow to live deafly and blindly in a miserable little world of their own, overcrowded with base spirits and into which no wholesome air ever penetrates. The courtiers, ministers, and functionaries who live by the sovereign maintain him in his dark condition until it is too late, and then the fresh wholesome air from out-of-doors does rush in, but only because the "people" have smashed doors and windows, and brought the wholesome element in with a vengeance. I said it was the same with all sovereigns, of no matter what origin. Now, here is one, Napoleon III., who has gone through all conditions and states: been an exile, a dependent on other men's purses, a needy man, a conspirator against other monarchs' rule—a man whose life has contained nearly every mode whereby political experience could be procured, yet he is probably on the eve of committing the faults that can never be retrieved, and which he knows so well that he has passed the best years of his life in describing and foreseeing them.

"Anything may happen any day;" that is the speech with which men meet each other now on the Boulevards. As far as mere "detail" goes, this is true. It is not true of the upshot of the whole business. The "definitive result" is freedom for France, and a return to parliamentary government, which little by little will grow to be (what it has never been yet) real, bona-fide self-government. But the "anything" which may happen "any day" is various. The Emperor may to-morrow dissolve the Chamber or "suspend" the constitution itself, reserving for himself a temporary dictatorship, under which he will propose no end of "socialistic" reforms. This would only be to revert to the formula of 1851, as enounced by M. de Persigny: "With and for the masses always: with the higher classes if they choose; without them if they don't choose; against them if they object." I repeat it, then, Louis Napoleon might without any great inconsistency revert to this policy (though he would be all but utterly alone if he did so); or he may attempt reaction under more than one shape; or he may yield, and thus govern more or less quietly to the day of his death. What those about him incline to believe he will do, is (what he often has done) "neither one thing nor the other." They incline to fancy that an attempt will be made so to draw on the discussions of the Corps Législatif that, when the simple "verifications" are nearly complete, it will be impracticable to keep the deputies any longer at their post, and that, with but little opposition, it may be feasible to prorogue the house till the ordinary time of assembling in the winter. This would perhaps put off the "evil day" for a few months, and save the concessions which some of those around him are persuading Louis Napoleon are too deeply humiliating. But if this be tried, it will be so at such a heavy and definite cost of popularity and public esteem that the Emperor had probably better resort to any other plan than this one.

There is no disguising, however, that this kind of half-measure is the one most to be feared. It is, and has always been, in Louis Napoleon's nature to try and slide out of a dilemma as silently as possible, and in this instance all his Ministry will help him. But afterwards? How will the government meet in January the deputies it has tried to juggle out of their rights in July? The settling day must come, and the longer it is put off, the bitterer the creditor will have become. All violent exits from his actual position are forbidden to Louis Napoleon. War is, first and foremost of all, out of his power, and he knows it. Not only will no one give him a pretext for a conflict, but France will not follow him into one; therefore, it is in the interior that all must be brought to a conclusion. It is said that the Emperor is unwise enough to lean towards reaction. M. Rouher advocates the status quo, which is nearly as bad. It is even yet time for Louis Napoleon to unite with the nation, and, by yielding gracefully half his power, preserve the other half for the rest of his days. Nothing else is practicable, unless as a momentary expedient; but this being the state of things, you may easily understand that the public mind runs on nothing but politics from morning to night.

Correspondence.

ANOTHER AMERICAN VIEW OF CHINA.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: The relations of Western countries with China are of special interest at this moment, when Great Britain is discussing the revision of her treaty, and, through hers, all the Western treaties with the empire. For what is accomplished for one is accomplished for all.

In the opinion of the American residents in China, Mr. Burlingame has not helped the American people to a more just idea of the position of China than they entertained before. On the contrary, they believe that his exaggerated descriptions have only further obscured the real state of the facts, and that our people and authorities are further away than ever from apprehending the imbecility of the government and the real barbarism that prevails among a large portion of the population. The immediate ill consequence of such misapprehension is the belief engendered that the Chinese Government will, of its own accord, deal justly with foreigners, and carry out the provisions of the treaties, and that any complaints of its action from foreign residents in the country are either unfounded, or that the action complained of is the consequence of the illegal behavior of foreigners themselves.

This evil remedies itself in time; for the power of the central government is so weak that it cannot control its own officers, and these officers are so generally corrupt, and so adverse to foreign interests and influence, that with a very little relaxation of the rigor with which the English and French have hitherto kept them within bounds, they become too aggressive for the patience of even the most amiable of their foreign visitors. But there is deeper injury done in perpetuating the present miserable state of the country, and so bringing upon it future calamities. It is with regard to the ultimate effects of this soft-handed policy that I take the liberty of addressing you. I do not propose to point out the proper policy. That I believe to be indicated sufficiently by the treaties themselves. They show plainly that if foreigners wish to enjoy the privileges of the treaties, they must look out for themselves. These privileges have not all been obtained, owing to the bad faith of the Chinese, but such as have been were had, and are had at this day, only by the resolute action of the British and French when attempts have been made to annul them. In accomplishing what I have to say, I must be excused for dwelling at some length on the present condition of the government and the character of the ruling class.

It may be said that foreign nations have always, hitherto, alternated between too lenient and too forcible an attitude towards China. It is sometimes assumed that it is a government, weak-jointed and halting, perhaps, in physical health, but full of good intentions and even of lofty aspirations; that its course is guided by maxims of profound wisdom, and its governors and statesmen animated by a sagacity and shrewdness beyond the average of those of Western nations. This is the view that Mr. Burlingame advocates, and it is the view that will, no doubt, now for a time be in the ascendancy. The Chinese, under the temptation that results from the forbearance of foreign nations under this condition of relations, soon bring about a reaction by a display of very opposite qualities. In this reaction extreme opinions still have sway, but in the other direction. The national character is then represented by the Western press as a very low type of character indeed, full of cruelty, injustice, rapine, and corruption. The truth, of course, lies between. There certainly does not exist a high morality. A lofty standard there may be, but of little effect practically. Though moral platitudes appear constantly in their despatches and edicts, and in their conversations with the foreign ministers, very little of the spirit reaches to their acts. Their sagacity is cunning, and their astuteness is distrust. They cannot see their way to a policy; they cannot even discriminate between useful and harmful propositions. Their simple plan is to reject all, as long as the liberty of action is left to them. They know, in fact, many advanced maxims; for in their former days of prosperity they reached a point which would have been civilization one hundred years ago; but as for an enlightened policy, or any liberality of ideas, such a thing is unknown in China. There is the shallow pretence, but without the reality.

On the other hand, as we who live here well know, they are not savages by any means. Education, of a sort that trains the mind and refines the manners, has long ago reached a high point among them. It bears, in these days, fruit in no way proportioned to its pretensions, and barren of the practical benefit to society which results from Western systems; but, at all events, it elevates them far above the uncivilized portions of mankind. In short, they cannot be treated, on the one hand, as if they had knowledge to see the right, and virtue to do it when seen; nor, on the other, as if they must, as a matter of course, be forced to give justice and to adhere to engagements. It is more especially in their state affairs that the Chinese need assistance. They are incapacitated from reforming these by their conventionalism, their self-conceit, and by what may be termed the custom of dishonesty. They cannot even think honestly on such matters. They refuse to see conclusions which are painful or distasteful, and cling to error when they must know that it is error. Their boasted wisdom is merely the dry husks of maxims which they cannot apply to the current affairs of the day.

There is thus no vigor in the administration, and without vigor there follows corruption in any country. In China, where the tendency is unchecked by moral considerations, and encouraged by customs unsuited to the present day, it reaches the extreme. When, therefore, it is asserted that this is a great and progressive country, governed upon great principles, guided by a generous policy, eager to enter upon the race for improvement among the foremost nations of the world, not only are Western nations misled, but evil is done to China herself. For in so far as the first act upon such assurances, they will act to the ultimate injury of the latter. It is a simple fiction to say it is a prosperous country. It would not have progressed one iota (unless it is progress to travel on the road to decay) but for the force from the West which has propelled it. It is not even a great country except in regard to numbers, and in that only by taking words for facts; for it is not one country, but several feebly bound together—and many portions a source of weakness and expense to the central government instead of a source of strength. The government is guided by purely selfish instincts—the instincts of an alien race that fears the advent of more vigorous ideas as injurious and dangerous to its now feeble powers. As for "a policy" or "generosity" as affecting the destinies of the empire in the interests of the people, one smiles either with contempt at the credulity or admiration at the audacity of such an exponent of their principles.

These views of the progressive tendency of the Chinese rulers of to-day are, of course, asserted in the interests of these rulers, as, if foreign nations could be brought to believe them, they would leave the Chinese to develop in their own way. There being in truth no will, there would be no way, but still, as regards the rulers alone, they would be relieved from pressure, and so gain their immediate object. Whether they would gain ultimately depends upon the disposition of Russia.

If China stood isolated in the world, the forbearance of all might be an advantage. Shouldered as she is by so powerful and aggressive a neighbor, it may be that the only effective protection for the present dynasty is in intimacy with the other Western powers. If it can be made to appear that the Russians have the will and the power to occupy China, it will be granted that there is at least a strong likelihood of that great event coming to pass. As to the will, there is no proof, of course. One can judge only by analogy. They have extended themselves in Asia whenever they have had the opportunity, and they have recently conquered and annexed the kingdom of Bokhara at great cost, completing the extension of their dominions in that quarter to the borders of British India—a boundary which they must accept as final in that direction. The difficulties in that enterprise were greater, and the advantages not to be mentioned as compared to those to be incurred or gained in the acquisition of China. In the actual direction of this empire, they have taken and occupied with forts within a few years the great tract of country lying between the Amoor and the present Chinese frontier, without any advantage in the region itself to attract them, and apparently only for the object of reaching nearer to China proper. They obtained a valuable port upon the coast, but that they could have had without the costly annexation of so great a territory. They have more young men learning the Chinese language in one way or another than all the other Westerns together, and they push their traders into the country with a pertinacity quite uncalled for by the exigencies of their trade.

Finally, there lies before them a prize unparalleled in the history of the world. A nation of at least two hundred millions of industrious, energetic, and ingenious people, ripe for conquest, and capable, when conquered, of giving inexhaustible supplies of excellent soldiers and sailors; a nation poor, indeed, in resources at present, but capable of a miraculous resurrection under an energetic rule; a country full of natural wealth, with an immense area of fertile soil already under cultivation, with a system of navigable rivers unsurpassed in the world; a coast abounding in fine harbors, and commanding this side of the Pacific; a dominion reaching to the tropics, and including in its wide embrace every climate and almost every valuable production of the earth. Is it not impossible that, with their antecedents, their settled policy for centuries, the Russians should fail in desire for such a prize as this? As for the power, unless succored by other Western nations, the country would lie defenceless before the assault of 50,000 men led by a general skilled in modern war. Such succor, if it came at all, would probably come too late. By occupying the western and northwestern provinces under one pretext or another, and with the declaration that it was provisional and temporary, they could fairly reach the coast and have possession of the main strategical points, with two or three hundred thousand Chinese soldiers under arms and in effective condition, before any of the European powers would have concluded to intervene. Their conclusions then would be uninteresting.

In view of this greatest of hazards, it would seem to be the natural policy of the government to cultivate as close relations with other Western people as possible; to introduce them into the country; to accept their inventions and improvements; to obtain foreign arms and equipments; to train an army to the European standard of efficiency and under European officers. These are the steps which should be pressed on the Chinese authorities by their well-wishers, and sedulously followed up if they wish them to maintain even their present position. It may be, however, that, in the great interests of humanity, foreign representatives may not have the prosperity of the present dynasty and government really at heart. Of this I do not pretend to judge. They may feel that nothing will elevate the Chinese people, and place the country fairly in the path of progress and reform, but the government of a Western power. It does, indeed, seem impossible that any real good can come from the selfish and apathetic race of rulers that now misgovern the country; and in the interests of the millions who suffer from their incapacity or perversity, foreign powers are, perhaps, bound to withhold advice or suggestion that may delay the hour of deliverance.

If such is the case, no course seems so wise as to leave them as much as possible to such seclusion as they can keep and to their present narrow policy. With no Western influence but Russian in the interior, and no advisers but their own antiquated maxims, they will drop the easier prey into the lap of their vigorous neighbor—friend or enemy, as he chooses to take the part and as circumstances recommend. Whether Russia will do evil or good to the world at large when she has an army of two millions of men on the Pacific, and a revenue to match, is a further point for consideration, but much beyond my province to discuss.

I only express the conviction that such a course of things is not only possible, but likely, if the Chinese inclination to resist progress and to hold Western nations at arm's length is allowed to control events.

A China Resident.

[The above is a fair presentation, by an American merchant, of the view taken of the Chinese by a considerable portion of the foreign residents in China. The obvious answer to it, it seems to us, is that the "hammer and tongs" policy has been tried and has failed, while the Burlingame policy has not been tried, and it has in its favor what the other has not, the experience of the civilized world touching the power of justice, humanity, and kind treatment on all classes and races of men.—Ed. Nation.]

VARRO, ST. AUGUSTINE, AND MR. LECKY.

To the Editor of the Nation:

In a work so full of references and citations as Mr. Lecky's "History of Morals," an occasional slip must not surprise us. Such a one, I think, occurs Vol. I., p. 176: "Varro openly professed the belief that there are certain religious truths which it is expedient that the people should regard as false." The reference is "St. Aug., De Civ. Dei, iv. 31." St. Augustine's words are these: ". . . . nisi evidenter alio loco ipse diceret de religionibus loquens, multa esse vera quæ non modo vulgo scire non utile, sed etiam tametsi falsa sunt, aliter existimare populum expediat," etc., etc. Can you get out of these words any such sense as Mr. L. assigns to them? Do they not rather mean that (according to St. Augustine) Varro held not only that some religious truths ought not to be known to the people, but even although certain beliefs were false, that it was expedient for the people to think differently of them (aliter existemare), i.e., believe them to be true? I do not see how tametsi can signify anything but "although." With Mr. Lecky's version, we should expect some such word as veluti or quasi and (even in the Saint's corrupt Latin) a subjunctive mood.

As I understand Varro's sentiment, it is a very common one, of which that author gives numerous instances, and which is not quite obsolete yet. But the opinion attributed to him by Mr. Lecky is most peculiar. I am not aware that any philosopher or theologian ever "openly professed" that it was "expedient for the people to regard certain religious truths as false," or, in other words, disbelieve them.

I take this opportunity of stating that there are several misprints in the American edition; whether they exist in the original English edition I cannot say, not having a copy at hand. P. 192, the misplacing of a reference number has the odd effect of making Sallust quote Pliny. P. 195 (note), Perseus for Persius. P. 218, quotation in note, animas for annos. As these three occur within thirty pages, there are probably others.

C. A. Bristed.

Notes.

LITERARY.

Messrs. T. B. Peterson & Brothers have in press reprints of Mr. T. A. Trollope's "Dream Numbers" and "Giulio Malatesta," Mrs. Henry Wood's "Roland Yorke," and Dumas' "Love and Liberty," a narrative of the French Revolution. The same house will shortly publish Mrs. Emma D. E. N. Southworth's "Prince of Darkness."——Mr. John H. Dingman—with Messrs. Scribner, Welford & Co.—announces his "Complete Business Directory of the Trade" for 1869–70, to contain, in one large octavo, full lists of all the publishers, booksellers, stationers, news-dealers, and music dealers in the United States and Canada.

—The Harvard University lectures are going to be of more importance than the outside world had been supposing. Their delivery might almost revive for us a mediæval feature of the student-world, and call to the college, from many States, a concourse of youths intent on hearing the most capable scholars give, viva voce, instruction not otherwise to be had. But, probably sooner or later, and before very long, we shall have in books the substance of the lectures, and need not make pilgrimage. Though, on the other side of this question, it is to be said that the lectures which Mr. Lowell has for a number of years been giving at Harvard, and which doubtless contain the best body of literary criticism that has been written in America, are out of the reach of the general public as yet. The Cornell Era, a college paper, published some brief notes when Mr. Lowell and Mr. Curtis were recently lecturing in Ithaca, which may properly make us hope that the lectures themselves are not to remain unpublished long. No present need of the American literary world is quite so great as the need of sound and stimulating criticism, because till we have it we want even the atmosphere which men of letters are to breathe while they work. "Early Italian and Spanish Literature" is to be Mr. Lowell's theme in the coming course; and his heart as well as his head will be thoroughly engaged in what must be to him a delightful task, leading his young men through the gayest and freshest of all the painted meadows of song. "Later Italian Literature" Mr. Howells will treat of; and how well he will treat of them those may see who will read his North American Review articles on modern Italian poets, and those may guess who know his books of Italian travel. Professor Bôcher, of whom we know next to nothing, has chosen to treat of "Molière"—a topic requiring a man of some size; and the same thing may be said of "Goethe and Schiller," which Professor E. J. Cutler will handle. Professor Cutler is known as the author of some graceful and well-finished verses and as a man of much cultivation. Some of his literary criticism may be seen occasionally in the Boston Advertiser, which in this as in other respects is a long way ahead of any other Boston journal—the Boston papers being, as a rule, singularly inferior in ability to what might be expected, considering the literary reputation of the city. It is almost even as the irreverent London Bookseller said the other day: "The newspapers of the Hub are nowhere." But then the Bookseller "does not understand our institutions" with much obstinacy; and it praises the London Times for keeping its American correspondent in Philadelphia. Professor Child will lecture on "English Poetry of the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Centuries," and, to say nothing of his acumen, will bring to its consideration a union of the most thorough knowledge of his subject with a refined taste in poetry—a poet's taste in poetry—which makes him, as we suppose, the most competent man on either side of the water to deal critically with his favorite literature. Another scholar whom it is a pleasure to think of as lecturing on his favorite pursuit—because the lectures will be one more example in a slipshod world of a thoroughly good thing well done by the man who best knows how to do it—is Professor Whitney, who takes up "The History and Relations of the German Language." The Philosophical Course—which will go on at the same time with the Literary, and like that will extend through the academic year—is to be opened by Professor Bowen, a gentleman for a long time Professor of Metaphysics in the college, the writer of a work on Political Economy, of another on Ethics, of a condensation of Sir William Hamilton's Lectures, of a translation of De Tocqueville's "Democracy in America," and the author of other books that have been used inside the college as text-books, but without making much noise outside of it. Professor Hedge and Mr. J. Eliot Cabot follow Mr. Bowen—the one a Unitarian divine very well known, by name at least, to the Eastern public—the other a Boston student of German Philosophy, not so well known except to the select few. Mr. John Fiske, the youngest lecturer, we suppose we may call a somewhat modified Herbert Spencerian, and, we dare say, he is as likely to wake up the undergraduate mind as any of the gentlemen we have mentioned—feebleness of conception and vagueness of language, and a lack of "the courage of his convictions," not being among Mr. Fiske's faults. Last in the course will come Mr. Emerson, who seems to be intending something more systematic than one might have expected, his list of topics reading like chapter-headings in the books of "Intellectual Philosophy for the use of Schools." "The Moral Sense," "Memory," "Imagination," are some of them; but it will not be in old Dr. Wayland's manner that they will be treated by Mr. Emerson. We almost feel inclined to hope that the Faculty will compel the undergraduates to attend both these courses of lectures, which, on the whole, give promise of being admirable. If there is to be any compulsion at all at Cambridge, it may be doubted if it could be better applied than in bringing the influence of such men and such subjects to bear upon the minds of the students. We should add that persons not undergraduates must pay three hundred dollars for both courses, one hundred and fifty dollars for either one, and one hundred dollars for one term of either one—prices which, we should think, would be found high; we were going to say prohibitory. Women are not to be excluded.

—The Arundel Society has an agency here, and ought to be better known by Americans than it is. Its great success in Europe—four or five thousand subscribers await, each fall or each spring, the appearance of its publications—and the real excellence of its works, especially of late years, ought to be responded to from this side the water more heartily than they have been. Perhaps there may be fifty subscribers in America, but we do not believe there are more. The Society was founded in 1848, having among its founders the Marquis of Lansdowne, Lord Lindsay (author of "The History of Christian Art"), Samuel Rogers, Mr. Ruskin, and Mr. Layard, "the Member from Nineveh," as Punch calls him, who, known to the world chiefly as explorer of the mounds where Babylon and Nineveh lie buried, has worked well and to the purpose at the elucidation of Italian early painting. The frescoes of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries in Italy have always been the chief study of the Society. A "copying fund" exists, out of which the best procurable copies in water-color of frescoes, especially those most in danger of decay, destruction, or ruinous repairs, are paid for. These copies form a gallery at the Society's rooms in London, and from among them are selected the subjects of the chromos which the Society publishes—chromos which recent improvements have enabled the council to make very fine. One of those published for the "Second Subscribers" for 1868 is as fine a chromo as even Kellerhoven has produced—as fine, indeed, as it seems possible to produce. The illustrated history and description of the works of the Society, recently published by the secretary, Mr. P. W. Maynard, is an important aid to the study of art; for, though the illustrations are only reproductions in little of the Arundel publications, they, at least, can be had, while the originals are not easy to get and are very expensive; moreover, the text, containing historical notices of painters whose works have been copied by the Society, includes much good matter. The photographs are excellent, even when judged by a very high standard of excellence in such things. They represent all the publications of the Society, and are all taken on the same scale; that is, each photograph is of one-fifth the diameter of its original—not "one-fifth the original size," as the title-page has it, but one-twenty-fifth the size, or one-fifth in each dimension. Those, for instance, taken from chromo-lithographs are, of course, much less pleasing than those from bas-reliefs in plaster and ivory. But there is no reason to take exception to any; every one well represents the subject and idea of the original work. The photographs of carved ivories are very fine. The set of about one hundred and fifty pieces admirably represents the successive schools of sculpture in ivory from the times of the Empire to the XVIth century. The originals being scattered over Europe in a score of museums, treasuries, and private collections, and the casts carefully made in ceramic "fictile ivory," and supposed to reproduce with strict fidelity the precious originals, being themselves very costly and seldom seen, these little photographs are simply invaluable to all students of art.

—Nearly every dramatic author in France who ever had one of his pieces acted on any stage, belongs to a society which has for its object to prevent the extortions of managers. To this end, one of the statutes of the society ordains that no one of the associates shall on any account surrender any part of his legitimate profits to a manager who has accepted a play of his. In France, the custom is not to buy a play out-and-out, but to give the playwright, for a piece in one act, from two to three per cent. of the gross receipts of each performance; for a piece in two acts, from four to six per cent.; and for a piece in three or more acts, from eight per cent. to twelve. Of course, it happens that in order to get their plays accepted writers make private arrangements with the managers, and take less pay than the society permits, although on admission to the society each member gives his word of honor that he will enter into no such transactions. What happens to the offending author in case he is found out, beyond his being sent to Coventry, we do not know; but a manager who has offended has hard measure meted out to him; he must either pay a heavy fine, or he is put under an interdict; and being under an interdict means a good deal—little less than retiring from the theatrical business. No author belonging to the society may supply an interdicted manager with a drama, and unless he can find some new man with talent enough to keep his theatre filled, or finds some good play by an obscure man, he must shut up, and, for the reason above given, shutting up is what happens. Just now there is war between the society and M. Moreau Sainti, of the Folies Dramatiques, that gentleman having been clearly proved to have been giving an author three per cent. instead of the nine per cent. which was his due; and, as he declines to pay a fine of twenty thousand francs, he is interdicted, and will probably soon come to reason. Certainly this application of the principle of co-operation is an odd one; but it seems as if it might be a very good one, though there is, perhaps, not another country in the world where it could be put in operation. It is more promising than the only instance of co-operation in literary business matters which we know of as having been afforded by the United States—Mr. Greeley's, Mr. Thomas Clarke's, Mr. Peter Gerard's, and Mrs. M. K. Dallas's Authors' Protective Association, which is going to publish books for authors who cannot make satisfactory arrangements with publishers. The capital stock of $100,000, in ten-dollar shares, will hardly be remunerative capital, it is to be feared; even although only one vote goes with a holding, whether of one share or fifty. Mr. Greeley's connection with this association is hardly more than nominal, we believe; at all events, he disclaims all responsibility for the management.

—Among the stirring characters who have given to the fifteenth century its romantic interest, there is perhaps none whose fortunes are more full of this interest than George von Podiebrad, the Hussite King of Bohemia. The events, too, of which he was at one time the centre are without a rival, even in that eventful century, in the power of exciting the imagination. The triumphant Ottomans, fresh from the conquest of Constantinople, were preparing to hurl themselves upon Central Europe, while the Christians were inert, discordant, and seemed ready to fall an easy prey. At this time Hungary, Bohemia, and Poland were leading powers, and to them is due the successful resistance made. The renowned Hunyady was the Charles Martel who stemmed this new invasion of Islam. It was fortunate for Christianity and for European civilization that each of these thrones was at this juncture occupied by an able and resolute sovereign. The last number of Sybel's Historische Zeitschrift contains an interesting article upon Podiebrad's project of a confederation of Christian sovereigns for the expulsion of the Turks from Europe. George Podiebrad was not a purely disinterested patriot, like John Hunyady of Hungary. He reminds us strongly, in his restless ambition and widely grasping schemes, as well as in their essentially selfish aim, of his more famous contemporary, Charles the Bold. His emissaries were busy throughout Europe; first, in an attempt to engage Pope Pius II. (Æneas Sylvius) in a scheme to set aside the contemptible Emperor, Frederic III., and get for himself the regency over the empire together with the conduct of the war against the Turks; and, when this failed, his ambition took a wider range—he projected a confederation, of which Louis XI. should be the nominal head, but himself the active member, which should embrace most of the states of Europe, and dictate to the rest. Nothing more natural, of course, than that, when the Turks were expelled, the grand prize of Constantinople should fall to the originator and leader of the league. Louis XI. and Venice gave in their adherence to this plan, and for a while, in 1642, it seemed likely to succeed; but it was brought to nought by the countermachinations of Pius II., and perhaps still more by the selfishness of Podiebrad himself. For, as his project was to gain for himself the place of the Turks, and rule from Constantinople, he did not venture to take his son-in-law, King Matthias Corvinus of Hungary, into his confidence, nor even to mention his plans to him, until after sounding France and Venice. Matthias—the real defender of Christendom—naturally feeling sore and aggrieved at this treatment, was ready to ally himself with the rival league, headed by the Pope. Hence the embroilment between the two citizen-kings, inflamed still more by the heresy of King George, which weakened both nations, and distracted the forces of Christendom from the contest against the common enemy.

RENAN'S "ST. PAUL."*

THE third volume of M. Renan's "Histoire des Origines du Christianisme" embraces the period of the first great missions to the Gentiles, of which St. Paul is the hero. It opens with the departure of Paul and Barnabas from Antioch in the year 45, and closes with the arrival of the apostle as captive at Rome, in 61. This period of sixteen years the author justly considers the historically best known in "the embryonic age of Christianity." Before them lie the shadowy "images of a remote paradise, lost in a haze of mystery," which he has reproduced in the pages of the "Vie de Jésus" and "Les Apôtres;" after them follows a long night of profound darkness, through which only "the bloody shine of Nero's savage feasts," "the thunderbolt of the Apocalypse," and the torch which destroyed the temple of Jerusalem, dart their lurid light. These few visible traits, together with the dimly transparent features of the last years of the apostles, are to form the main subjects of the fourth part of the "Origines," which the author hopes to complete in a fifth volume, closing with "the definitive establishment of dogmatic orthodoxy."

As a work of literary art—whether we consider the composition of the whole, the elaboration of parts, or the coloring—"St. Paul" could but with difficulty obtain the distinction of surpassing its two predecessors, for the sole reason that, as works of art, these could hardly be surpassed; and yet we have no hesitation in saying even that distinction must be awarded it. We forbear, however, specifying the grounds on which we base our judgment. The consummate mastership in planning, arranging, and delineating, these charms of diction, can be felt, but can hardly be described, except, indeed, by expressing the impression they produce on the reader. And yet it is chiefly as a product of historical criticism that we must declare the "St. Paul" decidedly superior to both the "Jésus" and the "Apôtres." And here we can specify our reasons. First, M. Renan has, during the elaboration of these volumes, considerably augmented the vast stock of knowledge with which he entered upon this field; secondly, he has in the same proportion chastened his critical fancy; thirdly, he has left behind him that part of his ground in which the adoring believer may find rich materials for the adornment of his temples, and the iconoclastic critic equally abundant fragments to exercise his irreverent art upon, but which offers no material out of which historical monuments—both true and unhallowed by faith—could be shaped by a process, however ingenious, of reconstructive art.

* "Saint Paul. Par Ernest Renan, Membre de l'Institut. Avec une Carte des Voyages de Saint Paul, par M. Kiepert, de l'Académie de Berlin." Paris: Michel Lévy Frères; New York: F. W. Christern. 1869.

As idyls—accompanied by erudite notes and critical introductions, as fanciful pictures of a "pastorale délicieuse"—as M. Renan designates the life of the earliest followers of the Son of Man—the "Jésus" and the "Apôtres" are really charming productions. It matters nothing that the idyl sometimes almost loses its character, and is, almost imperceptibly, changed into an epic. Idyllic and epic elements are not incompatible in poetry; the picture of the origins of an Utopia must be both epic and idyllic. But Utopias are, unfortunately, only creations of poets or visions of prophets. The Golden Age, the commonwealth of Plato, the "last days" of Isaiah—none of these belongs to the domain of history. And no "grande épopée" of human history, from Moses to Napoleon, has been idyllic; least of all the French Revolution, with which M. Renan so much likes to compare the revolution he depicts. And yet it is for history—critical history—that he endeavors to palm upon us those delicious pastorals. As history, they are far from being delicious—if in fact they are not quite the contrary. The ingenious processes by which our author transforms rugged, rude, and ignorant Galilee—the Galilee of the procurators, the sicarii, and exorcists—into an earthly paradise, full of love and joy and sunshine, numberless miracles into natural facts, and all kinds of psychological or historical incongruities into apparently logical developments—those processes are equalled in uncriticalness only by the method he applies in examining ecclesiastico-traditional testimony, and which makes him so often enter as historical a small part of an evidence the bulk of which he rejects as forged, falsified, based on superstition, or altogether incredible. M. Renan, without any qualification, rejects as incredible everything supernatural; but the shadows that accompany the delineations of supernatural things he saves, and—quite as artfully as artistically—works them into new images. His new images are often excellent imitations of the sacred ones he tears; but while orthodoxy must spurn them as devoid of all sacred substance, mere unimpassioned criticism, too, can see in them little more than shadows. The age of Jesus is a fit subject for the pen of sceptical historians; his life can be written only by a believer, for all we have about him comes from unconditional believers.

It is different with the life—or, rather, the career—of Paul. The main and most historical part of it—that which has exercised so vast an influence upon the development of Christendom and the world—can probably well be traced. The earlier part—that embracing his Jewish life, his miraculous conversion on the road to Damascus, and his Christian activity in Syria—furnishes, in M. Renan's elaboration, some of the epic tableaux of the "Apôtres"—with the change, of course, of the grand miracle into a natural, though a very strange, occurrence. The mystery-covered close of the apostle's career is wisely left to take its place among the dim appearances of Christian life in the following period. The volume before us sketches after tolerably authentic documents—M. Renan rejects only the Epistles to Timothy and Titus as entirely spurious—the period of Paul's missionary wanderings through Cyprus, Pamphylia, Pisidia, Lycaonia, Cilicia, Phrygia, Mysia, Thrace, Macedon, Greece, Ionia, Lydia, and Syria—countries through which, with few exceptions, the biographer expressly followed the footsteps of his hero before writing this book; the period which witnessed the foundation, among others, of the primitive Christian communities of Philippi and Thessalonica, of Athens and Corinth, of Ephesus, Colossæ, and Laodicea—cities to the description of some of which charming pages are devoted; the period which gradually developed and matured that anti-Mosaic and anti-Judaic form of Christianity, of which, according to M. Renan, Paul, and not Jesus, was the father, basing it on grace and justification by faith, preaching it to the Gentiles, and passionately defending it against the authority and hostility of the original apostles—the strict but "narrow-minded" followers of both Jesus and Moses. In this period there are but few miracles to be rejected, transformed, or ignored; there is no divine image to be painted over into that of an angelic man; the scene is no Arcadian Galilee; there is no Mary of Magdala; the hero is a very unamiable rabbi.

The reader of the "Apôtres" will remember the portrait there given of the short, somewhat crook-backed, broad-shouldered, small-headed, thick-bearded, and bald Jew of Tarsus, who, as Saul, gloated over the agonies, promoted by himself, of the first Christian martyrs, but, as Paul, was destined to become the disseminator, the great light, of Christianity—the teacher, in distant ages, of Wyckliffe, Huss, Luther, and Calvin. His character, as developed chiefly in the book before us, is far from being the exact counterpart of that unattractive exterior. Paul has changed his religion, but he has not given up his fanaticism. He does not persecute, for the powers that be are against him; but he is passionate, impetuous, vehement, rude, and not incapable of violence. He preaches love and charity, and preaches them in words that alone "can be compared to the discourses of Jesus;" but he seems himself to be inaccessible to all tender emotions. He boasts, and justly so, of grand sacrifices and endless sufferings for the cause to which he has devoted his life; but he is egotistic, jealous, obstinate, contentious. He combats the exclusiveness of Judaism, but without giving up its prejudices. He believes salvation possible only under his own formulas, inveighs against the yoke of the law, and yet often makes concessions, breaks his own rules, and compromises with superstition and untruth. He exorcises, heals, and does apparent miracles. Nor are his convictions and beliefs such as could appear particularly attractive under the pen of a Renan. His theories of sin, indulgence, faith, justification, grace, and redemption; his ideas of marriage, celibacy, and temptation; his belief in miracles, demons, angels, the bodily resurrection of Christ, and the approaching end of the world—all these are little to the taste of unbelieving philosophy, and M. Renan hides neither his tastes nor his philosophy.

And yet, thanks to the wonderful skill with which he handles his pen—as if it were a magic balancing wand, capable of carrying one safely over the double abyss of decided belief and decided unbelief—and thanks, also, to some indisputably grand mental qualities of his hero, he succeeds in representing him to his readers in a rather brilliant light. He almost passionately sides with him—who "never saw Jesus, nor heard his word," "scarcely knew his parables;" who preached revelations of a Christ who "was his own phantom," and "heard himself while believing he heard Jesus"—in his great contest with Peter, James, and other true Apostles, the pillars of the Church of Jerusalem. He even goes to the length of suspecting the bigotry of that Judaizing circle of complicity in the surrender of Paul to the Roman authorities. Altogether, the Apostles of Jerusalem cut a rather pitiable figure in the new volume of the "Origines," and, contrasted with them, Paul easily appears not only the liberator of Christianity, but its very genius.

Looking at the situation from M. Renan's critical standpoint, we must say, however, that he does the Apostles of Jerusalem injustice, and unduly extols their antagonist. We cannot perceive what should have induced them, who lived in the still undestroyed state of Judea, under the law, which was both religious and civil, and which they had seen Jesus observe to his death—what should have induced them to desert the divine institutions of their country and people, that had been binding from times immemorial, for the sake of a new-fangled reform, the fruits of which the world could not enjoy, as it was incontinently to come to a terrific end. Nor can we see what rational ground might have led Paul to use much violence—or, on the other hand, to make so many concessions—in carrying through that reform, while fervently admonishing his converts to live a provisional life, without attempting any change of condition—be it even through marriage—for the time was short, and the world as it was, was passing away. The truth is, the great fault of M. Renan in judging men and ideas of that time is his involuntary viewing them from the standpoint of a philosophical observer who has eighteen centuries of Christianity behind him. Looking upon a Christainized world, he eulogizes him who sacrificed everything to the universalization of the liberating faith, and casts stones at those who, from narrow-minded piety, laid obstacles in his way—forgetting that, according to his own statement, the number of all the Gentiles converted by Paul probably amounted to little more than a thousand, and that these converts mostly belonged to the lowest and most powerless stratum of society. And there is nothing in M. Renan's narrative which would explain how—without prophetic gifts, in which he does not believe—either "the twelve" or the great missionary could have dreamed of what the philosopher knows; and that, too, while they were momentarily waiting for the end of the world.

Want of space prevents us from calling attention to the numberless beautiful descriptions and generalizations interwoven with the narrative, as well as from exposing the glittering shallowness of others. M. Renan's knowledge is more extensive and exact than profound. He draws his materials from stores both vast and varied; but certainly he is not always conscientious in selecting and sifting them. The ease with which he creates almost perfect forms induces him to be lavish in multiplying striking traits. He likes to dwell on the beautiful, and is almost entirely devoid of humor; but there is something like hidden irony in some of his delineations —though his religious scepticism is most remote from that of Voltaire or Gibbon. We might call him a Rousseau writing sacred history.

MAGAZINES FOR AUGUST.

EVERYBODY who went to the Jubilee—and we believe everybody went—will read Mr. Howells's description of that festival of harmony; but such is the nature of man that we suppose more people will be pleased with Mr. Parton's "'Strikers' of the Washington Lobby"—a piece of writing which is almost enough to make one lose faith that the nature of man is ever going to be any better than it is. It is not the "strikers" that we are thinking of when we say so, but of Mr. Parton's performance, which is a curiosity of literature—as one says "literature," speaking roughly. There was a report current a while since that Mr. Parton was spending his vacation with General Butler—a report which attracted some attention from such observers as, having to keep an eye on everything, remembered that since his Decoration Day Speech, and "the one word, Reparation!" with which the Gloucester boy thrilled us, the General had been remarkably quiet for him, and seemed not to be minding even the Massachusetts senatorship; nor attending to the political murder of Governor Claflin; nor assisting to complete the political resurrection of Doctor Loring; nor laboring for the benefit of Senator Wilson; nor, in fact, doing anything for anybody's harm and his own good. Such observers at once began to wait for Mr. Parton; and here he turns up in the August Atlantic with a puff of Butler which, as we say, is a curiosity of literature as Mr. Parton understands it, and one of the most disgraceful things that anybody has read for many a day. Our ready writer begins with a little picture of a certain New England general—whose name we are going to leave unmentioned for the sake of setting an example to Mr. Parton, who is a little clumsy in his workmanship this time—a certain New England general, who was going down to Ship Island to take New Orleans, and who, in the face of popular murmuring, waited and waited in Boston harbor and thereabouts; and who braved newspaper obloquy, and did not deign to explain why he waited; and who, in short, obeyed orders and kept a persistent, and indeed heroic, silence at his own expense, because his Government had told him not to say anything, but to stay in Boston till he was told to go. This fable teaches that appearances are deceitful. And also we may learn from it that, although all the newspapers and everybody that knows him, and everybody that ever did know him, declares that a certain man is an unscrupulous fellow, and has never been anything else, it is nevertheless possible that secretly he may be a man to be admired, and one whom a good person may praise without disgracing himself. Appearances, then, being deceitful, the members of the two Houses of Congress are almost without exception honest men, who never belonged to whiskey rings, who have never sold the knowledge they acquired in committees, who have never offered to join in land speculation with Mr. Case or any other person, whom no railroad owns, and who own no section of land near any railroad—who, in fact, although exposed to very great temptation, and although selected by the average caucus, and although engineering as they do a more gigantic corrupting machine than is under the control of any other set of politicians in the world, nevertheless are as good as any of us who elect them. Don't "they represent us?" Mr. Parton wishes to know. So they might represent us—some of us—and still sell themselves. The fact is not to be lost sight of, however, let us remind Mr. Parton, that, although they go out from us, they go into a place where temptation is great—and that is a thing that we are to pray to be delivered from.

The "strikers" it is, Mr. Parton says, and not the Congressmen, who are the bad people. The strikers pretend they can sell Congressional votes; but in reality they can't; or only very, very rarely. This is the gist of the article—so far as it is a bona-fide article by Mr. Parton; and the only comment it calls for is, that of course it is excessively hard to prove that members of a legislative assembly are corrupt. Party feeling shields them; the secrecy of such transactions is a safeguard; the shame is great, to the briber as well as the bribed, and the punishment is great also; the proof, even if the briber has been cheated and made angry, is almost never or absolutely never producible. Definitely to prove the existence of the Augean stable nowadays is as great a labor as once it was to clean it. But the existence of the lobby presupposes corruption; and we for our part as much believe that there is a good deal of corruption in Washington as we believe that Mr. Ashley wrote his letters to Mr. Case, or that our own Mattoon here in New York has paid visits to certain railway directors.

We have just said by implication that a part of this "'Strikers' of the Washington Lobby" is not of the nature of a bona-fide article by Mr. Parton, and so it is not. Our readers have not forgotten the famous report in which the member from the Fifth Massachusetts District, after having hunted high and low for evidence against the seven Republican Senators who voted against the conviction of Johnson, had the power of face to say soberly—and it must have amused him as much as it insulted the House to say it—that the seven men whom he had accused were to be considered guilty because he had not been able to find the smallest shred of testimony against them. Well, the last two or three pages of Mr. Parton's essay have the ear-mark of the honorable gentleman who gave to our common country the distinction of producing the greatest and most impudent non sequitur of this or any other age. Here is a passage to which we wish we could call the attention of all decent people:

"The greatest triumph of the Washington lobby was the acquittal of Andrew Johnson. It was wholly the lobby's doings. His conviction was sure until the lobby went to work in earnest, and snatched him only branded from the burning. A person the least credulous of evil can hardly resist the impression that three of four Republican votes were bought and paid for, cash down, only a few hours before the votes were given. Some of the best-informed men in Washington—even the best-informed—[this must refer to the barrel of telegrams]—are convinced of it. They think they know who received twenty-five thousand dollars for a vote, who fifty thousand, who Indian contracts, and who railroad influences more valuable than both those sums united. They think they know at what house, at what time of night, and by what member of the lobby, the money was lost at cards to a Senator who voted next day for acquittal. All of which may be true. Much of the valuable testimony gathered by the select committee of the managers seems to confirm these conjectures. We know that the Johnson lobby, utterly devoid of principle and decency, had the money in their hands with which to buy the criminal off. We know that money was raised in custom-houses, and subscribed by distillers, and that a million of dollars could have been procured from those two sources alone, if it had been necessary. We know that the corruptibility of Senators was a topic of conversation at the President's table, and that one of his confidants correctly predicted, five weeks before the test vote was taken which seven Republican Senators would vote for acquittal. We know that two of those Senators, to within a day or two of the voting, continued to declare their intention to vote for conviction, and then suddenly changed their intention without any visible cause. We know that the lobby was in the fullest activity about Washington, rushing to and fro between New York and the capital, and telegraphing in cipher. I know that the strikers of the lobby were not idle, but rose to the occasion, and offered to sell to the managers votes enough to convict for a hundred and ten thousand dollars—but the managers were up to the game. We know that the heads of the Johnson lobby were as sure of an acquittal before the vote was taken as they were after; and that they acted upon their knowledge in the Gold-room and elsewhere.

"Now the simplest explanation of all this is, that the three or four votes supposed to have been given against the convictions of the Senators who gave them, were bought with money; and yet the probability is, that they were not."

A thousand things might be said of this tissue of misstatements, but, for one, observe that the one enormous lobby of all—the lobby that was telegraphing into Washington as well as out of it, and telegraphing threats as well as premises—the lobby that wanted the plunder of the country under the government of Senator Wade, and would have had it—the lobby of which our Massachusetts friend would, in all probability, have been the chief member—Mr. Parton leaves wholly unmentioned. Worse than that, he goes out of his way, for the sake of gratifying somebody's implacability—not his own, we believe; for he is not a bitter political partisan, we think—against the men who, as it happened, saved the country from Mr. Wade first and from Mr. Seymour afterwards by inflicting a great defeat on Mr. Seymour's old friend and Mr. Wade's new one; who elevated the reputation for honesty and courage of the Senate of the United States; and who are, all things considered, the very ablest and the most worthy to be respected of all the political leaders of the Republican party—which to-day is not a defeated remnant because Mr. Trumbull, Mr. Fessenden, Mr. Grimes, honest old Mr. Van Winkle, and their associates courageously voted, on their honor and conscience, that for want of law to convict him Johnson must be allowed to escape.

For the rest, the Atlantic is a good number. Mr. Dickens pleasantly praises his friend, Mr. Fechter, who will have hard work to come up to the expectations of anybody who takes Mr. Dickens's language as coolly true. Mrs. Celia Thaxter at "The Isles of Shoals" is very agreeable and poetical; "Before the Gate" is a very charming little poem which honors the Atlantic, thus reversing the relations that subsist between the Atlantic and most of its poems; of Mr. Howells's "Jubilee Days" it is saying little to say that it is the best writing the Jubilee produced; for we have little doubt, if Boston will allow us to say so, that it is the best thing the Jubilee has produced; "Uncle Gabriel's Account of his Campaigns" is interesting and like life; and "Recent Travels" is good enough for Mr. Howells—when Mr. Howells is in a good deal of a hurry, however. Mr. De Forest is hardly to be praised for his "Taillefer Bell-Ringings," which ought to be more supernatural, or less supernatural, or at all events to be more interestingly natural. As it is, it seems like the beginnings of two slight things.

The Catholic World has a reply, which in fairness ought to be read, to the recent article in Putnam's on "Our Established Church." In fairness, too, the writer in Putnam's should make answer. Lovers of proverbs will find some Spanish ones, with explanations, by the lady who calls herself Fernan Caballero, in this number of the same magazine.

Everybody will agree that the August Galaxy is a good summer number, with a general effect of lightness, though there is no particular piece that one would pick out as being especially entertaining. Certainly not Mr. R. J. Hinton's "Race for Commercial Supremacy in Asia," which might answer as reading for next December—or the December after next. Speculations as to the strides of Russia in a given direction, and the strides of England in this and that direction, and other speculations as to the future of Central Asia, are as little capable of rousing the languid reader in America as almost any reading that is set before him. Mr. Grant White's "Age of Burlesque" perhaps comes as near being suitable for the season as anything in the Galaxy's list—the philosophy of it being easily rejectable, and the personal reminiscences of Rachel being new and interesting, and the chat about the troupe of "British Blondes" who have just left us being chat about persons whom we have all admired more or less, and who have puzzled many of us not a little. But the "age of burlesque" has not set in yet, and hardly will, we should say, even though opéra bouffe has travelled to London and to New York, and had good luck in its journey to foreign parts, and even though our British Lydia Thompson Troupe has had much applause and much managerial imitation here among American audiences. A "season of burlesque" is a better descriptive phrase, it strikes us, for our late time of wandering, now happily at an end; and if Mr. White's theory as to the tendency of our nineteenth century to the sardonical and the unsentimental seems to disappear when the name of an "age" is denied to our period of spectacular plays and Offenbach, that is not an objection which need trouble us too much. Some curiosity to know a new thing, and a popular fondness for easy moving music, and perhaps the most finished company-acting or stock-acting—or whatever it is that "stars" and their assistants do not do—which ever was witnessed in the United States, made opéra bouffe successful among us for a year or so. And the amusing, farcical unmeaningness of dramas—to call them so—such as "Ixion," and "Sinbad," and "The Forty Thieves," together with the unreserve of the good-lookingness—if we must not say beauty or prettiness—and the good-lookingness itself, is quite sufficient to account for the recent success of the burlesque on our stage. The exceptionally great success of this particular troupe is no doubt to be attributed to the yellow-haired troupe itself, much rather than to the fact, as Mr. White calls it, that we, all of us, nowadays, have so schooled ourselves to cover up our profoundest emotions with jests, and so believe in the satirical and mocking Saturday Review—that we find Miss Lydia Thompson, when she gives us a "walk round," or Mr. Harry Beckett, when as Minerva he drinks spirits out of a black bottle, or Mr. George Fox, when he tumbles out of a donkey-cart, the best expositors of our sardonic frame of mind. The fact is, we take it, that the legitimate drama and melodrama—never driven from the loyal Bowery—will return and reign over us in undiminished splendor very soon, and we shall forget—fickle that we are—our "White Fawns" and "Forty Thieves" just as some of us have forgotten already the many weeks of "Romeo and Juliet" last winter and spring, and fail to remember the unsardonical audiences that are listening to "Enoch Arden's" woes and the sorrows of "Dora." One thing amuses us to-day and another to-morrow; but we may feel pretty sure that not even in Paris, with the Second Empire to form our manners for us, nor in London, with a certain number of admirers of the Saturday Review to help give society its tone, nor in New York, nor Boston, nor anywhere else, are we, in our capacity of theatre audiences, going to let the nineteenth century, or anything else, turn our stage into a place devoted to mocking and sneering. Probably the most cultivated class in no country now looks to the drama as a means of so much enjoyment and instruction as it once furnished, and thus the stage is perhaps guided more than formerly by the tastes of the classes next below the most intellectual. One would say that is the tendency at any rate, if it is not a veritable fact. But in this is a guarantee that heartier feelings than those at the basis of satire or self-contempt will rule the stage.

Dr. John C. Draper's article on "Mineral Waters" contains nothing that is new. With every apothecary in New York and all our large cities selling Vichy, and Kissingen, and other medicinal waters, and everybody drinking them with unmedical recklessness, a word or two from a good physician, as to the right use of such agents, would have a considerable value. But Doctor Draper's article is concerning visits to watering-places, and is too general to be of service. Mr. J. T. McKay, who writes "Climmerley Gap," we believe we have met before in a story which also was about a railroad train or a locomotive at a furious rate of speed. This story is tolerably well managed, as such stories go. Mr. Justin McCarthy's "Prince Napoleon" is magazine writing of the better order, but still it is essentially magazine writing, as distinguished from better writing; that is to say, it has the air of having been done quite as much for some purpose apart from the wish to treat of the subject carefully and fully as of having been done with that purpose in view. For the rest, it seems to be fair and is interesting and fresh. "How they Keep House at Compiègne" is better done than most of the work by the same hand, and if there is not much in it, what there is reads agreeably. "Feathered Life" is by Mr. John Burroughs, and has rather more of the books than is usual with his out-of-door papers, but it is good, and it makes one or two real additions to what has been recorded in regard to our smaller birds. The late Mr. Raymond is discoursed about by Mr. Augustus Maverick, who, it appears, assisted at the founding of the Times, or rather at the "getting-out" of the first number of that journal. But he does not make his reminiscences so long or so interesting as one would have supposed he might. "On a Cast of Tennyson's Hand" is a characteristic scrap of verse in the shape of a sonnet of the kind that we get from Mr. H. T. Tuckerman; and characteristic, too, of Doctor Parsons, and not of Doctor Parsons at his best, is the "Rose, the Cloud, and the Oriole." Adam plucked a damask rose, our fabulist says, and took it to Eve, "as once she lay in slumber curled," and laying it on her cheek, which he kissed at the same time, the rose became redder than before, for Eve blushed. Then an oriole lighted on the flower, and his breast turned from white and red to orange, and on the instant he snatched it and flew far as an opal cloud that burned overhead, and since then the sunset has its orange and gold and red. In the exercise of a wise discretion, editors might reject poems like this, and without doing any injury to the Nine Muses, one imagines.

Lippincott's contains a critical and biographical sketch of Mr. Joseph Jefferson, the comedian, which will please that gentleman's admirers. It is as good as any of the talk of old theatre-goers to convince us that the men first in their profession, and the greatest actors who ever trod the boards, are vastly less numerous in our own day than they were just before our advent. Mr. Trollope's "Vicar of Bullhampton" is the other readable thing in this month's Lippincott's. The second proposal of marriage has already taken place, though we are only in the eighteenth chapter; and provision seems to be made for a deal of misery for several people, though we can hardly tell what Captain Marrable will turn out like. "Is It a Gospel of Peace?" roundly scolds the truculent Doctor Sutherland, whose "war speech" a while ago flashed a lurid gleam on a figure not before familiar to many of us, and which again was at once swallowed up—irremediably, we had been supposing—by the dark. "Manifest Destiny" is by Mr. J. B. Austin, who wants both the Canadas and all the other British territory to the north of us, as well as Cuba, Jamaica, Porto Rico, and the rest of the West Indies—immediately, or as soon as may be. Our destiny, however, is a thing that we have all the same, whether we wait for it or make great haste; and why strong believers in it need disturb themselves, Mr. Austin does not make clear. Nothing is surer than that Canada and Cuba and the rest of the continent will be ready for us fully as soon as we are ready for them; and among the bad friends of America, so far as America consists of something besides feet and inches, not the least bad is the citizen who talks about "territorial expansion" like a Democrat of 1845, while the country groaneth and travaileth for good men—to say nothing of a lack of men merely. "An Adventure in the Snow" makes much out of little in an odd sort of way; and something like that might be said of the book-notices—both of that one which praises the late General Halpine and that one which abuses Mr. Stephen Fiske, whose little book of "English Photographs, by an American," does not call for particular dispraise. We must not forget to mention, in taking leave of Lippincott's, the beginning of a novel—"Magdalena," by the author of the "Old Mam'selle's Secret," nor the rather pretty little poem called "The Old Story." It is not a new story, certainly, in life or in letters, but it is neatly told.

As attractive to curiosity as any titles in Putnam's table of contents are those of two sonnets by Mr. Julian Hawthorne, the son of the great romance-writer. "Yes" is the title of one of them, while the better one is called "The Usurper," and may be said to be not unpromising. Miss Frances Power Cobbe begins in the August number of this magazine a discussion of the woman question, and seems to hold that woman is in bondage; that her subserviency is morally poisonous, and mentally is very injurious to her; and that the right of voting will put a new face upon her condition, making her in every way better. Mrs. Theodore S. Fay's "French Soldier at Inkermann" is the story of a lad who at Inkermann was in his first battle, and had both his legs shot off. It seems to have been taken down from his own lips, and perhaps has had a touch here and there from the amanuensis. If it is the writer's own, it certainly is well invented, and it is touching. "Old Times in Virginia and a Few Parallels" is by Mr. W. C. Elam, a Virginian, who shows from ancient records that Virginia should not fling reproaches at colonial Massachusetts, because colonial Virginia was just as bad—as having hanged witches, and oppressed Indians and Catholics and Quakers and Baptists, and compelled the worldly-minded into church on Sundays by the use of the secular arm, and freely employed the pillory and ducking-stool and stocks; in short, he shows what the judicious had suspected—that the mass of early Virginians were something like the Massachusetts men as regards the matter of belonging in thought and feeling to the age in which they were born. "Mauritius" is a slight article on a rather good subject; "Among Thieves" is of a kind recognizable by the title; "To-day: a Romance" we confess to having long given up reading; "More Light" is one of Professor De Vere's Popular Cyclopædia articles on lamps, candles, and oils; the ascent of "Monte Rosa," by Mr. J. M. Hart, is spirited and good, which is more than can be said for Mrs. Caroline Cheesebro's tale of "Lavinia," and more, indeed, than can be said of this number of the magazine in general. "Literature at Rome" illustrates pretty well a curious but common kind of criticism of books. One learns nothing of the book reviewed, and, we were going to say, nothing of anything else, and every little while comes a tag of newspaper, and then a line or two of verse, which give one the sort of sense of inevitableness and emptiness and unmeaningness which is given by things happening and words said in a dream. The effect is to make one sigh for a little truth and some force of language.

A very good number of Harper's opens with a sketchy illustrated paper on the Japanese as seen by two British army officers, and this is followed by something on "The New Theory of Heat" and an excellent new chapter of Mr. Moncure Conway's "South Coast Saunterings," which some day will make a book with some curious learning in it and with a great deal of personal interest. The English predecessors of our American Brook Farmers are a principal theme with Mr. Conway this month, and his description is worth attention, as being about as good as most of us have seen or will see. Our author is never wholly to be trusted, however, being always subject to cliqueism, if there is such a word. What else would make anybody say that Marvell's "Garden" had been made a household word in England in virtue of being put into Mr. Alcott's "Tablets?" It is a pity that the households are not many into which this household word has gone, but into most of the few it was Marvell himself who took it. This is a small matter, to be sure, but as an example it is large enough, and illustrates the method of a school more important in its influence once than now, and, indeed, of much less influence than Mr. Conway, we dare say, supposes. He is not the only American who went to England a sufficient number of years since to be in the wrong oftener than in the right as regards the fluctuations of sentiment, thought, and opinion in the country he has left behind.

"Reminiscences of Oxford" is by an ancient esquire bedel of that university, who began his college life in 1789, but who must have been a very aged man at matriculation if he is old enough to remember the origin of some of the jokes which he quotes with great garrulity and good faith. "The Graves at Newport" deals with some of the antiquities of the old town; "Slavery in Palaces" is something about the life—to call it so—of a Spanish queen a hundred and fifty years ago; "Borrowed Baggage" is a tale of true love which did run smooth, and "Hetty's Liberal Education" is a tale of love which did "run rusty" enough, the heroine trifling with the affections of the true man, and allowing the trivial man to pay the most marked attentions to her, until it happens that her face and neck get badly burned and scarred by fire, whereupon the slight foppish Thorn absents himself in a sneaking manner, having loved only the beauty of Hetty, while the true man forgives and forgets. Hetty is taken back again, as if she had always been entirely worthy of the brave Mills. "Draw your Conclusions" is cleverer, though not so mouth-filling, as "Hetty's Liberal Education," and introduces the low comic element into some highly complicated affairs of the heart. Poproy is the name of one of the parties, Buffum is that of another, and another is called Adolphus, by way of contrast to Belah, which is Mr. Buffum's first name. This latter device is a great success.

Harper's praises several American works, we see, in its book reviews, but it has been publishing a novel of its own, "The New Timothy," which is very much superior to a majority of contemporary novels, American or other. Its author's name is not given, but it almost deserves a place with "Inside, a Story of Secession"—a story of which not enough has been heard. This new book does not, perhaps, impress as a work based on great culture; but its good sense and the firm texture of it make it always a work that a man need not be ashamed to have done, and it is often vivid and often genuinely humorous. The bitter, sneaking young pair of "poor trash," while attending the funeral of General Likens, are admirably given in the last of these chapters before us Here they are, kicking their heels at the gate of the old man's house, and grumbling over their grievances, one of which is that a brother of the pair has turned his thoughts toward religion—has endeavored to induce "the old man" to come over to the funeral:

"'You hear Doc try the old man?' remarks Toad again, after a silence, whittling nearer his companion and further from the gate, as the company still continues to arrive.

"'To get him to come?' answers Zed, with an oath.

"'Not straight out, you know; he hinted round,' said Toady, with half-a-dozen curses. And that was a peculiarity of the Meggar family, that hinting round. Very rarely, indeed, did any one under that roof ask a direct question of, or make any direct remark, unless it was a curse, to any other there. This would involve their looking each other straight in the eyes while they spoke—a thing habitually avoided by them even in the heat of quarrel. Old Mrs. Meggar only asked direct questions, made remarks aimed at some one person under her roof, looking in the eyes of the person she addressed as she spoke; but she was a disagreeable exception to the general rule—a sort of incarnate conscience in the centre of the family on that account.

"'Yes, Doc he hinted round an' round the old man like a bumble-bee, comin' closer an' closer ev'ry time,' said Toad, who had himself not seen his companion's eyes in his life except furtively.

"'An' what did that old cuss say?' enquires Zed.

"'He was a-smokin' by the fire. "Ketch me goin' to funerals," says he. Old 'oman was a-knittin' in the corner,' continues Toad. '"Soul?" the old man says, says he, "ha'n't got any. Spit it away in tobacco-juice; puffed it away in tobacco-smoke; drowned it out in whiskey; cussed it to pieces long ago." An' he up an' slams on his breast with his hand. "Hollow!" says he, "hempty!" Old 'oman she was cryin' softly; when he says that she ups an' out.'

"'Breaks for the butter-beans,' remarks Zed, and very correctly.

"'Ha'n't been no fun sence that bar-fight,' continues Toad, at last. 'General Likens he comes over—glad he's gone; Brown Bob he sits an' talks; that young parson act'ly hes his praarrs in the house! Goin' to preachin', too, ev'ry Sunday; old 'oman on old gray, or in the wagon; we a-followin' behind.'

"'An' Doc he tryin' to ease off from swearin'.' Zed continues the catalogue of grievances. 'A fellar that could swear the bark off a black-jack too—he tryin' to give up swearin'!' The thought is painful to both in the extreme.

"'Did my best, too, to stop it,' complains Toad; 'his givin' it up. Crossed and bothered him more'n I ever dar to do before. You see I thought Doc he'd blaze out at me like he used to; get in the way again so.'

"'Not a curse at las'. Only got knocked down for your pains,' observes Zed, moodily.

"'But, I say, look here,' says Toad, after some silent whittling under the temporary influence, probably, of the funeral and of the many solemn faces grouped around and arriving every moment, and as if by a desperate effort, 'S'pose a fellar turns out he hes got a soul somewhere among his in'ards—and s'pose there is a God—' But his conjectures are broken by the indignant oaths of his disgusted friend, who trembles inwardly with even greater apprehension himself."

Mr. Curtis, in the "Easy Chair," gives some very sound advice to Mr.

Nathaniel Sands, a friend of the "practical education," who is not one of its most judicious friends. Mr. Curtis's article is calculated to do good, if only because it takes the question out of the muddle in which one usually finds it, and because of its conciliatory moderation. This, however, is rather to be looked for in a defender of the classics, who generally can admit, if he cannot exactly judge, the value of the practical man's favorite pursuits; while, on the other hand, the latter, trying to estimate things all but imponderable, except by more delicate balances than he has at command, is always in danger of sneering in the dark. The Boston Jubilee Mr. Curtis speaks of with a civility and kindness which we hope the Bostonians will remember to his credit; he is not quite sure about the goodness of the music; but as "a big thing" it was somewhat, he thinks. He does not say the same thing; but, on the contrary, quite the reverse concerning the means and appliances for drinking which were used in the days of prohibition in Maine—the days of prohibition and enforcement.

Hours at Home contains some words of remembrance of Mr. Raymond from a gentleman long connected with him in his work on the Times, and who, like everybody else who knew him well, speaks of Mr. Raymond with a good deal of personal affection, and evidently with sincere respect. Very few men have ever died in this country whose departure was the signal for more kinder and sincere notice. Apart from his personal amiability, it seems to have been everywhere recognized, as soon as he was gone, that, during all his editorial life, he had wielded great powers with great regard for the rights and feelings of others, and this is surely higher praise than most men can ever claim. Professor Porter's "Books and Reading" has reached its seventh instalment; "On the Steppe" is a paper of travel by Mr. Eugene Schuyler, who has wandered over the Ural Mountains and had his first glimpse of Asia; "Folingsby's Pond"—there are two, we believe—is by Mr. J. F. Headley, who years ago knew the Adirondacks very well, and in this article tells how one of Napoleon's colonels lived as a hermit in the woods near the Raquette, and was buried at last in the wilderness. We do not know that anything in particular is to be said of the other articles in Hours at Home. "The Story of Kristopher Kroy" goes on, and so does "Compton Friars," by the author of "Mary Powell;" and there is a fair allowance of other sober and reputable light reading.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Colange (L.), Zell's Popular Cyclopædia, Part 7, swd.	(T. Ellwood Zell)	$0 50
Eliot (Prof. C. W.) and Storer (Prof. F. H.), Compendious Manual of Qualitative Chemical Analysis	(D. Van Nostrand)
First Annual Report of the Trustees of the Peabody Academy of Science, 1868, swd.	(Salem)
Jones (Rev. J.), St. Liguori's Way of Salvation	(Cath. Pub. Soc.)
Koner (Prof. Dr. W.), Zeitschrift der Gesellschaft für Erdkunde zu Berlin, No. 21.	(L. W. Schmidt)
Lectures before the Lowell Institute, Boston, on the Early History of Massachusetts, 1 vol	(Boston)
Lippitt (Brig.-Gen. F. J.), Field Service in War	(D. Van Nostrand)
Marlitt (E.), Countess Gisela: a Tale, from the German, Part 1, swd.	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)	0 75
Packard (Dr. A. S., jr.), Guide to the Study of Insects, Part VIII., swd.	(Salem)	0 50
Pomeroy (Prof. J. N.), Education in Politics, swd.	(New York)
The Woman in Red: a Tale, swd.	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.)	0 50
Twelfth Annual Report of the Board of Commissioners of the Central Park, 1868, swd.	(New York)
Wainwright (J.), Julius Cæsar: Did he Cross the Channel? Reviewed, swd.	(John Campbell)
Wallen (Brig.-Gen. H. D.), Service Manual	(D. Van Nostrand)	1 50
Wright (Mrs. J. McN.), John and the Demijohn: a Child's Story	(Henry Hoyt)	1 50

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO.

HAVE JUST ISSUED

A New Novel by the Author of "The Old Mam'selle's Secret."

COUNTESS GISELA.

From the German of E. MARLITT, author of "Gold Elsie," "Over Yonder," etc. By MRS. A. L. WISTER. Part I. 12mo, paper cover, 75 cents.

THE REASON WHY SERIES.

Messrs. J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co. are now issuing this valuable series of works, which has attained such popularity in England that the sale has already reached considerably more than ONE MILLION VOLUMES. Each work is, in fact, a practical Encyclopædia of the subjects indicated by the titles. A vast Fund of valuable Information, embracing every Subject of Interest or Utility, is thus attainable, and at a merely nominal cost. The majority of the volumes are Illustrated, and to each is appended a complete Index of its contents.

NOW READY. 12MO. IN HALF ROXBURGH BINDING.

DAILY WANTS, THE DICTIONARY OF. 1 thick volume, $3 75.
USEFUL KNOWLEDGE, THE DICTIONARY OF. 2 thick volumes, $5.
MEDICAL AND SURGICAL KNOWLEDGE, THE DICTIONARY OF. 1 thick volume, $2 75.

12MO. NEATLY AND UNIFORMLY BOUND IN FINE CLOTH:

ENQUIRE WITHIN UPON EVERYTHING. $1 25.
THE REASON WHY, DENOMINATIONAL. Giving the Origin, History, and Tenets of the various Christian Sects, with the Reasons assigned by themselves for their specialties of Faith and forms of Worship. $1 75.
THE REASON WHY, PHYSICAL GEOGRAPHY AND GEOLOGY. $1 75.
THE REASON WHY, BIBLICAL AND SACRED HISTORY. $1 25.
THE REASON WHY, GENERAL SCIENCE. $1 25.
THE REASON WHY, HISTORICAL. Designed to simplify the study of English History, and to arouse a disposition to trace the connection between the Cause and the Event. $1 25.
THE REASON WHY, NATURAL HISTORY. $1 25.
THE REASON WHY, GARDENING AND FARMING. $1 25.
THE REASON WHY, HOUSEWIFE'S DOMESTIC SCIENCE. $1 25.
JOURNEY OF DISCOVERY ALL ROUND OUR HOUSE; OR, THE INTERVIEW. $1 25.
THE PRACTICAL HOUSEWIFE AND FAMILY MEDICAL GUIDE. $1 25.
THE FAMILY SAVE-ALL. A System of Secondary Cookery, with Invaluable Hints for Economy in the use of every Article of Household Consumption. $1 75.
NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS. $1 25.
THE CORNER CUPBOARD. Containing Domestic Information, numerous Needlework Designs, and Instructions for the Aquarium, Skeleton Plants, etc. $1 25.

Each work sold separately. For sale by booksellers generally, or will be sent by mail, postage free, on receipt of price, by

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO.,

PUBLISHERS, BOOKSELLERS, AND IMPORTERS,

715 and 717 Market Street, Philadelphia, and 449 Broome Street, New York.

VAN NOSTRAND'S ECLECTIC ENGINEERING MAGAZINE

SELECTED FROM HOME AND FOREIGN

ENGINEERING SERIALS.

No. 8, FOR AUGUST, NOW READY.

CONTENTS:

Reformed Schools.
Papers on Construction, No. IV. Iron Roofs.
Remarkable Endurance of Bessemer Steel Axles.
The French Atlantic Cable.
Submersion and Recovery of Submarine Cables.
Wheel-base of Railway Vehicles.
Velocipedes.
Transmitting Power by Ropes.
The Central Rail.
Testing Steam Engines.
Blast Furnace Economy.
The Martin Steel Process.
Railway Disasters—The Cause.
Iron Founding.
History of Decarburizing Iron, No. V.
Harbor Defence—Floating Gun Carriages.
Notes on Railway Construction.
New Bridge over the Thames.
Cement for Road-making.
The Metric System.
The Forms of Steamships.
Iron Ship-building.
Explosive Agents.
The Ventilation and Trapping of Drains.
Coal-burning Engines in England.
The Locomotive of the Future.
Patents.
Marine Engine Progress.
Steam on Canals.
The Manufacture and Use of Portland Cement.
Burning Coal Dust.
Culverts under Rivers and Canals.

TERMS:

Five Dollars per Annum, payable in advance. Single Numbers, 50 cents.

An extra Copy will be supplied gratis to every Club of Five Subscribers, at $5 each, sent in one Remittance.

ID. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher,

23 Murray Street and 27 Warren Street, N. Y.

 Copies of our new Catalogue of American and Foreign Scientific Books, 56 pp. 8vo, sent to any address on receipt of six cents in postage stamps.

The American Freemason.

CONTENTS OF JULY NUMBER.

MAN: A Poem. OUR MONTHLY RECORD: Is the Use of "Mnemonics" Unlawful?—Why did he do it?—Division of Grand Lodge Jurisdiction. CORRESPONDENCE: A Tub to the Whale—Grand Lodge Jurisdiction, No. III.—A Contribution to the Antiquity of Masonry—The African, or Prince Hall Grand Lodge. OUR MONTHLY MASONIC CHRONICLE: United States, Germany, Prussia, Hungary, Constantinople, France, Egypt. Review of New Books.

Sixteen quarto pages monthly, for one dollar a year. Address subscriptions to

J. FLETCHER BRENNAN, Editor,

114 Main Street, Cincinnati, O.

NEW ENGLANDER.

CONTENTS OF THE JULY NUMBER.

ART. I. The Religion of the Future. President Woosey, Yale College.
II. The American Colleges and the American Public. Professor Noah Porter, Yale College.
III. Romanism. Rev. Edwin Harwood, D.D., Rector of Trinity Church, New Haven.
IV. Forgery in Polemics; The Secret Instructions of the Jesuits. Rev. L. W. Bacon, Williamsburg, New York.
V. Moral Results of Romanism. Rev. L. W. Bacon, Williamsburg, New York.
VI. The Alabama Question. President Woolsey, Yale College.
VII. Notices of New Books.

Price of a single copy, $1. Subscription price for a year, $3.

 For sale by the American News Company, 119 Nassau Street, New York, or address, with orders,

WM. L. KINGSLEY,

New Haven, Conn.

TO LYCEUMS, LECTURE COMMITTEES, ETC.

THE American Literary Bureau is now prepared to make Lecture engagements with Lyceums and other Lecture Associations throughout the country for lecturers and entertainments of a musical and literary character. The Bureau's list includes Justin McCarthy, editor London Morning Star, Mark Twain, T. W. Higginson, Rev. Robert Laird Collier, Edwin P. Whipple, Olive Logan, Kate Field, Benson J. Lossing the historian, P. B. Du Chaillu, Dr. Isaac I. Hayes, C. Oscanyan, Prof. E. L. Youmans, Saml. L. Hewlett, Wirt Sikes, John G. Saxe, Henry Nicholls, Prof. Hitchcock, Josiah Phillips Quincy, Rev. George H. Hepworth, Prof. Rufus Adams, Thomas W. Knox, George Wakeman, John J. Pinkerton, E. P. Nowell, Editor American Odd Fellow, Professor Homer B. Sprague, Cornell University, Rev. T. E. Kittredge, B. T. Taylor, Rev. J. D. Sweet, Dr. Griscom, George Kennan (the Siberian traveller), Maria A. Stetson, Annie E. Potter, the Hutchinson Family, Mr. and Mrs. W. Fox Leggett in Shakespearian Rehearsals, and many others, whose names appear on the circular.

NO CHARGE WHATEVER TO LECTURE COMMITTEES.

Applications promptly attended to. Send for Circular to

AMERICAN LITERARY BUREAU,
132 Nassau Street, New York City.
JAMES K. MEDBERY, } Associate
S. HUMPHREYS GURTEEN, } Directors.
P. O. Box No. 6,701.

L. W. SCHMIDT.

GERMAN BOOKSELLER,

24 BARCLAY STREET, NEW YORK,

Imports regularly all the leading Foreign Publications, including Periodicals.

Foreign works noticed in the NATION kept constantly on hand or procured to order.

Harper & Brothers,

FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK,

HAVE JUST PUBLISHED:

FAMOUS LONDON MERCHANTS. A Book for Boys. By H. R. FOX BOURNE. With Portrait of George Peabody and 24 illustrations. 16mo, cloth, $1.

SIGHTS AND SENSATIONS IN FRANCE, GERMANY, AND SWITZERLAND; or, Experiences of an American Journalist in Europe. By EDWARD GOULD BUFFUM. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

FIVE ACRES TOO MUCH. A Truthful Elucidation of the Attractions of the Country, and a Careful Consideration of the Question of Profit and Loss as involved in Amateur Farming, with much Valuable Advice and Instruction to those about Purchasing Large or Small Places in the Rural Districts. By ROBERT B. ROOSEVELT. With Characteristic Illustrations. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

THREE SEASONS IN EUROPEAN VINEYARDS. Treating of Vine-Culture; Vine Disease and its Cure; Wine-Making and Wines, Red and White; Wine-Drinking as affecting Health and Morals. By WILLIAM J. FLAGG. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

RHETORIC: a Text-Book, designed for Use in Schools and Colleges, and for Private Study. By Rev. E. O. HAVEN, D.D., LL.D., President of the Northwestern University, Evanston, Ill. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

A PARSER AND ANALYZER FOR BEGINNERS, with Diagrams and Suggestive Pictures. By FRANCIS A. MARCH, Professor of the English Language and Comparative Philology in Lafayette College, author of "Method of Philological Study of the English Language," "Comparative Grammar of the Anglo-Saxon Language," etc. 16mo, cloth, 40 cents.

THE STUDENT'S SCRIPTURE HISTORY. The Old Testament History. From the Creation to the Return of the Jews from Captivity. Edited by WILLIAM SMITH, LL.D. With Maps and Woodcuts. Large 12mo, cloth, $2. Uniform with The Student's New Testament History.

THE MALAY ARCHIPELAGO: The Land of the Orang-Utan and the Bird of Paradise. A Narrative of Travel, with Studies of Man and Nature. By ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, Author of "Travels on the Amazon and Rio Negro," "Palm Trees of the Amazon," etc. With Ten Maps and Fifty-one elegant Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, $3 50.

FISHING IN AMERICAN WATERS. By GENIO C. SCOTT. With 170 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, $3 50.

HARPER'S HAND-BOOK FOR TRAVELLERS IN EUROPE AND THE EAST. Being a Guide through France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Austria, Italy, Egypt, Syria, Turkey, Greece, Switzerland, Tyrol, Russia, Denmark, Sweden, Spain, and Great Britain and Ireland. With a Railroad Map corrected up to 1868. By W. PEMBROKE FETRIDGE. Revised edition: Seventh Year. Large 12mo, leather, pocket-book form, $7 50.

HARPER'S PHRASE-BOOK; or, Hand-book of Travel Talk for Travellers and Schools. Being a Guide to Conversations in English, French, German, and Italian, on a New and Improved Method. Intended to accompany "Harper's Hand-book for Travellers." By W. PEMBROKE FETRIDGE, assisted by Professors of Heidelberg University. With concise and explicit Rules for the Pronunciation of the different Languages. Square 16mo, flexible cloth, $1 50.

THE NEW NOVELS

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

HETTY. By HENRY KINGSLEY, author of "Stretton," etc. 8vo, paper, 25 cents.

MY DAUGHTER ELINOR. A Novel of American Society. 8vo, paper, $1 25.

CORD AND CREESE. By the Author of "The Dodge Club." Illustrated. 8vo, paper, 75 cents.

STRETTON: A Novel. By HENRY KINGSLEY, author of "Hetty," "Geoffrey Hamlyn," "Ravenshoe," etc. 8vo, paper, 40 cents.

THE SACRISTAN'S HOUSEHOLD. A Story of Lippe-Detmold. By the Author of "Mabel's Progress," etc. With illustrations by C. G. Bush. 8vo, paper, 75 cents.

THE DODGE CLUB; or, Italy in 1859. By JAMES DE MILLE, Author of "Cord and Creese," etc. With 100 Illustrations. 8vo, paper, 75 cents; cloth, $1 25.

THACKERAY'S NOVELS:

New Edition, beautifully printed, with the Author's own Illustrations.

VANITY FAIR. Illustrated. 8vo, paper, 50 cents.

THE VIRGINIANS. 150 Engravings. 8vo, 75 cents.

THE NEWCOMES. 162 Engravings. 8vo, 75 cents.

THE ADVENTURES OF PHILIP ON HIS WAY THROUGH THE WORLD; Showing who Robbed him, who Helped him, and who Passed him by. With Portrait of Author and 64 Illustrations. 8vo, paper, 50 cents.

 HARPER & BROTHERS will issue immediately New Editions of Thackeray's other Novels, illustrated by the Author, at correspondingly low prices.

CHARLES READE'S NOVELS:

HARD CASH. Illustrated. 8vo, paper, 35 cents.

GRIFFITH GAUNT; or, Jealousy. Illustrated. 8vo, paper, 25 cents.

IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND. 8vo, paper, 35 cents.

LOVE ME LITTLE, LOVE ME LONG. 8vo, paper, 35 cents.

 To be followed by Charles Reade's other Novels.

 HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above books by mail, postage free, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

ZELL'S
POPULAR ENCYCLOPEDIA AND UNIVERSAL DICTIONARY.

The cheapest and most complete Encyclopedia ever published.

Sold by subscription, and delivered in monthly parts at 50 cents each. The entire cost will not exceed $25.

"We find it in the main both full and correct. The spirit in which the Cyclopedia is edited is what it should be."—The Nation.

"The articles are as carefully prepared, the engravings as well executed, and the general typography as perfect as the earliest sheets. Its sale deserves to be popular and extensive."—The Round Table.

"The work is evidently conducted with intelligent and conscientious industry."—N. Y. Tribune.

Address

T. ELLWOOD ZELL, Publisher,
17 and 19 South Sixth Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Or,

AGENCY OF ZELL'S PUBLISHING HOUSE,
7 Murray Street, New York.

John and the Demijohn.

BY MRS. J. McNAIR WRIGHT,

Author of "Our Chatham-Street Uncle," "Golden Heart," "Golden Life," "Golden Work," "Donet Clare," etc.

The ruin to health, to morals, and to all material prosperity, by alcoholic drinks, is absolutely appalling to every considerate mind. The aid of legislation is invoked, and still drinking goes on, The causes of intemperance are too deeply seated to be rooted out in a day by penalties and legal restraints, though they are essential helps in removing temptation.

Back to the cradle and the teachings of the mother we must look for the implanting of the principles which alone, under God, will give a correct manhood. The work announced will prove a help in the right direction, and we invoke its careful reading.

400 pages and 13 illustrations. Price $1 50.

HENRY HOYT,
9 Cornhill, Boston.

THE

Phrenological Journal
FOR AUGUST

CONTAINS:

Rev. John P. Newman, D.D., Chaplain to the U. S. Senate; J. Edgar Thomson, President Pennsylvania Railroad Co.; James A. Whitney; Henry J. Raymond; The Wallachians; Small vs. Large Heads; Reading Faces on the Rail; Marriage Customs; How to Become a Christian; A Well-balanced Mind, etc., with Portraits. 30 cents, or $3 a year. Newsmen have it.

S. R. WELLS,
389 Broadway, New York.

JUST PUBLISHED:

TOURISTS' MAPS,

NORTHERN ROUTES, AND SUMMER RESORTS. In pocket form; very full, and convenient for Pleasure or Business Travellers. Price $1.

THE CATSKILL MOUNTAINS:

THEIR SCENERY, LEGENDS, AND HISTORY. New Edition. With Maps and Illustrations. $1 25.

TAINTOR BROTHERS, Publishers,
678 Broadway, N. Y.

S. R. WELLS,

389 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Will Publish on Saturday, July 24:

WEDLOCK;

OR, THE RIGHT RELATIONS OF THE SEXES.

A Scientific Treatise, disclosing the Laws of Conjugal Selection, and showing who may and who may not marry. By the author of "New Physiognomy," "How to Read Character," etc. 1 vol. 12mo, extra cloth, price $1 50; full gilt, $2.

 Orders from the Trade should be sent in at once.

SABIN & SONS'

American Bibliopolist

(Published monthly) affords an excellent medium for ADVERTISEMENTS. It is useful to LIBRARIANS for the LISTS OF NEW ENGLISH AND AMERICAN PUBLICATIONS. BOOK COLLECTORS will find many desirable volumes in CATALOGUE OF NEW and OLD BOOKS, which accompanies each number. Notices of Rare or Curious Books, and the Notes and Queries upon American subjects, will be interesting to every one.

J. SABIN & SONS, Publishers,
84 Nassau Street, New York.

J. S. & SON have recently received a very valuable Collection of American Books—perhaps the finest ever offered for sale. Many of the volumes are illustrated with extra plates, and superbly bound.

New and Old Books.

DAVID G. FRANCIS (formerly C. S. Francis & Co.), 3 Clinton Hall, Astor Place, New York, keeps constantly for sale an extensive Stock of New and Second-hand Books in various departments of Literature.

Catalogues, issued from time to time, will be forwarded FREE to any address.

BACK NUMBERS OF THE NATION.

The following numbers of the Nation are desired by the Publisher, and if sent to his address within a week will be paid for, at the rate of twenty-five cents for the numbers in Vol. I., and fifteen cents for all others:

Vol. I. 1, 3.
III. 58.
V. 113.
VI. 160.

 The Publisher offers for sale complete sets of the Nation (eight volumes), unbound, for $26; bound, for $42; transportation not included.

PRESERVE YOUR PAPERS, AND BIND THEM YOURSELF.

The Eureka Self-Binder

Is simple, and binds stronger and better than a book. No. 6 is adapted to the Nation. Price $1 25; or, if sent by mail, $1 50.

Address SCHUMANN & LATHAM,
18 Dey Street, New York.

BINDERS FOR THE "NATION."

The Publisher of the Nation, considering the binder described above to be the best yet brought to his notice, has made arrangements for supplying it at the above prices, in cloth, to subscribers and others. The number of any volume will be stamped upon it without charge, to order.

Papers bound in this way really need no other binding for permanent preservation, and present the same appearance on the shelf as the usual bound volumes.

Address, with price enclosed,
PUBLISHER OF THE NATION,
Box 6732, New York City.

CRITICAL AND SOCIAL ESSAYS. Reprinted from the Nation, and supplying in some measure the first two volumes of that paper, which are now obtainable only with difficulty. Cloth, 12mo, price $1 50.

SLAVE SONGS OF THE UNITED STATES A Unique Collection of Original Melodies—words and music—obtained among the negroes of the South; preceded by an account of these Songs, and an Essay on the Negro Dialect, as observed at Port Royal, by Prof. W. F. Allen of the University of Wisconsin. Cloth, 8vo, price $1 50.

POLYDORI VERGILII DE RERUM INVENTORIBUS. The last publication of the Agathynian Club. Superbly printed, paper cover, 8vo, price $3.

Sent post-paid on receipt of price. Address PUBLISHER OF THE "NATION," Box 6732, New York City.

The Nation.

VOL. IX.—NO. 214. THURSDAY, AUGUST 5, 1869. FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM / TWELVE CENTS PER COPY

THE WEEK 101

EDITORIAL ARTICLES:
The Administration and Southern Politics 104
The Recent Attack on the Usurers ... 104
The Prevention of Bribery 105

Social Distinctions from Bridget's Standpoint 106

CORRESPONDENCE:
The Lobby and Lobbying 108
The Harvard University Lectures 108

Gymnastics at Dartmouth 108

NOTES:
Literary 108

Woman from a Conservative Standpoint 112
Professor Joel Parker on Politics 113
North American Review for July 115

CURRENT LITERATURE:
History of the Town of Lexington 116

Books of the Week 117

Terms:—Five Dollars per annum, in advance; Clergymen, Four Dollars.  Remittances at the risk of the subscriber, unless made by draft, check, P. O. money order, or registered letter.

The date of expiration of each subscription is indicated on the printed label. A delay of more than three months in renewing subscriptions will endanger their continuance.

ADDRESS, PUBLISHER OF "THE NATION," BOX 6732, NEW YORK.

PUBLISHING OFFICE, 3 PARK PLACE.

The Week.

A WEEK from to-day the political struggle in Tennessee comes to an end in the election—a temporary end, at least, though there are likely to be after-claps in the fight for the Senatorship, the great prize of the present contest, and though there is no doubt that we are to have fighting enough in the widened arena which will be used by the combatants—Republican, Democratic, and Old-line Whig—after Governor Senter's new registrars have done their work, and taken down the barriers that shut out the disfranchised. It is reported on all hands that Senter's new registrars are unscrupulous in admitting disenabled citizens to the voting lists, and that Senter, whose election is generally conceded, will find himself at the mercy of the Democrats, and will find a Democratic Legislature at the capital who will elect Andrew Johnson Senator. This latter calamity—for it would be nothing else—is, however, to be averted, other accounts say, and the Republicans, with the help of the Whigs—who still exist in Tennessee as in Virginia, North Carolina, and other parts of the country a little out of the main currents of affairs—are expected to elect to the Senate some such person as Emerson Etheridge. Mr. Boutwell's letter to General Stokes seems to have had the effect of warning the office-holders that they will do well for themselves if they abstain from furthering Governor Senter's cause. But, as we have said, victory seems to lie in the hands of the registrars, and it is much more than doubtful if anything can save Stokes, and if within ten days Tennessee is not by fair means or foul practically committed to the policy of amnesty. But, after that, what with the negroes, the Radicals, and the anti-Democrats, it will be possible, good observers say, to keep the State in the hands of the anti-Conservatives; so the prospect is not altogether so black as it might be. One thing is certain—under the proscriptive policy set up by Brownlow, and kept up till it pleased him to kick it down, peace would have been impossible.

As was to have been expected, the Southern Radical negroes look on Conservative negroes as traitors to their race, and latterly in Virginia, and more recently in South Carolina, they have been shocking the white men very much by their "proscriptive spirit"—the life of a white man in either of these States who votes against his race being a very pleasant one as long as it lasts—which in South Carolina is sometimes not so very long. The immediate cause of the Charleston riot appears to have been the presence in the city of a brass band composed of colored Democrats from Savannah, who had accompanied a white base-ball club to Charleston, and were attacked by the colored men of the city for being Democrats. But there seems to have been a preceding riot, also speedily quelled, which was caused merely by the unwillingness of the crowd to move off the ball ground when ordered by the police. The military had to be called out, for Mayor Pillsbury, a man of good intentions, but very little force of character, did not know what to do. The city papers, of course, make the most of the affair, for they hate Mr. Pillsbury and do not like negroes; but really there was very little in it, unless it has some value as an admonition to the Charlestonians to choose their policemen carefully, drill them well, and put them under efficient officers. From the rest of the South, the news is of little interest. Judge Dent will get and accept the Conservative Republican nomination in Mississippi; Alabama Republicans expect to send to Congress five out of the six Representatives; and everywhere the news in regard to the crops continues very favorable. There is talk of the largest cotton crop that has yet been raised, and the prospect of Chinese laborers is welcomed eagerly, while the charge that it is desired to engage in the Coolie trade, or to do anything but introduce free immigrants and pay them good wages, is stoutly denied. The whole business of Chinese immigration in its larger aspect, as well as in its details, will doubtless receive some of the early attention of Congress.

Mr. Boutwell has issued his statement of the public debt for August, and it is really, like all his other statements, a charming document. Of course it contains nothing hostile to religion or morals, and not an expression in it would bring the faintest tinge to the most modest cheek, but for this Mr. Boutwell would hardly claim praise. What he may claim praise for is, furnishing a detailed account of the character of various Government securities which the most enslaved and oppressed woman can understand as readily as the president of the Academy of Science. The aggregate of the debt bearing coin interest is $2,107,931,300; bearing interest in paper, $64,810,000; the debt bearing no interest, consisting of greenbacks and the like, and which the Butlerites wish to increase indefinitely, is $423,872,859; and to this must be added $60,860,320 worth of bonds issued in aid of railroads. Since the 1st of March the debt has been reduced $43,896,523; since the 1st of July, $7,435,744, and next month is expected to bring it down $10,000,000 more. All this does not exactly raise Mr. Boutwell to the level of Turgot or Gladstone, because he operates with a heavy surplus drawn from a country of almost fabulous resources, and with a rapidly increasing population, and is doing only what the law directs. He has no intricate problems of finance to solve; but then, when we consider how much less he might do with perfect impunity, we ought to feel thankful to him—and we do. If he will now abandon all official interest in the Tennessee and other elections, and lend a helping hand in reforming the Civil Service, he will have established everlasting claims on the popular gratitude.

"The longer the Indians can be treated fraudulently in a condition of semi-peace, the more money the agents, contractors, sutlers, and frontiersmen generally can make," because we have been in the habit of buying them off when they took the war-path, and the Indian Bureau and the Indian ring had the handling of the money; but there really seems now to be some hope that the ugly-looking Indian question may receive a solution not so disgraceful to our civilization as any one that has hitherto seemed possible. Such as persistently run wild, robbing and murdering, will have to be exterminated, unless they accept defeat—dealt with as Carr and Corse have been dealing with them. But an effort to tame them will no doubt succeed, in the case of a good many, as it has already succeeded with the Cherokees, who once owned negroes and who have high-schools. It is intended to put all peaceable Indians into two great reservations—a Northern and a Southern—the one being now in charge of General Harney, the other of General Hazen. From the Southern Reservation very good accounts come already. An army officer, writing to the Mail of this city, says it will be occupied by the Comanches, Kiowas, Apaches, Arapahoes, and Cheyennes—tribes numbering altogether between 6,000 and 7,000, and that of these there are already within the reservation more than 4,000 souls, with more than a thousand acres of rich land under cultivation, more than a hundred patches, containing from a few square rods apiece to ten acres apiece, while "pumpkins, melons, vines, and garden vegetables in fabulous quantities are growing everywhere." Several houses have been built and more are to be built, and schools are projected and asked for. It required a good deal of talk to effect so much, but now "even Ten Bears wants his patch fenced in," which we suppose is a fact of great promise, though we do not remember how sanguinary and indocile that chief has been. With the help of Grant's civilian commissioners and of some such body as the Sanitary Commission, it seems as if great good might be done among these people. Of course they will be for some time in a state of pupilage, and must not be expected to stand alone; a couple of bad successive seasons might send them all back to murder and pillage, and the charity of the American people may properly be invoked in their favor.

There is a conflict of evidence as to whether they are enforcing the Prohibitory Law in Massachusetts or not. State Constable Jones takes the Springfield Republican to task for saying that "in Boston the liquor law is a dead letter," and makes the editor a bold promise to the effect that if "any candid and fair individual will point out an open bar in the entire State," he will forthwith "abate the nuisance;" but there is n't any open bar. To this the editor replies by enquiring of the State Constable "if he is so jolly green as not to be aware that there are hundreds of bars open in the State?" Furthermore, he says to Major Jones that he and his assistants are commissioned and paid by the State for collecting and acting upon the information which the Major desires the candid and fair individual to furnish; and that, what is more, they have the information and could shut up plenty of open bars any day they liked. But is either the constable or the editor so jolly green, we should like to know, as to suppose that the politicians of the Republican party in Massachusetts, after being so civil to the temperance men in the matter of making them a law just as they wanted, are now going to endanger the party's political ascendancy by enforcing it? They no more intend it this time than they ever intended it before. They know that a certain number of the temperance men—if not all of them—with the zeal which characterizes moral reformers, would "bolt" if they were not pacified by being allowed to seem to have their own way as regards total abstinence, or to try to have their own way, and that with three parties running, the Democrats might very probably slip into power. But if Judge Pitman imagines that the Bullocks, Butlers, and Lorings, and the Slacks and other politicians, small and great, are going to give the State real prohibition till they are forced to do it, he is singularly confiding. Whether they can be forced, is another question.

A curious meeting has just been held in Lowell, at which clergymen who favor compulsory total abstinence sat side by side with liquor-dealers—whom some of them seemed to regard with a good deal of the feeling expressed in the old Washingtonian tracts about "the rum-seller"—and all agreed harmoniously, and with cheers, to demand the strict enforcement of the law; the one party expecting it to break down completely; the other believing, apparently, that more and sharper constables are all that are needed to make the sale of liquor almost unknown in Massachusetts. But the practical Republican politicians do not seem to have been represented in this assemblage, and, till the liquor-dealers and their friends go over to the Democrats in much greater numbers than ever they have on previous similar occasions, or till the earnest prohibitionists do some bolting, the meetings may be held, but the law will be enforced with much politeness.

The Washington correspondent of the Boston Advertiser, who is, as we have often had occasion to remark, an unusually sensible and well-informed and accurate writer, says—apropos of the reports in circulation as to the truculent character of Sickles's instructions—that neither the President nor Cabinet desires the annexation of Cuba at present, and that our Minister is not, therefore, as some people would have us believe, charged to bully the Spaniards into surrendering the island, or into selling it to the inhabitants for notes endorsed by the United States. The truth of the matter, the correspondent thinks, is that Sickles is instructed to urge the extension of Cuban liberties, either by the admission of the island to complete equality with the mother country, or its erection into a quasi independent principality like Canada, or the sale of the island to the inhabitants "on time" without security; and the correspondent thinks this is Grant's favorite scheme, and the one to which Sickles has been instructed to show most favor. All talk of Spain's receiving any cash from the Cubans beyond the first instalment on "a time sale," however, has, it as well to say, a humorous side to it on which we shall not dwell. The idea of Spain being entitled to any money from the inhabitants for leaving them in quiet possession of their own soil would be the best joke of the season, both in Havana and Washington, about the time the second payment came due. We mention this now solely through a regrettable want of control over our countenance. The Cuban military authorities have very brutally murdered, under the form of a military execution, after a very slight investigation, two, as it appears, innocent Americans, whom they found on board a filibustering vessel, and are offering to apologize for it or compensate their relatives. This sort of thing might have been prevented if Admiral Hoff had been instructed three months ago to give the volunteers plainly to understand that the stringency with which we were enforcing the neutrality laws was not an indication of sympathy with them or of a disposition to wink at their excesses.

Senator Wilson has come to the support of Mr. Parton and his article on the "Strikers" at Washington in the last Atlantic, and "thanks him for it, and expresses his surprise at the perfect truthfulness of his [Mr. Parton's] statements." He adds "that he has served with more than two hundred Senators, and among them all there are scarcely any whom he could so much as suspect of a corrupt motive." He then says, "Such articles as yours tend to increase the faith of the people and to strengthen honesty. That is my judgment, and I thank you for it." The Boston Journal thinks this ought to put the Nation to shame, in view of its recent strictures on Mr. Parton's article. On the contrary, the Nation finds Senator Wilson's letter very amusing reading. The very article he praises so highly accuses seven of the Senators, at least, of having taken bribes from whiskey-dealers and others to render a false judgment in a judicial proceeding. Taking bribes in an ordinary legislative proceeding is nothing to this; and as the charge comes from a warm friend of Mr. B. F. Butler, it is fair to presume that he has passed over in silence some corruption on the other side, so that, if Mr. Parton's statements be true, Mr. Wilson's hearty commendation of his article is simply ludicrous. What the Nation tried to do was to hold it up to reprobation as a disgraceful attack on the Senate, evidently written under the inspiration of one of the most unscrupulous politicians in the country, who had appeared before it as counsel in a cause in the result of which he had a strong personal interest, and had been defeated. To represent the Nation, as the Journal does, as an assailant of Congressional character in this case, and Mr. Parton as its defender, reads a little like a poor joke. The public, however, is gradually getting to understand this sort of thing.

Some of the other papers say that Mr. John Bigelow is at this moment editing the New York Times, and, as the Times does not deny it, we presume he is, and its readers are, doubtless, as we are, very glad to believe it to be true. A kind of hortatory article on the uses and abuses of journalism appeared in the paper of Tuesday morning, which read likewhat is called "a salutatory," was excellent of its kind, and, if lived up to, as we have no doubt it will be, will make the Times in certain aspects a real blessing to the community. Two things in it are specially notable: one, a recognition of the moral responsibility of editors for the lies of correspondents and telegraphers. A general recognition of it by editors would thin the ranks of the "reportorial" profession seriously. We have yet to hear of a single case in which a correspondent has found himself injured professionally by habitual misrepresentation as long as he was "spicy." The second is a recognition of the mischief and repulsiveness of the practice of puffing obscure people and chronicling their doings. The Times might have gone further, however, and put in a word against the puffing of notorious rascals. It ought also to have said a word in condemnation of the common editorial practice of surrendering newspaper columns to any young man who happens to be employed as a correspondent, and allowing him, without any check or supervision, to mingle with his news his own absurd or foolish opinions on all sorts of subjects, together with "digs" at, or damaging stories about, his personal enemies.

The projectors of the new Atlantic Cable, having undertaken in a letter to Mr. Fish to submit themselves, so far as in their own power, to the conditions proposed in the bill introduced into Congress last session, and to endeavor to procure from the French Government the abolition of the monopoly created as to the French coast in their favor, our Government has offered no opposition to the landing of the cable. There is talk of an American cable—that is, of a cable owned in America, and, we suppose, paid out from this side; but we fear no cable can, in the present state of American industry, be made here cheap enough to compete with those of English manufacture. There will probably be an indefinite number laid within the next ten or fifteen years, and in twenty we should not be surprised to see a great deal of the correspondence of the more important kinds between Europe and America carried on by cable. As the world gets familiarized with the telegraph, and business adapts itself to its use, the impatience of the rich and the business men with the letter-post will grow, and at last become uncontrollable.

There has been an interesting debate in the House of Commons on "the Central Asian Question," in which the probabilities of an attack on India by Russia were fully discussed—the weightiest and most authoritative speaker being Mr. Grant Duff. He pooh-poohs the idea that the Russian position in Central Asia endangers the British Empire in India, showing that the Russian army of occupation is so small, their real base of supplies so far off, the distances they would have to traverse in order to reach the British frontier so great, and in a military sense so aggravated by the absence of roads, the wildness of the country, and the character of the native population, that it is "preposterous" to fear a hostile advance from them. The Times takes a different view as to the nature of their occupation of Central Asia, believing it to be more solid and permanent than Mr. Grant Duff does, but holds that their civilizing influence must prove a source of security instead of peril to the English dominions. In the meantime, there is no doubt that, whatever the facts may be, the talk of the Russian advance is already seriously agitating the minds of the Hindoos, and a pamphlet of an Indian officer of high rank attempts to show that the spread amongst the natives of a belief that England was really afraid of Russia, and had reason to be, would be a serious matter. Shere Ali, the new Ameer of Afghanistan, finds himself growing more "interesting" both to Russians and English every day; and if he does not make a good thing out of their competition for his affections, he must differ from most Asiatics of his mental calibre.

There has been a meeting in London of the National Society of Women's Suffrage, at which Mrs. Peter A. Taylor presided, and Mr. John Stuart Mill, Lord Houghton, and Mr. John Morley, of the Fortnightly Review, spoke. The meeting was numerously attended, and was, in point of intellect, very weighty. It appeared from the report that during the year 229 petitions, signed by 41,000 persons, had been presented to Parliament, and 18,500 pamphlets distributed. There was nothing very new in the speeches, but they were all very hopeful, except Mrs. Taylor's, whose gloom, however, Professor Fawcett endeavored to dispel by examples of difficulties overcome drawn from his own experience. The society is about to lose one very truculent and powerful enemy in the person of Mr. Fitzjames Stephen, the barrister, and principal writer for the Pall Mall Gazette, whose fierce tussle in the Gazette, some months ago, with Miss Helen Taylor, on the subject of women's rights, was one of the prettiest pieces of intellectual fence ever witnessed. He goes out to India as Legislative Member of the Council in place of Mr. Maine, the author of the "Ancient Law," who retires. Mr. Stephen is an utter radical on almost every other subject, but touching the arrangement of the family he is a disciple of the patriarchs, and the most formidable upholder of their system. His departure will probably be worth to the society 100 petitions, signed by, say, 20,000 persons.

The Emperor has at last sent his long and anxiously expected message making concessions to the Liberals. He offers to allow ministers to sit as members in the Senate and Assembly; but while they are to be responsible for their acts, they will depend only on the Emperor, and can only be impeached by the Senate; to surrender the right of making changes in the tariff or postal system by treaty without parliamentary authority; and to permit "interpellation" or questioning of ministers in their places on notice; to allow to the Corps Législatif, as well as himself and the Senate, the right of introducing bills, but they must be referred to a committee and to the Council of State—leaving the Corps, however, the final decision; and to leave to both Houses the privilege of electing their own officers. The Senate met on Monday to draw up the "senatus consultum," in which all these changes are to be embodied. The new ministry contains only a few new men—notably Prince de la Tour d'Auvergne, a middle-aged trimmer of high degree, and Duvergier. Rouher goes out, of course, regretted by none, and with the reputation of one of the ablest "Swiss" that ever took the floor. Duruy, the late Minister of Public Instruction, is a real loss. He has done more for the cause of education in France than any of his predecessors, and has been the object of fierce and bitter hostility at the hands of the priest party, aided and abetted, it is said, by the Empress. One of his worst offences in their eyes, as our readers may remember, was his efforts to establish a system of higher education for women. His successor, M. Bourbeau, is a man of Ultramontane leanings.

Spanish affairs have reached a shape in which they are likely to remain till the Cortes meets again in October. Everything is ready for a monarch, but no monarch appears, and Prim says the reason is that the affairs of the kingdom have been in such a disordered condition that nobody would take the crown at any price; but the constitution once adopted, the republican agitation put down, and the finances regulated, a king can be found—and, in fact, one is now ready. Who it is that is waiting for the throne is a matter of guess, but the public eye is turned to Montpensier as the coming man. He has just got back to his home, and Prim, in reply to the remonstrances of the Republicans on his being allowed to re-enter, asked, and was not answered, for a legal reason for expelling him. Marshal Serrano has got the title of "Highness" as regent, and is getting on very well under it, having squelched a small Carlist rising without much trouble. He has, by-the-by, formally received General Sickles, and expressed his admiration for that person, in good set diplomatic terms, which leads us to fear that his copy of the New York World does not reach him regularly. A letter to the Council of Ministers from the Captain-General of Madrid—drawing a very gloomy picture of the state of the country, and announcing his intention of retiring into private life if a monarch is not at once chosen and order restored—has produced a good deal of impression on the public mind, and it is supported by other accounts—all of which agree in pronouncing Spain to be in a very bad way.

THE ADMINISTRATION AND SOUTHERN POLITICS.

THERE is a good deal of discussion going on about the letters Messrs. Boutwell and other members of the Cabinet have thought proper to write to Tennessee, expressing their preference for Stokes over Senter for the governorship of the State—Stokes representing the policy of continued proscription, and Senter that of immediate enfranchisement of the ex-rebels, numbering in all, it is said, about 100,000. The sympathies of the various members of the Administration in the case of Virginia have not been so openly manifested, but whatever Grant's may be—and they are said to incline to Walker—the relation of the two parties in Virginia so closely resembles those of the two parties in Tennessee, that we can hardly err in placing Messrs. Boutwell and Cresswell on the side of Wells.

There are two objections to members of the Cabinet writing letters of encouragement, or otherwise taking part in State elections at the South, which are both worth the consideration. One is, that the opinion of members of the Cabinet as to the way in which Republicans should vote in Tennessee or any other State, is worth no more than the opinion of any other citizen of another State, of mature age and fair capacity, who has never lived in Tennessee, and has no special knowledge of the temper of the people, of the drift of popular feeling, of the necessities of the day, and of the character of the local politicians. Mr. Boutwell and Mr. Cresswell, in other words, know no more about the way a Republican should vote in Tennessee than Mr. Senter knows about how a man should vote in New York. They know they don't know it, and the Tennesseeans all know it, and indeed everybody knows it. They have no special acquaintance with Tennesseean politics, and, per se, their letters, if they wrote them in private life, or even as members of Congress, would simply be a piece of impertinence, to which the State voters would pay no heed. Indeed, we risk nothing in saying that Mr. Boutwell or Mr. Cresswell hardly expects anybody in Tennessee to vote for any particular candidate in deference to his opinion, as an opinion. What he expects is that his letter will influence people—but through their fears, not through their judgment.

In other words, the reason why the opinions of these two gentlemen about the Tennesseean election are of such importance is, that one of them appoints all the postmasters and the other all the revenue assessors and collectors and inspectors, and so forth, in the State, and, consequently, can remove the persons now filling those places. Were it not for this, the opinions of Mr. Fish, or Mr. Robeson, or General Sheridan, or Mr. Hoar would be just as valuable as theirs. What they really mean when they recommend Stokes for the suffrages of Tennesseean voters is not simply that, in their estimation, Stokes is the best man for the governorship, but that if any Federal office-holder in Tennessee fails to "work" for Stokes, or to use his influence for him, he will be made to "rotate" in his office in such a way that the office will become vacant, and another citizen of more zeal be called to fill it. In fact, their letters are simply threats to abuse the patronage at their disposal for the purpose of influencing a political contest which concerns them no more than any other American citizen, and concerns them far less than it concerns the voters in Tennessee, and about the merits of which they are not well informed, and in which any mistake on their part would do incalculable mischief. We pass over with a mere mention the obvious fact, that the duties of those who are charged with the management-in-chief of the Treasury and Post-office of the United States are just now of such magnitude that it is no disparagement to either Mr. Boutwell or Mr. Cresswell to say, that men of twice their ability and powers of work, great as these may be, would find in them full employment for all their faculties of whatever nature.

The second objection is that their interference helps to maintain and stimulate the feeling of antagonism and mistrust between the mass of the Southern people and the Federal Government, which is one of the great difficulties of reconstruction. A State once admitted to the Union, the punishment of any portion of its population for having taken part in the rebellion ceases to be the duty of the Administration or of anybody connected with it. Even if we admit that it is a matter of concern to the Federal Government that the franchise in every State should be impartially bestowed, it is not a matter of concern to it, and it ought not to act as if it were, that a certain portion of the population should be disfranchised for past offences. In so far as Congress has not provided for anything of the kind, the matter ought to be left in the hands of the people of the State, who understand it. Attempts on the part of officers of the General Government to secure a continuance of a policy of proscription, against the wishes and the judgment of even a portion of the Republican party, are, therefore, ill-judged as well as indecent, and are calculated to prolong hatred and distrust of the United States amongst that immense and influential class of the Southern people—the men and women who aided and abetted in the rebellion, and their children. If this were a despotic government, it would make no difference how these people feel or were likely to feel; but as it is a democratic republic, it is, we submit, our duty and our interest to try to placate them, and would be, though they were all possessed by devils. The time for punishment of rebels, as far as regards the Federal Government, was during the continuance of military rule, and the place for punishment was the courts. The opportunities thus presented having passed away, all talk of the matter had better cease. We do not expect Mr. Boutwell to give offices to rebels or Democrats, but we do expect him not to use his patronage to help to divide the Republican party at a State election on a question of disfranchisement.

In this, as in many similar cases, Mr. Boutwell, as well as many other Republicans, does not seem to have ever asked himself a question which all politicians ought to ask themselves every hour, and that is, "What practical good will result from what I am doing?" The great end in view, in all the whole process of reconstruction, is to bring back the Southern people as speedily as possible to true allegiance—that is, allegiance of the heart to the United States. Keeping the most influential portion of the community disfranchised, therefore, could only be justified on the ground that it would promote love of human equality and of the Union amongst the disfranchised. To believe that it would have this effect, it would be necessary to disregard all we know of human nature and of history. The natural effect of proscription is to excite hatred and discontent. It is only justifiable as a means of security—but this it can never be as long as the proscribed have a near prospect of coming into power. So that to make further exclusion of the Southern whites from a share in the government a measure that will bear examination, we ought to make it perpetual. Military government, in short, may have its uses, and may do good; but class government, whether based on loyalty, caste, or color, is sure to breed bad passions, and, if they exist already, runs a fair chance of making them perennial. Men will almost always sooner be governed by a dictator than by neighbors they detest.

THE RECENT ATTACK ON THE USURERS.

THERE is a vast difference, not always sufficiently remembered, between what law writers call mala in se and mala prohibita: that is, between offences against laws enforcing some principle of abstract justice or morality, and laws merely embodying some people's views of what is advantageous for the regulation of commerce or industry. The former are wrongs, whether they be legally prohibited or not, and whether the legal prohibition of them be enforced or not. The latter are wrongs only so long as the prohibition remains on the statute-book, or has not fallen into desuetude. To commit murder or to accept a bribe is a wrong, whether prohibited by statute or not. To have carriage-wheels of more than a certain width is prohibited by the laws of many States, and is, justly or unjustly, punishable by fine and even imprisonment. The law against murder or bribery may not be enforced by a lax government, but the crime remains; the law concerning carriage-wheels is a law only so long as it is enforced. When the circumstances which led to its enactment have so entirely changed and disappeared that the law itself has become unnecessary or mischievous, it naturally falls into abeyance. There are in every country numerous laws or enactments which involve no principle of justice or morality—which, owing to the continuous changes going on in the affairs of men, have ceased to be necessary or useful—and which have gradually fallen into disuse and become totally disregarded, although they have never been expunged from the statute-book, and remain to this day nominally the law of the land. They should, indeed, be expunged from the statute-book, and would be, were it not that legislators find it more profitable to legislate on the affairs of railroad and other corporations than to attend to their legitimate duties.

To this class of laws belong the usury laws. It seems as if no sane man could argue that there is any violation of justice or morality in receiving or paying eight per cent. interest on money that is not equally involved in receiving seven; that it can be just to receive twelve per cent. in Illinois, but a crime to receive eight in New York, or seven in Massachusetts; that it is justifiable for the Government of the United States to pay twelve per cent., or seven per cent. in gold, or seven and three-tenths per cent. in currency, but sinful for its citizens resident in the State of New York to do the same. There are men who claim that it is wicked to receive any interest at all on money, but even they see no greater wickedness in taking eight per cent. than in taking seven. In fact, no man worth listening to has ever yet attempted to place usury laws upon any foundation of justice or morality, or to defend them on any ground save that of expediency, based on the belief that the great mass of borrowers are not capable of judging for themselves what interest they can afford to pay, and that the lenders have it in their power to extort all sorts of unreasonable terms for the money which they have to lend. The usury laws, having no foundation in justice or morality, but being founded only on principles of expediency (which have been found to be extremely inexpedient), have gradually come to be totally disregarded. For years and years they have not been enforced; the best and purest citizens have infringed them daily, not secretly or in disguise, but openly and in the market-place; the daily journals have quoted the transactions as part of the natural and legitimate business operations of the country; corporations, cities, counties, the United States Government itself, have thousands of times infringed, are daily infringing, these laws all through the State, as well as in sight of Trinity steeple; common consent, universal practice, the whole force of public opinion, all stamp usury laws as obsolete and dead; and the commercial community has unanimously branded as dishonorable all attempts to appeal to them in evasion of legitimate business engagements. Yet here we find in New York City a jury, composed of intelligent merchants, framing bills of indictment against reputable bankers for infringing laws that are deemed obsolete by common consent, and that no man dare appeal to in his own defence without being stigmatized as dishonest and tricky. What does it mean?

It means that a large and daily increasing portion of the wealth of the country is getting to be employed in very questionable financial transactions, and that in the course of these transactions some weeks ago a number of influential capitalists had enormous speculative interests in the advance in the price of Government bonds and gold and other stocks, while a similar number of equally influential capitalists were equally interested in having the price of these different articles decline. Of course it was the interest of the latter to make money scarce, in order to force the former to sell. By taking advantage of the weak and expanded condition of some of the poorly managed banks, they frightened these into refusing to lend. By holding out inducements to officers of other banks, they bribed those into likewise refusing. By ingenious manœuvres of various kinds, they threw a part of the financial machinery of the country into temporary confusion, and really succeeded in making money for a time so scarce that borrowers were glad to take it at any price, and readily paid as high as one-quarter and even one-half per cent. per day for its use. In this way those who were interested in the decline of stocks and bonds and gold—the bears of Wall Street—were really on the point of defeating their opponents—the bulls—and forcing them to sell. Then, but not till then, did the public conscience suddenly revolt with indignation at the depravity of the men who openly and barefacedly infringed these sacred usury laws. The press re-echoed or inspired the public demand for the enforcement of the law, the sympathy of all classes who had suffered inconvenience at least was enlisted, an example was required, the aid of the grand jury was invoked, the frightened bear speculators promptly relaxed their hold upon the money market money suddenly became abundant and easy to obtain at seven per cent. per annum, securities of all kinds rapidly advanced, the great bear combination was defeated, and the triumphant bulls went on their way rejoicing. The bulwark of liberty, the pillar of our institutions, the pride of Anglo-Saxon freemen, the grand jury of our fellow-citizens, was degraded into a simple piece of Wall-street speculation-machinery, and the whole country looked on with a dim and uncertain belief that the law had been vindicated, innocence protected, and that virtue was triumphant.

The whole proceeding is a piece of trickery and sham. The men who first complained, the jury that led the investigation, the witnesses summoned, the judge on the bench, all feel somewhat ashamed of their share in the proceedings; they all know as well as we do that the usury laws are as dead and obsolete as the laws relating to carriage-wheels in Jersey or to bakers' apprentices in Rhode Island; they all know that the appeal to these laws is a sham and a fraud, and that they have all been used together as convenient and despised tools of a set of gigantic gamblers, who are as ready to-day to appeal to the sacredness of obsolete laws as to defy all law to-morrow, if law happens to interfere with their reckless greed. But at the time when the proceedings were begun, this was scarcely recognized; it was impossible to deny the existence of the law; no one durst plead its obsoleteness; the public sentiment, often passionate and hasty, had already prejudged the case; and thus the grand jury was hurried on until it brought in a formal indictment against a number of the principal offenders. As usually happens in such cases, the convicted offenders are not those who had anything to do with bringing about the great stringency, but entirely inoffensive persons, who, having money to lend, received therefor whatever interest it happened to be worth. Their transactions having been open and undisguised, they have all pleaded guilty, and now await the action of Judge Cardozo, upon whom falls the difficult task of deciding what punishment they shall suffer. We can scarcely expect that his decision will be rendered at an early day.

The question of most interest connected with this investigation is this: How is it that the usury laws are not repealed when their injustice, inefficiency, and absurdity are so generally recognized, and the laws themselves practically ignored? Besides the indisposition among legislators to attend to any business of real utility, and conscientious objections of ignorant members from the rural districts, there is said to exist a powerful opposition to the repeal where one would least expect it, viz., among the national banks. One would think that banks having money to lend would desire to be authorized to get as much as possible for it. But the contrary appears to be the fact. It was openly asserted during the recent excitement—with what truth we know not—that certain bank presidents were leagued with the speculative cliques who made money so scarce and expected to derive large profits therefrom. Indeed, it was said that the legal proceedings were begun partly with the hope of proving this charge against certain bank officers, although, as far as we are aware, no such proof has been furnished. It is very evident, however, that there is temptation enough in times like the present to lend color to the report that it is among bank officers that the opposition to repeal originates. At the next session of the Legislature the subject will unquestionably be again introduced, and we shall then have an opportunity to see who it is that is benefited by retaining the usury laws upon the statute-book.

THE PREVENTION OF BRIBERY.

Several schemes for the prevention of legislative bribery and corruption have been brought forward within the past two or three years. This is of course natural enough, when we reflect upon the vast amount of dishonesty in the various State capitals which has been brought to light within the same period of time. It might be said with truth, that, since the settlement of the Reconstruction question, one of the chief functions of the leading journalists of the more populous and active States has been the exposure of the log-rolling, wire-pulling, and open corruption practised by the various gentlemen whose election they had themselves promoted and secured. In this condition of affairs, of course their minds have been greatly occupied with the invention of devices by which this lamentable running down of our political machinery may be stopped. The plans proposed are innumerable. On one side it is urged that, inasmuch as most of the corruption takes place in connection with "private bills," the legislatures should be prohibited by constitutional provision from passing any save general laws—in other words, that no laws either furthering or invading individual rights should be permitted—the argument being that, although it may be possible to hustle a bill affecting a single town or county or railroad through the legislature, it is manifestly impossible to hustle through a general law affecting all the towns or counties or railroads in a State, for the simple reason that the interests of one railroad would be at variance with those of another; that the grant wanted by one town would not be the grant desired by all; that the bill very popular in the county of Jericho would be detestable in the eyes of the inhabitants of the county of Jerusalem. And in some of the States constitutional provisions against special legislation do actually exist. But to the argument to which we have just referred, it is objected that legislatures which are intent on corruption will probably find means to override the restriction; that laws may easily be framed, general indeed in form, but affecting only a single individual or corporation.

Again, it has been urged that corruption may be greatly reduced, if not entirely destroyed, by limiting the duration of legislative sessions—the argument being that if time enough for necessary business only is allowed, it will be extremely difficult for corrupt law-makers to find that opportunity for crime which sessions of uncertain length are continually offering. But to this it has been replied, in the first place, that the short sessions, combined with frequent re-elections, make the matter ten times worse, for each legislator remains on the stage so short a time that he has no sense of responsibility; he therefore occupies his short moment of power not in the transaction of necessary business, which would bring him only the reward of conscious integrity, but the unnecessary business which brings him in solid wealth and notoriety. A legislature which should sit for some months, it has been said, may be watched to some purpose, but in a session of a few weeks any scandal may be perpetrated with impunity. Imagine, for example, the Legislature of New York sitting for a week! And it is further said that, as an actual fact, there is very little difference as to corruption between the States in which the duration of the sessions is limited and those in which no limit is set. Kindred arguments are also in use, pro and con., as to the possibility of stopping bribery by lengthening or shortening the term of office. Does any one believe that a long term secures honesty? Let him look at Florida. Did any one believe that a short term secured it? Let him look at New York!

The common way of effecting the object in view is, of course, the passage of stringent penal laws, such as have been introduced into the new constitution of this State, drawn up two years since. But the most novel and original plan is one lately brought forward and urged with great gravity by the Chicago Tribune. That journal, after saying that no effective anti-bribery law has ever been framed, proposes the passage of the following constitutional provision, which it thinks will meet the case thoroughly:

"1. No vote of either House of the Legislature, or signature of the Governor or other officer essential to the passage of any act, shall be valid if it be induced by any personal fear, favor, reward, or hope of reward, in or to any member or officer voting for or signing the same.

"2. The Courts of Record of the State, in any suit or prosecution wherein the rights or interests of parties are affected by any act of the Legislature, or signature of any officer, may, at any time within one year after the passage or performance of such act, on the application of the parties to the suit, join and try the issue, whether such act or signature were induced or affected as aforesaid; and, if the act or signature were so affected, may adjudge the act void, and may proceed to try and determine such suit as if no such act had been passed or signature given."

The Tribune continues:

"It may be objected that this would leave the entire enforcement of all our laws to so capricious a tribunal as a petit jury—whose verdict some irreverent but experienced lawyer has declared not even Omniscience could bet on with a fair chance of winning. But it must be remembered that the administration of justice depends on the verdicts of petit juries in any event; and the more important the question of fact involved in the enforcement of any law, the more surely should there be some mode of trying it, and, if necessary, trying it again, until the truth is so apparent that nobody cares to risk the cost of any new or further trial.

"No principle can be more evidently just than that a law in the enactment of which bribery enters should be set aside. The ordinary laws against bribery are practically null. The party who pays the bribe, having got his act through, it is law, and nobody has any longer the power to contend with it. The payer and receiver of the bribe have a mutual interest in concealing their crime, and the parties defrauded by it are bound hand and foot by the fraudulent enactment. But make the law void, and the facts relative to the bribery liable to be tried in every court in the State, with no check except that the losing party shall pay the costs if he fails to prove that some vote or signature was bought or unduly influenced, and our future Legislatures would, in our judgment, be as free from the temptation of money as our courts of justice have hitherto been. The parties most careful not to use it would be those who wanted to secure the passage of the law."

Now we do not propose to go into any examination of the merits of this scheme in detail, for we imagine that most of our readers will agree with us that it is an impracticable one. To permit courts of justice to enter into the question of the motives of every legislator who voted for a bill would be to consume the whole time of judges in an investigation which would, in nine cases out of ten, lead to nothing. Anybody who wanted to delay a case for a year or two would only have to insist on trying this issue. By the time all the prominent journalists who had accused, and all the prominent lobbyists who were suspected, and all the "enemies of the bill" who knew that money had been paid for votes—before all these persons had been examined, and their evidence duly weighed by the jury, the poorer party to the suit would have been driven to such expense and trouble that he would be ready to submit to any compromise rather than go on. An old-fashioned chancery suit would be nothing to it.

All this and much more is so evident that we do not propose to discuss the merits of the scheme any further. But we mention it because it has one characteristic feature of all the plans we have noticed, and exhibits this feature in a plainer light than any other. The common trait to which we refer is that they all proceed on the assumption that legislative dishonesty can be rooted out by legislative enactment or constitutional provision. We do not believe that it can. We do not believe that either long sessions or short sessions, or limited or unlimited terms, restrictions on special legislation or fine or imprisonment, or even the thorough-going measures of the Tribune, will ever have the desired effect. So long as we continue to elect to office men of bad or doubtful character, so long shall we have dishonest bills passed. To treat men whom we elect to make laws for us as children, and to erect bars here and point out gates there, and warn them against pitfalls in this direction and point out stumbling-blocks in that other, would be all very well if we had the slightest control over them after their election. But we have not. They are free agents; and whether they receive with respect our warnings in the shape of constitutions and laws, or whether they laugh at them, depends on what sort of men they are, not on the stringency of the warning. There is this peculiarity about the crime of bribery, that, while in almost all other offences against society it is for the interest of some individual or his friends to expose the criminal—as, for example, in murder, robbery, arson, and the like—in the case of bribery it is for the interest of no one to produce the evidence. The ordinary motive to disclose the facts, therefore, cannot be relied on; and in the absence of this security, what have we to fall back upon but high official character? There is our true safety. When we have men in office whose honor is above suspicion, our laws against bribery will be found to be the most effective in the world; until that time comes, we may cover our statute-books all over with such laws, and to no purpose.

SOCIAL DISTINCTIONS FROM BRIDGET'S STANDPOINT.

THERE was one period in the domestic history of the Roman Empire which must have been full of humorous and odd situations, but of which, owing to the destruction of the files of great dailies, monthly magazines, and religious and other weekly newspapers by Alaric, who hated the press, not a trace has come down to us—we mean the period when manners, having become very luxurious, and social life splendid and complicated, British, Thracian, and German slaves fresh from the forest were constantly called upon to act as waiters, grooms, valets, cooks, and so forth. It is useless to tell us that the newly caught savages were first used as field-hands, and tied up in the ergastula overnight, and that it was after long training that they were employed in menial duties, properly so called —if indeed the Roman-born slaves were not always reserved for this class of service. This was, no doubt, true of the great establishments; but there must have been plenty of Romans of moderate means who, when they wanted a cook or man-of-all-work, went to the market and bought a cheap newly imported barbarian; and, having taken him home, went through the agony of seeing him break their dishes and wine-jars, upset their lamps, and spoil their victuals. We know very well that many people feel warranted in supposing, on the strength of one passage in Juvenal, that, when things went wrong in this way, the master went out, dug a hole, set up a cross, and crucified the clumsy servant; but this can hardly have been a common practice. The vast majority of Romans bore with him as best they could; larupped him probably with moderation; and the mistress, when she went to the bath, told amusing stories to her friends of the queer things he had done, and of his ignorance of the usages of genteel Roman life. Now, what would we not give for a volume of these stories! Some of them must have been curious beyond imagination, because the contrasts they described must have been such as have never been seen in the modern world.

And yet we are probably now witnessing in the United States the last of a state of things not very far removed from it in grotesqueness and oddity. Since the fall of the Empire, nothing so closely resembling this one feature of domestic life in Rome has ever been witnessed as the efforts of Americans during the last thirty years to get their house-work done by European, and particularly Irish, immigrants. The classes in Europe which employ servants have ever since found or formed servants for their work amongst their own countrymen, possessing a certain familiarity with their ways, and prepared for household duties either by acquaintance with them from childhood or gradual training. It has fallen to the lot of the Americans to be forced suddenly to receive into their houses a great body of aliens, fresh from a mode of life not very much superior to that of the ancient Germans, as described by Tacitus, and to trust to them for the performance, without any preparation, of the thousand small domestic duties on which so much human happiness depends. The result has been a body of comedy which, if preserved, would not only be one of the most amusing pieces of literature in existence, but would throw more light on American civilization and manners in our day than anything the celebrated coming historian will find to his hand. One hears every day perfectly well-authenticated anecdotes, which for comicality and illustrative and descriptive absurdity have never been surpassed, and which ought to be written down, but which thirty years hence will be forgotten. By that time, the typical Bridget of the magazines will have become a faint memory. The supply of her is already beginning to slacken, and she is getting old. Before long, she will be simply known as the mother of innumerable Maggies and Minnies, who will work sewing-machines and make watches and tend power-looms, read the Ledger and Godey's Ladies' Book, and be a good deal "out of health."

The Chinaman will by that time have taken her place, and, heathen and outlandish though he be, he will never be half as amusing as she has been, because though American ways may be very strange to him, he has in him something which Bridget has not, and which is the mainstay of Chinese civilization, and that is a highly developed imitative faculty. He can repeat, with extraordinary fidelity, what he has once seen done; and—though he may copy without intelligence, like the Californian Chinaman who, having been shown by his mistress how to make a pudding containing three eggs, but having seen her throw one bad egg away, continued for months after, whenever he made the pudding, to use four eggs, regularly breaking, examining, and throwing one away as he had seen her do—still, it will be found that a capacity for routine is perhaps, on the whole, far more valuable in a household than intelligence—if we have to choose between them. Untrained intelligence is apt for a good while to run into mere zeal, which in housekeeping, as in diplomacy, is a dreadful thing. Anyhow, the Chinaman is coming, and we venture to predict that he will in twenty years have totally superseded Bridget.

Like nearly all actual observers of social and political phenomena, we do not know or do not consider how interesting future generations will consider the household crisis through which we are now passing, and how eagerly they will pick up all scraps of information about the effect on American life of the great European emigration of the nineteenth century. To be sure, the subject has been greatly discussed in periodical literature, but the discussions have been too homiletic or reflective, and not sufficiently narrative or anecdotical for the purposes of the future historian. We ought to have a printed collection of the incomparable stories now current in every circle of the extraordinary things Bridget has done, of the pretensions she has put forward, and the mistakes she has committed.

There is one of her difficulties which only few Americans understand, and which, nevertheless, must be understood, in order to judge her fairly. There is something almost pathetic in her attempts to grapple with it. It lies in the confusion in which she is involved by finding the standard she has been in the habit of using at home to ascertain the social position of her employer—and thus satisfy herself whether, when she changes her place, she has risen or fallen in the social scale—almost utterly useless on her arrival in America. The following advertisement, which appeared in the Herald a few days ago, is a very amusing illustration of the fog in which she gropes her way for a good while after landing, if not all her life:

> WANTED—A SITUATION BY A WOMAN AS COOK IN A PRIVATE FAMILY; the family to be as high in society as a Lord's family is in Europe. Apply at No. 125 West Twenty-Fifth street, between Sixth and Seventh Avenues.

In Ireland, she has tolerably easy work in rating people. The landowner—or, as she is in the habit of calling him, "the estated gintleman"—occupies, in her mind, as he does in that of the rest of the community, the highest place; if he is a "Lord," so much the better, but a "Lord" is, after all, only a superfine landowner; the title is a mere ornament on an article in itself good and substantial. After the landowner come the professional classes — barristers, doctors, and ministers of the Established Church—and she of course grades these, in some degree, by their wealth and connections, but still puts none of them down very low. With merchants of means she is not familiar; and has the old feudal or—what is still more intense—Celtic clansman's doubts whether a trader can ever be a gentleman. She grows up with the idea that this is the natural order of society, which was from the beginning and shall be to the end, and does not even dream of the existence of any other arrangement of classes. She arrives in America with her scale in her hand, and finds it utterly useless. The equivalent of the country gentleman she looks for in vain. She would probably put in his place an idle man drawing a large income from any source, but him she does not light upon, or sees only in very small numbers. On beginning her practical acquaintance, too, with American life, she finds that—no matter how fine the house in which she undertakes to cook, sweep, dust, or wash—the owner probably has "a store" to which he repairs daily, and in which he passes most of his waking hours at work. Now this fact, when she first grasps it, is more than "a painful revelation" to her. It absolutely disorders her faculties and destroys some of her best qualities. The horrible feeling takes possession of her that her master and mistress are not "a rale lady and gintleman," and, after a brief period of sauciness, she tries again—perhaps advertises for a "Lord," in order to make assurance doubly sure—and on finding that everybody either has "a store," or associates with people who have, she concludes that in the new country wealth is the only standard of respectability; and to wealth merely, apart from occupation or birth, she never brings herself to pay any respect, much less "petty allegiance."

In attempting to judge people by the standard of wealth, however, she again finds herself plunged in difficulties. She has certain notions about the manners peculiar to gentlemen of which she cannot rid herself, and which exercise a disturbing influence on her investigations. It is simple enough to divide families as she does—into "first-class," "second-class"—according to the kind of house they live in, and the number of servants and horses they keep; we have heard of her asking a lady at an intelligence office "whether she was a first-class family." But then, if the head of the family does not answer her ideal in respect to dress, bearing, and exigence, she is again plunged in doubt. The nature of her difficulty here is well illustrated by what she said the other day when giving warning to a lady, on the ground that her master was not a gentleman; her previous employer was a gentleman, she said, inasmuch as "he had three kinds of wine on his table, and swore." In fact, the mild-mannered, kindly American householder, who wears old clothes, runs errands for his wife and daughters, likes rather than eschews "chores," never rings the bell, and hates to give trouble, and does not mind blacking his boots on a pinch, and washes down his meals with ice-water, and speaks to Bridget as if he and she had gone to school together, is a being whom she never thoroughly understands, and is constantly disposed to regard as an impostor—a person living in a style he has no right to, and surrounded by luxuries he does not know how to enjoy. She will probably never understand the society in which she lives; and the only definite conclusion she appears to have reached about her business in it is, that she ought to get all she can out of everybody she has dealings with, and wear silks.

Correspondence.

THE LOBBY AND LOBBYING.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: In your article on the "Existence of the Lobby," in the Nation of July 22, the term "lobby" is used in the sense that is implied when you speak also of the "professional lobbyist;" and it is assumed that your correspondent, in saying that "some kind of lobby will continue to be a necessity," means the same thing. No notice is taken of a distinction which is intimated by your correspondent in a sentence immediately following the passage which you quote, and closing the paragraph where it occurs, viz.: "Nothing has a stronger tendency to make lobbymen corrupt than to assume that every one who lobbies uses corrupt means."

It has been the way with certain papers here in Massachusetts of late to darken counsel by thundering by the wholesale against "lobbying;" and I have been hoping to see some competent discussion of the subject which should distinguish a little. One tires of that kind of discussion wherein, as Dr. Johnson ponderously says of the human memory, "particular features and discriminations are compressed and conglobated into one gross and general idea."

Much of what is generally known as "lobbying" is done by lawyers and others who are not of the professional lobby. This sort of lobbying may or may not be paid for. It is not, I believe, generally esteemed disreputable among persons who are practically acquainted with legislation. Such men as the late Governor Andrew, for example, engage in it. What sort of services are rendered in this kind of lobbying will be understood readily enough by any one who, from public or private reasons, may ever have felt the responsibility of securing the passage of an important measure to be resting upon his shoulders. It is enough for my present purpose to say that they are not the services of those hired squatters at the State House to whom—and to whom alone—you refer.

I happen to know that the distinction above referred to was in the mind of your former correspondent when he wrote the passage which you quote, and I think it is fairly suggested in the sentence which you omit to quote. Let me say, then, that you do him injustice, after your description of the professional lobby, in saying that "it is to men like these that our correspondent would have us believe members must go in order to obtain information." And let me also venture to ask your attention to your correspondent's text and to the general subject again. To the Nation, if anywhere, we must turn for a fair consideration of such a subject. X.

Boston, July 26, 1869.

[We think that any wrong there has been in the matter has been due to want of clearness on the part of the correspondent, as well as of the Nation, though we admit, on looking at his letter once more, that we have imputed to him a more general defence of the lobby than he can fairly be made answerable for. On the other hand, nobody can have supposed that, in talking of "the lobby" as an objectionable body, we meant to include in it such men as Governor Andrew, or others, who once in a while try to push important public measures by personal solicitation. The duty of noticing all exceptions and distinctions is doubtless binding on all writers; but it is only binding within the limits imposed by the patience of readers and the natural life and bodily endurance of editors. If nothing could ever be left to people's imagination or good sense, no periodical could possibly live a month. The existence of the professional lobby cannot be denied; and the theory that it is simply a band of impostors, who never accomplish anything for their clients, is one which few people have yet swallowed.—Ed. Nation.]

THE HARVARD UNIVERSITY LECTURES.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: From the announcement that "either course of the Harvard University lectures will suffice to occupy the whole time of the student," and that "examinations for honors will be held at the end of the year," it may be inferred that the courses are really to be regarded as forming the basis of a system of post-graduate study, the cost of which is, indeed, not relatively higher than that of a single undergraduate year.

The number of people, however, who have at once inclination, time, and money to study quite out of the limits of the Brodwissenschaften, and can command a residence near, if not in, Cambridge for a year, and a freedom from other engagements three afternoons in the week, is, I fear, not large, and the funds of the University, we may suppose, will be largely drawn upon to eke out the salaries of the lecturers.

As a graduate of Harvard who would like to attend these lectures but for their "hard condition," I venture, therefore, the enquiry whether a much greater audience, larger receipts, and a more widespread and quickening influence might not be secured for our lecturers by some such expedients as lowering the price very considerably, holding the lectures in the evening, and admitting the two upper classes of the college at perhaps $15 a course. As regards the last step, college men know how generally the evenings are given up to loafing, and how eagerly the chance to spend some of them in hearing Lowell, Child, Howells, and Emerson would be welcomed.

It seems certain, at any rate, that there are a great many men and women who would like to hear these lectures, especially those of the Modern Literature course, who are quite unable to pay $150 for the privilege, and who do not care to pass a competitive examination at the end of the year. Is it not possible to provide, in some way, for this large class, without doing injustice to the few special students, and, at the same time, to increase, rather than diminish, the total receipts of the lectures?

Cantab.

Cambridge, July 31, 1869.

GYMNASTICS AT DARTMOUTH.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Under the head of "Literary Notes" (No. 210), in commenting upon Dr. Allen's "Physical Culture in Amherst College," your critic is of opinion that exercise at College gymnasiums in this country "is voluntary in all other places than at Amherst."

Allow me to state that the students of Dartmouth enjoy the advantages of compulsory class-drill daily, in a gymnasium which is second to that of no other New England college; that these exercises take place at a fixed time, under a leader, and occupy half an hour; and that our instructor, though not a physician, "is not a boxer merely, or a fancy performer," but "a gentleman of culture" and "a college graduate." A Junior.

Dartmouth College, July 12, 1869.

Notes.

LITERARY.

Dr. J. Thomas, the editor of "Lippincott's Pronouncing Gazetteer of the World"—a work which has met with much deserved favor—has been employed by Messrs. J. B. Lippincott & Co. to prepare a "Universal Pronouncing Dictionary of Biography and Mythology." The first five parts of it are announced as ready.——Messrs. Roberts Brothers have in preparation "The Primeval World of Hebrew Tradition," by Dr. Hedge; a "Homiletical Commentary on the New Testament," by Dr. Joseph Parker, the author of "Ecce Deus;" the "Writings of Madame Swetchine," translated by Miss Laura Preston, the translator of the "Life of Madame Swetchine," with which volume this one is uniform; a narrative poem called "The Woman who Dared" (durst?), by Mr. Epes Sargent; "Thorwaldsen: his Life and Works," from the French of Eugene Plon, by Miss Luyster; "A Day by the Fire, and Other Papers," hitherto uncollected, by Leigh Hunt; "Little Mysteries and Little Plagues," by John Neal; "Letters Everywhere," which we suppose is a juvenile, and which has concealed letters in pictures and text, and several other juveniles, including one old one and one new one, by Miss L. M. Alcott, one illustrated by Oscar Pletsch, and some others, which it will be time enough to mention by-and-by.

—The projected republication of Mr. Samuel A. Goddard's (of Birmingham) letters on the rebellion, which we lately announced, is dependent, we learn, on a certain number of subscriptions from the author's countrymen. Ninety have already been obtained over here, and sixty more are required, and, we hope, will be forthcoming. Rev. Samuel May, jr., 27 Hollis Street, Boston, will be glad to receive them from any quarter, or subscribers in this city and vicinity may send their names to Mr. S. V. Haughwout, 490 Broadway. The price of the volume has been reduced to five dollars, payable on delivery. Mr. Goddard's services to the Amer. ican cause were unremitting; and we may therefore expect from his writings, when brought together, an almost connected view of the course of events during the civil war. If not exactly history, we shall thus get at least contemporary illustration of history, that should be quite as instructive as formal narratives, with a better chance of being entertaining. In spite of our national partiality for the "American view" of foreign affairs, the American view of American affairs and American character from a foreign standpoint is much more worth considering; and to Mr. Goddard the compliment has been paid of having been "the most useful and intelligent American who has resided in England the last forty years."

—Apropos of the "American view of America," there is still another view from which we may derive benefit, and that is the one given us in the weekly issues of the London Anglo-American Times. This paper we take to be edited not by an American, but by a very thorough and generally well-informed friend of this country. From the start a readable journal, it has latterly, and apparently under a changed management, shown a peculiar ability, especially in extracting the pith of American discussions, and giving in a condensed form the substance of many long and wearisome articles. This practice proves a disciplined and cultivated mind on the part of the editor, and that he is not content to conduct his paper with scissors alone. He quotes, of course, liberally from the American press, as a main object of the paper is to keep Americans abroad informed of opinions and events at home; but even into the news items a good deal of original work is put, in the way of comment, explanation, or illustration. The Anglo-American Times watches closely the expressions of the English press on American affairs, and not unfrequently feels called upon to reply to them. In this way it gives its readers a just and pretty complete view of America as she appears to friends and unfriends in Great Britain, whose opinion, after all, is that for which we ought to care most of all the nations. That the Anglo-American Times never makes mistakes of judgment we do not say; nor that it never brings small things into undue prominence, to the neglect of greater; but in this it shares the liability to err of all foreign observers of any country, and these mistakes are seldom without instruction. Its tone is in full sympathy with the party of progress in this country; and this and its fair acquaintance with the American character and ideas make it capable of considerable usefulness wherever it is taken. It has just established an agency in this city, and those who may desire to subscribe for it or to advertise in it can do so by applying to Mr. J. A. Knight, 26 Pine Street. We do not anticipate for it an extended circulation on this side the water, but we have endeavored to show why sending it here is not exactly sending coals to Newcastle.

—The want of comic talent is certainly not the reason why we have to answer in the negative the often-asked question, "why we have no comic paper in America?" There are, indeed, few questions to which we might better apply an old recommendation to philosophic querists which directs them first to prove their facts. The truth appears to be that we have so many comic journals that none is the comic journal par excellence, like the English Punch, and the French Charivari, and the German Kladderadatsch. We have a thousand newspapers varying in humorous power from the San Francisco Weekly News-Letter—which is a class by itself, and beside which Punch seems, in point of general excellence, even feeble—down to the seven-by-nine sheet of the county town in the country, with its column of "spice," or "brevities," or "dashes here and there," or "odds and ends," which its patrons as regularly expect as they expect the news of the county court or the county cattle-show. Mr. Nasby, the San Francisco "Town Crier," Mr. Mark Twain, Mr. Josh Billings, some of the men on the World, Mr. Leland, the jester of the Boston Post, the balladist of "Truthful James," some of the story-tellers of the "Editor's Drawer" of Harper's, to say nothing of the jokers who scintillate more or less feebly in the journals of the Union generally, would, if they could be got together in one corps, make a comic journal which it would be very hard to beat, and which would easily take away our seeming reproach. Our artists we should have to breed probably; though Mr. Bush, and Mr. Worth, and Mr. Stephens, and Mr. Nast, and Mr. Fay, especially the first-mentioned, offer us already some good material, and would no doubt offer us more if the demand for their work were steady, and their powers were focussed, as the Harpers—say—with the publishing ability that they possess, and the editorial ability that they always know how to secure, might very probably be able to focus them. Hitherto publishers and an editor, and especially publishers, seem to have been the great want of the American comic paper which has at various times made an attempt at existence. We say that publishers in especial have been lacking, because it has always seemed that with sufficient purchasing capacity the chief difficulty could be overcome; a very large public is ready and avid, artists are obtainable, there is plenty of humorous talent in the country, but the money to monopolize Billings, and buy all Mr. John Paul's puns, and to take Mr. Nasby out of his Toledo Blade, has never been forthcoming. Great things have had feeble beginnings sometimes, and the little periodical which lies before us, and has suggested these remarks—Mr. G. W. Carleton's Kaleidoscope—may form the foundation of a journal of world-wide fame. Such a future is, however, only very slightly indicated by this first number. The Kaleidoscope is a small illustrated magazine of thirty-two pages, which is to be issued "once in a while," and is to be edited by Mr. Roderic Triplex, Mr. Roger Triplex, and Mr. Robert Triplex—gentlemen whose real names are as unfamiliar, we should suppose, as their assumed ones are likely to remain, so far as celebrity is gained by successful humorous writing. What we have given us here is anything but good. There is a little flavor of the "Bohemianism" of the old Vanity Fair; and there is a little smack of the "Harry Franco" or "Salmagundi" kind; and there is a letter from "Ralph Retina," who has come to New York from the town of Zenobia ("formerly Mosquito Hollow"), by way of Pegwacket, and who writes to his mother about the politeness of New York hackmen and shoddy, and the billiard-playing and drinking of the pale-faced young men, and all the rest of it, in the manner of the "Ethan Spikes" who used to be in fashion so many years ago, and whose pale ghosts seem even drearier than did the veritable beings themselves. The illustrations are rather better than the text, and seem to show here and there a trace of Mr. H. L. Stephens, but they are all very slight. We wish it might attract to itself some of the many men capable of making it entertaining; but unless the Kaleidoscope should thus become a nucleus for other wit than its own, we fear that few will care how intermittent it shall be in its appearances.

— Soon after the movement was inaugurated for raising a general fund for Harvard College, we received a letter from a graduate of high standing and character, complaining that on one, at least, of the class committees to collect subscriptions men had been placed who in college made a practice of cheating their instructors—at recitations, examinations, and in other ways. On this account, the writer went on to say, he could not contribute to the quota of his class, for fear lest his gift should never reach its destination. This reasoning, however, was open to the objection of being a good deal too logical, and if it were sound there should be far fewer honest and upright citizens than we do actually recognize. The maxim that all's fair in war has only to be applied to the relation of schoolmaster and pupil, as viewed by the latter, to account for the petty immorality—to give it that name—which all schools develop, and which may or may not survive the period of discipline and the arrival at years of discretion. That much of it is due to false modes of discipline and of teaching there cannot be a shadow of doubt; and this aspect of the question has been discussed with great practical ability by Miss Mary R. Goodridge, a teacher in the High School at Plymouth, Massachusetts, who recently read a paper on the effects of the marking system before a county association of teachers. This paper has been reprinted in the Massachusetts Teacher for August, and we can say of it that it is the best piece of writing on educational topics we have ever seen from the pen of an American schoolmistress. We reproduce a paragraph which arrested our attention, both because it re-echoed the apprehensions of our Harvard graduate, and because it is something new for a schoolmistress to take any more thought of the political bearing of her vocation than the committeeman takes when he admonishes each boy that he may one day become President. Miss Goodridge remarks:

"I know some say that school dishonesty is a very small matter—pertaining to school and its temptations only—and does not affect the outside life at all. I know the same boys who talk freely together of the various methods of cheating they use in school will not tolerate for an instant any such practice in their games, and the boy is disgraced among them who attempts it. But it seems to me, if under any circumstances they should be exposed to other petty but frequent temptations, they might find the resumption of the school-conscience dangerously easy and convenient. I have been told that a boy may cheat his way through the schools, and in college reduce the practice to a science and a fine art, and come out a perfectly honest man at last, with whom you might trust untold gold. Untold gold, perhaps—that may be quite possible; but what will be the effect of this habit of so many years if he chooses politics as his sphere?"

—The Convention of Philologists which has just met at Poughkeepsie will be memorable as the first successful attempt to excite among linguistic students something of the same spirit of community and active co-operation which exists among scientific men. It is very much to the credit of those gentlemen who started the movement and carried it through that it has maintained a liberal as well as earnest character; we owe it to them that American scholars have taken a long step towards knowing one another better, and understanding better the needs of American scholarship. The friends of the movement have felt from the first the importance of having it controlled by the best men, and in the interests of the highest scholarship; and the convention showed throughout the best spirit and temper. If, after all, it turned out in any degree to be the case that second-rate men obtained the care of the convention and leading places in its counsels, it was not the fault of the convention, but of those scholars of eminence who unfortunately stayed away. For the absence of these men was painfully evident. There were hardly half-a-dozen present who can fairly be considered as standing in the front rank as philologists. Neither Harvard, Cornell, Michigan, Rochester, nor Washington Universities; neither Bowdoin, Dartmouth, Amherst, Williams, Union, Columbia, nor Princeton Colleges were represented. Had not Yale been alive to the importance of the occasion, and been present in the persons of her most distinguished scholars, it is much to be feared that the convention would have fallen under the management of small men. It could not be otherwise, therefore, than that persons of an inferior grade, whether of ability or reputation, should take a more prominent place in the convention than fairly belonged to them. Prof. Hadley gave the convention nothing at all; Dr. Taylor and Prof. Whitney very little, though that was of the best quality. But it was noticeable that the papers read were largely by persons who are not widely known in the community—it is fair to add that several of these papers won for their authors a reputation as well deserving to be known. Some, however, were of very little merit; most of the members of the association must have rejoiced in that article of the constitution which requires all future papers to be submitted to the Executive Committee. The need of such a provision was only too evident on one evening, when a paper in defence of classical studies wearied the audience for nearly an hour and a half of very rapid reading with its verbosity and fallacies. Indeed, this interminable paper had no business in the convention at all. But some papers of real merit were read—those, for example, which treated of the proper pronunciation of Greek and Latin. And it was well done to advise, as Professor Whitney's committee did, the adoption in our schools of the Continental sounds of the vowels in the pronunciation of both Greek and Latin, and the observance of the written accent in pronouncing Greek. On the whole, a good beginning has been made. An association has been formed, with the most eminent American philologist at its head; and this affords as good an opportunity as our philologists need have for combined action and free interchange of thought. Some important considerations for all interested in the work of the convention we propose to take up very soon, at greater length than is here possible.

—The "First Annual Report of the Trustees of the Peabody Academy of Science," in Salem, Mass., is a pamphlet which relates the nature and circumstances of this important foundation from the beginning, and the steps taken in the past two years to carry out the wishes of the beneficent founder. Passing over the wise arrangements, happily effected, for securing at once the substantial nucleus of a great museum by joining the valuable collections of the East India Marine Society and the Essex Institute, we shall confine ourselves to the Academy's proposed plan of operations. This embraces the following objects: 1st, To give courses of lectures to the Normal School, to teachers, select classes of students, and persons interested in science; to distribute collections, properly labelled and mounted, to schools, as aids in illustrating text-books and lectures; and to provide special students, eager to study science, with the means of doing so without cost of tuition. 2d, To diffuse scientific knowledge by public lectures both within and without the Academy, and by means of catalogues prepared as a sort of text-books for each department of the Museum, and sold at a very low price; to encourage the formation of scientific associations, by giving them collections, etc., towards their outfit; to serve as an inexpensive medium for the supply of investigators, in all parts of the country and in Europe, with the materials for their studies, by purchase or by exchange; and to encourage any county scientific publication that may deserve it. 3d, To inaugurate a systematic survey of the county, and to publish a series of communications on special subjects, carefully assigned to the officers and students of the Academy, under the title of "Annals of the Scientific Survey of Essex County"—a work, says the Council, whose "prospective value may be partially estimated by the fact that comparatively little is known of the natural resources of any county in the State." 4th, To illustrate to the fullest extent in the Museum the natural and physical history of the county, but to make the general collection serve an educational purpose by confining it to "series of typical species," and thus ridding the cases of superfluous specimens, which may as well be stored out of sight. 5th, To establish a scientific library. 6th, To give freely or in exchange to institutions and individuals in the interior "typical collections of native products, especially the marine animals and plants." The attention here bestowed on Essex County is in accordance with Mr. Peabody's design and with the consolidation already referred to. So far from detracting from the usefulness of the Academy, it will probably increase it, by compelling the thorough investigation of a narrow field, and by fostering a scientific spirit in the people of the district that cannot fail to be diffused in time and to be felt all over the country. The Academy should therefore be regarded as truly a national institution as the universities, and the reading of the report will remind liberal givers that Mr. Peabody's bequest, munificent as it was, can be helpfully supplemented by other donations.

— Mr. Francis Peabody, the first named of the Academy's trustees, and who died shortly after accepting the office, was one of the founders, nearly forty years ago, of the Salem Lyceum, to which and to one or two others instituted about the same time the lyceum system of to-day owes its origin. The subjects of the first course are curious reading now: "The Advantages of Knowledge; Authenticity of Ancient Manuscripts; Steam Engine (by Col. Peabody); Physiology; Geology; Optics; Nervous System; Astronomy; A Workingman's Party (by Edward Everett); Public Education, with a sketch of the origin of public schools in Salem; Human Mind; Respiration; Circulation of Blood; Digestion." The fact that this sensible procedure has been pretty much abandoned, induces us to quote here the excellent observations of the Executive Committee in the report just mentioned:

"It may be remarked," say they, "that lectures affording solid instruction, in an agreeable and interesting way, are much needed in this community. The persons who for the most part supply the popular lecture platforms are either professional lecturers, given to sensational, declamatory fine writing, gentlemen of some general reputation obtained in other fields, or the advocates of some particular hobby or reform. Lectures are given and attended, not for instruction and improvement, but to gratify curiosity or to afford amusement and excitement to audiences. The result is that the lecture now seldom instructs. Aiming at other ends, the modest rewards of the scholar and man of science are no longer the measure of payment, and prices have risen to an exorbitant rate. Lecturers swell their incomes by a winter's tour at one or two hundred dollars a night. They are paid as opera-singers are paid. The lecture platform is thus forced to pay a heavy tribute, and in the smaller towns and communities the performance is beyond the reach of the people. It would be idle, even if it were desirable, to attempt a change in this condition of things, or to enter into a crusade against the present system; but it would seem that much might be done in this county by an institution like this, co-operating with local societies, to furnish that which the lyceums no longer supply."

—Our American lecture system being such as it is—namely, a system of bringing the people face to face with men and women whom they are curious to see, and of calling together in a social way communities not sufficiently amused, and hardly knowing how to amuse themselves—it might be supposed that the local committees of young men would be capable of getting their lecturers without advice and assistance from others. It is not as if the business before them were like that which the management of a similar English committee has on its hands—the business of selecting some speaker capable of giving instruction to a comparatively unintelligent audience on some definite and practical topic. The American course, which "judiciously combines instruction with entertainment," is apt to combine its instruction with its entertainment very judiciously indeed, the young people think, and gives a good deal more of Miss Dickinson and Mr. Gough than of Mr. Waterhouse Hawkins. But, nevertheless, the young men's committees away from the great centres find the need of accurate information as to the standing and qualifications of lecturers, both new and old, as to their terms, their addresses, and a dozen such matters, and the American Literary Bureau undertakes to act—gratuitously—as an intermediary between the associations and the lecturers. Of the latter, it now has some seventy on its list. Its founder was, we believe, Mr. J. K. Medbery—a gentleman known to the readers of the North American Review as the writer of a vigorous exposure of the New Jersey Railroad ring. Recently he has received as an associate in the management Mr. S. Humphreys Gurteen, a graduate of Jesus College, Cambridge, whose taste and judgment will, no doubt, be of service to the patrons of the Bureau in the matter of advising as to the choice of lecturers, and more especially in a branch of business which the managers talk of carrying on, and which consists in the examination of manuscripts for the press, the finding of articles for such as need them, and of publishers for such as have articles and other writings to sell. Writers who wish to be informed as to the aims of the Bureau will do well to send for circulars. The one which we have before us gives us, we may remark, no information on two important points—namely, what charges the Bureau makes for giving to authors information as to the details of publishing, and, secondly, whether or not it has ever actually been of service to authors in the disposal of their writings; of our own knowledge, we can tell our readers nothing as to either of these points.

—Better news to the lovers of English literature has not come for many a day than is contained in a circular which we have received from the Rev. Mr. A. B. Grosart, of 15 St. Alban's Place, Blackburn, Lancashire, England, whose address we give in full, that some of the American book-lovers whom he desires to oblige may be able to communicate with him. His circular describes a library of the rarest works of the Elizabethan age, and the age immediately succeeding, which Mr. Grosart, out of love for them and for no remuneration, is reprinting, under the name of the "Fuller Worthies Library," and of which six volumes, at low prices, have already appeared. The prices may indeed be called low. For example: the Bodleian contains a copy, believed unique, of Joseph Fletcher's "Historie of the Perfect-Cursed-Blessed Man. Setting forth Man's Excellency by his Generation; his Miseries by his Degeneration, and his Felicitie by his Regeneration;" and the only sales of it that are noted in the bibliographies put the price at £23 2s., £16, and £15, while the same author's "Christ's Bloodie Sweat" would, if put into the market, bring an equal sum. Mr. Grosart proposes to publish, in a one-volume edition, 106 octavo or large-paper copies of these works, and 156 duodecimo or small-paper copies, and for the prices respectively of 10s. 6d. and 7s. 8d. He has chosen the octavo and quarto sizes for his library as being, on the whole, most convenient, and as being the sizes of the vast majority of the volumes which contain vital literature. To go back a moment to the matter of cost: the smallness of the edition that will be published (always 106 and 156 as above-mentioned), the known destination of each copy, and the fact that the copies will not be issued through the ordinary bookselling channels, will cause the library to increase steadily in price, and the money invested in it will really be money drawing a good rate of interest. The editor remarks of these works of Joseph Fletcher's, that he would not have any one suppose that it is merely because of their antiquarian value that he intends including them in his collection; he rigidly excludes such authors as are not valuable in virtue of their matter, and "Fletcher's Poems" seem to him "marked by striking originality and penetrativeness of thought, vigor and resonance of versification, ingenious and unexpected rhymes, and not a few gleams of 'the faculty divine' that remind us of knowledge of them by Milton and other poets: e. g., Thomas Fuller's puns and playing on words are anticipated." He continues: "Homely but powerful, discursive and yet concentrated, leading the way, yet nevertheless finished and racy English, it seems a pity that these two poems should not have their place in the not over-large collection of English sacred poetry." A judgment to which, not knowing his author, we do not agree and from which we do not dissent, satisfying ourselves by saying that Mr. Grosart writes a sort of English that shows him to be an enthusiastic student in his favorite field; is often happily forcible in phrase—something as "an Elizabethan born out of due season," and when he talks as a critic concerning authors of whom we know something, we find ourselves in agreement with him. The other works in his list are these: "Thomas Fuller's Poems," complete for the first time; Dr. Thomas Washbourne's "Divine Poems," complete; "Giles Fletcher's Poems," complete for the first time; "Phineas Fletcher's Poems," complete for the first time and in 4 volumes; "Joseph Fletcher's Poems," as above-mentioned; "Sir John Davies's Poems," complete for the first time, and, though hitherto sold at fabulous prices, now offered at 25s. for the large-paper, the price having been raised, and at 12s. 8d. for the duodecimo; the "Complete Works of Henry Vaughan, the Silurist," in 2 vols. of verse and 2 vols. of prose; the "Complete Works of Fulke Greville, Lord Brooke," in 3 vols. of verse and 1 vol. of prose; "Sir John Beaumont's Poems," complete; "Selections from the Unpublished Writings of Jonathan Edwards, of America, with facsimiles;" a reprint of the edition of 1692 of Baxter's "Grand Question Resolved—What must we do to be Saved? Instructions for a Holy Life, by the late Reverend Divine, Richard Baxter;" an "Annotated List of the Writings of Richard Baxter;" "Palmer-Bacon: Lord Bacon not the author of 'The Christian Paradoxes,' being a reprint of 'Memorials of Godliness,' by Herbert Palmer, B.D., with introduction, notes, and appendix;" and, finally, "Who Wrote Brittain's Ida?" (generally assigned to Spencer but assigned by Mr. Grosart to Phineas Fletcher), which is a pamphlet, by Mr. Grosart we assume, which may be had for 2s. 6d. We do not make out clearly whether a person is held to be "a subscriber" in case he orders any number of volumes less than all; "non-subscribers" must pay for each volume an additional sum, varying, for the duodecimos, from one shilling more (as is much the most common) to five shillings, as in the case of the first volume of Phineas Fletcher. But any one can get a circular, and can at the same time have this question answered. Crashaw, Cowley, Donne, Marvell, Samuel Speed, Giles Fletcher, sr., will probably follow the poets above-mentioned, and, if all goes well, we shall ultimately get Quarles, Wither, Drayton, Daniel, and others.

—A literary character, very well known—once better known than latterly—Mr. William Jerdan, has just died in London, at the age of eighty-seven years. He was a Scotchman of the middle class; was educated for the law; but, like many a Scot before and since his day, he went up to London to push his fortunes in literature, and at the age of twenty-four became a reporter on the Aurora, which, dying, he transferred himself to the Pilot, and afterwards to other papers. His "Autobiography," published some seventeen years ago, contains a full account of his struggles and labors and of his final success. This work and his "Men I Have Known," published two years ago, are what will keep his name longest alive. Mr. Jerdan, what with his active political life and his literary position as a literary journalist, and his agreeable social qualities, was known to nearly everybody in London, and he had what may be called a peculiarly Scottish weakness—a fondness for collecting and relating personal anecdotes. So his reminiscences are very interesting, and worth the attention of the lovers of informal history. To say nothing of numerous other journals with which he was connected at one time or another—literary journals, political, comic, satirical—he was for thirty-five years an editor and part proprietor of the Literary Gazette, a forerunner—not of their excellence, however—of the Spectator and Saturday Review, or rather of the literary Athenæum, which latter journal it more nearly resembled both in character and calibre. Besides the works already mentioned, Mr. Jerdan was the author of four volumes of the "Memoirs for Fisher's National Portrait Gallery of Eminent Personages of the Nineteenth Century," of the "Paris Spectator," and of a "Voyage to the Isle of Elba"—works pretty much forgotten, and likely to remain so. He edited two of the volumes of the "Camden Society," assisted in founding the Royal Society of Literature, contributed to the Quarterly and the Edinburgh, as well as to countless magazines and annuals. On the whole, he was a very busy man, kind-hearted, and, like most members of the press—at least of the press of the first half of this century, a period when reporters and editors occupied a position not unlike that which actors occupied, and when, being without recognized position, they clung together all the more closely—he never grudged his assistance to others of his profession, but aided many in their struggles for honors and independence. He has a small niche in the back closets of history as being one of those who seized John Bellingham when that unfortunate man had shot Perceval in the lobby of the House of Commons. Mr. Jerdan was pensioned in 1852, and a testimonial was presented to him by many men of eminence in politics and literature, as a public acknowledgment of their recognition of his services to literature, science, and the fine and useful arts.

—Lady Duff Gordon, a versatile, fertile, and entertaining writer, whose later works have made her name widely known in this country as well as in England, has just died of consumption at her place in Egypt, whither, indeed, she had gone to die—or rather to prolong as much as possible a disease which she knew would end in death. She was connected through her mother, Mrs. Austin, with William Taylor of Norwich, whose name is of such frequent recurrence in the literary history of the early part of this century and the latter part of the last, and who is still remembered as the introducer into England of the taste for German literature, and the translator of much German poetry, and also as the open advocate, during Tory supremacy, of liberal principles in government and freer thinking in religion. He was a man of strong and active mind. Lady Gordon's mother, Mrs. Sarah Austin, continued the work begun by William Taylor and Thomas Carlyle, and distinguished herself very much as a translator into idiomatic, flowing English of some important German works. Some of our readers will recollect as hers the English version of the amusing travels of Prince Pückler Muskau—a German nobleman who visited England about forty years ago, and gave his views of society with a frankness that his readers find commendable; and more of our readers may know Mrs. Austin as the translator of the charming "Story Without an End." Lady Gordon's father was the well-known jurist, John Austin.

She married Sir Alexander Duff Gordon. She has followed in her mother's footsteps as a translator, though, perhaps, not with equal success; her mother being acknowledged as on the whole the best of the English translators of the century, if we exclude from consideration some felicitous scraps of work by men like Shelley. Lady Gordon, however, is better known and better liked for her travels, which are always bright and entertaining, and contain on every page proofs of the author's good heart as well as the active and penetrating mind which belonged to her in virtue of her paternal and maternal ancestry. A list of her works includes a translation of Niebuhr's "Greek Legends," which was done while she was still a girl; "The French in Algiers," a translated abridgment of Feuerbach's "Criminal Trials;" translations of Ranke's "History of Prussia" and "Ferdinand and Maximilian;" of Léon de Wailly's "Stella and Vanessa;" of the Countess d'Arbouville's "Village Doctor" and von Moltke's "Russian Campaigns on the Danube" (1829–30). Better than these is the story of "The Amber Witch," which most readers of twenty years ago will remember for the vividness of the strange, pathetic scenes which it describes, and which we suppose must have been a translation, though we are not sure, and have not the book at hand to inform us; and better, too, than these are the "Letters from the Cape" and the "Letters from Egypt," which are wholly original and, as we have said, wholly good. The Egyptians among whom Lady Gordon's lot was cast in her last years looked up to her with great affection and unbounded respect. Doctors of Mohammedan divinity are said to have admitted the likelihood of her being saved at last; the peasantry believed in her as incarnate kindness and justice and knowledge; and the officials stood in awe of her. Her loss will be regretted wherever her books have been read; but among her friends in Egypt the sorrow for her loss will be sincere and deep. She must have been not far from forty years old.

—Excepting the drama of "Sakuntala," no work of the ancient Hindu literature has received as much attention or called forth as much admiration as the Bhagavad-Gita. Scholars especially of a mystico-metaphysical turn of mind have been quite carried away by what seemed to them its profound and subtle speculations, and the high tone of its morality. It is most accessible to English readers in an edition published by Mr. J. C. Thomson about a dozen years ago, with a translation, copious notes, and an elaborate preliminary dissertation—the version of Wilkins, which Mr. George P. Philes was recently at the trouble of reprinting in this country, being quite antiquated and of inferior authority. A Dr. Lorinser, not otherwise known as a Sanscrit scholar, has just put forth a new German translation, of which the two noteworthy features are, that it imitates closely the metrical form of its original, and that its notes and accompanying dissertations attempt to prove the Hindu poet to have borrowed many of his ideas and expressions from Christianity and the New Testament. Such a theory, which would have been met with derision twenty years ago, now demands and will receive at least a respectful hearing, since the belief in the immemorial antiquity and pure originality of the classical Sanskrit literature has been severely shaken by attacks on many sides; and Weber has drawn out with great fulness the special evidences of an importation of Christian ideas into the legends and worship of Krishna—the divinity into whose mouth the exalted teachings of the "Bhagavad-Gita" are put. We have not looked into the details of Dr. Lorinser's proofs closely enough to judge them critically; but we are confident that he has been to some extent at least run away with by his theory. His columns of parallel passages from the Gita and the Testament, given in his appendix, are to us anything but convincing; the coincidences of thought and word are of a kind themselves to need considerable support from without in order to seem otherwise than merely accidental. The new tendency to trace Indian ideas to foreign sources is liable to exaggeration, no doubt; but a considerable infusion of a sceptical and iconoclastic spirit into the treatment of Hindu philosophy will do no harm. We are yet far enough from understanding the history and rightly estimating the merits of that very imposing but somewhat oddly constructed and unstable system. The title of the work is "Die Bhagavad-Gita: übersetzt und erläutert von Dr. F. Lorinser."

WOMAN FROM A CONSERVATIVE STANDPOINT.*

"The Family" is the last of a series of three volumes in which Professor Riehl endeavors to construct a system of social and political science upon the basis of what he calls "The Natural History of the People." Of the first two volumes—which are entitled respectively "Land and People" and "Civil Society"—we shall not here speak, but shall confine ourselves to a discussion of the topics treated in the third volume, which is divided into two books—"Man and Woman," "House and Family." In the heading of the first chapter, Riehl boldly asserts "Social Inequality as a Law of Nature." If human beings were sexless, then we might dream of them as everywhere free and equal; but, by the very act of creating man and woman, God has made inequality and dependence the fundamental conditions of all human development. It is the most daring and defiant thought of modern radicalism to denounce as one of the remaining results of barbarism—as a vestige of the régime of brute force which once ruled the world—this relation of the sexes, which is enjoined by nature, unfolded and enforced by the customs and traditions of ages, and engraved upon the brazen tables of universal legislation.

Some socialistic philosophers (and among them the younger school of Hegelians) lay particular stress upon the theory that, by the fall, Adam first became human, and that, before the commission of sin had awakened him to self-consciousness, he had been little more than a tame brute wandering about in Paradise like a gorilla in a zoölogical garden. By transgression he was humanized, the family was instituted, and organized society and civil government became possible. Riehl regards it as a significant fact that just at this point of transition of animal into man, this "Menschenwerden," out of which all the various forms of social and political life have been developed, woman's subordination was decreed by Jehovah: "Thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee." To the man it was said: "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread." Each decree was alike prophetic and of perpetual validity; each was uttered in the form of a curse—a divine curse, whose secret fruit is blessing. The mystic philosopher, Jacob Boehme, whose sedentary life as a shoemaker seems to have given a peculiar original stimulus to his reflective faculties, puts a new and profound meaning, says Riehl, into the Hebrew myth when he affirms that our first progenitor, Adam, was both "man and woman, and yet neither man nor woman." Plato expresses a similar thought. According to Riehl, this notion is not a mere empty fancy, but rather the legendary reflection of a great historical fact, namely, "the obscuration of the antithesis of sex among all primitive peoples." The old tales about Amazons symbolize the same thing; and in Dahomey we find in reality such a state of society, where one-half of the army consists of women who are not permitted to marry. In these and many other facts of a like kind, our author discovers a general law of the differentiation of sex as a result of culture, or, to use his own language, "die Scheidung der Geschlechter im Processe des Culturlebens." This is observable in works of art. The experience of every one, in looking for the first time at portraits of women famous for their beauty several centuries ago, is a feeling of surprise at the bold, strongly-defined lineaments and features, which seem too hard and masculine for our ideal of female beauty. The portraits of Mary Stuart, the fair Queen of Scots, always produce this effect upon the eye of the nineteenth century, and he who expects that her face will impress him as it did her contemporaries will be inevitably disappointed. The same is true of the heads of angels and saints in mediæval paintings and the Madonnas of Van Eyck and Hemmling. The Holy Virgin appears to be at least thirty-five or forty years of age, and even the child on her lap has a very mature look. Although this result may be due in part to the antiquated stiffness of the costume, yet, as regards the lines of the face, the artist followed nature; but since then nature has changed. The delicate maiden had, three centuries ago, a more masculine physiognomy than now; and in the lowest classes of society this characteristic is still preserved. The face of a peasant woman is hardly distinguishable from that of a peasant man; and this resemblance increases with age, until, in threescore years, they become as like as two eggs. There is also a striking similarity in height. The short, slender woman by the side of the tall, large-boned man is a product of progressive and hereditary culture, and is very rarely found among the inferior classes of the people. In ruder stages of semi-civilization, this was true likewise of the highest circles of life. We see a recognition of this fact in Schnorr's or Kaulbach's illustrations of the Nibelungen, where Kriemhild and Brunhild are almost equal in heroic stature and stateliness to Siegfried and Hagen; and at the present day, among the peasantry of the North German Marches, grenadier-like women, as tall and strong as the men, are the general rule; whereas, in our cities, they would be looked upon as very conspicuous exceptions. The same gradual differentiation of the sexes as the result of culture is manifest in the tone or timbre of the voice, which among rude tribes or uncultivated classes of society is nearly of a uniform quality, and almost on the same key. The man's voice is a tenor and the woman's an alto; but, with the progress of civilization, the former sinks into a deep base and the latter rises into a soprano. These changes of timbre of the voice have revolutionized music, broken up its original monotony, increased its heterogeneity, evolved complex harmony out of simple melody, developed the chant into the oratorio, the recitative of the ballad into the fugue of the serenata, the solo into the symphony, and rendered the grand opera, with its wealth of vocal and orchestral combinations, possible. It is a significant fact that European theatres are obliged to depend upon Hungary, Galicia, and other borderlands of civilization for their high, clear tenors; and our modern culture has so effectually eradicated the deep contralto voice of the woman that musical composers have almost ceased to write for it. This divergence of the sexes is seen also in their respective costumes. The dress of the peasant and that of his wife are scarcely distinguishable in cut or color, whatever name may be applied to it—blouse, kirtle, tunic, or petticoat—it is essentially the same garb. The Tyrolese woman is an unconscious bloomer, with man's hat, short skirt, and high lace-boots. With the increase of culture and refinement, each sex assumes a more and more distinctive costume, until it is difficult to conceive a more striking contrast than that which now exists between a gentlemen's scanty dress-coat and tight pantaloons and the long, full, trailing robes of a fashionable lady. This antithesis extends also to color; the woman decks herself in all the tints and hues of the rainbow, while the man has become sober, subdued, dark, or at least monochromatic in his raiment.

* "Die Familie. Von W. H. Riehl." Stuttgart: J. G. Cotta'scher Verlag. Pp. 292.

Among the poorer peasantry there is no strict division of labor according to sex. Man and woman do precisely the same things. Indeed, so perfect is the identity of their occupations that it often seems to us an absurd exchange of work. The man frequently boils the porridge for dinner whilst the woman is chopping wood or working in the garden; and it is by no means uncommon to see a shepherd knitting stockings as he watches his flock whilst his wife is reaping grain or following the plow. What each one shall do at a given moment is determined by accident rather than by any sense of the fitness of the occupation for the person, such as governs the assignment of employments in the higher ranks of life. It is curious to observe how the highest idealism of Plato's state coincides with this crude realism of peasant life; for in the Republic the women have no peculiarly feminine kinds of labor, but perform the same work as men, even to becoming soldiers. In the latter case, however, the Greek philosopher, having no great confidence in their valor, recommends that these Amazonian forces should be kept in the rear as a reserve—or, rather, as an arrière-garde—which might at least serve to terrify the enemy by their numbers. As a result of this homogeneity of character and of occupations, the domestic life of the peasant is exceedingly monotonous; his conjugal love has its source in convenience, or at most in mere friendship; there is not the slightest touch of the chivalry of minne-service in it; the imagination of the novelist may clothe it with idyllic colors, but the peasant himself has no consciousness of this poetic side of his existence. The only pastoral aroma which he appreciates is that which arises from the neat dung-heap at his front door.

Such are a few of the facts from which Professor Riehl attempts to build an argument against the modern theory of woman's rights. The inevitable tendency of civilization is to separate the sexes, and to cause man and woman to diverge as they develop their inborn peculiarities. Here, as everywhere, the law of evolution is from homogeneity to heterogeneity. Not only physiology and physiognomy, but also pathology, furnish illustrations of this principle. The morbid idiosyncrasies of women, the large group of diseases scientifically classified as "female," scarcely exist in rude states of society or among the lower classes of the people. It must be remembered, however, that by the term "lower classes of the people" is meant not the poor and ignorant proletariat of our large cities, but classes which are hereditarily "low," like the peasantry of Europe, and which in this country can have no existence. Looking at the subject from the high standpoint of history, our author comes to the conclusion that the effort to reform society, so far as it affects the social, political, and industrial position of woman, indicates not an advance towards a more perfect civilization, but a relapse into barbarism. His argument is original and ingenious, and rests upon a very wide range of observation and study; but at the same time his reasoning is illogical and his inferences incorrect. His chief fallacy consists in a misconception of the real aims of those who plead for woman's rights. His statement of the tendency of culture to develop the antithesis of sex, and to strengthen the masculine qualities in man and the feminine qualities in woman, is unquestionably true. Yet the corollary to this proposition is not that the existence of woman should be merged entirely in that of man (which is in law equivalent to annihilation), but that, on the contrary, she should have a fuller and freer individual life; an opportunity to work according to the measure of her faculties, not in subjection as the serf of another, but in independence as an intelligent personality. The soundest portions of Professor Riehl's book are those chapters in which he emphasizes the fact of sex and the influence which this fact exerts as an irrepressible force in human society. Book II., which is entitled "House and Family," we have not space to discuss here. It consists of six chapters: "The Idea of the Family," "The Whole House," "The Family and Domestic Architecture," "Renunciation and Recognition of the House," "The Family and the Social Circle," and "The Reconstruction of the House." They are all full of suggestive thought and contain much information as regards German life, which could hardly fail to interest even those who have no sympathy with the deeply dyed conservatism of the author. An English translation of this volume, with annotations by a competent person, would be a welcome aid to those who are sincerely endeavoring to solve one of the knottiest problems of the day.

PROFESSOR JOEL PARKER ON POLITICS.*

THE political pamphlet, as a means of instructing and directing public opinion, has long been in common use in England, but has never been completely naturalized in the United States. It might be well for us if to the newspapers and the speeches of Senators and Representatives in Congress could be more frequently added the careful and thorough discussions of public questions by men who have made law and politics a scientific study rather than a trade or profession, who have been the calm observers of political contests rather than active combatants in party strifes. Still, it cannot be hoped that, in the hurry of American life, such essays will make any deep, direct impression upon the common thought and opinion. The day has passed in which the letters of a Hamilton and a Madison could change the destinies of the nation.

The pamphlet before us belongs to the general class we have mentioned, and the reputation of its author as a jurist will secure for it a somewhat careful examination. Professor Parker was for many years, during the ascendancy of the Democratic party in New Hampshire, Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court of that State. He was subsequently transferred to a chair in the Harvard Law School, which he continued to occupy until some time in the year 1868. After his resignation, he was appointed to deliver lectures upon constitutional law and civil polity in Dartmouth College. Three lectures, originally given in the Law School, and repeated during the present year in Dartmouth, Professor Parker has now submitted to the wider audience which is reached by the press. They treat of questions which lie at the bottom of our whole political system; which are involved in the very theory of our government; and whose correct solution is perhaps even more necessary at the present time than ever before in American history. They are respectively entitled "The Three Powers of Government," "The Origin of the United States, and the Status of the Southern States on the Suppression of the Rebellion," and "Three Dangers of the Republic."

The first lecture is devoted to a discussion of the proposition that, in order to the security of civil and political liberty, every government must be divided into three co-ordinate and independent departments, with a separate and distinct class of functions assigned to each, so that each may become a check upon the unlawful designs and aggressions of the others. This proposition may well be considered a truism by American political writers, and we cannot discover that Professor Parker has thrown any new light upon it, has based it upon any surer foundation of à priori reasoning or of experience, or has made its importance to appear any more clear and certain. It was well to insist upon it while lecturing to the young men beginning their studies, but the book would have been better without it. Professor Parker sets out with the statement that "systems of government are of three sorts—monarchical, the government of one; oligarchical, that of a few; democratic, that of the whole." We may remark in passing that this is neither an exhaustive nor an accurate method of describing governments according to their outward form. All the sovereignty of a nation does in truth reside in that aggregate which we call the people, and every government is merely their creature and instrument, and ultimately derives all power as a trust from them; yet, when we examine the actual governments which now exist, we shall find no such thing as a democracy in the sense given by Professor Parker. There is no instance in which the administration of all public affairs is committed to "the whole." There are, perhaps, a very few civilized nations in which a monarch holds and wields all political functions; but in the vast majority of actual cases the government is in the hands of a few, or, as we should prefer to say, of a part. If such governments be oligarchies, then the United States and Great Britain are oligarchies, as well as France, Austria, and Prussia. Austin very properly calls such forms aristocracies, and separates them, by a line of division impossible to be drawn with any exactness, into oligarchies, where the power is lodged in the hands of a very few, and democracies, in which it is confided to a large number of that entire aggregate called the people. By this classification the United States and Great Britain would fall into the rank of democracies, although in neither country is there anything like a government "of the whole."

* "Three Lectures delivered in the Law School of Harvard College and in Dartmouth College. By Joel Parker." New York: Hurd & Houghton. 1869.

Professor Parker next proceeds to elaborate the proposition that each of the three kinds of government may be despotic. This is certainly true. The forma imperii, as the German writers say, has absolutely nothing whatever to do with the forma regiminis. An uncontrolled few may as easily wield their power without rule and limit as an uncontrolled monarch or an uncontrolled "whole." Indeed, a pure democracy, or government of the whole (if there were any such thing), would of very necessity be a despotism, because the self-same body which possesses the administrative function would also hold the ultimate sovereignty. In order to preserve civil and political liberty, there must be some constitution emanating from the sovereign whole, which shall be a check upon the actual rulers, and which may be written, promulgated by a conscious act of the sovereign body, or may be historical and traditional. Professor Parker finds this check, as our fathers found it, in a scheme which separates the executive, the legislative, and the judicial departments, makes them free as well as co-ordinate, and allots to each a distinct class of functions. So far, we must entirely agree with his positions. But it is to be remarked that the United States is the only nation in which such a complete freedom, as well as separation, has ever been attempted or even suggested, and this is the radical idea of our whole system which distinguishes it from that of European countries. The separation into executive, legislative, and judicial is common enough; it is the freedom of each to act within its own sphere which is peculiar to ourselves. There is no such thing in England as an independent judiciary considered as a co-ordinate and free branch of the government—in the American acceptation of the term—for the simple reason that it is impossible for the class of questions which we call constitutional to arise and come before the British courts, while it is the very power of our own tribunals to entertain and decide such questions which makes them an independent and co-ordinate department in the political system. Nor is there any longer a free executive in Great Britain. Of course, whatever of executive power exists is entrusted in fact to the ministers of the crown and not to the crown itself. For a long time these ministers were in theory, and to a considerable extent in practice, independent of the Parliament in respect of those powers which are administrative rather than legislative, and they also assumed to lead the two Houses in all important matters of legislation. But this time has passed away. The ministers are now only the servants of Parliament, directly carrying out its will in the executive as well as in the legislative department. Recent events have shown that the House of Commons has drawn to itself all political power, and now wields, without any effective organic and constitutional restraint, the function of administering as well as of making the laws. Great Britain has become a nation practically governed by a single representative body, whose majority possesses absolute authority, and is held in check by sentiments only, and not by institutions.

The lecture concludes by a reference to recent facts which indicate a partial abandonment of the radical idea of our own national Constitution. Among these are mentioned certain unauthorized acts of the President during the war, and especially the emancipation proclamation—"that great humbug"—the proclamation of martial law, the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, and the arrest, detention, and trial of civilians by military officers and tribunals. Since the war, Congress has striven to override and destroy the independence of the President, of the Judiciary, and of the States. This is shown by its denial of representation to the revolted States at the return of peace, by its whole course of legislation in respect to reconstruction and in respect to the Executive, and by the limitations which it has placed upon the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. We shall not follow Professor Parker through this portion of the lecture. Dissenting from many of his conclusions, with some of them we heartily agree. But we must say that throughout the whole discussion he exhibits an acrimony of manner and spirit which is more naturally expected of the partisan newspaper than of a learned lecturer to students of jurisprudence.

The second lecture opens with the statement that "there are two theories in relation to the Constitution of the United States which not only differ widely in reference to its origin and the powers which exist under it, but which may lead to very different results in regard to its amendment." These are said to be: (1) That the States were originally sovereign and independent; that they formed the Constitution by surrendering a portion of their powers to the General Government, and thus created a nation and a people by this act of union; and that separate States are therefore necessary, not only to the orderly working, but even to the very existence of the Constitution, the Government, and the nation. (2) That the nation and the sovereign people thereof were called into being by the Declaration of Independence, existed as such prior to the Constitution, adopted that fundamental act as the expression of their supreme will, and delegated some powers to the General Government and others to the separate States. The lecturer has here quietly ignored the doctrines of Calhoun and his school of extremists, who deny that there is now, or ever has been, any nation, and assert that the United States is merely a league of sovereign and independent commonwealths. Professor Parker maintains the first theory with much earnestness and no little dogmatism, and evidently supposes that the second has no basis of fact or of reasoning on which to rest. He occupies the exact ground which has long been held by the Democratic party, and upon which Mr. Alexander H. Stephens has lately placed himself. We do not intend to examine the professor's argument. It is enough to say that the question whether the several States or the one people were the original sovereigns is one of fact, not depending upon what has been said, but upon what has been done. That a nation—a people—exists is a historic truth, not a logical conclusion. We may enquire in passing, however, if Professor Parker can tell us when the States formed out of the cessions from France and Spain and the conquests from Mexico became sovereign. This territory never belonged to the other commonwealths individually. It was bought or conquered, and governed by the United States, and the States themselves became such only by an act of Congress. The same is virtually true of all the other commonwealths, except the original thirteen colonies which unitedly revolted. But in maintaining his dogmas, the professor is forced to some conclusions which, we should suppose, must have given his logical mind a good deal of a strain. Thus, when he finds in the preamble the statement that "We, the people of the United States, do ordain and establish this Constitution," which to the common mind would imply the existence of that people, he is driven, by a course of reasoning which is, in the true sense of the term, absurd, to the self-contradictory result that this people, represented as ordaining the Constitution, were in fact called into being by, and at the same moment as, the instrument itself; in other words, the creators were themselves created by and with their creation. Some of the fables of Hindu mythology go as far as this, but surely nothing else does.

We will not stop to comment upon the propositions which Prof. Parker lays down in regard to the status of the revolted States after the close of the war. They are the legitimate deductions from the premises assumed, and they necessarily lead to an establishment of the right of secession and to a destruction of the very idea of nationality. They are one and the same with the teachings which for a generation had been given in Southern colleges to Southern young men, and which did so much to make rebellion possible. It is much to be hoped that the students of no leading Northern institution will become indoctrinated with such exploded heresies.

In the third lecture, our attention is called to three dangers which menace the Republic. These are said to be an undue extension of territory, an undue extension of the right of suffrage, and an undue desire for office. Of the first and third we shall say nothing. Under the second, the notion that the suffrage is a manhood right is vehemently assailed. But the discussion is chiefly directed to the questions of negro and of female suffrage. In regard to the former, we must say that the professor does not object to the electoral capacity being conferred upon negroes as such, but to its being granted to so many ignorant negroes. In regard to the latter, the objections appear to be that God never designed women to vote, because Hagar did not vote against Abraham's putting her out of his house or tent, and because we are not told that the Queen of Sheba, or any of the New Testament women, voted. We are then referred to many instances of women distinguished in history who did not vote, among whom are mentioned Zenobia and the wives of the Pilgrim Fathers. It is also urged, not in a single jocular remark, but through several pages of argument, that women should not be permitted to vote because in such case none but young and handsome men would stand any chance of election to office.

But we have a graver fault to find with this lecture It cannot be said to contain a sentence of reasoning; it is simply a mass of vituperations and personal attacks upon what are called the "leaders of the dominant party." Bad motives are imputed with the same freedom as by the most unscrupulous partisan editor. Republicans are said to advocate negro suffrage only to maintain themselves in power; the Southern States are reconstructed solely for the benefit of party; offices are sought and held only in the hope of plunder. These and similar charges are repeated ad nauseam. We are willing and anxious that professors of law and civil polity, when before their classes, should handle the important subjects of the day with perfect freedom, and not shun them because they involve the measures of opposing parties; but we cannot say less than that this lecture transcends the limits of decency, and degrades the professorial chair almost to the level of the Southwestern Democratic stump—an institution which one would not expect to find established at a college which claims Webster and Choate and Chase.

NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW FOR JULY.

THE two things that most strike a thoughtful American in England—that force themselves on his attention while he is dutifully on his way to the Abbey which he has crossed the ocean to see, or while he is enthusiastically making his pilgrimage to Oxford or Stratford—are the dreadful squalor of the lowest class of Englishmen, and what seems like the indifference of the rich and ruling classes to the hopeless degradation and wretchedness of so many millions of their fellow-beings. Cases like that of the miserable man and woman—though they were respectable, intelligent, and to some extent educated—who, the other day, in London, poisoned their two sleeping children and then themselves, in utter despair of finding work and wages, attract always a good deal of pitying and enquiring attention, and regularly cause the newspapers to point out that the suffering must be great from which such relief is sought. But, on the other hand, how likely such comments are to dispel the general carelessness may be partly guessed from the laughter and contempt which greeted Mr. Gladstone's recent question whether people like the couple just mentioned, and people of the classes just above them, were not "our own flesh and blood"—laughter not wholly caused by Mr. Gladstone's use of a sentimental argument or transgression of the House's standard of taste.

That the subject demands the gravest consideration Mr. Norton's careful article in this last number of the North American makes very evident. Of the twenty million inhabitants of England and Wales, nine millions are in the receipt of an average yearly income of £35, which is a little less than two shillings a day; or, if we count one other person as dependant on each of these persons with a two-shilling daily income, we have eighteen millions out of the twenty millions of English and Welsh living on a shilling a day. The disproportion between the incomes of the rich and the poor is as striking as the immense disparity in the numbers of the two classes. Eighteen millions live on a shilling a day, while the class who (with their dependants) possess yearly incomes of more than £300 have for their support £633 a piece, or about thirty-five shillings daily, and number only 400,000. What this means when taken out of abstract figures and put into facts, no one can realize who has not seen it. "Constantly increasing rates," says Mr. Goschen; "constantly increasing pauperism; millions of money spent, yet without satisfaction; and, infinitely worse, millions of human beings whose very name implies a degradation in their own eyes." Take the case of the farm-laborer in Herefordshire. There, says one writer, his "ordinary wages are nine shillings a week; his ordinary home is two small rooms, through the thatched roof of which the rain drops on to a floor half mud and half broken stones; his daily food dry bread and rough cider; his normal condition one of ignorance and squalor." Things can hardly be much better off in Cornwall, Devon, Somerset, and Dorset, where the weekly wages is ten shillings and sixpence. The laborer's cottage is described by one observer as "miserable," by a second as "deplorable," by a third as "detestable," by a fourth as "a disgrace to a Christian community." "Modesty," says another, "must be an unknown virtue, decency an unimaginable thing, where, in one small chamber, with the beds lying as thickly as they can be packed, father, mother, young men, lads, grown and growing-up girls—two and sometimes three generations—are herded promiscuously; . . . where the whole air is sensual, and human nature is degraded into something below the level of the swine." Unchastity is perfectly common, and "incest anything but uncommon." "Very few laborers over forty," says Mr. Mechi, "can read and write;" and Mr. Edward Stanhope reports that the object of the farmers is "to keep the school down; their view is that more than a little education is very much too much; they are afraid the laborer will be spoiled for field-work"—a suggestion that marshals the friends of England the way they should be going: to spoil the laborer for the life of field-work which we have just been looking at is what no politico-economical considerations ought to prevent them from striving to do. The town laborer is not much better off, though somewhat better off he undoubtedly is. Let any educated person, says Mr. John Simon, medical officer of the Privy Council—any person who knows the conditions under which alone animal life can thrive—"learn by personal inspection how far these conditions are realized by the masses of our population, and form for himself a conscientious judgment as to the need for great, if not almost revolutionary, reforms. Let any such person devote an hour to visiting some very poor region of the metropolis, or in almost any of our large towns. Let him breathe its air, taste its water, eat its bread; let him fancy what it would be to himself to live there in that beastly degradation of stink, fed with such bread, drinking such water." And the worst of it is, that this state of things does not diminish in spite of the well-judged and ill-judged attempts at diminishing it, but increases; and that the "dangerous classes," and the pauper and ignorant classes—dangerous enough, too—increase in an accelerated ratio from year to year. Mr. Goschen says that in the two years from 1866 to 1868 there was an addition of twenty per cent. to the army of metropolitan paupers.

Yet in spite of such facts some things that Mr. Norton relates would give one some courage to hope that the great body of the English people are not becoming imbruted, if it were not that the exceptional cases are those of people who showed a heroism in resisting their outward circumstances which of itself would assure us how idle it is to expect for them many imitators. We hear of one woman whose husband was a shepherd earning ten shillings a week, "besides what he got at lambing time." Upon this sum (out of which they paid sixty-three shillings annual house-rent), the pair brought up a family of eight girls and six boys, never had a penny from the parish, and never let their girls go out into the field to become demoralized. The girls even learned to read and write, but the boys are less educated, as three of them began to go out to work at six years of age, and one has on this account never been able to learn his letters. The woman remembered the time when her husband's wages being ten shillings a week, and she having nine children to feed, fourteen pounds of flour cost three-and-sixpence—a time that was probably before the repeal of the corn-laws, the repeal of which, sure enough, is no wonder. And as that was done at last, so perhaps there may be something done now to remove the burden which is weighing England down and making her great cities a defilement of civilization. It must be nearly time; already it is found that a Scotchman in the field can do the work of two English laborers, and English artisanship is behind that of the Continent in very many branches in which formerly it was unrivalled; the men are deteriorating in body and in mind. But it is Englishmen who are loudest in their outcries against the present order of things, and the day is not come yet for any one to fear that England will not somehow contrive to do her duty. But the task is immense; and if it were not for the outlet afforded by emigration—an outlet more used each year—one might be compelled to think of the "almost revolutionary reforms" of which Mr. Simon speaks. At all events, it seems as if there must be some revolutionizing of British notions of the office of the state and of British unwillingness to permit its larger activity, unless we are to see the state quiescent till the weight of misery which it controls shall subvert it.

Mr. Charles Francis Adams, junior, makes an article, entitled "A Chapter on Erie," which is certainly admirably well done. It must have been a work of great labor to track the courses of the Drews, Vanderbilts, Fisks, Barnards, Cookes, Mattoons, Cardozos, and the rest of the men who have let us see so plainly that neither Wall Street, the New York bench, nor the Albany Legislature had previously taught us all they had to teach of the most audacious and shameless disregard of honesty and honor. If we were going to find any fault with Mr. Adams's essay, it would be that perhaps the reader unlearned in law, and in the manipulations of stock operations, will not fully understand much more than that the various parties to the contest were all a set of rascals together. To protect the community against the thieving and other villany of these men, it will be necessary that something more definite than this charge against them be impressed on the minds of the people at large, and the narrative cannot be made too clear. School-girls ought to be made to see just how every man who put his money into Erie stock has had a certain number of dollars stolen from him by certain men, church-members and others, in Wall Street; and how certain judges, who claim for themselves and families the civil regard of their fellow-citizens, have been bought and sold, and have even been privy to the hiring of kidnappers and possible assassins. But the story, as it stands, will well repay a little study. And to the reader who comes to its perusal not wholly unprepared, it will be as interesting as a novel, in virtue of its story, and very agreeable for its style—a style relieved by a prevailing tone of sarcasm and satirical contempt, which gratify the reader much as an honest expression of public opinion in regard to Mr. Adams's quarry would gratify him, that is, which seems to put the men in their proper place, and thus relieves the mind from the indignation with which it sees the wicked flourishing, and the mean in high places, and the decent man beguiled of his stock. Governor Claflin—in spite of the fact that some practical politicians in Cambridge speak of Mr. Adams as a young man who has lately been writing in the North American Review about railroads—has certainly done well to make him one of the State Commissioners to examine into the management of Massachusetts railroads. They are like other railroads in other States, and will bear a certain amount of watching very well, and "practical railroad men," while they are very good at watching, are not always so good at telling what they see; they have defects of style; but a clear style is an important qualification in a commissioner who is to enlighten the people at large. Why will not some of the publishers get out a cheap pamphlet edition of the essay? To do so would be to deserve well of the Republic, and, we should think, to put money in the publisher's purse.

Mr. John Fiske, in his "Laws of History," is very efficacious in his handling of Professor Draper, who, however, may hardly require quite so much labor; his views do not now meet with wide acceptance; we had supposed it was only the Roman Catholic reviewers who now brought him out for formal attack. For the rest, Mr. Fiske's essay explicates very well the law of progress in history, and also applies Mr. Herbert Spencer's (heterogeneity and homogeneity) law of organic life to historical phenomena—an application which seems to us decidedly rather of speculative than of practical importance. Professor Allen's article on "The Religion of Ancient Greece" leaves off at the point where the general reader begins to be most interested, but to scholars it will be welcome as giving—not without additional critical remarks of value—the latest and best views in regard to the Greek mythology, in its mythic stage, comparatively considered. Professor J. D. Whitney on Volcanoes, and Dr. Isaac Ray on Hereditary Insanity, are both authorities, and so we may consider Mr. Karl Blind on the politics of "Hungary and Roumania," of which he seems to take a judicious view, favoring the Austro-Hungarian monarchy, and deprecating Roumanian independence as sure to end in the Russification of the Principalities and Turkey.

We hope Mr. J. M. Merrick, jr., is not too hopeful in his anticipations of what is going to happen to us in the way of wine-making and salvation from whiskey as a national beverage. He expresses the opinion—and not sarcastically, but with real enthusiasm—that before the next decade is over we shall see "American wines ranked as their merits deserve." The unmixed juice of the Delaware grape already, he says, yields "a wine of which any vigneron or any country may well be proud;" the little wine that has been made from the Iona grape has astonished everybody, and gives a wine which "will enable us to rival in this country the very choicest and most famous vineyards of the Rhine;" "one of Mr. Bull's seedlings produces a very fine port wine;" "the Rogers Hybrid No. 1 is said to make a fine sparkling wine;" and the Hermon grape of Missouri "gives, it is said, a genuine Madeira wine." Mr. Merrick seems very sure of living to see the grape culture and the wine-making interest of the country equal in value the cotton crop or the hay crop, and he quotes from Mr. Bull, of Concord, one new, ingenious, and forcible reason why we all may join in his wish: It is a crying evil that the young men abandon the country and betake themselves to the city, because the farm-work is odious, and moreover is unprofitable, so that the farmer lives close to the limit of his means, and has no money to expend on self-culture or to make his home attractive to his boys and girls. Now, says Mr. Bull, the culture of the vine is easy, and the making of wine a very interesting and light form of highly skilled labor; the harvest is delightful, a holiday in fact, and the profits are considerable. Under Mr. Bull's own encouragement, a good many of the farmers in his neighborhood have added considerably to their incomes by grape-raising, and in this same way, as he believes, a vast number of the farming class might be raised from the condition of being slaves to the soil up to independence and competence, and he adds, "I confess, gentlemen, that this aspect of the case gives me more pleasure than any other"—as well it may. Perhaps, too—who knows?—the decay of Mr. Bull's native New England, and the loss that all the world would suffer in losing the New England mind, or a great part of it, might be averted or long delayed if a good article of cheap red wine were added to the native diet. The boy may now be born who shall live to see coffee, and pie, and rum, and the various sorts of medicinal "bitters," all discarded from the New England table, and to see ruddy faces and contented countenances and a cheerful theology and sound digestions as common in Massachusetts as in Gascony itself, or in Normandy, where man, woman, and child drink cider and milk at every meal.

The critical notices are few but able, with the exception of one or two.

History of the Town of Lexington, Middlesex County, Massachusetts, from its first settlement to 1868, with a genealogical register of Lexington families. By Charles Hudson. (Boston: Wiggin & Lunt.)—There are not a few superfluous pages in this on the whole interesting and well-constructed work. We do not mean that the chapters which trace the origin and progress of the Revolution, both before and after Lexington's famous participation in it, should have been omitted. They might have been greatly condensed, however; and if the first thirty-two pages of the book were dropped altogether, the true beginning of it would be found in the right place. His readers can discover betimes and skip Mr. Hudson's pardonable commonplaces and patriotic outpourings, and will not find it too hard to forgive him for them; but they may not all be able to detect the inexact and erroneous generalizations in which he frequently indulges, of course with the worst possible waste of space. We have in mind particularly his notions of the purposes of the Puritan fathers, and his apology for them, where we might have expected more clearness and correct information in a member of the Massachusetts Historical Society; and also his statement, "on a broader scale," of "the causes which led to the Revolution." The chapter devoted to the latter deals exclusively with the question of the right of taxation, and leaves out of sight the numerous enactments, long previous to the Stamp Act, by which the industry and commerce of the colonies were hampered and repressed in the most outrageous manner. "We have seen," says Mr. Hudson, a little later, "that the controversy originated in the question of taxation;" which, if true, would make the Revolution a sudden outbreak, instead of a growth, and a contest for abstract right instead of resistance to the most concrete and material grievances. This, to be sure, is the popular and traditional way of looking at it, and so is the view that "though our high-minded and patriotic [Revolutionary] statesmen, North and South, regarded the institution [of slavery] as corrupt and degrading to our national character, they fondly believed that the odious system would soon cease in the Republic." And, finally, granting that "slavery in Massachusetts was never hereditary by law," can any one assert that "there never was a time when our courts would not have given freedom to the children of slaves?" At least, there is no proving such a proposition.

We have touched first on Mr. Hudson's weak points, and the parts of his history which do not immediately relate to Lexington. When able to put his own hand upon documents, we have found him what we may call a pleasant and judicious, if hardly graphic, chronicler, and trusty enough. His chief business with the town, as he confesses, is to describe the battle of Lexington—a twenty-minute skirmish on the town common—and the retreat of the British from Concord; and to give biographies of the two eminent divines whose combined ministry lasted from 1698 to 1805. All this is carefully done. The Rev. John Hancock and his kinsman, the Rev. Jonas Clarke, were men and clergymen of uncommon force of character—the latter illustrating, by the lead he took in public affairs, the view which Locke held of true politics as a part of moral philosophy, and therefore within the natural province of the pulpit. He wrote the town's Revolutionary manifestoes, and they are fine specimens of that sort of documents. Both these clergymen were Calvinistic in their theology, and yet not only is the First Parish of to-day Unitarian, but "the Calvinistic Congregationalists have no organization in Lexington." It would be interesting to learn how this change of faith was brought about under the successors of Hancock and Clarke—who, says Mr. Hudson, were mild and liberal in doctrine—and Mr. Hudson should have told us. Lexington owed much, and in many ways, to the neighboring university, and its Calvinism was perhaps tempered from the first by Harvard College; but we infer that Mr. Clarke's successor, the Rev. Avery Williams, at whose ordination the Rev. Dr. Kendal assisted, was the middle term between the old faith and the new; and yet he was a graduate of Princeton. The Unitarians, indeed, have the strongest associations with the Lexington of the present century. There preached, at various times, Follen, Emerson, May, and Staples; and there was born, grandson of the Captain John Parker who led the minutemen at Lexington, the Rev. Theodore Parker, in whose study visitors used to see the musket carried by his ancestor on the memorable April day, and now preserved in the Senate Chamber of Massachusetts.

The military history of Lexington in the French wars, the Revolution, and the late rebellion, puts the patriotism and courage of its inhabitants in high relief. They have shown a just pride in the opening conflict of the Revolution, and we only hope they will not be persuaded to substitute a pretentious and probably badly designed monument for the plain and sufficient shaft that now tells the story of duty unadorned. And, by the way, in spite of the rivalry for glory between Concord and Lexington, Mr. Hudson, in giving a long extract from the late Mr. Everett in commemoration of the battle, might have admitted Emerson's beautiful ode, beginning

> "By the rude bridge that arched the flood,
> Their flag to April's breeze unfurled,
> Here once the embattled farmers stood
> And fired the shot heard round the world."

In celebrating the whole day, these verses deserved a place corresponding to Lincoln's masterpiece at Gettysburg. In its educational provisions, the town has served as an example to others, and was the scene of the experiment of the first Normal School. In its ecclesiastical experience, it suffered no disturbance by reason of the Dedham decision of 1820, as the Unitarians had possession both of the town and of the parish; but the division of the ministerial fund gave rise to a controversy which caused no little unpleasantness in the community.

Mr. Hudson has taken great pains with his very full and orderly Genealogy, in which, besides names already mentioned, will be found the pedigrees of the Hoars and Lawrences, and other families of local or national renown. That mistakes occur in these records is to be expected, of course. The labor involved in preparing them is enormous, the materials unequally accessible, and while the chances of original error are almost infinite, the printing adds still others. It is not in a spirit of hypercriticism that we venture to point to an obvious contradiction in dates occurring on opposite pages, but referring to the same event: Did John Parker marry Hannah Stearns Feb. 17, 1785 (p. 172), or Feb. 7, 1784 (p. 173)? That the latter date is probably the true one is shown by the date of the birth of their first child.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Bache (Mrs. A.), Legends of Fairy Land	(Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger)	$0 75
Bright (Mrs. A. M.), The Three Bernices	(Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger)	1 75
Bloor (A. J.), The Architectural and Other Societies of Europe, swd	(New York)
Fairchild (Prof. J. H.), Moral Philosophy	(Sheldon & Co.)
Hale (Rev. E. E.), The Ingham Papers	(Fields, Osgood & Co.)	1 50
Hittell (J. S.), The Resources of California, 5th ed	(A. Roman & Co.)	1 50
Holland (C.), Aspasia: a Tale	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)	1 25
Keam (P.) and Mickleborough (J.), Handbook of Map-Drawing	(E. H. Butler & Co.)
Kingsley (H.), Hetty: a Tale, swd	(Harper & Bros.)	0 25
Marck (Prof. F. A.), Parser and Analyzer	(Harper & Bros.)	0 40
Reade (C.), Love me Little, Love me Long, swd	(Harper & Bros.)	0 35
Ruskin (J.), The Queen of the Air	(John Wiley & Son)	1 00
Sands (N.), The Philosophy of Teaching	(Harper & Bros.)
Sea-Drift: a Child's Story	(Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger)	0 90
The Holbein Society's Fac-Simile Reprints.—Vol. I., The Dance of Death	(Trübner & Co.)
Warner (Miss S.), Daisy: a Tale	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)	1 75
Wight (P. B.), Remarks on Fire-Proof Construction, swd	(New York)

Professor Cleveland's Works.

I. A COMPENDIUM OF ENGLISH LITERATURE, chronologically arranged, from Sir John Mandeville to Wm. Cowper. 762 pages large 12mo, price $2 50.

II. ENGLISH LITERATURE OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY, embracing the chief English authors from 1800 to 1867. 800 pages large 12mo, $2 50.

III. A COMPENDIUM OF AMERICAN LITERATURE, on the same plan. $2 50.

IV. A COMPENDIUM OF CLASSICAL LITERATURE, consisting of choice extracts translated from the best Greek and Roman writers, with Biographical Sketches, etc., etc. $2 50.

V. THE POETICAL WORKS OF JOHN MILTON. With a Life of the Author, Notes, Dissertations on each Poem; with a complete Verbal Index to all the Poems. 688 pages. $2 50.

These five volumes, of which one hundred and twenty thousand have been printed, have received the highest commendations from a large number of our best scholars, clergymen, educators, and reviews. From these our page will permit us to select but a few—literally not one in ten:

"The four books comprised in Prof. Cleveland's series present a very complete view of literature from Homer to Holmes—from the first Greek to the latest American author. As books of reference, they should find a place upon the table of every scholar; while to the man who can afford but few books, these will supply the place of an extensive library."—Samuel B. Bates, Esq., late Sup't Common Schools, Pa.

"With the Bible, your Milton, and your four volumes upon Classical, English, and American Literature, one might leave libraries without very painful regret."—Joseph Warne, Esq., Oxford, England.

"For the home library or parlor table, and for the pleasant and profitable employment of a spare half-hour, I know of no series of books more truly valuable than the four volumes of Professor Cleveland upon English, American, and Classical Literature."—Rev. Albert Barnes, Philadelphia.

COMMENDATIONS OF THE FIRST OF THE SERIES.

"I do not believe the work is to be found from which, within the same limits, so much interesting and valuable information in regard to English writers and English literature of every age can be obtained; and it deserves to find a place in all our high-schools and academies, as well as in every private library."—Rev. C. Peirce, Principal, West Newton, Mass.

"To form such a compendium, good taste, fine scholarship, familiar acquaintance with English literature, unwearied industry, tact acquired by practice, an interest in the culture of the young, a regard for truth, purity, philanthropy, religion, as the highest attainment and the highest beauty—all these were needed, and they are united in Mr. Cleveland."—Christian Examiner.

OF THE SECOND.

"The work of selection and compilation—requiring a perfect familiarity with the whole range of English literature, a judgment clear and impartial, a taste at once delicate and severe, and a most sensitive regard to purity of thought or feeling—has been better accomplished in this than in any kindred volume with which we are acquainted."—Independent.

"The biographical sketches are just and discriminating, the selections are admirable, and I have adopted the work as a text-book for my first class."—George B. Emerson, Esq., Boston.

"This is the very best book of the kind we have ever examined."—New Englander.

Of the new edition of the nineteenth century, brought down to 1867, in which there are 495 authors noticed, 662 selections, and 401 references to Reviews and Essays in the Notes, Professor Moses Coit Tyler, of the Michigan University, thus writes: "I have given your book a thorough examination, and am greatly delighted with it; and shall have great pleasure in directing the attention of my classes to a work which affords so admirable a bird's-eye view of recent 'English literature.'"

The Saturday Review (Oct. 24, 1868), not prone to praise American books, says: "It acquaints the reader with the characteristic method, tone, and quality of all the chief notabilities of the period, and will give the careful student a better idea of the recent history of English literature than nine educated Englishmen in ten possess."

OF THE THIRD.

"This work is a transcript of the best American mind; a vehicle of the noblest American spirit. No parent who would introduce his child to a knowledge of our country's literature, and at the same time indoctrinate his heart in the purest principles, need fear to put this manual in the youthful hand."—Methodist Quarterly Review, New York.

OF THE FOURTH.

"It bears mark of a conscientious and scholarly regard for truth and correctness."—Professor Tyler, of Amherst College.

From the North American Review: "It is enough to say of this work that the promise of its title is as fully realized as it could be in a volume of moderate dimensions. The biographical and bibliographical sketches are succinct, carefully written, and wonderfully comprehensive in detail. The references to editions and translations indicate the author's full conversance with the field which they cover; while the selections are made with faultless taste."

OF THE FIFTH.

"I have several editions of Milton's poems, but I like yours better than any of the others. I think that every lover of Milton must feel indebted to you."—John Bright, M.P., in a private letter, which he gives the author permission to use.

"I never use the Verbal Index without feeling that I am your debtor."—Richard Grant White.

"The text I have found in all cases the best; the notes most judiciously selected or supplied; while the index is as complete and faultless as human labor can be."—J. G. Cogswell, Librarian of Astor Library.

"This volume is thoroughly worthy of a place in every English library, and is among the most remarkable produced by American men of letters."—London Reader, May 27, 1865

J. W. SCHERMERHORN & CO.,
PUBLISHERS,
14 Bond Street, New York.

J. A. BANCROFT & CO.,
512 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

AHEAD OF ALL COMPETITORS
IS Richardson's New Method
FOR THE PIANOFORTE.

Being the Only Book the Teacher requires, and the Book every pupil is attracted to.

150,000 copies already sold, and the demand greater than ever before. 30,000 copies are now selling every year.

Its lessons are adapted to pupils of all ages, and its exercises are attractive and useful in every stage of advancement. This book has, on account of its actual merit, become the standard work of Piano Instruction, and the only one which every well-informed teacher and scholar uses. Price $3 75. Sent post-paid.

O. DITSON & CO., Publishers,
277 Washington Street, Boston.
C. H. DITSON & CO.,
711 Broadway, New York.

The American Freemason.
CONTENTS OF JULY NUMBER.

MAN: A Poem. OUR MONTHLY RECORD: Is the Use of "Mnemonics" Unlawful?—Why did he do it?—Division of Grand Lodge Jurisdiction. CORRESPONDENCE: A Tub to the Whale—Grand Lodge Jurisdiction, No. III.—A Contribution to the Antiquity of Masonry—The African, or Prince Hall Grand Lodge. OUR MONTHLY MASONIC CHRONICLE: United States, Germany, Prussia, Hungary, Constantinople, France, Egypt. Review of New Books.

Sixteen quarto pages monthly, for one dollar a year. Address subscriptions to

J. FLETCHER BRENNAN, Editor,
114 Main Street, Cincinnati, O.

TO LYCEUMS, LECTURE COMMITTEES, ETC.

THE American Literary Bureau is now prepared to make Lecture engagements with Lyceums and other Lecture Associations throughout the country for lecturers and entertainments of a musical and literary character. The Bureau's list includes Justin McCarthy, editor London Morning Star, Mark Twain, T. W. Higginson, Rev. Robert Laird Collier, Edwin P. Whipple, Olive Logan, Kate Field, Benson J. Lossing the historian, P. B. Du Chaillu, Dr. Isaac I. Hayes, C. Oscanyan, Prof. E. L. Youmans, Saml. L. Hewlett, Wirt Sikes, John G. Saxe, Henry Nicholls, Prof. Hitchcock, Josiah Phillips Quincy, Rev. George H. Hepworth, Prof. Rufus Adams, Thomas W. Knox, George Wakeman, John J. Pinkerton, E. P. Nowell, Editor American Odd Fellow, Professor Homer B. Sprague, Cornell University, Rev. T. E. Kittredge, B. T. Taylor, Rev. J. D. Sweet, Dr. Griscom, George Kennan (the Siberian traveller), Maria A. Stetson, Annie E. Potter, the Hutchinson Family, Mr. and Mrs. W. Fox Leggett in Shakespearian Rehearsals, and many others, whose names appear on the circular.

NO CHARGE WHATEVER TO LECTURE COMMITTEES.

Applications promptly attended to. Send for Circular to
AMERICAN LITERARY BUREAU,
132 Nassau Street, New York City.
JAMES K. MEDBERY, } Associate
S. HUMPHREYS GURTEEN, } Directors.
P. O. Box No. 6,701.

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO.

HAVE JUST PUBLISHED

The Second and Concluding Part of

DAISY.

By the Author of "The Wide, Wide World," "Queechy," "Say and Seal," etc. 12mo, fine cloth, $1 75.

ASPASIA.

A Novel. By C. HOLLAND. 12mo, tinted paper, extra cloth, $1 25.

MORAL REFORMS.

Suggested in a Pastoral Letter, with Remarks on Practical Religion. By A. CLEVELAND COXE, Bishop of Western New York, Author of "Thoughts on the Services," etc. 12mo, fine cloth, $1.

COUNTESS GISELA.

A Novel. From the German of E. MARLITT, Author of "The Old Mam'selle's Secret," etc. By Mrs. A. L. WISTER. Part I. 12mo, paper cover, 75 cents.

CHRISTIAN SINGERS OF GERMANY.

By CATHERINE WINKWORTH. With Portraits. 12mo, toned paper, extra cloth, $2. Forming Vol. VI. of "The Sunday Library."

NEARLY READY:

Lippincott's Commonplace Books.

Small 4to, handsomely bound in cloth and gilt, with gilt edges.

I. ART AND ARTISTS.
II. BOOKS AND AUTHORS. Illustrated by Facts and Sketches.
III. OMENS AND SUPERSTITIONS. With Curious Facts and Explanatory Sketches.
IV. LAW AND LAWYERS.
V. CLERGYMEN AND DOCTORS.
VI. INVENTION AND DISCOVERY.

 For sale by all Booksellers, or will be sent by mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of price by

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO.,
PUBLISHERS,
715 and 717 Market Street, Philadelphia, and
449 Broome Street, New York.

John and the Demijohn.

BY MRS. J. McNAIR WRIGHT,

Author of "Our Chatham-Street Uncle," "Golden Heart," "Golden Life," "Golden Work," "Donet Clare," etc.

The ruin to health, to morals, and to all material prosperity, by alcoholic drinks, is absolutely appalling to every considerate mind. The aid of legislation is invoked, and still drinking goes on. The causes of intemperance are too deeply seated to be rooted out in a day by penalties and legal restraints, though they are essential helps in removing temptation.

Back to the cradle and the teachings of the mother we must look for the implanting of the principles which alone, under God, will give a correct manhood. The work announced will prove a help in the right direction, and we invoke its careful reading.

400 pages and 13 illustrations. Price $1 50.

HENRY HOYT,
9 Cornhill, Boston.

SABIN & SONS'

American Bibliopolist

(Published monthly) affords an excellent medium for ADVERTISEMENTS. It is useful to LIBRARIANS for the LISTS OF NEW ENGLISH AND AMERICAN PUBLICATIONS. BOOK COLLECTORS will find many desirable volumes in CATALOGUE OF NEW and OLD BOOKS, which accompanies each number. Notices of Rare or Curious Books, and the Notes and Queries upon American subjects, will be interesting to every one.

J. SABIN & SONS, Publishers,
84 Nassau Street, New York.

J. S. & SON have recently received a very valuable Collection of American Books—perhaps the finest ever offered for sale. Many of the volumes are illustrated with extra plates, and superbly bound.

L. W. SCHMIDT.

GERMAN BOOKSELLER,
24 BARCLAY STREET, NEW YORK,

Imports regularly all the leading Foreign Publications, including Periodicals.

Foreign works noticed in the NATION kept constantly on hand or procured to order.

JUST PUBLISHED.

"Manners Make the Man."

GOOD SOCIETY:

A COMPLETE MANUAL OF MANNERS.

By the Right Hon. Countess of * * * * * *. Printed on fine toned paper, 300 pages 12mo, extra cloth, gilt top, $1 75.

CONTENTS:

INTRODUCTORY,—On Good Manners in General; their Rise, Progress, and Social Importance.
CHAP. I. The Arrangement of a Lady's House and the Management of Servants.
II. Letters of Introduction—Cards—Addresses.
III. Visiting—Morning Calls.
IV. Conversation.
V. Letter-writing—Invitations.
VI. The Lady's Toilet.
VII. The Gentleman's Toilet.
VIII. Riding and Driving—The Promenade.
IX. Morning and Evening Parties.
X. The Ball.
XI. Dinner Parties.
XII. Engagement and Marriage.
XIII. Visiting at a Country House.
XIV. General Hints to both Sexes.
Appendices—Index.

This volume aims to meet a social requirement of long standing, namely, a work of genuine authority on all points of etiquette, ceremonial, and manners. It addresses itself to all classes of society, and, as the above list of contents will show, it embraces all points wherein rules of etiquette are necessary. "The author has endeavored, to the best of her ability, to treat of the subject under all its aspects; to omit no point, however trivial; and to provide her readers with a faithful and judicious guide in every social emergency."

"We have read this work with great care, and feel ourselves justified in pronouncing it by far the best of the kind we have ever chanced to see. The authoress is thoroughly familiar with her subject, and handles it with more than common grace; and we fancy there are few in our very highest society who might not derive some advantage from the most cursory perusal of her book."—Scottish American Journal.

 Will be sent by mail, post-paid, to any address in the United States, on receipt of the advertised price, by the Publishers,

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS,
416 Broome Street, New York.

New and Old Books.

DAVID G. FRANCIS (formerly C. S. Francis & Co.), 3 Clinton Hall, Astor Place, New York, keeps constantly for sale an extensive Stock of New and Second-hand Books in various departments of Literature.

Catalogues, issued from time to time, will be forwarded FREE to any address.

BACK NUMBERS OF THE NATION.

The following numbers of the Nation are desired by the Publisher, and if sent to his address within a week will be paid for at the rate of twenty-five cents each.

Vol. I. 1, 2, 3, 4, 6.

 The Publisher offers for sale complete sets of the Nation (eight volumes), unbound, for $26; bound, for $42; transportation not included.

PRESERVE YOUR PAPERS, AND BIND THEM YOURSELF.

The Eureka Self-Binder

Is simple, and binds stronger and better than a book. No. 6 is adapted to the Nation. Price $1 25; or, if sent by mail, $1 50.

Address SCHUMANN & LATHAM,
18 Dey Street, New York.

BINDERS FOR THE "NATION."

The Publisher of the Nation, considering the binder described above to be the best yet brought to his notice, has made arrangements for supplying it at the above prices, in cloth, to subscribers and others. The number of any volume will be stamped upon it without charge, to order.

Papers bound in this way really need no other binding for permanent preservation, and present the same appearance on the shelf as the usual bound volumes.

Address, with price enclosed,
PUBLISHER OF THE NATION,
Box 6732, New York City.

The Nation Press.

The Proprietors of THE NATION PRESS give notice that they have established a Book, Pamphlet, Job, and Newspaper Printing-Office in this City, and are prepared to execute at moderate prices, for cash, the best of work in any and all of these branches.

For BOOKS they will furnish Electrotype or Stereotype Plates, as desired, and will guaranty unusual accuracy in their preparation.

PAMPHLETS of every description, embracing Prospectuses, Statements, and Reports of Corporations, Statistical, Scientific, and Literary Papers, Law Pleadings, etc., etc., will receive the same attention as books, and be printed with especial care.

JOB WORK, in all its details: Cards, Circulars, Programmes, Bills, Receipts, Forms, etc., will be promptly dispatched, with taste, and in the newest varieties of type.

NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, and other Periodicals will be printed on reasonable terms, and strictly upon time.

In short, the Proprietors undertake to satisfy first-class custom in all that pertains to a general Printing Business.

Orders may be sent to THE NATION PRESS, 27 Rose Street (a few doors North of Frankfort), or to this Office; and estimates will be furnished at either place.

JOHN ROSS, Manager.

Office of THE NATION, 3 Park Place,
April 26, 1869.

D. VAN NOSTRAND,

PUBLISHER OF SCIENTIFIC BOOKS

23 Murray Street and 27 Warren Street,

HAS NOW READY THE FOLLOWING NEW POPULAR WORKS:

DESIGNING AND CONSTRUCTION OF MACHINE GEARING. By FRANCIS HERBERT JOYNSON. Illustrated. 8vo, cloth, $2.

HOW TO BECOME A SUCCESSFUL ENGINEER. Being Hints to Youths intending to adopt the Profession. By BERNARD STUART. 18mo, cloth, 75 cents.

FREE-HAND DRAWING; A Guide to Ornament, Figure, and Landscape Drawing. By an Art Student. Profusely illustrated. 18mo, cloth, 75 cents.

THE EARTH'S CRUST; A Handy Outline of Geology. By DAVID PAGE. Illustrated. 18mo, cloth, 75 cents.

DICTIONARY OF MANUFACTURES, MINING, MACHINERY AND THE INDUSTRIAL ARTS. By GEORGE DODD. 12mo, cloth, $2.

 Copies sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price.

AMERICAN SILKS

MANUFACTURED BY

Cheney Brothers.

MACHINE TWIST,
SEWING SILK,
TRAMS AND ORGANZINES,

FINE ORGANZINES FOR SILK MIXTURE CASSIMERES.
FOULARDS AND FLORENTINES, PONGEE HANDKERCHIEFS,
SILK WARP POPLINS,
SILK DRESS GOODS,
BELT RIBBONS.

SILKS FOR SPECIAL PURPOSES TO ORDER.

AGENTS:

EDWARD H. ARNOLD & SON,
102 Franklin Street, New York.

CHENEY & MILLIKEN,
4 Otis Street, Boston.

LEONARD BAKER & CO.,
210 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

CHASE, STEWART & CO.,
10 and 12 German Street, Baltimore.

$10.00 PER DAY GUARANTEED

Agents to sell the HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. It makes the LOCK STICH, ALIKE ON BOTH SIDES, has the under-feed, and is equal in every respect to any Sewing Machine ever invented. Price $25. Warranted for five years. Send for circular. Address JOHNSON, CLARK & Co., Boston, Mass., Pittsburg, Pa., or St. Louis, Mo.

The Nation.

VOL. IX.—NO. 215. THURSDAY, AUGUST 12, 1869. { FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM / TWELVE CENTS PER COPY

THE WEEK 121
EDITORIAL ARTICLES:
Our Financial Relations with Foreign Countries 124
The Clergy and the Courts 124
Opinion-Moulding 126
The Present Condition of the Massachusetts Tippler 127
France 128
CORRESPONDENCE:
The Philological Convention 129
NOTES:
Literary 130
Landscape Architecture in Chicago 132
Current French Literature 132
Viollet-le-Duc's French Mediæval Architecture 134
CURRENT LITERATURE:
A Complete Latin-English and English-Latin Dictionary.—A Treatise on the Law of Shipping and the Law and Practice of Admiralty.—Minor Chords.—Astronomy without a Telescope.—The Elements of Theoretical and Descriptive Astronomy.—First Lessons in Civil Government.—Stretton.—The Science of Right.—Travels of Fah-hian and Sung-Yun 135-137
Books of the Week 137

Terms:—Five Dollars per annum, in advance; Clergymen, Four Dollars.  Remittances at the risk of the subscriber, unless made by draft, check, P. O. money order, or registered letter.

The date of expiration of each subscription is indicated on the printed label. A delay of more than three months in renewing subscriptions will endanger their continuance.

ADDRESS, PUBLISHER OF "THE NATION," BOX 6732, NEW YORK.
PUBLISHING OFFICE, 3 PARK PLACE.

The Week.

THE event of the day in politics is the rather surprising refusal of General Rosecrans to accept the Ohio nomination. Probably other motives may have had something to do with his taking this course. It is as well, perhaps, in view of the Sulphur Springs negotiations, to say little about his unwillingness to "go back on his record"—though a "Copperhead" is more offensive to the nostrils of a Union General than a former rebel; but perhaps he had no desire to be beaten, as he probably would have been. The Catholic question has been made prominent in Ohio of late, and not to the advantage of a Catholic candidate. The Democrats must be more or less demoralized by this refusal, which will affect the minds of the soldiers a good deal. In Pennsylvania there is neither Catholic school question nor anything else to break the prevailing apathy, but Republican prospects are thought to be not bad, though why not we do not see. In Tennessee and Mississippi they are surely anything but good. In Mississippi, where the Republican platform contains nothing against which we hear any complaint alleged, Judge Dent is determined to be governor if he can, and will do what he can to break the party in two—a course that we can see no excuse for, but in which there is a good deal of danger that he may succeed. Alabama seems to have sent four Republicans and two Democrats to Congress, which is one less Republican than was expected. The escape from having another Democrat was very narrow, and was indirectly the cause of riot. Mobile is probably fuller of revolvers than any city of its size in the world, and is a haunt of rascals, so that there is less than usual to wonder at in the unprovoked firing upon negroes assembled to celebrate a political victory.

The Tennessee election has been, as everybody expected, carried by Senter by an enormous majority—say 60,000—the Democrats all going for him, and a considerable portion of the Republicans. The general result seems to be that the Democrats have once more got the State into their hands, the Republican element in the Legislature being small, and likely to be powerless. The help Mr. Boutwell gave Stokes did him no good, even with the Republicans; and it is reported, most likely untruly—for Stokes is not a fool—that he consoles himself and his friends with saying that Congress will set the election aside, and put the State under martial law. It is not by any means improbable that this is what a good many people who voted for him think ought to be done. To many of the Southern Radicals these Southern elections are games conducted on the old principle of "turkey for the white man and buzzard for the Indian; or buzzard for the Indian and turkey for the white man;"—that is, the majority is to be respected if it is on the right side, and the holding of an election is simply the concession to "ex-rebels" of an opportunity of evincing their repentance The triumph of the Democracy in Tennessee is, of course, a misfortune but it had to come; there was no way of avoiding it, without changing the form of the Government. There is, therefore, no more use in whining over it than over bad weather or the shortness of winter days.

In Virginia the Walkerites, having triumphed, have assumed the imposing title of "True Republicans," and claim all the honors and prerogatives of genuine orthodoxy. The Wellsites, being beaten and feeling rather humble, have apparently laid aside their proscriptive policy, and now propose to make friends with the victors, and reunite the party by a grand reconciliation. These offers, however, the Walkerites scornfully, and as it seems to us foolishly, reject, the chairman of their committee, Dr. Gilmer, haughtily refusing even to "confer" with Colonel Jenkins, the corresponding functionary on the other side; and he justifies himself by saying that if the Wellsites are Republicans, why the Walkerites are Republicans too, and it is all right, and there is no need for any reconciliation. This is all very well, as far as brotherly love goes; but it does not touch the important question of the division of "the spoils," which is no unimportant matter. It makes some difference to the Wellsites whether they are to be simply privates or have a share of the commissions.

A new "Republican Central Committee" has been started in this city, to take charge of the interests of the party in the place of the Twenty-second and Twenty-third Street "gangs," of which we gave some account a fortnight ago. The new committee have issued an address to the party, in which they draw on the whole even a less flattering picture than ours of the old organizations. The preparation of fraudulent rolls of voters and the use of Democratic "roughs" to control the primary meetings, were amongst the least of their offences. Another was a corrupt understanding with Tammany for the division of the spoils. In fact, no one should fail to read the address. It is a new and interesting chapter in the history of "the men inside politics." The "gangs," it must be observed, however, have been brought to grief mainly through their having come across an honest and courageous man in their pursuit of plunder. General Barlow, the United States Marshal, refused to allow them to fill his office with their rascally nominees, and the ridiculous meetings they held in consequence of his opposition, and the ridiculous demand which they addressed to the President for the General's removal, first drew to them the attention of the public and led to the exposure of their real character and the formation of the new committee. It now remains for the State Convention to repudiate them formally and recognize the new committee. One of the delightful things about the "Radical" "gang" was, however, the spectacle it afforded of love for the black man and "hatred of treason." This we shall be sorry to lose, because it furnished occasionally an evening's entertainment of unusual richness and variety. We hope the new committee will be particular about the character of the "tried leader" whom it puts up to conduct the hymn-singing on election night. For this, at least, if for no other office in the gift of the people, a fair moral character is absolutely necessary.

Collector Grinnell has not fared so well in the matter of appointments as General Barlow, mainly, of course, because he has such a large number in his gift; and report says that in order to keep his innumerable promises of places he has to keep up such "rotation" as never was seen, and is daily beset by the friends of men who want offices and the friends of those who have just lost them. The excitement amongst the drunkards and stupid and dishonest people, caused by this perpetual commotion, is intense. The number of members of these classes who want to qualify for governorships of territories, as our correspondent "Clericus's" friend, the Congressman, pleasantly suggested, by a short term of service in the Custom-house, is immense. Amongst those who have been "rotated" out of office are the female searchers, who strip and examine lady passengers suspected of smuggling lace or jewelry on incoming steamers. These searchers are mostly poor widows, and the office, though a wretched one, is one in which, owing to the temptation to bribery, and facility with which bribes may be received, needs good character—perhaps more than any other in the service. The late incumbents have, however, all had to quit, and "the party" is now receiving service from a new batch, who, as our friend the Congressman also suggested, are stimulated to honesty and fidelity by the knowledge that they, too, may any day be turned out themselves.

The Albany and Susquehanna Railroad is a new road which runs southwesterly from Albany to the upper waters of the Susquehanna, and ends at Binghamton—through which town passes also the Erie, coming in from the other direction. Just south of Binghamton, at Great Bend, in Pennsylvania, this latter most famous or infamous of all railroads is struck by a road which taps the great coal region of Pennsylvania; and from Great Bend on to Binghamton the Erie is the coal-dealer's way to all the Albany region and to New England. It is a way which Mr. Drew and Mr. Fiske and the rest of them have not made so cheap that the coal-dealers have not been very anxious to get to the Albany and Susquehanna road by some other line; and they are now building a road which, going round Great Bend, stops at Binghamton. It will soon be done; and Mr. Fiske and the other Erie managers have lately been bestirring themselves with great activity to circumvent the coal men, and get control of a great part of the coal market, by getting the Albany and Susquehanna into their own hands. We are therefore having a railroad fight more lively than ever we had; and have been getting proofs in the shape of lawsuits at the rate of about two a day—to say nothing of armed reprisals between the contending parties—that a "railroad man" of our time and country leads a life much like that of a Japanese daimio or mediæval baron.

In September comes off the election of officers of the road; and on August 7 was the day when the company's books were closed, and after which stock could not be transferred. At that date Mr. Fisk had "got" the company, it is understood, or would have were it not for two things: the company would not transfer 1,350 shares which he had bought—we do not use the names of the various minor actors on the one side or the other—and there are 3,000 shares out which he declares were illegally issued. So he brings Suit No. 1, and enjoins President Ramsey and everybody else not to allow these 3,000 shares to be voted on. Ramsey answers by an injunction restraining the railroad company from transferring the 1,350 shares above-mentioned to the Fisk party. But Fisk's lawyer — who throughout seems to have been very much too sharp and too quick for his opponents—soon gets this injunction removed. Suit No. 3 is a Fisk suit, and is brought to compel the company to make the transfer on the books. Suit No. 4 is also a Fisk suit, and Ramsey is enjoined not to act as president. Suit No. 5 is a Ramsey suit, and Ramsey in turn attacking the Fisk party, the company enjoins certain directors not to perform any of their official duties. Here we have the railroad company neatly tied up, so that it can do nothing for Fisk and nothing for Ramsey, or anybody else. Fisk's attorney now promptly brings suit in the name of a stockholder, who recites these facts, calls the court's attention to the fact that he is pecuniarily a sufferer because of this inaction, and the court civilly appoints Mr. James Fisk, jr., and another gentleman, receivers. Ramsey also gets a receiver appointed; but to get him he goes into an Albany court whose order is not in force till Saturday morning at 9 o'clock, whereas Fisk's appointment is dated Friday, and is in force from the moment it was made, for it was obtained in the First Judicial District—the only one, by the way, in which the rule just stated holds. To sum up: the suits now number some nine or ten; the receivers have had a good-sized fight; everybody is enjoined in all manner of ways; Judge Barnard, in this city, stands by his friends; at Albany, Judge Peckham is prompt in behalf of Ramsey; at last accounts, something very like a state of civil war exists on the lower portion of the road, and Gov. Hoffman has been obliged to give warning that he will take military possession if violence continues. The question now is, which will be the next road the Fisks will fix upon, and what becomes of the stockholders during and after "a war?"

As is usual in Harvard experience, the boat built for the race turns out not entirely satisfactory, and an English builder was commissioned to build a new one, which was to be four or five feet shorter than the Elliott boat, and, we suppose, round bottomed, in the English fashion, instead of slightly flattened, as is the style in this country. The new boat is probably done by this time and in use, and the crew are very likely in it, and still wishing for some one of the aged Harvard shells laid up in the Cambridge boat-houses. We are glad to see that the course is to be buoyed off, and two-thirds of the width of the river kept perfectly clear for the contestants. It would be about a not very great thing, to be sure, but American wrath in case the crews were interfered with would be louder, beyond a question—and deeper, we do not doubt—and much more unanimous, than when, a while ago, Mr. Sumner's shout set the rest of us shouting, and was so fearfully reverberated from the other side. On the whole, despite the dangers of acclimation, and the novelty of carrying a coxswain, and the crookedness of a course which a Bostonian compares to the crookedness of several Boston streets, there seems to be no more reason, as yet, why we should haul down the American flag than there was when our four champions were among us. Still, although it is our official, and personal, opinion that the Harvard crew will beat, and though we are willing to put our cause unreservedly in their hands and Mr. Blaikie's, and to beat or be beaten with them, it does us no harm to reflect sometimes on the Roahr crew and what it did in Charlestown last June. It would be worth while to export a few steamer-loads of young gentlemen from old Cambridge to do cheering from the river bank. Americans abroad must do their duty.

The case of Major John Haggerty, titular American Consul at Glasgow, Scotland, is at once melancholy and amusing. He is of Irish parentage, though born in Glasgow. He is an honest and able man, and served with distinction in the war, and has since the war been making herculean, but vain, efforts to induce his countrymen here to vote the Republican ticket and to shake off the British yoke. Although not a very prominent Fenian, his connection with the Brotherhood, and his feelings towards the British crown, were sufficiently notorious to satisfy anybody but a Fenian, or partially demented person, that he might as well expect to be appointed Gold Stick in Waiting as to be allowed to act as Consul in a British port. No government was ever known to grant an exequatur to a man connected with an organization formed to bring about its overthrow. Of course, the cute Republican politicians who gave him the place knew this perfectly well, but, by giving it him, they made him believe that they were doing something very fine for him, and threw on the British Government the odium of keeping him out of it, and are probably now laughing over it at the sea-side or in the mountains, while Haggerty is spending his hard earnings in some Scotch tavern. The same "little game" was on the point of being tried on a certain Mr. Savage, who was at one time a Fenian "head-centre" or some such dignitary. It was seriously proposed to give him also some very handsome and opulent consulship, also on British soil; but either Savage himself or some of his friends saw the joke before he started to take possession, and consequently he wisely stayed at home, and we hope has made them give him something in which he can get at his pickings without having to incur obligations to the hated Saxon. There was only one thing wanting to make poor Haggerty's case a perfect and symmetrical "sell," and that was that some Republican organ should pretend to think the British Government had played him a mean trick, and this, sure enough, the New York Tribune did on Tuesday last. "A great government," it said, "cannot afford to do small things, and yet it does them sometimes," etc., and winds up by hinting that it is Glasgow that will suffer from Haggerty's absence. One of the worst results of "the six hundred years of wrong" is seen in the Fenian capacity for being humbugged.

The "usurers" in this city have been called up by Judge McCunn for judgment, and sentenced to five days' imprisonment in the City Prison—not by any means a light sentence at this season. Some of the papers seem to think this is very fine, as it constitutes that enforcement of a bad law which it is now the fashion, in imitation of General Grant, to call the best mode of ensuring its repeal. No doubt this is true of legislation in comparatively unknown and untried fields; but a more disgraceful bit of barbarism than shutting up two men in jail for nearly a week in summer, in a great commercial city, in order to convince the public that an obsolete law ought not to be carried out, has hardly been witnessed since the days of witch-burning. If this is the only way in which we can find out that usury laws are absurd, what is the use of our eyes and ears and memory and judgment? Was it not to find out things of this sort, without torturing our fellow-creatures, that God gave us our faculties? What should we say if it were gravely proposed to burn two infidels at the stake in order to show that religious persecution was cruel and foolish, or to hang a corn-dealer to prove the folly of legislating against regrating and forestalling?

The Spanish Government, like the Austrian, has found itself at last obliged to go to loggerheads with the clergy, who have been conniving at the Carlist insurrection; indeed, the latest despatches say that several of the insurrectionary bands have been led by priests. The Government have accordingly ordered the bishops to issue pastorals inculcating loyalty on clergy and laity, within eight days, on pain of being refused permission to exercise their functions within the kingdom, and seem to have the hearty support of the town population at all events.

In France there is little, if any, change in the situation since the publication of the Emperor's concessionary letter. The Senate is busy in deliberation on the proposed changes, and is adopting them one by one—the deliberations of the body on the Imperial suggestions being really merely a kind of playful compliance with the forms of the constitution. The reforms have been conquered by a now famous body known as the "tiers parti," made up in part of moderate Liberals and in part of supporters of the Government, and which literally sprang up in a day after the Chamber met, and signed, to the number of one hundred, the address which brought the Emperor down. Seeing his own adherents going over, he gave way without more words. M. Mazade says, in the Revue des Deux Mondes, that the Government had made up its mind to yield immediately after the elections; but, instead of yielding at once, it waited till the Chamber met, to see what force it would have, and thus lost the credit of yielding voluntarily. All are agreed that personal government is at an end; and M. Saint-Marc Girardin has significantly come out with an article on what he calls the "Three Crises of Personal Government in France—1814, 1830, 1848." The fourth crisis—that of 1869—has, it must be admitted, been better managed than any of the former ones—if indeed we have seen the end, which many doubt.

Things are not going well in Austria. The "Dualism" is not working easily. Nobody is satisfied with the present state of things except the Hungarians. Their success in getting all they want has stimulated the exertions of the Bohemians and Croats, who demand the concession of autonomy also; and, unfortunately for the Austrian Ministry, there is not a single reason for refusing their demands which would not also apply to the demands of the Hungarians. So discontent grows in these provinces. Meetings multiply, and Panslavic agents work harder than ever. The Poles of Galicia are quieter, as they are doing better under Austria than they have done before since the partition; but it is certainly no part of their programme to form part of the Austrian empire for an indefinite period. M. de Beust, in the meantime, takes it coolly; is not very sanguine about the preservation of peace, though he says if Europe gets over the next four years without an outbreak of hostilities, it may last a long time.

Russia is getting more and more afraid of Bismarck. We mentioned some time ago the very unpleasant impression produced at St. Petersburg by the apparition in the Baltic of the new German fleet, which, if report speaks truly, would hardly find food for half an hour's cannonade in the Czar's whole naval force. An additional source of anxiety has now been furnished by a project, ascribed to Bismarck, to pierce Schleswig with a canal, so as to give Prussia readier access to the Baltic, and it is rumored that the Czar is going to maintain the balance of power in the north by building up a new Scandinavian state, composed of united Sweden, Norway, and Denmark. The New York Times, approving of this, calls loudly for fewer and bigger states, not only on the ground of economy, but because a large state is "a power; has a literature, a national spirit; does memorable things, and breeds great men." We doubt very much if anybody knows whether a division of the world into a few large states will be a good thing for mankind or not. Thus far, large states have, perhaps, done more harm than good. As a matter of fact, most of the great literatures, great men, and great deeds the race has to boast have thus far been furnished by small states. If we take the history of Athens and Sparta and Republican Rome out of the ancien world, what have we left? Imperial Rome was no doubt great in many ways, but it was made possible by the discipline and sacrifice of little early Rome. Take Holland, Florence, Venice, England, Sweden, and Switzerland out of modern Europe, and what have we left? In fact, we owe to small states nearly all that is most precious in literature, laws, and traditions. Big states, no doubt, can be "run" cheaply, but whether they will do as much for civilization and human character as small ones is certainly fair matter for doubt.

The anti-capital-punishment men in England have made the annual effort to procure the abolition of the death penalty, and have been defeated in the House of Commons by a majority of 60. Some of the statistics furnished in the course of the debate were curious. Out of 155 sentences of death passed in Great Britain and Ireland during the last six years, only 82 had been executed. Of the remainder, 23 were for infanticide, which in practice is never punished with death. There is a still more remarkable dwindling down amongst the cases in which verdicts of wilful murder are found by coroner's juries. In fact, the general result is, that there is no crime less likely to be followed with the legal penalty in England than murder; but sentences of imprisonment for life are there equivalent in practice to sentences for twenty years; here they are only equivalent to about six years. It appears, too, that great numbers of persons who are in favor of the death penalty as a general rule, when the question of applying it in a particular case comes up, oppose it violently. There seems to be little doubt that in most countries, too, the public sympathy with criminals grows faster than sympathy with the victims of criminals. The percentage of homicides to population in Italy, and especially in the Papal States, is enormous; but the popular horror of capital punishment is proportionately intense, and the most atrocious murderers are rarely executed unless their crimes have had a political complexion. What is going to be the end of the present drift of feeling, it would take a wise man to say. Saint Just was apparently not so very far in advance of his age when he inserted an article in his draft of a constitution providing that riots and other disorders should be repressed by six old men, wearing tricolored scarfs round their waists. If, after having arrived on the scene, and requested the rioters to desist, the latter persisted in their violence, the elders were to "declare the law in mourning" ("la loi en deuil"), and pronounce the rioters wicked persons ("méchants"), and deprive them of the rank of citizens. The effect of this on the feelings of the rioters, after hearing that "the law was in mourning" on their account, he left to the imagination; but the scheme was, of course, based on the hypothesis that it would be harrowing.

OUR FINANCIAL RELATIONS WITH FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

In discussing our foreign relations, little or no attention is paid to the peculiarly delicate financial relations which the enormous extent of our natural resources and our great needs during the war, compared with the amount of our disposable capital, have been for some years back establishing between the United States and Europe. The causes of the steady efflux of Federal obligations to Europe during the last six years are well known, but no exact information exists as to the amount now held abroad. The estimates of the best authorities—bankers, brokers, and Treasury officials—among whom we have made enquiries on the subject, vary greatly, and range from nine hundred up to twelve hundred millions. That we may not be accused of exaggeration, we propose to use the lowest of these figures for our argument. In addition to "governments," many other American securities are held on the other side of the Atlantic. To the State and city bonds and the stocks of the older railroads that were placed there before the civil war, large quantities of the obligations of several Pacific railroads have been added during the last two years. Altogether, we feel safe in saying that the total of American securities owned abroad represents at this moment a value of not less than twelve hundred millions. The financial history of modern civilized states will probably be searched in vain for another instance of so enormous an indebtedness on the part of a nation to foreign capitalists. The public debt of Great Britain is larger, and that of France relatively but little, if any, smaller than ours. Yet of the consols and the rentes only a comparatively insignificant portion is in foreign hands. Even in the case of such chronic borrowers as Russia, Austria, Italy, Spain, and Turkey, the total of their respective loans contracted in foreign markets will be found to be relatively far less than our national debt to European capitalists. Certainly, if there could be any glory in so vast an absorption of national promises to pay, we should have occasion for no little pride; and if the respectability of a debtor could rest on the number of his creditors, we might claim on that ground alone to be the most respected nation on the face of the earth.

But, unfortunately, there is the reverse of the medal, which has been persistently overlooked by the patriotic souls who are in the habit of exulting over the plethora of 5-20's in European cash-boxes as evidence of the unlimitedness of our national credit. What does, indeed, this fact of our indebtedness to the Old World to the tune of twelve hundred millions really indicate? Nothing less than a state of financial dependence bound to exercise, while it exists, an influence on our international relations of the extent of which the general public appears to have as yet but a faint conception. However disagreeable the necessity may be, we shall be compelled, sooner or later, to open our eyes to the truth that the billion and more of our bonds now across the water will prove an uncomfortable, though often a useful, fetter in our future dealings with other nations. We shall have to think twice hereafter before we act. Whether willing or unwilling, we must be prepared to find ourselves often stopped in the pursuit of any foreign policy involving serious consequences. The alternative of refraining strictly from any unreasonable or provoking attitude in international disputes, or of undergoing a complete financial breakdown even before we have got very far in quarrelling, will stare us mercilessly in the face. We are, in short, put upon our good behavior towards other countries—how, we shall presently endeavor to show.

But a few months having elapsed since Mr. Sumner launched his thunderbolt in the Senate, we are justified in supposing that neither the immediate response to it, in the form of a considerable fall in the price of all American securities in London, nor the consequent decline in "governments" and rapid rise of the premium on gold in New York, have been forgotten. A perfect panic ensued, as will be remembered, among the holders of our bonds in the former city, and millions after millions of five-twenties were thrown upon the market in headlong haste, causing a depreciation of five per cent. in a short time. But for a fortunate circumstance, we should have then witnessed the first practical illustration of what we have said above. We have before us a letter from a prominent German banking-house at Frankfort-on-the-Main, stating that the Bourse of that city had, within a few weeks after the delivery of Mr. Sumner's speech, absorbed over thirty millions of the five-twenties that had been rushed upon the London market under the first effect of the twenty-five hundred millions claim of the Massachusetts Senator. That the British holders were in haste to part with their American bonds was no more to be wondered at than that the Germans—who, as neutral parties, viewed the situation more coolly, and of whom the intelligent classes know, as a rule, more about the United States than Englishmen—eagerly availed themselves of the chance of a good bargain. But supposing the Germans had not been willing to take the tens of millions hurried off from London, what would have inevitably happened? In the first place, the general depreciation of our securities in England and the sympathetic reaction upon all values in this country would have been far greater; and, in the second place, the same millions that now quietly repose in Germany would have flowed straight back to the source from which they were originally derived—that is, New York. We need not dwell upon the disastrous consequences the return of many millions of five-twenties a week for a month or so would have had on this side. Let any one who is unable to form an estimate of them himself seek light from any banker or broker on the subject. He will be told that the flooding of our markets with many millions of "governments" in the space of a month, would have caused a disturbance of all values such as has not been seen in Wall Street since the summer of 1864, and as could not help being followed by the greatest distress in all business circles.

Now, is there any one foolish enough to believe that if, instead of the mere transient clouding of the political horizon by a parliamentary demonstration, the grim spectre of actual war between us and Great Britain should rise before the foreign holders of our bonds, another such safety-valve as that described would open for our benefit in Germany or any other part of Europe? On the contrary, in that event there would be not only a general reflux of our securities from England, but an even mightier stream would set in in the direction of New York from Germany, Holland, Switzerland, and wherever else the five-twenties in their widespread flow have found their way. The Germans, especially, who hold the bulk of the twelve hundred millions of bonds in foreign parts, and who understand our financial condition as well as ourselves, would be the first, from their knowledge of our inability to bear the cost of another great war, to rid themselves of our national promissory notes. The recollection of the genial soil which repudiation theories found among us would revive in them with double force, and make them act upon the principle that partial losses are preferable to the risk of losing everything. Not tens but hundreds of millions would then be forced back upon us in a rapid current. And how should we face the emergency? Would it be possible for us to meet the enormous draft of specie that would be made upon us? Where would be the limit of the upward bounds of gold, of the fall in every kind of securities, and of the fluctuations in all mercantile values? Probably even before the firing of the first gun we should be in the midst of a national crisis, compared to which that of 1837 would appear as insignificant as that of 1857.

We have referred exclusively to the Alabama question in the foregoing, because that is of the greatest present concern to us. But the financial fate that would befall us if the final solution of that complication should be sought at the cannon's mouth would be hardly less severe in the case of war with any other country; and hence our escape from an entanglement with Spain through the faithful execution of the neutrality laws affords no less occasion for self-congratulation to all good citizens than the second sober thought of the public in regard to our misunderstandings with Great Britain. It is no doubt unpleasant to be thus obliged to count in advance the cost of every shift in our foreign policy. But the sooner we learn to understand the state of financial relations to Europe in which we now are, and which will continue just as long as the balance of trade keeps largely against us, and we need more capital to develop our resources than we have ourselves accumulated, the better it will be for us.

THE CLERGY AND THE COURTS.

An injunction has recently been rendered by Judge Jameson, of the Supreme Court of Chicago, restraining an ecclesiastical court of the Episcopal Church of the diocese from proceeding with the trial of Mr.

Cheney, an Episcopal minister, at the suit of Bishop Whitehouse, for the omission of the words "regenerate" or "regeneration" in the baptismal service. The cause of the injunction, as set forth in Judge Jameson's decision, is certain irregularities in the procedure of the ecclesiastical court. Had the court proceeded according to the rules and canons of the church, he says a civil court would have no right to interfere. The church association is, as he says elsewhere, "no more in the eye of the law than is an association for any temporal purpose, a base-ball club, a lyceum, or an organization for the construction and operation of a railroad," yet, as the decisions of its courts on the trial of clergymen touch "rights of property," the civil courts may properly be called on to intervene to prevent injustice being done.

Now, what is "the property" involved in the present case which entitles Mr. Cheney to ask for the protection of the temporal power? It is "the function or business of a minister of the Gospel" which he exercises, and from which an adverse decision of the Bishop's court would probably have cut him off; not simply the amount of salary now due to him, or to become due to him, from the congregation with which he is connected in Chicago, but the abstract right to pursue the calling "of an Episcopal minister." It must be borne in mind that his deposition by an episcopal court for error in doctrine, and particularly such an error as the one he is charged with, would not prevent his joining either the Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Baptists, or Methodists. In fact, it would render him rather acceptable to most of them. Consequently, all he had to fear from the ecclesiastical court—even if the worst came to the worst—was a deprivation of the opportunity of pursuing his calling as an Episcopal minister—a distinction which Judge Jameson seems to overlook, as he in one place treats a "minister of the Gospel" and "Episcopal minister" as synonymous terms, though he acknowledges, a little further on, that it is only from the Episcopal Church, here and in England, that a condemnation would drive Mr. Cheney. For the doctrine that the profession of a "minister of the Gospel" is "property" as against the religious denomination or association to which the minister belongs, Judge Jameson relies on two recent decisions of the Supreme Court in cases arising in Missouri, in one of which it was held that the right of a minister to preach was property as against the State Legislature, which sought to prohibit him from exercising it unless he took an oath, which it was impossible for him to take, with regard to his participation in the rebellion. But these are the only authorities Judge Jameson cites.

We do not propose here to attempt a refutation of Judge Jameson's view of the law. What we wish to do is to call the attention of religious denominations to the possible, and even probable, consequences of this extraordinary decision. It is, of course, perfectly plain that if the position and status not simply of a minister of the Gospel in general, but of a minister of a particular church or sect, be "property" in the eye of the law, any attempt on the part of the association to drive a minister out of it for any reason at once entitles him to the judgment of the civil courts on the legality and even reasonableness of the proceeding against him. It does not matter whether the charge be one of immorality or heresy. Property is property, and the law does not permit even an immoral man or a heretic to be deprived of it, except under the sanction of judicial decision. In this case, the civil court bases its interference on the violation by the ecclesiastical court of its own rules and regulations; but it is obvious that if it be the right of civil courts to revise the proceedings of ecclesiastical courts on one point, they may revise them on all points. Supposing the composition of the court had been perfectly regular in the present case—suppose the citation had been duly served—and the canon, in fact, observed in every particular—Mr. Cheney might still, if the judgment had gone against him or seemed likely to go against him, have come into the civil courts as a citizen exposed to spoliation, and demanded protection on the ground that the ecclesiastical court had not observed the rules of evidence, or had construed the Thirty-nine Articles or the rubric in a non-natural or non-historical sense. Judge Jameson would then have been obliged to go over the whole ground to satisfy himself that the ecclesiastical court had properly interpreted the rubric and the canons and the Thirty-nine Articles, and had, in short, dealt with Mr. Cheney according to the rules and regulations of the Episcopal association. Rules and regulations, canons and articles, are but words; to have force, somebody must interpret and apply them; and if the tribunals instituted by the church cannot do this, and cannot decide in the last resort touching the extent of their own jurisdiction, and the guilt or innocence of ministers and other officers brought before them, and cannot pronounce positively and definitively whether a man has or has not ceased to belong to the association, and is or is not fit to minister at its altars, their proceedings are simply a mockery, and they themselves a sham, like the Convocation in England, and the proper place to try questions of heresy and ecclesiastical discipline is a court of law. In fact, if Judge Jameson's decision be good law, every attempt to depose a minister by the denomination to which he belongs will have, in order to be prompt and effective, to take the form of a bill in equity. Had it been good law thirty years ago, the dispute between the Old and New School in the Presbyterian Church, instead of being fought out in the Synod and General Assembly, would have followed "the bristling sinuosities" of a chancery suit. In short, we should by this time all be familiar with the spectacle, so common in England, of lawyers arguing the most knotty questions of religious doctrine before the civil courts. It was in a case almost exactly like Mr. Cheney's that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council decided that nobody had any right to drive an Episcopal clergyman from his living because he did not believe in the eternity of future punishment; and whether a belief in the eternity of future punishment was part and parcel of Anglican doctrine was decided by an elaborate examination of the Articles by men who had never studied theology.

The mischief and inconvenience of such a state of things would, however, be much greater here than in England. The lawyers before whom ecclesiastical questions come in England are mostly members of the Established Church, and imbued with great reverence for it and for its rights. Many of them have made a special study of canon law; more still of civil law. The judges, too, are a very homogeneous body, and famed for their caution and discretion. Everything the State can do is done to raise them above temptation or suspicion, to clear them of all political, religious, or social bias. With all this, however, the decision by them of questions of church doctrine and discipline is universally acknowledged to be a great scandal and absurdity. Nothing could possibly do more to show what a ridiculous as well as monstrous thing the union of church and state is. We need hardly point out to any intelligent reader the greater abuses to which the assumption of similar jurisdiction by the civil courts in this country would lead, and the exasperation to which it would give rise. Judge Jameson is a man of learning and character, and himself an Episcopalian, so that the impropriety is, in this case, reduced to a minimum. But fancy the power of deciding on the right of ministers to remain in a religious denomination committed all over the country to the class of lawyers whom caucuses and popular election now often elevate to the bench; fancy Judge Barnard and Judge McCunn deciding what a Presbyterian minister was bound to believe on the subject of human ability, or an Episcopal minister on the nature of the sacramental elements, or restraining Archbishop McCloskey from silencing an immoral priest!

We cannot pass from the subject, however, without calling attention to the growing tendency amongst judges, of which this Cheney case is an illustration, to make a lavish and indeed reckless use of the power of granting injunctions—the greatest power with which judicial officers were ever armed. The system of equitable jurisdiction, of which it forms a part, is emphatically a system of conscience. In it the judge enjoys a discretion which he does not enjoy in the common-law courts, and it is permeated throughout by the supposition that any community which employs so delicate a machine to do right between man and man will not do so without providing judges not only of great learning, but of great integrity and delicacy of moral fibre to work it. With all its faults — and it has had shocking faults—the administration of equity as distinguished from law has always, both in England and in this country, been until recently remarkable for its purity and its caution. It is rapidly losing that character with us. We need only mention the abuse of equitable remedies by judges in this State to show what a frightful weapon the power of granting injunctions is, when wielded by ignorant, hasty, or corrupt men; what serious injuries to mind, body, and estate may be worked with it; and how desirable it is that the exercise of it should be forthwith surrounded by positive restrictions, and not left any longer to the discretion of the bench, when we refuse to pay enough to make it worth the while of our best lawyers to mount the bench; and when nearly every State in the Union has done all it can to discountenance the idea that careful training and learning are requisite for practice at the bar.

OPINION-MOULDING.

We raised three weeks ago, as we thought very modestly and inoffensively, mentioning no names, the question whether it was as necessary for the publishers of very cheap papers to be "as wildly sensational, vulgar, and slangy as they usually maintain that it is," and propounding the theory that it was the New York Herald which first set them a bad example, and, in fact, begot the "lively writer" who is now the great bane of the press. In some obscure way, however, this seems to have given offense to one of our daily contemporaries, which castigated us severely, and, amongst other cruel and unjust things, said that the Nation was "aristocratic." As our bones are still aching from the effects of this infliction, we might naturally be expected to look on the character and influence of the press as a delicate subject of discussion, and endeavor to avoid it; and we almost think we should do so for the present, if the New York Times had not, in an article to which we made brief reference last week, brought it up once more—we presume by way of indicating the views of its new editor as to the proper business of daily newspapers. Tempted and somewhat encouraged by this, we shall take the liberty of saying something more about it, by way of elucidating what we have said already, premising that we have nobody in particular in our eye.

The Times dwells with emphasis on the fact that news has become of immense moral and social as well as commercial and political importance to the world; that the daily papers are the dispensers of it; and that, therefore, the editors work under a load of responsibility such as hardly any other class of men are called on to bear. In fact, though they make no comments whatever, they are able, by their mode of reporting the events of the day, to mould public opinion completely. They color the light through which their readers see the world around them; and they really almost decide, by the extent to which they share in building up and casting down the reputations of legislators and other public officers, whether the laws under which the community lives shall be nullified or enforced.

One of the first duties of the press, therefore, is not indeed to publish no false news—for this would be an impossibility—but to do its utmost to get accurate news, and, after it has got it, not to color it to suit the editorial taste or necessities. This again, when examined closely, is found to be simply a question of men. News is an impalpable thing—an airy abstraction. To make it a ponderable, merchantable commodity, somebody has to collect it, condense it, and clothe it in language; and its quality—indeed, its whole value—depends on the character of the men employed in doing this. Now, we do not mean to say that there are no honest, painstaking, scrupulous, and accurate men employed as reporters and correspondents by the daily press. This would be a ridiculous calumny. But we do say that the number of such men is smaller by far than it need be or ought to be; and that the reason is that such men are not generally and systematically encouraged for their honesty and accuracy. These qualities are not exacted of the reporting class as essential to professional success. On the contrary, they are constantly treated as of inferior importance—far inferior to smartness, "spiciness," and enterprise. The first thing required of reporters is that they shall supply at least as much news as the reporters of the other papers; the second, that they shall supply as much more as possible; and a man who takes upon himself to discriminate between facts and rumors, or to remain silent sooner than telegraph or write what he feels satisfied is a sensational falsehood, but which for a day at least, if printed, would put his paper in request, is too apt to find his value decline and his prospects grow dim. On the other hand, the busy and unblushing collector of all the rubbish he can lay hands on too often grows rapidly in the profession—all the more rapidly if he makes his news the means of damning political or other opponents.

The general result is that newspaper reporting is about as demoralizing a business as a young man can engage in. Men of great capacity and force of character may stay in it, and thrive in it, and remain scrupulous in it, and eventually rise out of it into the higher walks of the newspaper calling; but it is not a good place for scrupulous men; and some of the best known men in it are persons who love notoriety more than anything else, and chuckle over a well-told lie, or successfully defamed character, as an artist over a good picture or statue. Of course, such men are comparatively few in number; but, as usual, they do four times as much work as their betters, and they get most of the poor prizes the calling has to offer. One consequence of all this is that, although there are great numbers of young men of talent and education only too willing to embrace the press as a profession, they are kept out of it by the fact that they are not willing to expose themselves to be detailed to listen behind doors or under sofas, to steal private confidential correspondence, to dress up sensational blatherskite, or to blackguard respectable men old enough to be their grandfathers because they do not "vote 'No' on the Eleventh Article;" or, what is nearly as bad, to have to associate with or be classed with those who do these things. One of the first duties of the editors of the great daily papers is, it seems to us, to give decent and sensible men a chance of thriving in the profession of which the editor is the head.

Coming to the editorial way of treating public men, it ought to be observed that, inasmuch as they have the making of men's reputations in their hands—and on men's reputations the public happiness largely depends—the sedulous and persistent puffing and exaltation of feeble, ignorant, or worthless and naturally obscure persons is just as great an offence against the common weal as the persistent vilifying and belittling of really able and good men. We know it does not seem so. Praise, or even adulation, always bears the appearance of kindliness, and therefore is readily bestowed even by well-meaning people, and always commands more or less popular sympathy or indulgence. But when bestowed on unworthy objects, it is none the less a fraud on the public. It, in the first place, enables a man of no ability or character to assume an appearance of fitness for places of honor and emolument, and, what is more, to get them. In the next place, it secures for his opinions and wishes an amount of respect, or for his wares an amount of demand, to which they are not entitled; and, in the third place, by perverting the popular judgment, it deprives men of real value of their proper place in the public estimation.

To anybody who has never watched, from a professional standpoint, the process of puffing a charlatan or pretender into notoriety and success, we may, in saying all this, seem to be fighting a shadow. But there is nobody who has much acquaintance with the machinery of journalism, and knows how to "put this and that together," who cannot enumerate scores of persons enjoying a fair amount of popular attention and confidence, or making a living out of popular credulity, and getting good offices, without a single claim to the respect of any human being, and solely owing to their diligence in running from one newspaper office to another and their skill in getting on the weak side of editors and reporters, or to their professional connection with some widely circulated paper.

As regards the general tone of the press, there is no doubt it has greatly improved within twenty years; but we adhere to the opinion that whatever is worst in it has been largely due to the immense pecuniary success of the Herald as a buffoon. It owed its success in large part, no doubt, to the fact that it was not simply a buffoon, but an able purveyor of news, and a change from its ponderous and dull predecessors of the "blanket-sheet" variety. But its most striking feature was what we may call its telescopic mode of treating everybody and everything in its editorial columns. Seen through one end of its glass, all men and all subjects were magnified to more than mortal dimensions; seen through the other, they were belittled infinitesimally; and the whole process was carried on amid much laughter as a good joke. Everything grave or thorough it stamped as "old fogy" and "fossil," and treated religion and wisdom and morality and knowledge and discretion, and everything else that makes individuals or states in the slightest degree respectable, as funny but transparent humbugs. It took, however; it found a market, it increased its circulation enormously, and indeed founded a school of journalism. Its imitators, of course, improved greatly on its morality; that was a little too bad for any civilized community; but they retained many of its methods and some of its spirit, and justified themselves, as it justified itself, by alleging that what they supplied was what the public wanted—witness their growing sales. To this it is of course a sufficient answer to say, that if men of all other callings followed the example of some conductors of newspapers, and carried on their business solely with reference to profits, civilized society could not hold together. What really keeps up human progress, and makes the world fit for intelligent beings to live in, is that most men say, in doing their work, "I might make more money by supplying a different kind of wares, or resorting to this or that practice; but I will not do so: I owe something to my country and my kind as well as to myself; I have not done my whole duty when I have made a fortune. Civilization is entitled to a contribution at my hands, and the smallest I can make is to be a better, honester, and more high-minded and scrupulous man than the criminal code requires me to be, or than my pecuniary interest merely would tempt me to be."

THE PRESENT CONDITION OF THE MASSACHUSETTS TIPPLER.

BOSTON, Aug. 7, 1869.

THE controversy which has lately arisen between the Springfield Republican and the State Constable, as to whether the Prohibitory Law is enforced in this State, exhibits in an amusing light the difficulties which beset the enquirer after truth in this matter. For if the enquirer after truth conducts his enquiries in the channels indicated by the officials charged with the enforcement of the law, he inevitably reaches the conclusion that the sale of liquor is an offence of the past, that the bars are indeed closed, and that the very liquor-dealers of other days have abandoned their noxious vocation and betaken themselves to those harmless pursuits in which the friends of reform have always hoped to see them sooner or later engaged. On the other hand, if the said enquirer reads the various publications in the "rum interest," he finds, to his amazement, that, if the bars are all closed, the little rooms behind the bar at any rate are open; that the sale of ardent spirits goes on at a fast and furious rate; and that the Liquor Law is a farce. In this state of things, the experimental philosopher has nothing left but to relinquish all hope of acquiring truth from either the officers of the law or from the "great independent organs of public opinion," and to institute an investigation on his own account. Animated by the desire to do this, I have lately made a short excursion along the coast of Massachusetts, and have done my best, in the interest of truth, to discover the precise amount of "enforcement" accorded to the inhabitants of the various towns on my route. The result I now proceed to lay before you, premising, however, that the names are omitted, for reasons too obvious to mention, and also that the places visited were not selected but taken at hap-hazard, so that they might fairly represent the general state of things.

The first place to which my friend and myself turned our steps was a little town, not far from a large city, where is kept a hotel famed for miles around for the excellence of its dinners; not a place which the noisy poor specially affect, but one where the sedater rich congregate. Lying quite off the usual lines of travel, not connected with the great centres of industry by any railroad, it seemed eminently a place where the absence of a hostile population would make enforcement of the law easy; it might be that in large towns and cities a truculent proletariat would defy the law, but here, in such sequestered loneliness, we should certainly find it triumphant. We were surprised, therefore, to discover about the bar-room that suspicious odor which may or may not be itself "within the statute," but which certainly betokens the presence of something that is. Nor was there wanting about the water belonging to the establishment, when poured into the bar tumblers, that peculiar flavor which reminds the guest of his predecessor's partiality for a more generous liquid. But all our doubts were finally removed when, on beginning our enquiries in the usual manner, we were served with what we called for with that promptness for which the hotel in question is famous, and with a publicity which we had not expected. Delivery, deglutition, and payment all took place in the most open manner possible. I am bound to say, however, that on reappearing at the same hotel a week later, and attempting a second violation of the law, the proceedings were different. Whether it was that on this second occasion my enquiries were addressed not to the landlord, but to his assistant, and that this assistant was gifted with a mind more capable of distinctions than his employer, or whether it was simply accident, or whether it was caprice, I am unable to say, but certain it is that the ceremony was this time much more mysterious. In order fully to explain the case, let me go a little into detail. What I called for was a cobbler, and I called for it, naturally enough, in the bar-room. Now the wine was poured out, and the ice broken, and sugar put in, and the mixture shaken, to my certain knowledge, behind the bar—even the straw, I think, was inserted there. But when the final moment approached, all was changed. The face of the vendor, up to this period radiant with hospitable smiles, became suddenly overcast with hesitation and dread; he beckoned me silently, and silently I followed him. Evidently the law was now to be vindicated, and the vindication was accomplished, in the most simple manner possible, by handing my cobbler to me, not across the bar, but in the small room behind the bar. In order, sir, that you may appreciate the full force and legal effect of this, I append below a diagram of the premises.* On this second visit I improved my opportunities by interviewing the landlord, a genial and communicative man, who certainly had not much of the prohibitionist about him. The following conversation ensued:

"I suppose the Prohibitory Law does not give you much trouble down here?"

"Well, no; this is n't the kind of place they prohibit; small bars, and places where they make a noise, you see—those kind they shut right up, but they do n't want to interfere with a quiet, respectable place like this, supported by business men; we do n't have any rows here. The State Constables do n't trouble us except when they want their dinner."

"So you sell just as much as ever?"

"Oh! yes; just as much as ever."

"But they have notified you to close your bar?"

"Oh! yes; they 've notified us to close our bar—and we have closed our bar!"

The next place which we tested was a village a little further along the coast—once a flourishing town, but now inhabited chiefly by poor people, fishermen, and shoemakers, not supported by "business men." The only hotel we found in a state of great dilapidation, and the landlord could with difficulty be prevailed upon even to enter into conversation with us. When at length we had obtained a hearing, we asked if we could have a room. "Wa'al," the landlord said, "do n't know; do n't cal'late to take in strangers at this hotel." We asked, in some surprise, whom he did take in, on which it appeared that he was so disgusted with the Prohibitory Law that he proposed taking down his sign that night. His bar had been closed; and although, after our experience at ———, we were at first at a loss to understand why this should lead to such violent measures on his part, the explanation was soon given. This, as I have already said, was not a place supported by "business men," and we found that places not so supported fared but badly in the hands of the State Constable. On this account, our host had determined to stop innkeeping. We prevailed upon him at length, however, to give us a bed, and then, becoming softened, he led the way to a mysterious closet, where the remnants of his former bar were to be seen, the life slowly and surely, but illegally, oozing out of them. Here he seemed to take a saturnine satisfaction in witnessing the violation of the law which was ruining him.

Our next stopping-place (excepting one where the closing had been very effectual) was a large town, which I will no further describe than by saying that one of Massachusetts' most noted sons once made it his home for a few weeks for the purpose of being elected to represent it in the National Legislature. There we found again that all the bars were closed; but rumor said that there was one hotel the landlord of which was "opposed to the law." To him we went. He was a thin, knowing-looking old man, and he at once assured us that it was impossible for him to comply with our request, because he could not be sure that we were not constables in search of evidence against him. We assured him we were not, and entered into conversation. We asked him how long he supposed this thing would last. "Well," said he, with great irritation, "as long as this petticoat law lasts, probably. We can't sell anything now. Even cigars they won't let us sell out of the case." We asked him how that was, and were told that it was petticoat law also—a mistake on his part, of course; but he was quite convinced of the truth of what he said. "All the bars are closed in ———, are they not?" "Oh! yes," he said, "all closed." We waited a moment or two, and were rewarded for our patience. "We can sell cider," said the landlord, after a pause. We again waited. "I've got some very fine old cider, bottled in '51," he continued; "if you'd like a bottle of that, I can give it to you." "Yes," we said, we should like a little of that; on which we were again conducted to a hospitable closet, whose shelves revealed a sad tale of crime and lawlessness. The landlord produced—but I must not go further, or his worst suspicions as to our connection with the Constabulary may seem justified. The relation which exists between certain vendors and vendees in this State is a confidential one, and faith must be kept. Cider, bottled in '51, was what we bought, the bar having been, as in the other cases, closed by action of the authorities.

* Our correspondent's diagram we do not reproduce. It represents the small room as being not at all a secluded place nor one difficult of access.—ED. NATION.

We had seen enough to understand how the law was enforced in the country districts: it was time to return to Boston and see what had been done in our absence. The bars had all been closed there some time since, the matter had been much discussed in the newspapers, and there was now a good opportunity for seeing what had been really accomplished. I went to one of the prominent hotels, and, seating myself in the restaurant, asked a waiter whether he could bring me anything. "Anything I wished." What I called for was immediately brought. I asked how it was that this was done. "Oh!" said he, as if he were explaining everything, "the bar is closed." "And you sell everything as before?" "Oh! certainly, sir. In the restaurant, everything is furnished that is called for." "But how is it if any one goes to the bar itself?" "Oh! if any one goes to the bar, what he calls for is handed to him at the lunch-department, on the other side of the room."

And what is the upshot of all this? It can hardly be questioned by any candid person who reads the admissions of the various persons whose testimony I have already given that the bars in the towns visited are thoroughly closed, and therefore assertions by the State Constable to this effect are amply substantiated. The bars are closed, notwithstanding the insinuations of the Springfield Republican, not only in the country, but in that very centre of the criminal traffic itself—in Boston. On the other hand, there seems no room for doubt that allegations like those of the Republican, to the effect that the sale of liquor goes actively on, are entirely worthy of credit, and can be proved to the satisfaction of any doubting mind. Further, the investigations conducted by me all point to the conclusion that the enforcement at present in vogue is an enforcement against the poor, but not the rich. Those places supported by "business men" go scot-free; and even in small towns, such as those I visited, where enforcement is the strictest, the business man is at no loss to find the key to the mysterious closet, or the means of approaching "the other side of the room." With the poor, however, the case is different. Every day we read descriptions of ferocious descents by the Constabulary on some small dealer in some obscure quarter, of seizures of his whiskey, and consequent vindications of the majesty of the law.

"A Progressive Man."

FRANCE.

Paris, July 23, 1869.

One of the papers of the "moderate opposition" published two days back a list of the various movements, backwards and forwards, that the Emperor has made since the elections; and they certainly are curious enough. First, there is the letter to M. de Mackau, saying that no government that "respects itself" ever makes "concessions;" secondly, the decoration conferred upon M. Jérome David, the notorious réactionnaire; thirdly, the letter to M. Schneider declaring that the said "decoration" meant nothing at all; fourthly, the "message" purporting to grant no end of "concessions" to the Chamber; fifthly, the decree shutting the Chamber up; sixthly, the offers of the Ministry to certain members of the Left Centre; seventhly, the nomination of ministers taken exclusively from amongst the nullities of the "Right;" eighthly, the maintenance of the decree which suspends the Chamber; and, lastly, the letter to M. du Miral, which says this is against the Emperor's will. It would probably be impossible to find an example of any other sovereign in Europe who has given such a quick succession of proofs of irresolution in such a short space of time. But those who have been used to the Emperor since his early days feel no astonishment whatever at this excessive weakness of purpose, but say that in every occasion of his whole life, great or small, he has never had a will of his own. In truth, if you track back to the coup d'état, you will find not so much Louis Napoleon as St. Arnaud, Fleury, de Morny—the men, in short, of desperate fortunes, who, having been made the confidants of the Prince's dreams, determined that they should become realities. His nerve failed him, according to the most reliable accounts, ten times every day. And so again with the Italian war of '59. If it had not been for Cavour and Orsini, that war would no more have taken place than has the war the Emperor has been dreaming of ever since the Prussian victories of '66. And again with Mexico; in the outset it was the determination of M. de Morny and the Empress combined which brought about that never-enough-to-be-reprobated expedition. The external world made its "Emperor" according to a species of traditional image, and set it up, and said "this is he;" but "he" was all the while nothing of the kind, as his intimates were for ever repeating. After Mexico came Von Bismarck and the collapse of Austria; and a corresponding collapse became visible in the ruler of France. Since that day—since the day when there was really a man with a will in Europe—the phantom "ogre of the Seine" has vanished. Neither at home nor abroad has he any more terror spread around him, and the truth of Cardinal Antonelli's famous words has grown evident: "Walk up to him boldly, and he will always recede."

But the fact of Louis Napoleon's weakness being found out does not make the situation more easy or more agreeable. France has no institutions, no men, and no school wherein to form men for the future. I speak this of the classes whence politicians are taken—of what in England are called the "governing classes;" but if you descend a step lower—if you examine the lower classes, the "masses," you start back in affright at the monstrous amount of ignorance you find. Not only is instruction, learning, whatsoever comes under the term "education," wanting, but there is a total failure of the special teaching which is necessary to the poor at every hour of their lives. You will hardly believe me if I tell you that in the provinces the daughters of peasants learn neither how to sew nor how to cook! French peasants are deplorably ill-fed; but as much comes from the ignorance of the mother of the family as from insufficient means. Try to tell a French peasant's wife how she may make a good and nutritious soup out of breast and flaps of mutton, with a bit of beef-bone, and she will snarl at you, and say you want her to feed on "offal" because she is poor, and you, "the rich man," want to keep the proper pieces of meat for yourself. Give her a couple of pounds of good rump of beef if you will, and she does not know how to make it into soup. She will either put it into six times the water it requires, or put in the water hot, or boil it, or in some way spoil it completely. Nay, for that matter, the rarest thing going is, even in Paris, to find any cook, man or woman, knowing how to make a genuinely good pot au feu. This fact is well known to the French soldier, who is the only true maker of a first-rate pot au feu, and who looks on aghast at the muddle made of this excellent food by cooks "in kitchens." The simple fact is that they don't learn, and that, throughout the land, neither the peasant's wife nor the girl who hires herself out to small households in towns as a cook has ever learnt how to make the best of her raw material. Well, then, the consequence is that the laboring man is mostly fed upon a sort of hog-wash made of carrots, turnips, and cabbages, boiled in water, mashed and hashed together, into which, on "great days," a nasty bit of hard, ill-salted pork is shoved. So much for the cooking. As to the needle-and-thread business, I would ask any observant traveller to look at the way in which the clothes worn by the female peasants are mended. Patches are admitted everywhere, and a patch may be of a different color or stuff from the garment itself; but it is in the way in which a patch is inserted and sewn in that you recognize the careful housewife. On the blouses and trowsers of a French laborer you will seldom see a patch neatly put. It will be puckered in one corner, or the edges will be left jagged, so as to make them liable to catch in something and tear out again. It is never "clean work." And this is the ruling fault throughout this country; no one is taught the value of clean work. What precision is inwardly to a man's character and mind it is outwardly to the fashion of his work; above all is precision necessary to women. This is not the fault of the poor people themselves. There are no schools in which they can learn what they most need. A wretchedly insufficient number of these exist, in which Jesuits, or Frères Ignorantins, or Sisters of Charity, teach as ill as possible a certain sum of that knowledge which comes under the head of "education;" but of what the "housewife" will require in her poor little ménage, so as to make her husband more comfortable and her children cleaner—of that no French child in town or country ever learns anything.

Much of all this absence of proper, practical, and what I would call "professional" education (above all, for women) is ascribed to the influence of the clergy; and undoubtedly the Jesuits have done all they could to keep the population in darkness. But that does not bear upon technical instruction. The Jesuit will, if he can, keep a man from learning history faithfully and truly; but there is nothing in the fact of knowing how to sew or to cook which prevents superstitious practices; therefore, the Jesuit would have no objection to that. A woman may make the best soup in the world, and write letters to the Virgin—which she devoutly believes the Virgin replies to! One does not prevent the other. No; it is simply that the want of the sort of practical education I allude to has never been adverted to—that is all.

This question of education, as connected with the clergy, does, however, bring one to perhaps the most radical foundation of morality and immorality in France. Little by little the two parties—one in favor of obscurantism, the other in favor of enlightenment—are growing more decided and doing battle more openly as the Œcumenical Council at Rome is looming in the distance. At the head of the modern liberals stand the Père Hyacinthe, the Père Gratry, the Archbishop of Paris, and a few others of their description—and a hot time they are beginning to have of it now. The event which, in this respect, has created the greatest sensation is the last meeting held in Paris by the International Peace League. The Père Gratry, prevented from attending in person, wrote a letter to the president, which was publicly read, in which he said that the state elections proved that France was determined (and equally so) upon two things—upon freedom and upon peace. After this letter had been read, and Messrs. Michel Chevalier and Passy had made their speeches, the Père Hyacinthe delivered an oration upon peace and upon the conquests of modern science and industry which is still ringing in the ears of the Ultramontanists. But this subject would lead too far at the close of a letter. In a future one, I will enter more at length into the female education question; the disputes of the clergy and the university; the Bishop of Orleans and M. Duruy; the freethinkers and the Princesse de Beauvais' admirable establishment; the union of science with faith—and the results all this leads to.

Correspondence.

THE PHILOLOGICAL CONVENTION.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: The "literary note" in your last number, on the subject of the late Philological Convention at Poughkeepsie, touches the main points of interest in its action so fairly that little more need be said about it; yet, to one or two points there suggested, it may be well to direct a little further attention. The convention was properly regarded by those most interested in it as a decided success; the more gratifying inasmuch as men had doubted before whether American scholars in this department had enough esprit de corps—enough enlightened interest in the higher phases of their work—to bring them together in any respectable number. To see assembled a hundred men—professors, teachers, and private scholars—whose main study was language and literature, was cheering to the eyes of those who love sound learning. That many were wanting who should have been in the gathering was so much the worse for them; their lack of faith in the movement this time was natural and excusable; perhaps they will see reason to do better next year. The spirit of the assemblage, too, was all that could be desired; no one seemed to have come with "an axe to grind," or with the selfish intent to thrust his little self and his little concerns unduly before the public eye. No time was lost in wrangling over matters incapable of settlement, or in tedious discussion of business details; and it was refreshing to behold a constitution of forty lines adopted without dissent in five minutes, under the efficient management of the Constituent Committee's representative, and the convention, in the sequel, resolved into an association, and in full operation as such, in about five minutes more. That the time of the meeting was always occupied by the most important subjects, and duly apportioned to their several importance, no one will claim; but all the papers offered by their authors were read, and most of them talked over, with what fulness and insight there was time and talent for. Our philological brigade is not yet so organized as to have its acknowledged chiefs, commissioned from above; nor is it likely ever to be so well disciplined as to assemble simply to listen to and obey any such chiefs. While the general average of our philology is as low as it is, the average merit of the utterances of our philological conventions cannot be very high; for the one must of course represent the other. We have many scholars who, in their pent-up spheres of labor, do not know what their fellows have already learned and left behind them, and what are the living questions of the time; and they cannot well avoid exposing themselves a little, before they find out. And we have not many scholars, perhaps, who, in a field so long and so thoroughly cultivated as philology, can do work whose results, if brought out before the eyes of the world, would be deemed real contributions to philological science.

The paper which had most decidedly this character at the late meeting was one on the methods of etymologizing in our native Indian languages; and the convention showed, by the warm interest with which they received it, how well they appreciated its character, and how ready they were to accept and profit by things of solid worth. The highest degree of enthusiasm awakened was called out by the appearance and words of one who had spent forty years laboring as a missionary among the Indians of Canada—one of those men, lovers of knowledge as well as of religion, who in so many lands do honor to the name of American missionary. Indeed, the amount of attention given to our aboriginal tongues—that vast field of philological exploration which lies nearest to us, inviting and demanding our labor—was one of the gratifying features of the occasion. Far too much of the time of the convention, no doubt, was occupied with discursive and pointless disquisitions on matters connected with general philologic pedagogy (not including the subject of pronunciation, the discussion of which was timely and able, and the result reached a valuable one); and this was so keenly felt by many of the members that the same mistake can hardly be made again. The paper to which you take especial exception—the elaborate derogation of classical studies in the guise of their extollation—appeared to be condemned by the general sense, as conceived in the wrong tone and style. If papers of this class, however, are to be excluded, it must be mainly by the pressure of better ones. And no American scholar need have been restrained from offering the best work he is capable of producing by fear of finding an audience inattentive and unappreciative.

The main use of the organization, it should seem, must be to make our scholars in language acquainted with one another, to teach them severally what the rest are thinking and talking of, and to stimulate them to productive effort outside the class-room. Where and how what is produced shall be placed on permanent record is a matter of minor consequence. For the establishment of a journal, for the exercise of any critical control over the philological force of the country, such a society is too miscellaneous and too little centralized. But a small part of what is best among the papers of the kindred scientific association finds its way to the public through the proceedings of that body. And how small a part of its papers are fit to be brought before the wider scientific public at all! How much is aimed over the heads of the Association itself at the ladies and the laymen in the outskirts and in the galleries! N one who has the interests of American science truly at heart comes away from one of those meetings without a strong dash of mortification through his satisfaction. That it will be thus with the Philological Association also there is no good reason to doubt. Yet, so long as on the whole it shall accomplish good, and be one of the agencies tending to raise the character of American scholarship, our duty will plainly be to keep it alive and labor earnestly for its prosperity.

Who knows but the new Association may contribute an item toward the settlement of the conflict now raging as to the respective advantages of a scientific and classical training, by showing how a crowd of philologists behave when they get together; how wisely and how well, in point of style and spirit, they talk and write; and what superior appreciation they show of the real claims of studies lying outside their own beats! Certainly, if they are to justify the assumptions of some among their number, they need to set a shining example in all these respects. And they must be prepared for sharp criticism on the part of the public that is looking on from without, and that will not fail to draw its comparisons.

We have made, as you truly say, a promising beginning: what it will lead to must be determined hereafter. No such thing succeeds without hard work on the part of a good many persons; and those who stand aloof, ready in case of failure to say, "I told you so," will have the satisfaction of feeling that they have helped the fulfilment of their own forebodings. There has been thus far, in this country, no organized body of men whose business it was to hear and judge essays in all the different branches of philological science; there has been, and still is, no periodical in which such essays could look and feel at home. The Philological Association promises to take away from us one of these reproaches; it may be hoped that its influence will lead to the removal of the other also.

August 9, 1869. T. P.

Notes.

LITERARY.

MESSRS. D. APPLETON & Co. announce "The Suez Ship Canal," by E. Hepple Hall.——Messrs. J. B. Lippincott & Co. announce "The History of Canada from its First Discovery to the Present Time"—a very good subject, indeed; "Erling the Bold: a Tale of the Norse Sea-Kings," by Mr. Ballantyne, the author of "Deep Down;" "Adventures of a Baltimore Trader on the Coast of the Pacific," by Mr. Geo. Standish; "A Wreath of Rhymes" and "Poems," the one by "Millie Mayfield" and the other to be published under the equally good name of "Xariffa;" a new work by "Ouida;" Volumes II. and III. of Allibone's "Dictionary," which complete that desirable book; Globe editions of "Wordsworth" and "Burns;" and nineteen or twenty volumes of pocket editions of "English Classics," such as the "Vicar of Wakefield," "Collins and Gray," "Goldsmith," "Locke on the Human Understanding," Falconer's "Shipwreck," Thomson's "Seasons," St. Pierre's "Paul and Virginia," Madame Cottin's "Elizabeth, or the Exiles of Siberia," and a dozen others of the old favorites—"classics" or not. A set of "unclassics" would be a welcome gift from some right-minded publisher—some of the old good-for-nothing books that used to have the credit of unsettling the female mind, but over which the female mind of our better day would preserve a perfect equilibrium—books like the "Female Don Quixote" and the "Thaddeus of Warsaw" and other tales of wonder, out of which amusement would still be got by a good number of readers.——Mr. P. Donahoe announces "The Irish Widow's Son; or, The Pikeman of '98," by Mr. Con O'Leary.——"The Spanish Barber" is a story of the dissemination of the Scriptures in Spain by the author of "Mary Powell." It is to be issued by Mr. M. W. Dodd.——Fields, Osgood & Co. do not yet make their fall announcements, but they add to their list "Sermons by Stopford Brooke."——Messrs. Kelly, Piet & Co. have in press "The Life of Madame Louise de France," "The Life and Revelations of St. Gertrude;" "The Day Sanctified: being Meditations and Spiritual Readings for Daily Use," selected from the works of Saints and approved writers, and a set of Miss Edgeworth's "Parent's Assistant," "Popular Tales," and "Moral Tales."——Mr. George A. Leavitt announces "Remember," an illustrated keepsake annual, by Mr. and Mrs. R. H. Stoddard, which is a gift-book for 1870; "From Year to Year," another illustrated annual, by the Misses Cary; "Women of Worth and Beauty," which also is illustrated, and a gift-book; "The Shakespeare Annual;" and new editions of "Byron," "Burns," "Pope," "Scott," "Cowper," "Moore," and "Fielding."——Among their technical medical works Messrs. Lindsay & Blakiston announce three which may prove to be worth lay attention: "Fœticide, or Criminal Abortion"—a lecture by Professor Hodge, of the University of Pennsylvania; "On Athletic Training and Health," by Dr. Harrison; and "On the Human Hair," by Dr. Baeder.——Messrs. G. P. Putnam & Son announce for republication "Christopher Kenrick," by the author of "Blindpits."——Roberts Brothers announce "Roman Imperialism"—the recent article by Professor Seeley, the author of "Ecce Homo;" and "Tales from the Old Dramatists," by Shirley Brooks, who has struck a mine worth working.

—The last New Englander contains several purely secular articles of great interest, and, amongst others, one on the Alabama question from President Woolsey; being a careful and elaborate statement of the opinions which were hastily expressed in his College lectures, of which an imperfect report appeared two months ago. There is nothing new in the ground he takes, but he fortifies it with more care and precision. He deals first with what we may call the "fons et origo malorum" theory about the Queen's Proclamation, which formed the weft of Mr. Sumner's speech, and leaves hardly a shred of it. His treatment of the great "pacific blockade" theory, which formed the warp of the speech, he deals with in the same manner. In fact, he denies it any place whatever in international law, and says it is a "nondescript—half lion, half lamb." Responsibility for the Alabama doings, however, he brings home to England with unanswerable force; and we recommend all orators and writers who have it in contemplation to give vent to their feelings hereafter on this subject to study the article. We are sorry to see that he makes no mention of Senator Sumner's application of the "law of nuisance" to the Alabama case. This we have always looked on as the spiciest and most original portion of the speech, and are disappointed in finding it passed over without notice.

—The "University of the State of New York," which has just held a sixth annual "convocation" in the Assembly Chamber at Albany, is an entity as to whose status there is some degree of misapprehension in the popular mind. Most of the newspapers which have noticed that anniversary have done so under the heading "College Commencements;" and the more prominent of the "regents of the university" there assembled—such as Chancellor Pruyn, Vice-Chancellor Verplanck, and Generals Wetmore and Leavenworth—have been classified as "eminent instructors." Many well-informed people confound the body in question with the "University of the City of New York;" others believe it to be a legal fiction; and even that fountain-head of authority, Webster's Unabridged Dictionary, has been obliged to devote a separate paragraph, under the word university, to define the eccentric New York institution which under that name bewilders all ordinary minds. If, then, this venerable myth be not, as has been so generally believed, a legal fiction, but, as Chancellor Pruyn has recently felt justified in calling it, "a glorious reality," we have reason to rejoice that an institution of such magnificent possibilities has come out of the dead past into the living present. For it is undeniable, that during the half-century which preceded the first session of the "convocation" in 1863, that body had very illy answered the requirements of a university in either the English or American sense of that elastic word. But we would fain believe that better days have dawned. The several annual sessions of the University convocation have been very useful gatherings, and have steadily grown in influence and popular appreciation. The sixth anniversary, just celebrated, was more numerously attended than ever, was honored by the presence of eminent educators, discussed "live" subjects, and came to useful conclusions.

—Among new English books of Poetry we find mentioned one by the widow of the late Mr. T. K. Hervey, a literary journalist of some repute. "Our Legends and Our Lives" is the title of the work, and its author's name is Eleanora Louisa Hervey. It is described as being of the nature of gift-book poetry, which description would answer for most of Mr. Hervey's verse, a volume of which was published a year or two ago by Messrs. Ticknor & Fields. To the three Cornish "Mysteries" hitherto known a fourth has been added. It was discovered by the Rev. Mr. Robert Williams, the author of a Cornish Dictionary, who, with a Mr. Wynne, was engaged in cataloguing a collection of manuscripts known as the Hengwert and Peniarth manuscripts. "The Ballad History of the Wonderful Derby Ram, detailed from its stupendous origin to its tragical termination in a series of Imaginative Sketches, and with an Introduction and Notes," is the work of Mr. Priestman Atkinson and Mr. Alfred Wallis, the latter having furnished the prefatory and explanatory matter. Mr. William Morris has decided to publish the volume of autumn tales which are to form a part of his "Earthly Paradise," in November next, instead of waiting till May, when the winter tales will be ready, and the work will be completed. A Mr. David Johnston has executed a new line-for-line translation of the Divine Comedy. He employs blank verse, and his work is commended by those who have seen it; but most of the curious who may wish to compare it with Mr. Longfellow's translation will be disappointed, as the three volumes are privately printed. Of more interest than any publication that we have yet mentioned under the head of poetry, is the "Life, Letters, Prose Remains, and Poems of Arthur Hugh Clough," which will have an appreciative and loving American audience, if not so large a one as it will have in England. No doubt the two volumes which Messrs. Macmillan & Co. announce will contain all that was in the volume which was privately printed some years ago, and is known to a few of the American admirers of the poet, whom some think the poet most characteristic of this nineteenth century of ours, and to whom it is possible to give higher praise than that. Mr. G. W. Edginton puts forth the second volume of his translation of the "Odyssey," done into a kind of so-called verse invented by himself. The Early English Text Society intends to issue early next year a long alliterative poem on the Fall of Troy, which Mr. Robert Morris declares to be the production of some West Midland poet, and which Mr. D. Donaldson, on the other hand, declares to be by the Scotch poet, Hucheowne, the writer of several alliterative poems, who is conjecturally indentified with Sir Hugh Eglinton. Mr. Laing's "Select Remains of the Ancient Popular Poetry of Scotland" goes into a new edition, and in October there is to be a complete edition of Sir David Lyndesay's works.

—We may place among books of English fiction the "Aventures d'Alice au Pays de Merveilles," which is a translation of the Rev. Mr. Lewis Carroll's now famous story-book, which has reached its sixteenth edition in English, and has been translated into German. Alice was originally put in print, we hear, for the author's own children, but she bids fair to delight millions of people, big and little, outside of her native parsonage. A work of another writer for children, the Rev. Mr. George Macdonald's "Seaboard Parish," goes into a second edition. Messrs. Trübner & Co. announce a translation by Captain H. Rogers, R. E., of a Burmese book of fables, entitled "Buddhahosha's Parables." Professor Max Müller furnishes an introduction, which contains Buddha's "Dhammapadam," or Path to Virtue. And here we may mention that Mr. Otto Kistner has just issued through Messrs. Trübner & Co. a bibliographical work containing the titles of almost a thousand works, greater or smaller, on Buddha and Buddhism—a list which is supplemented by Mr. William E. A. Axon, who, in the last number of Trübner's American and Oriental Literary Record, gives thirty-three titles of books and articles which had escaped Mr. Kistner's attention. Among works in History and Biography the one which bids fair to be most interesting is a life of Lord Palmerston, which is to be done by Sir Henry Bulwer. It is said that Palmerston left behind him a very full diary, extending back as far as 1827, and that his widow has put it into the hands of Sir Henry. Another book of secret history is the "Memoirs" of the Honorable William Wickham, a gentleman who was employed by the English Ministry, during the wars against Napoleon, to distribute the British gold which kept England's allies up to their work. The anecdotes related are said to be very amusing, and the revelations made to be of a surprising character. Of notes of travel we find two or three worth mention: Mr. Hepworth Dixon is to "do" Russia, which country he is soon to visit. Mr. Consul Petherick and his wife have written "Travels in Central Asia; an Exploration of the Western Nile Tributaries." A country about which little is known, British Guiana, is treated of by Joseph Beaumont, late Chief-Justice of the colony. "Five Years in British Guiana: a Description of that Country and its Peoples, and an Account of their Political and Social Condition," is the title of the work, which ought to be fresh and interesting. Among scientific works announced or newly published, one that the general reader will probably find as interesting as any other is by Dr. Charles Elam, and is entitled "A Physician's Problems," which is described not very lucidly as "a contribution to the natural history of Thought and Action, Brain, Mind, and Nerves." Perhaps the reader may be helped by learning that one of the chapters deals with "Reverie and Abstraction," another with "Moral and Criminal Epidemics," and another with "Natural Heritage." Sir James Clark, M.D., has written a memoir of Dr. John Conolly, in which he gives an account of the present improved system of treating the insane in England and other countries. Under the head of Science we suppose we may put a reply to Mr. Mill's "Subjection of Women." It is anonymous, and has the undescriptive title of "The Grosvenor Papers." And perhaps we may range under the same head "An Entirely New and Complete System of Universal Line Writing and Steno-Phonography," which is by Mr. Melville Bell, whose name most of our readers will recollect as that of the inventor of a system of "visible speech" which was more successful as a realization of an old dream than most people expected. A book that may be classed as Miscellaneous, which will have an interest for certain sections of the reading public, is "A Report by the Committee on Intemperance from the Lower House of Convocation of the Province of Canterbury"—that same province being in all probability the spot on the earth's surface where there is most drinking and most drunkenness.

—At the head of the new English books pertaining to Theology and Religion—at the head of them so far as concerns the interest taken in such books by the untheological reader—is the announced "Select Correspondence of Keble." At the request of the poet's representatives the Rev. Dr. Moberly has undertaken the task of editor, and notice is given that any one who has in possession important or characteristic letters of Mr. Keble will confer a favor by communicating with Dr. Moberly on the subject. We may add that, on application made by Mr. Browning, Mr. Tennyson, Lord Russell, Herman Merivale, and others equally distinguished, the Dean of Westminster has given the required permission for the erection in Poet's Corner of a tablet to Keble's memory. Another work of some general interest is Mr. S. Baring-Gould's "Origin and Development of Religious Beliefs." It is, perhaps, likely to be curious rather than very weighty; though, for that matter, it as likely to be as decidedly polemical as anything else, for Mr. Gould is a Ritualist of an advanced type, and has already struck some telling blows in print at his opponents, whom he hates with a good, sound, theological hatred; apparently he does; at all events, he hits out with quite a degree of viciousness, and is at the same time facetious, and enjoys the spilling of blood. The Rev. Mr. Orby Shipley, who is very well known as a Ritualist leader—or rather file-leader—issues a new edition of a volume of his Ascetic Library—namely, the "Counsels upon Holiness of Life," which is from the Spanish of Luis de Granada. Whatever else he may be, Mr. Shipley is an editor of taste and judgment. That is to say, he is an editor of judgment so far as concerns catering to his own public, which is a public that reads eagerly the almost impossible things of Faber—things which are actually written, or one would hardly believe they could be; and he is an editor of taste so far as regards the external appearance of his books, which is always pretty enough to tempt the reader, and which we wish our other religious editors and publishing committees would imitate. An American theological or religious work is nine times in ten so repulsive in the matter of print, paper, and binding as to give needless pain to any person of susceptibility, and, we really have little doubt, partly to neutralize the good which may be done by the contents of the volume. "What is Ritualism?" is by an anonymous author who calls himself "Excelsior," but whom Ritualists would not allow that name, for he is so Low Church that, after being severe with the advanced High Church for several pages, he closes his pamphlet with the prophecy that "Ritualism will be exposed, formalism abolished, and the Church purified from the pollution." Another work on the same side of the Anglo-Catholic controversy is "The Advance of Popery in this Country," by Mr. J. C. Philpot, a Fellow of Worcester, Oxford. It is said to be eloquent, but to lack notes and an index. "Broad," rather than "High" or "Low" or "Anglo-Catholic," we take Mr. Augustus Clissold to be. He has written a two-shilling pamphlet on the question, "The Centre of Unity: What is it? Charity or Authority?" And while the controversy thus rages as to the doctrines of the Church, and it seems as if she must be rent in twain, or into many parts, the attack on the temporalities begun by the disestablishment of the Irish branch of the Church has to be met, and will not be resisted by the united factions, which are quarrelling with each other spiritually; for if the Ritualistic party could have their way, there is little doubt that we should see disestablishment in England before two years were over. However, there are enough to fight disestablishment without the Anglo-Catholics, and a very firm and united front we may rely on the others to show, whatever may be their private opinions of each other's future state. Mr. Charles Hastings Collette is already out with "A Reply to Cobbett's History of the Protestant Reformation in England and Ireland." Mr. Collette edits and compiles the labors of others.

—A rumor has been current that Punch has just been sold by Messrs. Bradbury & Evans for what at first glance seems the very small sum of £7,000. So famous a paper could hardly be worth less, we suppose; especially a paper published among a people who are not particularly quick-witted, and who have believed in Punch years enough to make it quite certain that it may be stupid for quite a number of years without being found out by its public. For some little time, however, it has been found out by its more discerning readers, especially by its American readers, who during the war had their eyes wonderfully opened to the dulness of all jokers whose jokes were cracked on the wrong side. But the fact is, that whatever it was that opened people's eyes, when once they were opened, there was the stupidity plainly to be seen. Always, indeed, except in its very great days—the days of Blanchard, Thackeray, and Jerrold—its main dependence was on its draughtsmen and on an occasional lucky hit, rather than on anything like sustained excellence; but of late years it has had neither the one nor the other, and the aged jester has long given the spectator a pretty unmixed sensation, not very mirth-provoking, of the same sort that he gets when he sees the rheumatic old clown grimacing on the sawdust where he can no longer win golden opinions. And apart from its inferiority to its former self, it has latterly had a good many rivals, each not much, if at all, inferior to itself. The Tomahawk has had some full-page pictures, or cartoons, as they are called, which have been better than anything Punch has had since the Tomahawk began operations—indeed, have been so remarkable some of them, for grim imaginative power as to take them at once up into the region of true art. So of the Vanity Fair caricatures—to call them so—they have been of a high order of artistic excellence, and have made the paper in which they appeared more desirable than Punch; and to mention no other rivals, for a long time Fun has been, so far as we can see, quite as good as its patriarchal contemporary. The new owner of Punch—if it really has a new owner—is a Mr. Agnew, of Manchester, who will perhaps infuse some new blood into its veins, as everybody will be glad to see him do, despite the sins of his patient.

LANDSCAPE ARCHITECTURE IN CHICAGO.*

THESE two pamphlets are complements of each other, and, taken together, give a comprehensive synopsis of the general facts bearing on the subject of parks for cities, and valuable suggestions as to the way in which the experience of other cities may be of service to Chicago. Each pamphlet is characteristic of the tastes and occupations of its author. The larger, by Dr. Rauch, is full of statistics and generalizing, and is chiefly valuable as an encyclopedic article on the subject. The author brings together a great deal of useful and interesting detail about the past and present of public grounds; and, in order to omit nothing, begins his enquiries at the period when the Garden of Eden was opened to the public. Then he carries the reader through religious, classical, and modern history, and comes on down to the Central and Prospect Parks—the two last great works about which we have any definite knowledge—and proves conclusively that a demand for parks is innate in man; that parks are necessary for the happiness and welfare of communities of men; that Chicago is a community of men; and that, therefore, a park or parks are essential to the present and future prosperity of Chicago. He wisely abstains from advising how or where to lay out the great park; but the importance of having one, and having it as soon as possible, he duly enforces.

In enumerating the public grounds of great cities, Dr. Rauch is more polite than discriminating in his description and judgments. Thus, in speaking of Boston, he says: "The Public Garden, which was once a portion of the Common, is now separated from it by Charles Street, and will soon rival it for beauty and usefulness." This, we think, must be gentle sarcasm if the doctor has an eye for effective and tasteful treatment of public grounds, or else it is flattery, as competent judges of such kinds of beauty consider that garden a fine monument of wasted opportunity. To call the drive round the muddy basin in Providence near the railroad depot a park is civil, but it is a misuse of language; and to praise the squares of Philadelphia, sacrificed, as they are, to the straight and diagonal walks and rows of soft maples and horse-chestnuts is encouraging the rest of the country to follow a very bad example. Dr. Rauch thinks that the part of Fairmount Park which has been for several years public property is tastefully laid out, and is a delightful place. Its situation, trees, and water deserve praise; and to escape from the dust and heat of the city to find such a breathing-place is delightful; but it is no better laid out or improved than the Boston Public Garden, and both of them should cover those who laid them out with discredit rather than honor. About one-third of the pamphlet is given up to the sanitary part of the subject. Here Dr. Rauch is strong, and the facts he brings together deserve attention, and are as important to the rest of the country as to Chicago.

Mr. Cleveland approaches the subject from a different point of view. He is a professional landscape gardener, of long experience and good taste. Casting aside all questions of health and tradition, he discusses the æsthetics of the subject. He divides his pamphlet between Boston and Chicago; Boston and its vicinity, with its hills and rocks, offering opportunities the opposite of those which belong to the nearly dead level of Chicago. He counsels Boston to convert her suburbs, the winding roads, picturesque ledges, and tree-clad hills of Dorchester, Roxbury, and Brookline, into a great park, by bringing every road to the perfection of a park-drive, and planting and decorating the roadsides, waste places, corner lots, and public areas. Such a system of treatment would greatly beautify the environs of the city, and is desirable under any circumstances, but, we think, rather as the introduction to a park and an adjunct of it than as its substitute. It is true, such a plan admits of indefinite extension, and permits the purchase of large areas which might be added to the general system, and then be laid out as lawn, meadow, or water. Without such open areas to give breadth of effect and great contrasts of light and shadow, form and color, there would be a fatiguing sameness in the plan proposed. However beautiful detail may be, and however varied in its application, we weary of it unless it is often relieved by the contrast of simplicity; the dead level of a snow-covered lake in winter is often as beautiful as the play and sparkle of its water in summer; a wide reach of meadow, without a tree upon it, as pleasing as the most effective combinations of trees and flowers. Broad meadows and long vistas, bounded by a group of trees, say, a pleasant view, a fountain, or a sheet of water, are especially agreeable to those who live in thickly-settled places, where enclosures, houses, and people seem to "pre-empt" the air and sky, and forbid even the thoughts to wander out of the public highway. However perfectly Boston may lay out and enrich her highways and byways, let her never substitute what they give for the variety and grand effects that might be produced in many eligible areas which could be obtained by the city at a moderate price. When Mr. Cleveland turns to Chicago, with her level plains, he feels the want of variety, and dreads the tameness and sameness which is liable to follow any system that may be adopted in laying out a great park under such circumstances. Of course, the difficulties are very great, and the most skilful person will be unable to produce as much beauty or variety as come naturally with surfaces like the Central, Prospect, or Fairmount Parks; but the occasion should stimulate the artist; and, with money and time, a man of genius can make on the most level prairie a park which almost would leave nothing to be desired. Our author is less dismayed by the park on the prairie than by the long boulevard of fourteen miles which is to sustain and connect many little parks and squares. This boulevard will be three hundred feet wide, and gives little opportunity for variety. Mr. Cleveland thinks the wearying repetition of any kind of plantation may be relieved by converting the whole into an arboretum, where trees and shrubs planted in families can interest not only by their beauty, but by the facts of their family history. But, however scientific or tasteful the plantation may be along this boulevard, fourteen miles of it is sure to be tedious, if taken as a whole. That, however, is what it never will be; it will be seen and visited in sections, and if treated locally—contrasting, perhaps, one section with another, sometimes breaking away from trees entirely, and using only shrubs and flowers, grass, margins, or architectural adornment—sameness may be avoided, and a visitor kept actively interested all the time.

When men like Dr. Rauch and Mr. Cleveland begin to discuss carefully these subjects public attention will be aroused, and we may believe that good results will follow, and that not Chicago and Boston only, but all the large cities and towns in the United States will have their Prater, or Bois de Boulogne, or Champs Elysées, or Central Park.

* "Public Parks; with Special Reference to the City of Chicago. By John H. Rauch, M.D." Chicago: S. C. Griggs & Co.
"The Public Grounds of Chicago. By H. W. S. Cleveland." Chicago: Charles D. Lakey.

CURRENT FRENCH LITERATURE.

IN our ordinary apprehension of individual death, the more sweeping catastrophe of the extinction of the entire human species seldom occurs to us. Dr. P. J. B. Cherubin has not only thought of it, but given the subject serious study, as is shown in his "De l'Extinction des Espèces: Etudes Biologiques sur quelques unes des Lois qui régissent la Vie." No more than individuals, he says, have races indefinite duration; the fact of the existence of innumerable human generations does not prove the contrary; for the period embraced by them, however long it may appear as contrasted with the duration of human life, is, after all, but an insignificant space when compared with the thousands of ages that have elapsed since the origin of our globe. Palæontology demonstrates that species totally differing from those we see around us once existed on the earth and in the waters. Notwithstanding the immense distance we go back in the past by the aid of this science, and the tributes it brings by almost daily discoveries, no vestige of proof has yet been discovered authorizing the belief that species once obliterated have again, after any lapse of time, returned to light. True, these discoveries may serve to connect broken links in the chain of beings, or fill voids that have separated certain races one from another; but that is all. Such is the main idea of the author's thesis. His work is not so much a statement of discoveries made in palæontology and biology as deduction and reasoning from the mass of facts scientifically recognized and classified. On one capital point he appears to us wanting not only in clearness, but in fairness. The question of extinction is argued as though extinction had always been the result of gradual organic deterioration and ultimate decay, and allowance is not made for exterior causes, which have often been potent, such as climatic changes, deluges, earthquakes, and other convulsions of nature. And regarding Dr. Cherubin's idea of the insignificant period covered by the existence of innumerable human generations, we must say that it appears to us to be of formidable duration. If, at the expiration of more than forty or fifty centuries—to take only the extremest minimum claimed—there is not yet any perceptible symptom of deterioration, the extinction of the human race from gradual decay must be distant beyond calculation. In fact—leaving out of consideration, as being forms ideal or idealized, the figures left us by Greek art, which is almost as old as our earliest recorded history—the evidence would seem to show that, even as an animal merely, man does not deteriorate with the lapse of ages, but is improved.

During the past decade, the literary life of Switzerland has been most active, running mainly in the direction of historical studies and the reproduction of ancient MSS. of the mediæval and Reformation periods. Every canton has its Historical Society, the enthusiasm of their labor of love appears to have created an entente cordiale between Catholics and Protestants, and in the "Archiv des Schweizerischen Piusvereins" and the "Helvetia Sacra" the Swiss press furnish solid proofs of their successful researches. Archæological studies are also cultivated with energy, and a work lately published at Lausanne, on the age of stone, the age of bronze, and the age of iron, might serve as an introduction to the essay by Dr. Cherubin of which we have just been speaking. It is "Monuments de l'Antiquité dans l'Europe Barbare," by Frédéric Troyon, who enjoys a certain reputation as the author of "The Fossil Man," or syllabus of studies on the most ancient traces of the existence of man. It is an archæological arsenal.

Any one seeking information concerning the internal affairs of Cuba may find it in "Réformes dans les Iles de Cuba et de Porto Rico," by Porfirio Valiente, with a preface by Edouard Laboulaye. It does not appear from the work who Señor Valiente is, or what have been his opportunities for the acquisition of his knowledge, but he is certainly at home in his subject; his information is full, detailed, and apparently accurate, and a man "endorsed" by Laboulaye is not a person to be slighted. The history of the two colonies of Porto Rico and Cuba, all the questions—political, administrative, economical, and social, including those of slavery and the coolies—are treated with fulness and with what we are disposed to think entire command of the subject; certainly the statement of the Cuba question, so far as it has formed part of the politics and diplomatic history of the United States, is thorough and able. At page 227, the author states that, during the presidency of Mr. Polk, at a time when the Spanish treasury was exhausted, and a heavy war-debt was pressing on the Government, the then American Minister at Madrid proposed to the Spanish Minister of Foreign Affairs the cession of Cuba. The proposition was favorably entertained, and the price of the "Pearl" fixed at a hundred millions of dollars. The Cabinet at Washington approved of what was done, and authorized our Minister at Madrid to close the negotiation—endeavoring, if possible, to obtain some reduction in the price. Meantime, the secretary of the American Legation at Madrid, whom the Minister, on account of his ignorance of the Spanish language, had been obliged to call in as interpreter, visited Paris, where, at a dinner with some friends, he spoke of the negotiation. The intelligence was immediately transmitted to London by some one present, and, as a matter of course, the English Government interfered to prevent the consummation of the sale. Another illustration of the value of our system of regulating the civil service. We feel a reasonable certainty that the author of this work must be the Don Porfirio Valiente long known here in New York as an ardent and intelligent champion of Cuban independence—the same who accompanied Lopez on his fatal expedition, afterwards practised law in this city, and for some time edited a paper in the Spanish language—El Porvenir.

It is not often that Brazil favors us with a literary work. Yet here is "La Science et les Systèmes. Questions d'Histoire et de Philosophie Naturelle," by Don Pedro Americo Figueiredo e Mello: dedicated, with "eternal gratitude," to His Majesty the Emperor of Brazil, and published at Brussels. In its arrangement and groupings of historical development it is creditable to the infant literature of the empire, but it is not particularly strong or original in its reasonings.

"Seize Mois autour du Monde, 1867-69," by Jacques Siegfried, takes us pleasantly by Constantinople, Athens, Smyrna, Syria, Palestine, Alexandria, Cairo, the Red Sea, Bombay, Agra, Benares, Calcutta, Japan, over the Pacific to San Francisco, and across the Rocky Mountains to the Valley of the Mississippi. The author does not say so, but there is internal evidence showing that he travelled as an agent, either commercial or diplomatic, of the French Government. M. Siegfried is an Alsatian, and therefore has more of the modern idea of commercial enterprise than his countrymen of Southern and Eastern France. It is thus, we suppose, that he gives in his preface a glimpse of the situation at home, which is quite as interesting to the American reader as any of his trans-oceanic sketches. He complains of the absence of French enterprise. He finds the young men of England, America, or Germany numerous and active in China and Japan, taking home with them not only fortunes, but experience and enlarged ideas. In France, on the contrary, he complains they are still in the old beaten track, delving at Greek and Latin, strong in Greek mythology and in the names of the provinces that formed Alexander's empire, while profoundly ignorant of contemporary history and modern geography. Knowing nothing of modern languages, and particularly of the English, young Frenchmen are forced to search for a career in their own country. The first evil resulting is the close struggle for civil office at home; and this is so great that the ne plus ultra of the ambition of a careful father is to obtain for his son some such place, where he may earn just enough to obtain a livelihood filled with privations. And this state of things is far from changing for the better. Then, while the dissatisfied Liberals of Germany and England naturally seek independence in foreign countries, discontented French Liberals are kept at home, and with smothered aspirations become the stuff that révolutionnaires are made of. According to M. Siegfried, Bombay has heard of the great American rebellion. Thus it was: Up to 1861, Bombay exported annually from 300,000 to 400,000 bales of cotton, worth twelve millions of dollars. Failing the American supply of 4,000,000 of bales, a colossal rise took place, and cotton, until then in Bombay worth 80 or 100 rupees, rose at once to 700 rupees. Such a stimulus worked wonders, and Bombay exported a million of bales, worth more than $150,000,000. Oriental heads were turned; the wildest speculation set in; fifty new banks and companies had all their stock taken at fabulous prices; money no longer appeared to possess value. The only difficulty was how to invest it. The Back Bay Company, supposed to have deeply at heart the filling up of a small arm of the sea near the city, sold its first issue of stock at twelve times its nominal value. Every one counted his gains by the hundred thousand, and Premchund Roychund and some other native merchants became millionaires a hundred times over. Then, one fine May morning, came the news of Lee's surrender. Down went the card-houses; Back Bay, quoted at 60,000 rupees, sank to 150! Premchund Roychund failed for $150,000,000, without a cent of assets, and the famous Bank of Bombay melted into air.

The commercial question is evidently uppermost in the mind of our author, but he has, nevertheless, an eye for the beauties of nature and art. His official position made him the recipient of several superb Oriental fêtes, such as are seen by few travellers. And then he describes the Taj-Mahal. What young woman that has read "St. Elmo"—and what young woman has not?—does not recall the sensation of inferiority and reverence impressed upon her by our gifted Alabamian's use of those mysterious words? M. Siegfried's description of this "poem in marble"—the tomb of the beautiful Nourmahal—is enthusiastic; for he places it above the Alps, St. Peter's, Naples, the Bosphorus, Michael Angelo's Moses, the Raphaels and the Murillos, Baalbec, Karnak, and the Acropolis. Then he goes to Hong Kong, where of the commercial expenditure three hundred millions is for opium. At Shamien, near Hong Kong, he sees with mortification the French portion of the European reservation—a vast desert space, waiting for the arrival of some French house, and waiting in vain. "Is it not shameful," he exclaims, "that our young men have not had enterprise enough to take their share with English, Americans, and Germans of this grand Chinese commerce?" The appendix contains much valuable commercial information in the shape of reports to the French Minister of Foreign Affairs; and an excellent map accompanies the book, which we heartily commend.

A. De Gaston, who modestly describes himself as "tout à la fois artiste, journaliste, encyclopédiste et romancier," bestows upon us "Constantinople en 1869," and sets out with this startling proposition: "Born in America, which familiarized me when quite young with the idea of long voyages, I have long been animated with an immense desire to visit the Orient." There is room for long voyages, one would say, between some of his thoughts. What is the connection between an ardent desire to go to Turkey and a familiarity with long distances? We regret to say it of our countryman, but it is the truth, that his book is vapid except when it is impertinent, is always superficial, is platitudinarian to the last degree, and is remarkable for stale anecdotes and an irresistible gravitation to a French theatre, wherever one is to be found.

The veteran historian, Capefigue, gives us "Isabelle de Castille—Grandeur et Décadence de l'Espagne;" in which he sketches a rapid outline of the history of Spain, and dwells with some emphasis on the essentially Spanish (as contradistinguished from Roman) origin of the Inquisition. The necessities of the epoch and the situation must be understood to appreciate it; the Inquisition and the Holy Brotherhood (La Santa Hermandad)—frequently and ignorantly confounded—both came in under Isabella. Cervantes, in "Don Quixote," never lets an occasion pass of praising the Brotherhood. The Inquisition, in its first period, was a patriotic necessity, just as revolutionary tribunals and committees of public safety have been found to be in other countries. It was in its second period, as a mere tribunal of theology, that it earned its well-deserved odium.

Simultaneously, at the Hague and at Paris, have just appeared two works on Rembrandt—"Rembrandt Harmenszoon van Rijn"—that is to say, Rembrandt of the Rhine, son of Herman. They are "Rembrandt Harmensz. van Rijn: sa Vie et ses Œuvres, par C. Vosmaer," and "Rembrandt et l'Individualisme dans l'Art, par Ath. Coquerel fils." The dissertations of Ch. Blume, Thoré, Taine, and others on Rembrandt are well known to art-readers; and the fruits of the learned research of Immerzeel, Scheltema, and Millies for documents concerning the great artist, give us all the elements of a complete biography. Nevertheless, a book was yet wanting that should give a résumé of the labors of the critic and the archivist; and such a book M. Vosmaer has given us. A single detail shows with what conscientiousness his work is prepared. He has travelled throughout Europe, wherever a Rembrandt was to be found in a collection, and, with the exception of a few scattered in England and Russia, has thoroughly studied all the master's works. Of the valuable material accumulated by his predecessors he has made the best possible use, has added hitherto unpublished autograph letters of Rubens, and thrown satisfactory light on points hitherto problematic and disputed. The fault of the work is the common one—that it degenerates into panegyric. The author's enthusiastic admiration for his subject has utterly blinded him to his weaknesses and imperfections. Not a solitary stain will he recognize on his idol; and he appears to be satisfied that he has demonstrated that Rembrandt was not only the king of painters, but the man, par excellence, whose heart and whose character equalled his talents. Without believing the half that is told us by Housbraken, the Vasari of Holland, there is more than enough left to make M. Vosmaer's position simply absurd. "If we compare Rembrandt the artist," says M. Vosmaer, "we naturally think of Shakespeare," and, further, "Rembrandt the man brings up Michael Angelo." One reflects with some uneasiness as to what would have become of Ophelia and Imogen under the brush of the great painter of beggars. But to compare the quiet burgher of Amsterdam, whose cook had him for a lover, and who never took the slightest part in the affairs of his city or his country, with the grand genius who bearded Julius the Second and defended Florence against the tyranny of the Medici; with the chaste lover of Vittoria Colonna; with the austere thinker, who, pursued by honors, thrust them aside to remain in solitary contemplation of his art; with the worthy suitor of "divine poesy"—is pushing the parallelism too far altogether.

M. Coquerel's work is the reproduction of a lecture on Rembrandt delivered by him at Amsterdam, Paris, and other cities, and it has evidently been the subject of much polish and studious revision. The author does not dwell so much on the biography as the special artistic merit and characteristics of the great Dutch painter. Like M. Vosmaer, he yields to the temptation of comparing Rembrandt and Shakespeare—"ces deux géants du Nord." It tries the patience to be told that "there is nothing more lugubrious—no scene of horror more startling in the 'sombre dramaturge Anglais'—than in any given picture of Rubens or in some of his engravings." Will our French friends never have done making unto themselves a Shakespeare that is half Molière and half Hoffman? M. Coquerel has written an interesting chapter on Rembrandt. Like M. Vosmaer, again, he volunteers to carry weight. M. Vosmaer's weight was Rembrandt's personal perfection. M. Coquerel's burden is the proposition that the accredited superiority of Catholicity over Protestantism in the fine arts is an entire mistake; but he argues as Protestant rather than artist, as most Protestant artists will tell him.

In his "Histoire de Léonard de Vinci," M. Arsène Houssaye has fallen very far short of the inspiration of his subject. Leonardo da Vinci, the many-sided man in a truer sense than that in which those words can be said of most on whom they are bestowed—the anatomist, chemist, musician, geologist, mathematician, improvisatore, poet, physician, subtle student of humanity, painter, and engineer—merits an infinitely better book than this. There is little in it not already told us by Vasari, Venturi, Stendhal, and Taine; and all of it is disfigured by overmuch declamation and a constant striving for antithesis. Beyond the biography, M. Houssaye gives us some interesting details concerning the search (June, 1863) for the remains of Da Vinci at Amboise, France, where he died and was buried, and in giving them to us reproduces Overbeck's interesting account of the discovery of Raphael's tomb at Rome.

In all Europe, there is no name more widely known in the literature of music than that of M. F. J. Fetis. Some thirty years ago he published his "Biographie Universelle des Musiciens," and he now announces as complete his long-looked-for "Histoire Générale de la Musique depuis les temps les plus anciens jusqu'à nos jours," in eight volumes, the first of which is just issued from the press of Firmin Didot. Judging from the first volume, and from what we know of the author, his work will be found to be no mere review—a pretext for ingenious research and elegant dissertation—but a thorough presentation of all that science and erudition can do for so vast a subject. The labor of fifty years of the first literary musician of Europe on such a theme cannot fail to produce a work that will create an epoch in the historiography of his art. Treated by him, the history of music is the reconstruction of an important fragment of the history of humanity. Music, says M. Fetis, "is the ideal art par excellence. Unlike poetry, painting, or statuary, it is not intended to produce the manifestation of determined ideas, or the representation of external objects; but its province is to awaken emotions and express sentiments whose endless modifications escape analysis. The poems of Homer, of Pindar, and of Anacreon fathered the poetry of Latin antiquity, of the Middle Ages, and of modern times; something of them may be found in the productions of the most original geniuses; Homer and Virgil still live in the poetical apocalypse of Dante, whose original creations have inspired his successors; the tragedy of Æschylus, Euripides, and Sophocles may be partly found in the tragedies of to-day; the statues and bas-reliefs of our artists differ but little in their aim from the productions of Phidias and Praxiteles, and not always do they excel them; to the art of the Grecian painters our modern artists have added nothing but perspective and more skilful shading of color; the object sought to be represented, which is nature, still remains the same. Music, on the contrary—vague in its essence and sublime in its effects—has, in the multiplicity of its forms, nothing identical but sound and time. Among the peoples of India, in China, among the Arabs, among the Greeks, in the mediæval plain chants, in the harmonic combinations of the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth centuries, in the popular melodies of different nations, finally, in the dramatic or instrumental productions of our day, the art so little resembles itself that we feel tempted to attribute to it as many diverse origins. Imitation of nature is, within a certain limit, the necessary principle in the arts of design; that of music is spontaneous emotion." And this cannot be called mere enthusiastic eloquence; though whether we should allow M. Fetis the word "ideal" to use just as he uses it is a question. To defy analysis and to be most emotional is not to be truly ideal in the highest degree, though there is a school which seems to hold that belief—a school in literature as well as in other fields of human activity.

VIOLLET-LE-DUC'S FRENCH MEDIÆVAL ARCHITECTURE.*

THE remarkable series of works on the architecture, decoration, costume, and industrial arts of the Middle Ages in France, begun eleven years ago by the publication of the first volume of the work named below, now approaches completion. This work, the "Dictionary of Architecture," is finished; the "Dictionnaire du Mobilier" is in course of publication; and with these larger and general works should be named several smaller ones which have been issued at different times. The monographs upon the castles of Coucy and Pierrefonds are independent essays, illustrated, full, and of permanent interest; and the elaborate treatise on the military architecture of the Middle Ages and the Renaissance in France, though containing nearly the same matter as that given to the same subject in the larger work, under numerous titles and scattered through nine volumes, yet, by its thorough rearrangement and complete form, deserves the name of a separate and independent work. All these volumes are alike in form and size of page, and all have illustrations of the same character; there is constant reference from one work to another, and this of necessity, because many things must be considered in several aspects; and a general subject—as, for instance, carpenter-work or glass-painting—is to be thoroughly treated only when traced through a score of minor articles having to do with it, and seen reflected in a hundred illustrations meant to explain other things as well.

The encyclopedic character of this series of works is the more worth dwelling on because it is not the arts only that we have here a history of; we have a history of the condition of the people, of manners and customs in war and in peace, of the dress and habits, the enjoyments and sorrows, and almost of the whole daily life of those typical mediævals, the French. And it is rather to such special and technical treatises as these under consideration than to historical writing of the general and literary sort that we must look for a right use of the historical evidence contained in existing remains. What the French writers call monuments—namely, all works of art illustrative of an epoch, from a cathedral to a miniature or a jewel—are historical documents of great importance; and, for the proper treatment of them, we repeat we must go to the architects, the soldiers, the jewellers, and the collectors and investigators of the most recent times. The feeling of respect for the once despised relics of the past has been of modern growth; and with it has grown the sense that the relics are to be studied and the sense of how to study them. It is in men like M. Viollet-le-Duc that this feeling and knowledge first appear and produce the best results; and books such as his are and must long remain important to all historical students.

* "Dictionnaire Raisonné de l'Architecture Française, du XIe au XVIe Siècle, par M. Viollet-le-Duc, Architecte du Gouvernement, Inspecteur Général des Edifices Diocésains." 10 volumes, of which one is a table, 8vo; about 5,000 woodcuts. Paris: formerly Bance, now A. Morel & Co. 1857-1869.

If we consider history, even in its more customary form, as a mere record of wars, we find it impossible to understand the record aright unless by close study of existing monuments (to take the French word in its own sense) we have learned how our fathers fought, how it was they triumphed, and how they died. It is well to know that Sir Walter Scott was not a very profound antiquarian, and that his knighthood and his monkery are false—mere figments of the brain, and interesting only because the brain was a dramatic poet's; but there are few among even our critical modern historians who could reconstruct the account of the siege of Torquilstone. As it stands in "Ivanhoe" it is altogether false—not one incident of it could have happened as it did; and it would be good to have somewhere an accessible and reliable account of some siege of the time—as of Chalus, where Cœur de Lion met his death, or of Chateau Gaillard, which Philip Augustus wrested from Cœur de Lion's feeble successor—that the student might be able to picture to himself as they happened, and not as they only can be fancied to have happened, the scenes of which he reads delightedly. Now, just this accurate knowledge is put within our reach by such books as these before us. The ruins of mediæval castles have been explored and studied, and in imagination restored; some of them have been actually restored or are in process of restoration; the contemporary literature has been searched for legends and stories, and the miniatures of contemporary manuscripts have been critically examined for what they might reveal to the practised eye; existing weapons and engines of war have been studied, and from the descriptions, the allusions, and the pictures lost ones have been made anew—even a trebuchet and a mangonel have been built and set to work; the singular system of defence by means of temporary wooden-covered galleries, mounted upon the walls when a siege threatened, the changes in this system, and its supersedure in the fourteenth century by permanent machicolated galleries of stone, have been examined, practically experimented upon, and understood. The acumen and patience shown in all this research have been great, but not quite so marvellous as they at first appear, for practical knowledge is a great enlightener. M. Viollet-le-Duc, for instance, employed to restore the great château of Coucy, constructed and hung out from the walls of the donjon tower a scaffolding for his masons; and this he modelled after the hoarding which had been used for defence, and mounted and adjusted it by the means used for the hoarding as far as he could ascertain them. At all events, here was a means of building, and putting up a sufficient means of defence, actually tested. M. Viollet-le-Duc's galleries might have differed in inessential particulars from any which the defenders of the keep had ever put up; but more than one set of defences may have been used, all slightly different among themselves. The essential thing was to build hoardings that would meet all the conditions, and perfectly account for and explain every putlog hole, corbel, groove, or eye left in the old masonry, as well as allow for the free use of every weapon known to the defenders, and provide for the perfect command of the whole site. Granted that much will always remain unexplained, the importance of learning in a scientific and practical way all we can learn is only the more plain. Historical truth is hard enough to get at, at the best. We have always, and shall have always, to contend against our ignorance of the real motives of men, and the daily loss of the unrecorded, unwritten, and almost unspoken daily history of the men who make history. And since all accounts of men's motives must be always untrustworthy—mere matter of conjecture, it behooves us to be very sure we understand exactly what they did, how they did it, and how they dressed, how they moved and looked, what language they spoke—in short, how they seemed to their contemporaries. Like the pictures that Dante saw on the path, as he climbed the mountain of Purgatory, the living should seem alive to us. And this truth of "local color"—this accurate picturing of the "situations" of the past—is not yet a part of the work of the historian. The poet has some of it seized for us; no one ought to be sure he understands the Italian republics until he has read "Sordello;" but the expert has more.

It is to be observed that antiquaries are all liable to as bad mistakes as Mr. Oldbuck himself unless they are more than antiquaries. The dreadful oubliettes, dungeons where the victim cannot stand up nor lie down, nor find any comfort—inverted hollow cones into which the prisoner is thrown, and up whose walls of smooth stone he cannot climb—these bugbears of the Middle Ages become ice-houses sometimes when examined by unbelieving architects in search of facts. Horrid ditches full of bones are found to be in suspicious proximity to the kitchen, and the physiologist examines them and fails to find any vestiges of humanity. M. Viollet-le-Duc tells an interesting story about the identification of the stimuli, an effective sort of abbatis, mentioned by Cæsar in his account of the siege of Alesia. The antiquaries had had the making of the notes of the school editions of Cæsar's Commentaries, and had misinformed generations of boys about these stimuli, telling them that the iron spike was driven into the head of the log which was fixed into the ground. Sharp boys of country experience must have misdoubted something—must have seen that the log would have split three times out of four, and would never have held the iron spike securely; moreover, that it would have been impossible to sharpen the spikes afterward, or keep them sharp while driven. Now comes Captain Prévost, quoted by our author, and clears up the simple mystery; we refer our readers to Vol. V. of the Dictionnaire de l'Architecture, article Fossé.

In relation to architecture, civil and religious, these books are almost alone in this, that they analyze both style and construction, set up and prove theories, establish points that have been doubtful, explain, state general truths. The splendid works upon architecture and the cognate arts which late years have produced, are devoted almost wholly to the giving of plates, often marvellously correct and beautiful, of the monument chosen, complete and in detail. Very seldom is there any attempt at examination or explanation. Whereas the books of Viollet-le-Duc proceed the other way, treat of tower, spire, cupola, vault; painting, carving, glass-painting, joiner-work; angels, the Trinity, the Tree of Jesse, the personified Church; ewer, brooch, table, chair; and illustrate the general treatises by thousands of examples. In treating the subject in this way, a profound and accurate as well as varied knowledge has been needed—a knowledge resulting from long familiarity with all branches of the subject, and shaped by sound judgment and power of discrimination. Few men have had the opportunities which have been enjoyed by M. Viollet-le-Duc; as architect in charge of the restorations of Notre Dame and many other churches, large and small, and of the castles we have named, he has had great chances for investigation; and he was fortunate in being prepared for the best use of these by a youth spent in wide travel and study of the architecture of many lands. But, if his opportunities have been great, his ability and his industry are great also. He has proved himself a most excellent draughtsman, nor are there anywhere, except in the works of Mr. Ruskin, such admirable drawings of architecture. It is not only architectural forms only that he renders well and spiritedly; he draws the figure admirably for his purposes, and nothing can exceed the vigor of his sketches of workmen, soldiers, or passers-by, introduced to explain his subject or only to give the scale. Moreover, he draws with such ease that he never spares drawing—a great thing—the reader seldom wishes for more representations of a building than are given. We speak in this personal way of these six or seven thousand illustrations because they seem to be all the author's own work—because it is probable that, except a few diagrams, they have all been drawn by his own hand. This proves, moreover, our author's great power of work, but that is evident to any cursory examiner of his labors, and we pass to the consideration of other points brought to our attention by the books themselves.

A Complete Latin-English and English-Latin Dictionary for the use of Junior Students. By John T. White, D.D., of Corpus Christi College, Oxford; Rector of St. Martin Ludgate, London. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1869.)—On the back of the volume before us we read: "Complete Latin-English and English-Latin Dictionary," without any further qualification, for which, we presume, the author is not responsible; the title-page not quite distinctly qualifies the word "complete" by the addition of "for the use of junior students;" but the author's preface plainly defines the limited scope of the work by stating that, "except so far as is necessary for etymological purposes, words occurring in writers ordinarily read by less advanced students of the Latin language are, for the most part, alone explained." We must, however, confess that even within these narrow limits this dictionary hardly deserves to be called complete. It requires but a slight scrutiny to discover the absence of words such as even a more moderate-sized school lexicon than ours is would omit only from inadvertence. Such are—to mention words properly belonging to the columns of one page—ducatus, ductim, ductito, and even dualis, which is not given, as a derivative, under duo either. Few pages may betray equally grave omissions, but all we have examined show that lexicographical fulness is not among the distinctive merits of the work. In reality, what Dr. White principally aimed at is etymological and grammatical clearness, and a systematically precise statement of meanings and shades of meanings. In this respect we may call his production very elaborate.

The principal features of his plan for the Latin-English part, to which we confine our remarks, are the following: Each leading word is so printed as to exhibit its process of formation. "Immediately after the assigned origin of each word, the literal interpretation is given between parentheses; and that English rendering of which such interpretation holds good in a pre-eminent degree is placed first in order, and regarded as the proper or primary meaning. When the source of a word is not discoverable, the fact is stated." Figurative or metonymical powers are given, as such, when they fall within the restricted scope of the whole. A brief reference is usually made to some classical author. Peculiar grammatical constructions are noticed. Historical, mythological, and geographical names are included in the body of the work, in most cases with the addition of their meanings. Philological comparisons with Sanskrit, Greek, and Teutonic roots are introduced. French derivatives from the Latin words are also given.

All these features are consistently carried out throughout the work, but it is the putting in relief of the derivations to which the author seems with most care to have devoted his labor. The references to and brief quotations from authors are also carefully executed, and decidedly ample for a book of these dimensions. The English renderings, on the other hand, we find, like the vocabulary, less full. The philological remarks are often very poor. Thus we read under hera: "akin to herus;" under herus: "etym. dub."—without even a mention of the Teutonic herr, not to speak of ἥρως, κυριος, etc.; under doleo: "prps akin to Sanskrit root DRIor DA, to cut asunder"—where ὀτλεω is so much nearer; and under dolo again: "akin to Sanscrit root DRI or DA, to cut or hew asunder," while Eng. to deal, Icel. dela, and δαιδαλλω remain unmentioned.

A proportionally very large part of the space is surrendered to the proper names, which collectively almost form a kind of classical dictionary. But this part of the work is executed with less regard for symmetry, uniformity, and accuracy than those more properly belonging to the sphere of a Latin lexicon. Thus, while of Horace, Virgil, Suetonius, Seneca, and the two Plinys we hear who they were or what they wrote; of Plautus also at what village he was born; of Ennius, in addition, in what years he was born and died; and of Cicero even on what day he was born, and at what age and by whom he was murdered—Sallust and Livy are entered only as "Roman names," and Tacitus and Martial are entirely forgotten. Vitellius and Nerva are given as emperors of Rome; of Trajan we read when he reigned, and what his character was; but Tiberius, Titus, Domitian, and Hadrian are entered only as names, and Caracalla and Heliogabalus are omitted. Of Atticus we hear who wrote his life; Agricola, like his biographer, is forgotten. Roscius Otho is twice given—under both names—and his law twice fully, though not uniformly, spoken of; but there is no mention of Licinius Stolo and his laws under either of these names. The cruelty, the brazen bull, and the fate of Phalaris are minutely mentioned; but of Dionysius we hear only that he was tyrant of Syracuse. Donnus, "a petty sovereign of the Alps," is given, but the Carthaginian Hannos are all forgotten. Alymon is entered as "the father of Iphimedia," but Iphimedia herself is not to be found.

The geographical portions are at least as negligently done. Of Phocis we are told between what territories it lay, and what mountains and waters it contained; but Ætolia is only "a province in Central Greece," and Doris is given neither as a division of the same part of Greece nor as a territory of Asia Minor, while the Dorians are barely mentioned, and their fabulous ancestor, Dorus, is forgotten. Of the Locri, who are enumerated by divisions, the Opuntians are omitted, and the Epizephyrians, a mere colony, are mentioned, under Zaleucus, as "the Locrians." The city founded by these colonists in Lower Italy is incorrectly called Naryci*um* under Locri, though correctly given as Naryci*a* under its own head. Laconia is designated "a country in the centre of Southern Greece, or the Peloponnesus," which is also stated—and only then correctly—of Arcadia. Heraclea, "now Erakli or Eregri," is designated "a maritime town of Pontus," instead of a maritime town of Bithynia, on the Pontus Euxinus. Such names as Cyme, Dorylæum, Gaza, Opus, or Ozolæ are omitted, while others of minor importance, like Maronea or Marpessus, are given.

The mechanical execution of the reprint is very pleasant.

A Treatise on the Law of Shipping and the Law and Practice of Admiralty. By Theophilus Parsons, LL.D., Dane Professor of Law in Harvard University, at Cambridge. (Boston: Little, Brown & Co. 1869.)—In his work on "Maritime Law," published in 1859, Professor Parsons treated of shipping, insurance, and admiralty, because he thought, as he says in his preface, "that the law of shipping and the law of marine insurance could not be learned fully and accurately, excepting in their connection." In 1868, however, he found that the connection was not so important (or did his publishers ask for two new volumes?), and he gave us a separate work, in two volumes, on marine insurance, and now we have two volumes on shipping and admiralty.

In these last volumes we have not found so much additional matter as there was in the volumes on marine insurance, and yet they constitute something more than a new edition of the treatise of 1859. In most of the chapters on shipping some changes have been made, and all the recent cases are cited in the notes. The chapters on hypothecation and general average have been rewritten; new and valuable chapters on collisions, wharves and docks, and passengers have been added.

The chapters on admiralty do not contain so much that is new, though all the recent cases appear, and if no change has been made in the text, it is because the jurisdiction was settled and the practice remains the same. Instead of fifty pages of appendix of the volumes of 1859, we now have two hundred and fifty, the additional pages being taken up by the statutes of the United States on subjects connected with shipping. These statutes are arranged according to the dates of their passage; and instead of the promised index of their subject-matter, only a chronological list, with their titles, is given, but yet they form a valuable accessory to the work.

Minor Chords. By Sophia May Eckley. (London: Bell & Daldy. 1869.)—Mrs. Eckley's religious poems are probably successful so far as concerns the expression of her own religious feelings and belief; and many of her fellow-believers will probably find them satisfactory as devotional poetry. Her secular poetry we have found wanting in many respects—in so many respects that we are hardly able to call it poetry at all. In the whole volume we find no piece which is well conceived, and, what is rarer, there is none that we have found which is at all happy in expression. One merit, however, Mrs. Eckley has, if she has no more—and it is not a common one—the merit of not being a plagiarist, nor even an imitator; whatever poetry there is in her book is her own. Considering the apparent genuineness and fervor of feeling which is displayed in several of the religious poems in this little volume, we should say that the church might very probably yet be indebted to Mrs. Eckley for more than one good hymn. And yet, without care and study she cannot try to draw from this source with any hope of great success; "Siloa's brook" and Helicon being in some respects not so much unlike.

Astronomy without a Telescope: being a Guide-book to the Visible Heavens, with Maps and Illustrations. By E. Colbert. (Chicago: George & C. W. Sherwood. 1869.)—This work is in the atlas form, and contains fourteen celestial maps, representing the stars from the first to the fifth magnitude, white upon a blue ground. The maps are accompanied by carefully prepared descriptions of the different constellations, pointing out the relative positions of all the brightest stars. We think these maps will be found useful. We have seen none so well adapted to the wants of students in astronomy. The account of the constellations given in most text-books in astronomy is generally too brief and superficial, and the maps, if any are introduced, are usually coarse and inaccurate. The instruction in astronomy given in most schools is defective in respect to practical acquaintance with the heavens. Students seldom have sufficient knowledge of the stars to enable them to distinguish one region of the heavens from another. They may learn the sizes, distances, and motions of the planets and their satellites, and yet not know Venus or Jupiter by sight. They cannot point out in the heavens Sirius or Arcturus, although they may know their distances, and how these distances were ascertained.

Good instruction in astronomy should gradually make the student familiar with the appearance of the heavenly bodies at the same time that it acquaints him with their nature and motions. For such a study of the constellations we recommend Mr. Colbert's atlas. It may be used for beginners in astronomy, or in our colleges and the higher grades of academies, in connection with other text-books of a more advanced character. It should not be inferred, however, that this work is confined to a representation and description of the fixed stars. The reader will find treated with rare skill most of the topics usually discussed in astronomical text-books for high schools.

The Elements of Theoretical and Descriptive Astronomy, for the Use of Colleges and Academies. By Charles J. White, A.M., Assistant Professor of Astronomy and Navigation in the U. S. Naval Academy. (Philadelphia: Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger. 1869.)—There is no lack of text-books in astronomy adapted to the wants of students in our high schools or schools of lower grades. Such books must be almost entirely descriptive, avoiding the introduction of algebra and geometry. Nor is it difficult to find suitable works on this science for very advanced students, containing a full discussion of astronomical instruments, elaborate applications of the law of universal gravitation, the full consideration of eclipses, and a thorough treatment of astronomical problems too difficult for the general student. Teachers in colleges and the higher grades of academies can use neither of these two classes of text-books. The former are too superficial and the latter too elaborate. Usually the first half of Herschel's "Outlines of Astronomy" is used. It is no reflection on this treatise to say that it is not a good text-book, inasmuch as it was never intended to be used as such. A good text-book for students who can read Herschel's "Outlines" with appreciation has been hard to find.

In view of this want, we have read with special interest Mr. White's treatise, and, after a careful examination, we can recommend it to teachers as the best work of its kind we have seen. It covers the same ground as that part of Herschel's Outlines which is usually studied; while the more systematic division of the subject, and the introduction of simpler mathematical processes, make it much better than that work as a text-book for college use. No statement the proof of which comes within the scope of the work is made without a demonstration; and yet the theoretical discussions are remarkably simple, and within the limits of the mathematical knowledge of all college students. In those branches of the subject upon which the views of astronomers are most liable to change, the reader will find the most recent theories and the latest information. It is a pleasure to read a book which is written in a style so clear and finished, and which shows so much care in its preparation.

First Lessons in Civil Government. By Andrew W. Young. (New York: A. S. Barnes & Co. 1869.)—It is a merit in Mr. Young's "Civil Government" that it does justice to that side of our political system—the State governments—which is wholly overlooked by most school-books; one hundred and forty-four pages are given to the Government of New York, and only thirty to that of the United States. This is, however, a disproportion in the other direction, for the National Government requires fully as much explanation as that of the States. And, of course, it unfits the book for the use of any school except that of this State. For a State so populous and important as this, it may be well enough to have a special text-book; a work of real general value for the whole country would be a brief comparative view of the Constitutions of the several States, giving those features which are common to all, or nearly so, with the important variations presented in a tabular form. Mr. Young's treatise has many points of merit: it is, however, sheer dishonesty to put the date 1869 on the title-page of a book which contains on a single page (162) so many obsolete statements as the following: That the ratio of representation for Congress is 90,716: that New York has thirty-three representatives, and New York City and County four; that "in the Southern States a large portion of the people are slaves;" and that "members of Congress receive for their services eight dollars a day."

Stretton: A Novel. By Henry Kingsley, Author of "Ravenshoe," "Geoffrey Hamlyn," "Hillyars and Burtons," etc. With illustrations. (New York: Leypoldt & Holt and Harper & Brothers. 1869.)—Mr. Kingsley's new novel gives the history of four young Englishmen of the well-known muscular-Christian type—a type which in his hands becomes fearfully muscular and queerly Christian—in its author's usual dashing, rattling style, and is as entertaining as his stories usually are. His books are easy reading of the kind which does not presuppose hard writing; they are easy because they cause no thought in the reader, and appear to have cost the writer very little. Character-painting, in any legitimate sense of that term, he has no conception of; when he has called a hero "ox-like," or "bucolic," or "violent and cruel," described him as "Antinous Evans," or noted his resemblance to a bloodhound, he has come as near to either analysis or description as his nature allows him. His heroes are so much alike—in this story at least—that we have found ourselves continually at a loss to know which was a Mordaunt and which an Evans, and been forced more than once to recur to the opening chapters and trace out a pedigree in order to be sure that one of the boys was not in love with his own sister, or about to marry his aunt. But there is plenty of "go" in the story, and some effective pictures of school escapades, of boat-racing, and of incidents of the Indian Mutiny. Mr. Kingsley is at his best when he has out-of-door life to deal with, and there is a boyish sort of fun that he is not a bad hand at, and although he dogmatizes with characteristic self-confidence on other subjects of which he knows as little as a decently intelligent man well can, his conceit is always too amusingly barefaced to be offensive. He makes no improvement in his craft as a novelist, or rather he grows worse and worse with each story, although he makes efforts at art—or at least says he does. "Stretton" is even more carelessly written, and the story more loosely and inconsequently put together, than is usual even with him.

The Science of Right. By J. G. Fichte. Translated by A. E. Krœger. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1869. 12mo, pp. 505).—This is a translation of Fichte's Grundlage des Naturrechts by the recent translator ofthe Wissenschaftslehre. Mr. Krœger does not always understand the English use of words and constructions; but much worse translations of German philosophy have appeared in our language. The work itself is interesting not only to the student of the history of philosophy, but also to the student of general history; for notwithstanding the very scientific form of Fichte's theory of rights, in its special doctrines it chiefly reflects the opinions of his time and of his country, as modified by his individual temper. Americans should accept with some reserve the representations now made that Fichte and Hegel illustrate the best thought which Germany has produced.

Travels of Fah-hian and Sung-Yun, Buddhist Pilgrims, from China to India (400 A.D. and 518 A.D). Translated from the Chinese. By Samuel Beal, etc. (London: Trübner & Co.; New York: John Wiley & Son. 1869. 12mo, pp. lxxvi., 208.)—Where a country is so wanting as India in materials for the orderly construction of its own history, every gleam of information from without is doubly valuable. A few incidental and fragmentary notices by Greeks, growing out of Alexander's Indian expedition, have proved of incalculable worth to Indian chronology. And in working out the history of Buddhism, the notices of Chinese pilgrims who, in the early centuries of our era, made the tremendous journey to Hindustan in search of the authentic scriptures of their faith, are playing an important part. The earliest of the accounts of such pilgrimages now known to exist are given by Mr. Beal in this elegant little volume, and for the first time in English. Rémusat's French version of the travels of Fah-hian is well known to scholars; but, having been made more than thirty years ago, when little was known of the subject it deals with, is no longer reliable. We cannot commend the Chinese monk's story to the American public at large as a juicy and entertaining narrative; the blight of triviality and barrenness which rests upon the whole body of Buddhist literature is over it also; but the translation is doubtless a valuable one; the notes are instructive, and the elaborate introduction—a sketch of the history of this religion in China and of its development in its native land—will be found interesting by many whom the main text will repel. A very pretty sketch map of the pilgrims' route is an admirable addition to the volume. An index would have been one still more admirable; and we can hardly pardon Mr. Beal for having failed to let us have it.

Authors.—Titles. BOOKS OF THE WEEK. Publishers.—Prices.

Alcott (Miss L. M.), Hospital Sketches.....(Roberts Bros.) $1 50
Burt (Dr. W. H.), Characteristic Materia Medica.....(A. J. Tafel) 3 00
Bell (Dr. J. B.), Homœopathic Therapeutics of Diarrhœa, etc., etc.....(A. J. Tafel) 1 25
Baily (Wm. L.), Our Own Birds of the United States.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.) 1 50
Bancroft (H. H. & Co.), Guide for Travellers in the Pacific States..... 0 50
Butler (B. C.), Lake George and Lake Champlain from their First Discovery to 1759.....(George P. Putnam & Son)
Clemens (S. L., "Mark Twain"), The Innocents Abroad; or, The New Pilgrim's Progress.....(American Publishing Company)
Coxe (Bishop A. C.), Moral Reforms.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Dash (Countess), Mademoiselle Fifty Millions.....(D. Appleton & Co.) 0 60
Lossing (B. J.), Pictorial Field-Book of the War of 1812.....(Harper & Bros.)
Mill (J. S.), Froude (J. A.), Carlyle (T.), Scottish University Addresses, swd.....(J. W. Schermerhorn & Co.) 0 20
Newspaper Advertisers' Guide.....(Cook, Coburn & Co.)
Reade (C.), Foul Play, swd.....(Harper & Bros.) 0 25
The Workshop, No. 7, swd.....(E. Steiger) 0 50
The Life of Mother Margaret Mary Hallahan.....(Cath. Pub. Society)
Thackeray (W. M.), A Shabby Genteel Story, swd.....(D. Appleton & Co.) 0 50
Winkworth (Miss C.), Christian Singers of Germany.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Watson (J. M.), Independent Third Reader.....(A. S. Barnes & Co.)

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO.

HAVE JUST PUBLISHED

OUR OWN BIRDS:

A FAMILIAR NATURAL HISTORY OF THE BIRDS OF THE UNITED STATES.

By Wm. L. Bailey.

Revised and edited by Edward D. Cope, Corresponding Secretary of the Academy of Natural Sciences. 16mo, fine cloth, $1 50.

SOIMEME:

A STORY OF A WILFUL LIFE.

16mo, tinted paper, fine cloth, $1 25.

Histoire de Charles XII.

Par Voltaire.

Nouvelle édition, publiée avec une Carte de Europe Centrale, des notes littéraires et des éclaircissements historiques et géographiques, par E. Brochard-Danteuille. With Explanatory Notes and an English Vocabulary by Gustave Masson, B.A., Assistant Master of Harrow School. F'cap 8vo, half-roan, $1 25.

COUNTESS GISELA.

A NOVEL.

From the German of E. Marlitt, author of "The Old Mam'selle's Secret," etc. By Mrs. A. L. Wister. Part I. 12mo, paper cover, 75 cents.

NEARLY READY, THE FIRST VOLUME OF

The Student's Manual of Oriental History:

Manual of the Ancient History of the East to the Commencement of the Median Wars. By François Lenormant, Sub-Librarian of the Imperial Institute of France. Translated from the Third Revised Edition by E. Chevalier, M.R.A.S. 2 vols. post 8vo.

WILL BE READY IN A FEW DAYS:

The History of Freemasonry from its Origin to the Present Day.

By J. G. Findel.

 For sale by all Booksellers, or will be sent by mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of price by

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO.,
PUBLISHERS,
715 and 717 Market Street, Philadelphia, and
449 Broome Street, New York.

MINOR CHORDS.

By Sophia May Eckley.

A few more copies of the London Edition of Mrs. Eckley's "Minor Chords" are on sale at Messrs. E. P. DUTTON & CO.'S, Washington Street, Boston, and 713 Broadway, New York.

"The present volume of Mrs. Eckley's will sustain the reputation she has already acquired. Mrs. Eckley has taken a place among the foremost and most successful of contemporary song-writers. Many of these poems in this volume cannot fail to be popular with all who have taste enough to appreciate their tenderness and beauty."—John Bull.

"Mrs. Eckley shows a real faculty for writing hymns in the manner of the late Father Faber."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"Mrs. Eckley's poems will take a high place amongst our 'minor' poetry. Her utterances have an ease and grace and a gentle imaginativeness which exhibit real poetical feeling, if not positive genius. We welcome the authoress to that place amongst our poets to which, with such humility, she aspires, and which she is so well fitted to adorn."—The Court Journal.

"Mrs. Eckley has already taken a prominent place among our sweet singers; and the present charming volume will add to the reputation which her writings have deservedly gained."—Church Review.

"Under this quaint and mournful title, Mrs. Eckley has produced another very charming volume of poetry—tender, delicate, and beautiful."—Church Opinion.

"It will be a relief to turn to these 'Minor Chords' by a lady who evidently possesses the feeling, fancy, and power of expression of a true and accomplished artist."—Daily Bristol Times and Mirror.

Just Published.

"Manners Make the Man."

GOOD SOCIETY:

A COMPLETE MANUAL OF MANNERS.

By the Right Hon. Countess of * * * * * *. Printed on fine toned paper, 300 pages 12mo, extra cloth, gilt top, $1 75.

CONTENTS:

Introductory,—On Good Manners in General; their Rise, Progress, and Social Importance.
Chap. I. The Arrangement of a Lady's House and the Management of Servants.
II. Letters of Introduction—Cards—Addresses.
III. Visiting—Morning Calls.
IV. Conversation.
V. Letter-writing—Invitations.
VI. The Lady's Toilet.
VII. The Gentleman's Toilet.
VIII. Riding and Driving—The Promenade.
IX. Morning and Evening Parties.
X. The Ball.
XI. Dinner Parties.
XII. Engagement and Marriage.
XIII. Visiting at a Country House,
XIV. General Hints to both Sexes.
Appendices—Index.

This volume aims to meet a social requirement of long standing, namely, a work of genuine authority on all points of etiquette, ceremonial, and manners. It addresses itself to all classes of society, and, as the above list of contents will show, it embraces all points wherein rules of etiquette are necessary. "The author has endeavored, to the best of her ability, to treat of the subject under all its aspects; to omit no point, however trivial; and to provide her readers with a faithful and judicious guide in every social emergency."

"We have read this work with great care, and feel ourselves justified in pronouncing it by far the best of the kind we have ever chanced to see. The authoress is thoroughly familiar with her subject, and handles it with more than common grace; and we fancy there are few in our very highest society who might not derive some advantage from the most cursory perusal of her book."—Scottish American Journal.

 Will be sent by mail, post-paid, to any address in the United States, on receipt of the advertised price, by the Publishers,

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS,
416 Broome Street, New York.

TO LYCEUMS, LECTURE COMMITTEES, ETC.

THE American Literary Bureau is now prepared to make Lecture engagements with Lyceums and other Lecture Associations throughout the country for lecturers and entertainments of a musical and literary character. The Bureau's list includes Justin McCarthy, editor London Morning Star, Mark Twain, T. W. Higginson, Rev. Robert Laird Collier, Edwin P. Whipple, Olive Logan, Kate Field, Benson J. Lossing the historian, P. B. Du Chaillu, Dr. Isaac I. Hayes, C. Oscanyan, Prof. E. L. Youmans, Saml. L. Hewlett, Wirt Sikes, John G. Saxe, Henry Nicholls, Prof. Hitchcock, Josiah Phillips Quincy, Rev. George H. Hepworth, Prof. Rufus Adams, Thomas W. Knox, George Wakeman, John J. Pinkerton, E. P. Nowell, Editor American Odd Fellow, Professor Homer B. Sprague, Cornell University, Rev. T. E. Kittredge, B. T. Taylor, Rev. J. D. Sweet, Dr. Griscom, George Kennan (the Siberian traveller), Maria A. Stetson, Annie E. Potter, Stephen Massett (Jeems Pipes), Wm. H. Pope (the Recitationist), W. R. Alger, Hon. Ingersoll Lockwood, Mrs. Carter, Hon. M. Bovee, Miss Susan B. Anthony, Rev. Elias Nasin, O. D. Munson, T. S. Townsend, the Hutchinson Family, Mr. and Mrs. W. Fox Leggett in Shakespearian Rehearsals, and many others, whose names appear on the circular.

NO CHARGE WHATEVER TO LECTURE COMMITTEES.

Applications promptly attended to. Send for Circular to
AMERICAN LITERARY BUREAU,
132 Nassau Street, New York City.
JAMES K. MEDBERY, } Associate
S. HUMPHREYS GURTEEN, } Directors.
P. O. Box No. 6,701.

The American Freemason.

CONTENTS OF JULY NUMBER.

Man: A Poem. Our Monthly Record: Is the Use of "Mnemonics" Unlawful?—Why did he do it?—Division of Grand Lodge Jurisdiction. Correspondence: A Tub to the Whale—Grand Lodge Jurisdiction, No. III.—A Contribution to the Antiquity of Masonry—The African, or Prince Hall Grand Lodge. Our Monthly Masonic Chronicle: United States, Germany, Prussia, Hungary, Constantinople, France, Egypt. Review of New Books.

Sixteen quarto pages monthly, for one dollar a year. Address subscriptions to

J. FLETCHER BRENNAN, Editor,
114 Main Street, Cincinnati, O.

NEW

HOMŒOPATHIC PUBLICATIONS

THE HOMŒOPATHIC TREATMENT OF DIARRHŒA, DYSENTERY, CHOLERA, etc., etc. By James B. Bell, M.D., of Augusta, Me. Philadelphia: A. J. Tafel. Pp. 170, 12mo, price $1 25.

CHARACTERISTIC MATERIA MEDICA. By Wm. H. Burt, M.D., of Lincoln, Ill. Philadelphia: A. J. Tafel. Pp. 460, 12mo, price $3.

THE HOMŒOPATHIC TREATMENT OF SYPHILIS, GONORRHŒA, SPERMATORRHŒA, AND URINARY DISEASES. By J. H. Berjeau, M.D. Revised, with numerous additions, by J. H. P. Frost, M.D., late Professor of Physiology and Pathology at the Hom. Med. College of Penna. Philadelphia: A. J. Tafel. Pp. 270, 12mo, price $2.

SELF-ENERVATION: ITS CONSEQUENCES AND TREATMENT. By C. S. Eldridge, M.D., of Bay City, Mich. Price $1.

JAHR'S THERAPEUTICAL GUIDE: the most important results of more than forty years of practice. By G. H. G. Jahr, M.D., Chevalier, etc. Translated by C. Hempel, M.D. Price $3 50.

N. B.—Any of above works will be sent free of postage on receipt of price. Address

A. J. TAFEL,
Homœopathic Pharmaceutist and Publisher,
48 N. Ninth Street, Philadelphia.

The Fifth Volume of the "Hahn. Monthly," edited by R. J. McClatchey, M.D., commences in August. This is one of the best conducted Homœopathic Journals in the country.

Subscription price, $3, payable in advance. Sample numbers sent for 25 cents. Address A. J. TAFEL, Philadelphia, P. O. Box 2,332.

ZELL'S

POPULAR ENCYCLOPEDIA AND UNIVERSAL DICTIONARY.

The cheapest and most complete Encyclopedia ever published.

Sold by subscription, and delivered in monthly parts at 50 cents each. The entire cost will not exceed $25.

"We find it in the main both full and correct. The spirit in which the Cyclopedia is edited is what it should be."—The Nation.

"The articles are as carefully prepared, the engravings as well executed, and the general typography as perfect as the earliest sheets. Its sale deserves to be popular and extensive."—The Round Table.

"The work is evidently conducted with intelligent and conscientious industry."—N. Y. Tribune.

Address

T. ELLWOOD ZELL, Publisher,
17 and 19 South Sixth Street, Philadelphia, Pa.
Or,
AGENCY OF ZELL'S PUBLISHING HOUSE,
7 Murray Street, New York.

New and Old Books.

DAVID G. FRANCIS (formerly C. S. Francis & Co.), 3 Clinton Hall, Astor Place, New York, keeps constantly for sale an extensive Stock of New and Second-hand Books in various departments of Literature.

Catalogues, issued from time to time, will be forwarded free to any address.

SABIN & SONS'

American Bibliopolist

(Published monthly) affords an excellent medium for ADVERTISEMENTS. It is useful to Librarians for the Lists of New English and American Publications. Book Collectors will find many desirable volumes in Catalogue of New and Old Books, which accompanies each number. Notices of Rare or Curious Books, and the Notes and Queries upon American subjects, will be interesting to every one.

J. SABIN & SONS, Publishers,
84 Nassau Street, New York.

J. S. & Son have recently received a very valuable Collection of American Books—perhaps the finest ever offered for sale. Many of the volumes are illustrated with extra plates, and superbly bound.

The Nation.

VOL. IX.—NO. 216. THURSDAY, AUGUST 19, 1869. { FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM / TWELVE CENTS PER COPY

THE WEEK..... 141

EDITORIAL ARTICLES:
The Next Work for the Republican Party..... 144
The Prospect in France..... 145
A Word More about Church and State..... 146
The Usurers in Court..... 147
A Few Remarks on Insults..... 148

CORRESPONDENCE:
The Influence of Sex on Character.... 149

NOTES:
Literary..... 150

The West of Fifty Years Since..... 152
A Literary Veteran..... 153

CURRENT LITERATURE:
Mopsa the Fairy.—Julius Cæsar.—Beatrice, and Other Poems.—A Treatise on Admiralty and Prize.—A Parser and Analyzer for Beginners..... 155-156

Books of the Week..... 157

Terms:—Five Dollars per annum, in advance; Clergymen, Four Dollars.  Remittances at the risk of the subscriber, unless made by draft, check, P. O. money order, or registered letter.

The date of expiration of each subscription is indicated on the printed label. A delay of more than three months in renewing subscriptions will endanger their continuance.

ADDRESS, PUBLISHER OF "THE NATION," BOX 6732, NEW YORK.
PUBLISHING OFFICE, 3 PARK PLACE.

The Week.

IT was said at the time that Governor Hoffman's friends "killed" Hancock in the Pennsylvania Democratic Convention; that the Cuban-Fenian meeting the other evening was got up for the purpose of getting cheers for an informal nomination of the Governor for President; that the Fourth of July meeting of Tammany was for the same purpose; that Mr. James Fisk, Jr., and Mr. Jay Gould began the Albany and Susquehanna war—at all events, made their appeal to the Governor—that our chief magistrate might have an opportunity of showing to all mankind his energy and executive ability; and now comes the story about Rosecrans's nomination in Ohio, which also puts Mr. Hoffman in the attitude of a most carefully groomed competitor in the next great race. The story is to the effect that Mr. Pendleton is a person whose political death is desirable and necessary, and that, in order to secure it, Mr. Hoffman's friends proposed that if the Ohio brethren would support Hoffman in 1872, Judge Ranney—most popular of Northern Ohio Democrats—should have the second place on the national ticket. He must be nominated, then, and elected, Governor of Ohio, to give him prestige. But "Ohio's Favorite Son" heard of this "little game," as they say in California; and though he himself did not wish for the nomination—for the Democrats are to be beaten in Ohio this fall—it behoved him to show his strength and prevent the Ranney movement. This he easily did, and he did it by having Rosecrans put in nomination, as he easily could, for he is still the most potent of the Ohio Democracy. Thus the Tammany ring was defeated; but now, Rosecrans having declined, Pendleton has to come out, after all, and take his beating. He cannot say, in 1872, that he made a good, sound, "peace" platform, and then got Ohio to accept it by the skilful employment of "Old Rosey;" on the contrary, he must make confession that his platform would not do, that his generalship did not serve its purpose, and that it is a part of Ohio only of which he is the Favorite Son. So Mr. Hoffman has apparently put one more candidate out of the way; but, like Washington Irving's Dutchman, certainly he is running a long time before it is time to jump.

There is at least one moral to be drawn from tales like this—and if they are false, the moral may be drawn from the fact that they are everywhere current—and that is, that it is a fine thing to be the ally and pet of the gentlemen whose duty it is to decide at election time how large the Democratic majority in this city is to be. To begin with, one can thus be made to show on one or more municipal tracks any desired amount of running power. Then, as the majority in the city, made to order, can be made big enough to cover over the adverse majority in the State, a candidate with these gentlemen behind him can be New York's Favorite Son any day he likes. And then, when the friends of such a personage as that go into the national gatherings of the Democracy, and place before the convention his name as that of a candidate who has thirty-three electoral votes safe in his pocket, the convention may be supposed likely to be civil. We may yet live to see the three head men of Tammany giving us a President—in which case the expenses of supporting those pillars of the State will be shared between us and the nation at large—without our share becoming much smaller either, we suppose. As the work nearest the hands of decent New York Republicans, we hope attention may be given to the firm establishment of a Republican General Committee in this city which shall not be owned by these same gentlemen who have made us a Governor, and who talk of making us a President. And we dare say leading Democrats in other States may soon be willing to lend our City Republicans their moral support. As matters stand now, New York when in convention exerts in the party councils an influence to which neither the brains nor the numbers of her Democrats entitle her, and overslaughs foreign Democrats by her frauds about as much as she does her domestic Republicans.

Tennessee politics are largely personal, and when the Nashville Banner comes out against Ex-President Johnson as the Senator to succeed Mr. Fowler, it is not so easy as it would be in the case of a Northern party organ to say whether the man it fulminates against is distasteful to a section of the party to which the paper belongs, or whether it is merely that the paper has decided to support one chieftain's claims rather than another's. We may indulge a cautious hope, however, that Mr. Johnson is not going to be sent, for our national sins, to sit for six years in the United States Senate. The Banner cannot see what it is that Andrew Johnson has accomplished for Tennessee that Tennessee should be expected to load him with additional honors, and says that it is not a gladiator that Tennessee now wants in the Senate, but a man of peace. Union, civil order, and quietness at home are what Tennessee has need of now, and not a Senator at Washington who will infallibly draw on himself, his State, and his people the fire of Congress and general ill-will. This sounds very well; and also it sounds a little like some gentlemanly and smooth-tongued statesman of the Old Line Whig order who might like a place in the Senate for himself; and the voice may be the voice of the Banner, while the words are the words of the Hon. Emerson Etheridge or the Hon. Baillie Peyton. A better assurance that Mr. Johnson will not be sent to Washington again we get when we ask ourselves in vain what on earth the Northern Democratic leaders can be thinking of not to entreat with their Southern brethren to keep him at home, where he can only do the Republican party local good and his own friends local injury. Still, a Legislature made up all but wholly of Tennessee Democrats is hard to hold. As for Senter men, Senter seems the only one of them left.

Elsewhere politics are not particularly lively, though Grant has made some stir by what he has been saying about Judge Dent's candidacy in Mississippi. Dent is trying to divide the party, Grant says in substance, and shall not have his help, for he believes that but a very few Republicans are among those who want the Judge as a candidate, and that their success would necessarily be a rebel success. This will be pleasant news to the astute Mississippians who, having read the Democratic papers carefully, were thinking that to get Grant on their side, all that would be necessary would be to put in nomination a relative of his. This Dent movement in Mississippi is practically a request to the President to lend aid in breaking up the party which elected him, and is a request to which he was justified in giving an answer. The one he has given is a negative which will give general satisfaction to the Republicans, to those of them who disapproved as well as to those who approved Mr. Boutwell's and Mr. Creswell's interference in Tennessee politics. We learn that in the case of Virginia, as well as of Tennessee, Grant's sympathies were with the Radical wing of the party. He acted, however, on the theory that there was a real division of opinion among the Republicans of these two States, and that they had a right to settle their disputes without intervention from outsiders; but the Walker men and the Senter men will no doubt find that they will have to live up to their pledges if they expect to be recognized as within the pale. Much sensation has been excited by the announcement that General Canby is going to exact the iron-clad oath of the members of the new Virginia Legislature—which will exclude most of the Walkerites.

A Labor Convention, larger than has ever been held before, is in session in Philadelphia. Up to the moment of writing, nothing has been done beyond hearing an address from the Vice-President and a report from the executive committee, and refusing to admit Miss Anthony as a delegate from the Working.women's Association, on the ground, as urged by one member, that she was an enemy of labor, having employed women and unskilled labor in the Revolution office. The address and report, perhaps, indicated pretty clearly the objects of the Convention; if so, they are—the formation of a workingman's political party, pure and simple; the influencing of State Legislatures by agitation; opposition to Chinese emigration—the workingmen having apparently at last got hold of what seems a very simple idea, that taxes on foreign commodities do little for the native laborer, so long as foreign laborers are admitted without stint or hindrance; the restriction by law of the profits of all distributors and exchangers of commodities; the payment of the national debt in greenbacks. The Vice-President also indulged in a good deal of savage denunciation of "the old Norman law of inheritance," whatever that may be; of "the British villanous land and money systems;" and he announced his desire to have the country made "hot" for "the knaves and idlers" connected with these systems—by which we presume he means capitalists.

The condition of the judiciary in this State has received two signal illustrations during the week. The game of cross injunctions and counter orders which was carried on between Judge Barnard, acting in the Fisk interest, and Judge Peckham, acting in the Ramsey interest, with reference to the Susquehanna Railroad, at last brought things to such a pass that the only mode of deciding who was entitled to the possession of the road left open to the disputants was an armed struggle; and to this they resorted. Each brought on the ground a body of armed retainers, variously estimated at from 400 to 800 men, and tore up the track, destroyed culverts and bridges, seized on rolling stock, and finally used the locomotives as rams, after having carried the opposing forces to the scene of action. The traffic of a great public highway was thus for some days completely suspended, a whole district convulsed by private war, and the property of a great corporation placed at the mercy of a pair of undisciplined mobs. There was no use in saying to the leaders in the struggle that they ought to lay down their arms and submit their quarrel to the decision of the officers of the law. They had exhausted all legal means of redress when they took up arms. They had employed some of the acutest lawyers at the bar; and these, working night and day, had done all that skill, learning, and ingenuity could suggest to get from the people's judges an authoritative answer to the question, Who is entitled to the possession of the Albany and Susquehanna Railroad? But it was found in practice that, there being a great many judges, all having concurrent jurisdiction, and some ready to take one side of a controversy and some another, one suitor was speedily armed with as many writs, of the same force and effect, in his favor as the other had in his favor; and as each writ related to the same subject-matter, there was nothing left for it but to fight—in other words, but to resort to the reserved right of armed self-defence which corporations as well as individuals undoubtedly possess in the absence of courts.

A good deal of fault has been found with Governor Hoffman for stepping in and taking charge of the road at the request of the parties, it being no part of his duty, it has been said, to work railroads at the request of contending speculators. But what better use could a governor possibly put himself to than taking charge of a great highway threatened with complete closure, and devastated by civil war, owing to the total absence of judicial means of deciding to whom it belonged? If this be not a legitimate part of a governor's business, what can be the use of governors? With what face could he keep troops to prevent either Fisk or Ramsey from working the road, after they had told him that they could find no judicial redress, and had offered to place this great body of unprotected property in his hands till some peaceful and rational mode of settling their quarrel could be hit on? Concurrent jurisdiction, when held by a large body of judges in several different courts, may work well enough when judges are carefully selected, and when they use their discretion in constant dread of the opinion of the bar and of the public. But, as long as we do not allow them to be selected, in any proper sense of the term, but rather tossed up for in one of the dirtiest of games, and are content to see men on the bench who care no more for the opinion of either bar or people than for the lowing of so many oxen, we ought to be only too thankful that we have a governor who is willing to step in, as Mr. Hoffman has done in this case, to keep the peace in an inexpensive and sensible way.

The other illustration was a habeas corpus issued by Judge McCunn for the deliverance of one Pratt, a Texan cut-throat, who was one of the ringleaders in the brutal murder of Captain Smith, in Texas, last October, on which we commented at the time. Smith, an ex-Union officer, was, as part of a preconcerted plan, lodged in jail on some trumped-up charge, apparently that the Ku-klux might find him "handy" when they wanted him. He, knowing what was coming, applied for a guard of United States troops, and got it; but the "regulators" arrived, Pratt amongst them, intimidated the officer in command into offering no resistance, and then entered the jail and riddled poor Smith with balls. General Reynolds has been in pursuit of Pratt ever since, and at last caught him here, and a habeas corpus from Judge McCunn caused the jailer to produce him, with the return—which the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Abelmar agt. Booth, has pronounced sufficient, and, as regards all State courts, final—that the prisoner was in custody under the authority of the United States, and he was accordingly remanded to the jailer's custody. Marshal Barlow, then, in order to be secure against fresh attempts to release the prisoner on the part of other New York judges, transferred him to Fort Schuyler, on hearing of which Judge McCunn issued a fresh order, directing the Marshal to discharge the prisoner, which the Marshal, under the decision above referred to, disregarded, as he held the prisoner, as Judge McCunn knew, under the warrant of the United States Commissioner. Whereupon the Judge prepared a warrant for the arrest of the Marshal and the commanding officer at Fort Schuyler, on hearing of which the Marshal, by General Grant's order, surrounded himself with a guard of soldiers. Pratt was discharged by the Commissioner for want of evidence.

The affair has been in many ways scandalous, but it could not have occurred if our bench was in a proper condition. It was a gross abuse of Judge McCunn's discretion to hear, and indeed encourage, a long argument on the return to the habeas corpus, after he had found the prisoner was in the custody of the United States; and the reason why, after this, Marshal Barlow removed the prisoner to Fort Schuyler, and surrounded himself with a guard, is the very same reason which drove the Union Pacific, and will probably drive other roads, into removing their offices out of this State. The relations between the States and the United States are very delicate, and are largely dependent for their proper and peaceful maintenance on the character of the judges. With such judges as some of those we now have in this city, an armed collision between the two will always be one of the possibilities of every question of jurisdiction. Men like Judge McCunn cannot be allowed to have their own way simply because they are judges. Even if the inhabitants of this city be willing to put up with them, there is no reason why the United States should let them discharge its prisoners on habeas corpus, and lock up its officers for contempt of them; they all doubtless feel it, and there are cases in which their duty requires them to show it. Arrests under a United States Commissioner's warrant would be complete farces if State judges, as judges now are, could discharge them; just as the collection of the United States revenue would become a farce if injunctions, such as Judge Barnard issued the other day, could be enforced by State judges against collectors, forbidding them to demand and receive their dues. This last case is to be removed to the United States courts; but suppose the latter to dissolve the Barnard injunction, and Barnard to reimpose it and issue contempt warrants against all persons who disregarded it, what is to be done? If the troops cannot be summoned from Fort Schuyler to protect the Federal officers, in what sense is this State "a State in the Union?"

Count de Rochechouart, the present French chargé d'affaires at Pekin, has been writing a letter to the Journal des Economistes on the subject of Chinese money, in which he makes sundry observations on the condition of Chinese society which, we regret to say, place our Celestial brethren in a much less favorable light before the world than the accounts given by Mr. Burlingame. He says, for instance, that the adulteration and other cheats in the copper coinage have long been one of the great sources of revenue to the Central Government, and that when, by reason of the approach of a band of rebels, for instance, the copper coins fall heavily in value, owing to their great weight, the Mandarins have a pleasant way of levying the taxes by a silver standard, just as if the United States Government were, when gold was high, to levy its taxes in paper estimated in gold. He says that it would never do to abolish the consular jurisdictions in the trading ports, and submit the Europeans to the jurisdiction of the mandarins, who, he says, possess too few moral qualities, and are too ignorant, to make it possible to entrust them with the duty of doing justice between Europeans. Indeed, he adds that these functionaries "have only one idea, and that is, to throw us into the sea and get rid of us."

Talking of the Chinese, we find some observations in the Ashtabula (Ohio) Sentinel on the probable effect of an influx of the Chinese and other Asiatics on American society which are well worthy of attention. It scoffs at the notion that the civilization or social or political life of an Aryan race can be seriously influenced by contact with any number of barbarians of the Turanian or any other stock. If they settle among us permanently, they will adopt our religion and manners; if they do not, they will take themselves off when they have made a little money, and leave us as they found us. But that they will prove willing, industrious, and economical servants, working at small wages, when they see Americans constantly occupied in devising means of escaping work themselves, the writer pronounces a pure though sweet delusion. He says the great danger of the country just now is not the Chinese immigrants, but American laziness. No native American wants to do any hard work any longer; he imposes it on machinery or foreigners. He won't serve an apprenticeship to any manual art, or dig, delve, or mine, wash, cook, or plough, milk cows or bear children, if he can possibly get anybody else to do it for him. The Sentinel says there are 5,000,000 of blacks at the South and 10,000,000 of whites, and the whites do nothing nevertheless but howl for "more labor," being themselves nearly to a man idle. The farm-houses at the North, it says, are full of "well-dressed young ladies waiting to be married;" and the father is left to till the farm owing to the departure of the boys to peddle illustrated books, quack medicines, and patent rights, or be clerks in a store—a statement which, coming from a Western country paper, we commend to the attention of the ferocious agricultural organ which so cruelly chastised the Nation for saying the same thing a few weeks ago. We are still of opinion, however, that the Chinaman will supersede Bridget; her Aryan origin will not save her.

We must remind the Sentinel, moreover, that the eagerness to escape manual labor is not peculiar to Americans. All races share it; in other countries, a particular class of the community impose the lowest kind of toil on their own countrymen; here the natives, owing to their superiority in culture of various kinds, impose it on foreigners. But the dislike of manual labor is really the mainspring of civilization. The ideal world of some of our social philosophers, in which everybody would work with his hands, would be simply a world of barbarians. It is well known that the most ardent preachers of the dignity and delight of manual labor are persons who themselves only resort to it for amusement or exercise.

The new French Minister of Justice, M. Duvergier, has presented the "exposé des motifs," or, in other words, the reasons which have actuated the Government in proposing the reforms to be embodied in the pending senatus-consultum. There is, however, nothing new in the statement of them, and the document is interesting rather as a specimen of the way in which an absolute monarch saves his dignity in giving way to popular demands, than as a political paper properly so called. Great care is taken in it to represent the coming changes as the products of the Emperor's "foresight" and "sagacity;" the part which it assigns to the nation is that of "assenting" and "adhering" to them. The general result of the change is, that the Lower Chamber gets the power of introducing and fully discussing laws, instead of only partially discussing and agreeing to them, as heretofore; it gets the power of discussing and voting on the budget, item by item, instead of having, as heretofore, to accept or reject it as a whole, or en bloc, as the French call it, so that an objectionable appropriation can now be struck out without leaving the country for one year without revenue; and the Government surrenders the power—which, combined with the vote en bloc, rendered the control of the Chamber over the finances a mere sham—of transferring to one department of the public service, at its own discretion, money voted for another. Heretofore, for instance, supposing three millions were voted for education and five for the army, the Government had the power, exercised every year, of devoting six millions to the army, and only two to education, and so on; so that the country really had no share in fixing the comparative importance of different branches of the public service. The election by the Chambers of their own officers will do something to put a stop to the very comical hortatory labors of the chair, and the control of the commercial treaties and postal tariffs will probably endanger the treaty with England. The majority of the Chamber are undoubtedly protectionists, and are powerfully influenced by the great manufacturers; and the Journal des Economistes acknowledges that in this case economical progress will probably be hindered by political progress. There is no mention in the "exposé des motifs" of the abolition of Article 75 of the Constitution, which exempts functionaries from prosecution, except by permission of the Council of State, and so long as this lasts personal government is really not destroyed.

For the first time in the history of the empire, statistics making some approach to accuracy have been published relating to the population of Russia. The difficulties of making a census in that country, owing to the semi-barbarous condition of the eastern portion, are well known; but M. Semenoff, the chief of the Statistical Bureau of the Ministry of the Interior, has made some deductions from the census of 1863 which may be relied on with some degree of confidence. He gives the total population as 60,909,000; the births as 3,089,450, and the deaths as 2,243,321 per annum, at which rate of increase it may be said that in Russia population, as in Germany and England, doubles in about fifty years, or one-half less rapidly than in the United States. There is one birth every year to 19·7 inhabitants, while in France there is only one to 375. The deaths, on the other hand, are one in 37, which is a higher rate than that of any European country, and makes large families very necessary; but, as might be expected, the further west one comes, the more the rate of mortality declines, the average of life increasing with the civilization of the community, until in the Baltic Provinces it stands almost on the same level with that of Germany.

THE NEXT WORK FOR THE REPUBLICAN PARTY.

The speech made the other day by Governor Palmer, of Illinois, before the Ohio Republican Convention of that State, deserves attention for having stated in pretty plain terms the conditions on which the retention of power by the Republican party depends, or rather, indeed, the kind of work to which Republicans have now to devote themselves. He says frankly that the people will sustain no party on account of its past deeds, and that the services of the Republican party are part of the inheritance of the nation, but that, if the organization is to live, it must live by laboring for the welfare of the country. He then goes on to indicate in what way it must labor for the benefit of the country by enumerating the questions which it must deal with—or, as he says, "the abuses that have grown up during the war which it must take hold of." These are "the heavy burden of taxation;" a want of responsibility on the part of public officers; gross corruption in the States, counties, and towns, especially those which have been long in Democratic hands. In other words, he thinks that the great work before the country now is the purification of the State governments and State institutions—which, during the long absorption of the public mind in the contest with the South, have largely fallen into the hands of thieves; and the restoration of the States to their proper dignity and weight in the Federal system—they having, he thinks, owing to the excesses of the State-rights party, lost both "their purity and respectability."

This is, we believe, the first formal expression we have had from any public man of what nine persons in ten have been thinking, and what five in ten have for some months back—indeed, ever since the Reconstruction question was fairly disposed of—been saying in private. The idea which formed the Republican party, and which during the last fourteen tremendous years has held it together, has been worked out. It is now embodied, or will beyond peradventure very soon be embodied, in legislation. The work of achieving its triumph, however, was of such magnitude and such a nature that it necessarily diverted the mind of the public from all other political questions. Its most marked effect, apart from the emancipation of the slaves and the eradication of the color discrimination from legislation, has been to develop enormously the public taste for general ideas and abstract propositions, and to foster greatly the popular faith in loud-sounding formulæ. The multiplicity of strange, sweeping propositions on all sorts of subjects which one hears now every day announced from platforms and pulpits and in newspapers as legitimate inferences from the doctrine of human equality, which was necessarily and properly the principal weapon in the anti-slavery struggle, is one of the most striking political phenomena of the day. Under the cover of this taste and tendency, of course, a great number of abuses have sprung up and are flourishing in all branches of administration; and a great number of problems of the last importance are pressing for solution. The administration of justice and everything connected with it, from the courts of last resort down to the police and the jails, is, in nearly every State, in a condition which everybody admits calls for treatment of some kind. The power of the great corporations, and particularly railroad corporations, has assumed proportions which are exerting most deplorable effects on the State legislators and on the judiciary. The management of the prisons in a very large number of the States is honeycombed with abuses. The machinery of municipal government, especially in the now numerous large cities, is either out of gear or unfitted to its work. The only thing about public schools which seems to be well settled is, that they ought to exist. On all that relates to attendance, discipline of pupils, the pay and qualifications of teachers, the courses and hours of study, the public may be fairly said not yet to know its own mind. It is agreed on all hands that men should abstain from the abuse of intoxicating drinks; but about the best mode of preventing it there is the wildest confusion of opinion; and in all discussions which take place on the subject, it is plain that we are still far from anything approaching to general agreement upon a subject on which, perhaps, in a democratic country, it is more necessary there should be something like general agreement than on any other, and that is the proper limits of the province of government. There is a large and powerful section of the community which thinks the Government should do nothing for a man except help to keep him from being robbed. There is another which thinks it should regulate his drink, his hours of labor, the kind of labor he should pursue, and even lend him money at low rates of interest. The relations of capital and labor, of husbands and wives, are in every State in a condition of extreme disorder, and the discussion of them, so far from having as yet seriously engaged the attention of the mass of the people, is mainly confined to a few enthusiasts or a few demagogues—the latter doing all they can to darken counsel. The way they have begun to bid against each other of late, in diminishing the hours of labor, is a striking illustration of the way in which the subject has thus far been neglected by the bulk of rational men.

Last of all, there comes the tariff question. There is probably nothing before the public which comes home to men's "business and bosoms" as this does. The manner in which it will be settled affects the price of everything—everybody eats, drinks, and wears. It is not now settled, or anything like it. The protectionists are not satisfied with the present tariff, because, although it falls very little short of prohibition, it does not afford them, in many branches of industry, protection enough. The free-traders are hostile to it: first, on principle; and, secondly, because, besides increasing prices in the domestic market, it has so raised the cost of home production as to be killing our foreign trade. The great markets of the world, as was well illustrated by the late returns of the foreign commerce of China, are gradually passing into the possession of other nations.

Now, the question before politicians is, whether you can take the Republican organization, as it stands, and use it for the solution of all these questions? There are many reasons for desiring to use it for such work; and first amongst them is the fact that, as we have often remarked, it contains in its ranks nearly all the reformers, and people of reforming tastes and tendencies, to be found in the country. Indeed, one might roughly describe the distinction between the two great parties by saying that a Republican thinks the world needs a great deal of improvement, and that there is no comfort to be had in it without continual attempts to improve it; while the Democrat thinks it is, or was till the Republicans took charge of it, a perfectly satisfactory world, and that by letting things alone, and properly respecting the rights of liquor-dealers, more happiness can be got out of it than in any other way. But then, when you come to look facts in the face, and sit down, for instance, to draw a platform which shall command the adhesion of the Republican party about education, or the judiciary, or the tariff, or prohibition, or the civil service, or almost any other question now agitated, you feel at once that, powerful as it was on the question of equality before the law, it is not to be depended on for concerted action on any other. There is not a single problem of magnitude now ripe for discussion on which anybody who wants to keep the party together dare press it to declare itself. Many of the leaders know this perfectly well, and are accordingly trying to elevate some question not prominently before the public into factitious importance, so as to keep the ranks unbroken as long as possible. But, practically, this is about as sensible as trying to keep an army together by avoiding the enemy. The business of a party is not to exist simply and divide the offices, but to take positive and incessant action on a great variety of subjects.

Then there is another question which may be said to be dividing the party already, without any pressure from the outside, and that is, the question of the fitness of faithful rascals for important public offices. These gentlemen enjoy, owing to the war, a position such as they have never enjoyed before, inasmuch as service in the field or elsewhere, which many of them can boast, provides them with a kind of moral corset which gives them a most imposing "set-up," and enables them to make as good an appearance as if they had begun life as saints. People, too, have been very loth to poke them in the ribs, or otherwise call public attention to the fact that the corset was there, and the fine figure was a sham after all; and they have consequently had a run of good things during the last five or six years, such as has never fallen to the lot of men of their kind before, and probably never will again. But we believe we are right in saying that a large portion of the Republican party begins to tire of the spectacle of their elevation, and even begins to tire of the party discipline to which they owe it. Good men all over the country, who have worked in good causes all their lifetime, are beginning to ask themselves seriously whether they have not voted the regular ticket, and overlooked the little black spots in the career of candidates, fully as long as is good for either their own souls or for the country. We see or hear from such men every day. Whatever policy the Republican party may adopt, they say some change or convulsion is necessary that will rid it of some of its most active "workers" and officers of all grades, and not a few of them are ready for anything that will bring this about.

THE PROSPECT IN FRANCE.

THE situation in France seems to become more and more interesting as the weeks roll by. The contest between the Liberals and the Emperor has since the elections been exceedingly dramatic; the plot full of startling incidents and surprises, and possessing one of the highest merits of plots, in that it has thus far given nobody the slightest inkling of what the dénoûment is to be. When the new Chamber was dissolved in the spring, although there were some bad signs for the Government, such as the election of M. Grévy, nevertheless there was no general expectation that the system of forcing official candidates on the electors, by means of official bribing and threatening, would work less well than it had always done; for besides the usual influence of official pressure on the minds of the peasantry, and the enormous number of the Government functionaries, the prefects have under the constitution the power of gerrymandering the election districts immediately before election. If, for instance, as at Bordeaux, the prefect has reason to believe that the vote in a particular district is likely to go against the Government, he can lop a piece of it off and stick it on to another, and add a piece from a third in place of the detached portion, so as to make a sure thing of the result; and this sort of work the prefects did, not as an American politician would do it, shamefacedly and with secrecy, but openly, proudly, and with the air of men who knew their duty, and were glad to let the world see that they would not shrink from it.

The result of the election at first sight, too, seemed favorable enough. The radical ranks, it is true, were swelled from about nineteen to forty; but, to all appearance, the Government could count positively on the remaining 253 members of the Corps. There was, it is true, something startling in the fact that in the Liberal districts there was an unlooked-for outburst of intense radical and, indeed, as it seemed, socialistic feeling. The old campaigners, like Favre, Simon, and Picard, who had borne the heat and burden of the day, came very near being repudiated by their own followers for lukewarmness, and the root-and-branch men rose high in popular favor. This frightened many people; but it at first reassured and even encouraged the Government. Was not the Emperor the saviour of society? did he not owe his elevation to the general dread of the socialists? and was not this fresh outbreak of socialist fervor a fresh proof that society still needed him?

When the Chamber met, however, it became plain that something had happened out of the usual course. In a single day it was evident that a new power had shown itself in France; that a new spirit had taken possession of the people; that, in short, personal government had broken down; and that the alternative, reform or revolution, was staring people in the face as it did in 1847. A new party, known as the "Tiers Parti," at once showed itself; and, to the number of 116—a large proportion of them deserters from the Imperial ranks—signed a paper calling on the Government to concede the responsibility of the Ministry, the independence of the Chamber, to abandon the power of making commercial and postal treaties and to declare war without its consent, and to abolish Article 75 of the Constitution, exempting functionaries from responsibility before the courts for their official acts; in short, to abolish personal government—the very essence of the Napoleonic system—and substitute parliamentary government, the perniciousness of which had always been a cardinal doctrine of the Napoleonic creed. To everybody's surprise, the Emperor gave way at once; the Ministry resigned, and a new one was formed; but what was suspicious about the surrender was, that though, on sound parliamentary principles, the "Tiers Parti" ought to have composed the new Ministry, not one of them was let into it. While they were grumbling and wondering over this, came a decree proroguing the Corps before the members had well taken their places, and convening the Senate, which is now sitting, to discuss and adopt the senatus-consultum which is to embody the new reforms. This was adding insult to injury; and the insult was aggravated in the eyes of the Opposition by the somewhat ludicrous circumstance that the first they heard of the prorogation was from M. Schneider, the President of the Chamber, who announced it not from the chair, but from his carriage-window in the street, round which a large number of members gathered when he drove up to the door.

Why the Emperor prorogued the Chamber was at first a great puzzle. Many were disposed to look on it as an act of defiance; but the majority at last settled down to the belief that the Emperor did it because he did not know what else to do. He was not prepared to face the fire of the Opposition debates while in the midst of a quandary, and with a new Ministry on his hands and still uncertain as to the aims or strength of the Opposition, so he resolved to stop their talking for a month or two while he was preparing his defence. The result has proved, in a most comical manner, that he was right. The "Tiers Parti" met again to draw up another address, or "interpellation," as they call it, to the Government, and fell to pieces at once. It was of course heterogeneous in its composition, and when it tried once more to put its united wishes and feelings on paper, in the shape of an address to the country, the various elements began to fight in a most lamentable way. The extreme radicals, or Left, as they are called, were for "going the whole hog," and exacting everything; the Left Centre were willing to be moderate and compromise; while the Centre was doubtful. The Right, of course, being composed of common Government hacks, put in by the prefects, counts for nothing in these troubles, and is paralyzed with fear. The establishment of parliamentary government would put an end to their political lives, and they know it, and are considerably abashed at finding that the Government is twice as liberal as they undertook to be on its behalf. There are in the Tiers Parti a dozen men who want to lead; but apparently not one is willing to serve, and the result has been complete disorganization at the very first meeting. Finding themselves unable to agree upon an address to the country, it was resolved that each member should address his own constituents in such manner as he thought fit, and on this they separated, but not without having exposed themselves to a good deal of ridicule on the part of the Government organs, one of which says that the country knows and cares nothing about them, and that they might as well be called Sou'sou'west or Nor'nor'east as Left or Left Centre, as far as it is concerned. The spectacle of their divisions, too, it must be admitted, is the best justification for the prorogation the Emperor could have—in his own eyes.

From the addresses of the members to their constituents—and notably from that of M. Keller, a noted and influential Catholic Conservative from the Rhine district—as well as from the articles in the Liberal papers, and especially from two very remarkable and instructive ones in the last Revue des Deux Mondes, from the pens of Saint-Marc Girardin and André Cochut, it is clear enough that the main body of French Liberals are willing to make peace with the present dynasty, on condition that personal government is definitively abandoned. M. Girardin, who is an old politician, who has seen, and indeed figured, in three revolutions, gives us an idea of the plan on which the moderates have apparently hit for enabling the Emperor to surrender without too great loss of dignity. Their theory is that universal suffrage took possession of the Government in 1848; that the exclusion by the National Assembly of about a third of the voters from the polls in 1850 was in reality a breach of faith, and a cause of great exasperation to the working-classes, and afforded Louis Napoleon a sort of plausible justification for the coup d'état; that after this a dictatorship was clearly necessary in the interest of public order and safety—as indeed it was after the Dixhuit Brumaire—but that a dictatorship is always a provisional and temporary remedy; that the great mistake of the First Napoleon was his conversion of it into a permanent form of government; that the dictatorship of 1851 has lasted as long as, and longer than, the public interests require it; that the people which acquiesced in it in 1851 refuses to acquiesce in it any longer; and that this being now plain to everybody, it will be the part of wisdom and of honor for the Emperor to quit the provisional sphere and transform himself into a constitutional monarch. All seem agreed, however, that if he cannot make up his mind to this, his error will be followed by the same consequences as that of Napoleon I., Charles X., and Louis Philippe. The extreme men, and some moderates, on the other hand—Prévost-Paradol for one—deny that internal reforms can now save him, so great have been his transgressions, and that his only chance of safety is foreign war, and the wildest rumors as to his intentions are accordingly circulated and believed. Altogether, the scene is a striking and, in some respects, ludicrous illustration of the low condition to which the government of great men, and "men on horseback," and "wise rulers," and saviours of society has fallen in the modern world.

A WORD MORE ABOUT CHURCH AND STATE.

We are in the habit of talking as if there was something in our institutions which makes them essentially distinct from those of any country in Europe, the fact being that they are in most things a development of European ideas. We have contributed, however, to the science of politics one new element—the complete organic separation of the state and the church. Other nations of Christendom have tolerated different forms of religious belief, worship, and association; indeed, the principle of toleration seems now to be a favorite one in Europe; but in all cases there is a connection more or less intimate between the civil society and one or more ecclesiastical societies. The American idea goes far beyond any mere toleration. The state with us does not recognize the church as having any legal existence whatever, and places all religious associations upon the same level, by denying to them anything but a mere voluntary condition, a mere self-assumed status. It is somewhat difficult for one who, by study or by experience, has become familiar with the relations of the church to the state in England or in any other European country, to form an accurate conception of the relations—or rather absence of relations—which subsist between the same bodies in the United States. We fear that American politicians and even American courts have sometimes failed to appreciate the true position occupied by the ecclesiastical in the midst of the civil society, and have been unconsciously influenced by notions derived from an acquaintance with English precedents. The state does not recognize any church as a spiritual body; it regards the congregations of believers as mere voluntary associations, united from motives and for purposes of which it takes no cognizance; it treats the forms and ceremonies, the sacraments and vows, by which individuals are admitted within the spiritual pale, and the canons and rules by which they are governed while therein, as self-imposed, as having no legal binding force, and as capable of being broken or thrown off at pleasure without incurring any legal penalty; but it does admit the fact that property may be held by or in trust for these societies, and does protect the possession and use thereof to the same extent and for the same reasons as in the innumerable instances where the subject-matter of the ownership is entirely devoted to secular uses. Indeed, our law has broken down and utterly destroyed the distinction between religious and secular purposes. Church corporations are common in the United States—more so, perhaps, than in any other country—but they are not "religious corporations" in the English sense of the term; they are purely business associations; they differ in no respect, except in the objects for which they are created, from banks and railways. The members of such a body may all, perhaps, be members of the interior and spiritual body called the church, or, on the contrary, none of them may have been received into the mysteries of that higher association; but the American state does not trouble itself to enquire in regard to that matter. It sees only a legal, secular organization possessing land, edifices, funds, and will guard the property therein, and will enforce the trusts which have been created, in exactly the same manner as it would in the case of a college or hospital. But it is the very essence of the American theory that there is no legal ecclesiastical status, there is no legal right, in a person to be a member of or a clergyman in any particular church. If an individual, by complying with the provisions of the statutes, has become a corporator in a parish, his rights to vote and to take a part in the business of the body-politic will be secured to him by the civil tribunals. If a clergyman has been employed by the proper authority, whether trustees, vestry, or congregation, he will be treated as any other hired person, and may recover his wages upon the same legal principle as that which is invoked in the case of the humblest day-laborer.

Our law, however, confers no jurisdiction upon the courts to compel a bishop to lay hands in confirmation upon any applicant, or a session or congregation of believers to vote affirmatively when a person seeks admission to the spiritual body. When a candidate for the ministry has completed the prescribed or customary course of preliminary study, and exhibits the prescribed or customary amount of personal fitness, he cannot appeal to the judges or to the legislature to aid him in entering the ranks of the clergy, no matter how unjust or even malicious may be the acts of the church authorities in excluding him. This is equally true in respect to the methods of discipline by which the rules of government adopted by each ecclesiastical community are enforced, not even excepting the final processes of excommunication and deposition from the ministry. If the civil courts may under any circumstances interpose to prevent the expulsion of a member or the removal of a priest, it is only because the law clothes such membership or office with a legal character. But if it could do so—if the office of a member or priest were a legal status—then a person might demand to be admitted to it as well as to be retained in it. It is plain, then, that we must deny the latter power unless we are willing to admit the former. If an injunction is possible in the one case, a mandamus would be proper in the other. No doubt there may be some rights of property—or, rather, some capacities to acquire property—remotely affected by the action of church rulers in excommunicating a member or deposing a clergyman; but these rights and capacities all depend upon certain rules of a purely spiritual nature which have been voluntarily adopted and assented to—of which the law professes itself to be in utter ignorance, and with the administration of which it refuses to interfere.

But, in addition, no ecclesiastical discipline can have any necessary influence upon individual proprietary rights and capacities. The deposed minister cannot, it is true, officiate in any society which retains its connection with the church in question; but the congregation which had employed him may at any time dissolve that connection and retain him in his former position. They and he will be equally beyond the reach of any civil or spiritual penalties. This is the very essence of separation between church and state. Herein lies that perfect freedom of the church to act within its own peculiar sphere which is as dear to the American as the corresponding freedom of the state within the range of its proper functions. Any attempt of judges or legislators to control the proceedings of spiritual judicators is as much a violation of the American theory as would be any organized endeavor of the religious bodies to coerce the civil rulers. The recent and notable instance of such usurpation by a court in Chicago, on which we commented last week, ought to have called out a spontaneous and indignant rebuke from the press, secular and religious, instead of eliciting, as it did, an ill-concealed expression of approval if not of exultation from so many journals, especially from those which claim to be pre-eminently liberal in politics and religion. If the bishop and clerical assessors in one religious body may be restrained by an injunction, the sessions, presbyteries, and assemblies of a second denomination, and the congregations of another, are equally exposed to the same judicial interference. A bill in equity to prevent the contemplated union of the Old and New School Presbyterians would doubtless raise a violent storm of indignation in ecclesiastical circles; and yet the legal principle by which such a suit could be sustained is exactly the same as that which has been invoked in behalf of Mr. Cheney.

No argument is needed to convince any American that this principle of church and state freedom which has been incorporated into our fundamental law is the true one; that its practical workings are advantageous both to the civil and to the spiritual societies. It should be a source of gratification to us to see the Parliament of Great Britain adopting the same idea and applying it to a portion of the empire. It is surprising, therefore, that so many newspapers which represent the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States have united in lamenting the late action of the British legislature, as though a blow had been struck at the prosperity and usefulness, if not at the very life itself, of the same church in Ireland. We should have supposed that all American Episcopalians would rather have hailed this new measure with delight. The history of their own communion in this country should have taught them the good effects of ecclesiastical liberty, especially in the midst of a population strongly hostile. At the close of the Revolution, the Episcopal Church in the United States was in a condition of mere suspended animation. Its numbers had been very few during the colonial times; it was surrounded by other denominations strongly antagonistic to its doctrines, worship, and organization; it bore the odium of its former connection with the mother country, and of the political opinions of its clergy, most of whom had been violently opposed to the war for independence. In fact, it has not even yet recovered from the weight of unpopularity which rested upon it, for no other religious body is so constantly attacked by the secular newspapers and periodicals. But, notwithstanding all these disadvantages, it has prospered, and has grown in numbers and influence, to an extent which has surprised even its own adherents.

THE USURERS IN COURT.

The bankers and brokers who pleaded guilty to the charge of usury recently brought against them by the Grand Jury of the county, have received their sentence. It has not been an excessively severe one. A money fine, comparatively light for men of wealth, has healed the wounded majesty of the law. Eleven of the criminals pleaded guilty of usury. Nine were fined for the crime of usury with which they were charged, and which they had confessed. Two were sentenced to a fine for the crime of usury which they had confessed, and also to a term of confinement in the city prison for other crimes of which they had not been accused, for which they had not been tried, and of which they had not been convicted. Judge Cardozo forgot the discretion which he displayed in the rest of the sentence when he sought to inflict discriminating punishment on two of the criminals for crimes with which they were not charged, such as language defiant towards the policeman who arrested them, and especially when he accompanied its announcement with remarks that would have exposed a less exalted reputation to a faint suspicion of demagogy. This error—if so trifling a deviation from justice as punishing a man for a crime of which he has not been accused can be called an error—was, however, promptly and honorably acknowledged and amended. When the facts of the case were brought to the knowledge of the judge, after sentence had been passed, he suspended or entirely remitted the punishment by imprisonment, and the frightened criminals left the court, thanking their stars and Judge Cardozo for having got off so easily. Here, to the minds of thoughtless people, the interest in the usury trials ends. But to those who watch public affairs with a view to future developments from present events, the real interest in these usury trials only begins. It is worth while to divest the questions involved of the surrounding complications that hide their real significance.

Public sentiment is against the usurers, because the public believes that the men who received usurious rates of interest were the same men as those who created the stringency in the money market which proved so injurious to business throughout the country. Nothing could be further from the truth. There was not only no connection between the two, but there was positive antagonism. The men who created the stringency—who locked up money, as the phrase goes—are perfectly well known. One or two second-class national-bank presidents, the robber-barons of the so-called Erie clique, with one or two large "bear" speculators and their brokers and hangers-on—these were the creators of the lock-up. They were fighting the Vanderbilt clique—the men who believe that Mr. Vanderbilt's administration will make the shares of the different railroads with which he is identified more valuable than they are even now. The Erie clique wanted to make the Vanderbilt men sell their stocks, and for that purpose created the stringency. They accomplished it by not lending their own money at all, and by inducing their friends and colleagues to withhold theirs. These men were not the usurers, as the public seems to think; these men sought to prevent their opponents from getting money on any terms, and would not lend their own money at any price. The public indignation against them is just enough—their combinations to lock up money are injurious to public welfare, and utterly subversive of individual and public morality; but the public must not confound the men who created the monetary stringency with the men who sought to reap a well-earned reward for their efforts to relieve it. The men who created the stringency did so by not lending their money, and by inducing their friends to withhold theirs. The men who have been punished for usury were those who not only did lend their own money, but who went to great labor and expense to bring other people's money from all accessible points so as to lend it. It was they who called upon merchants, up-town and down-town, on private capitalists and retired business men, to gather whatever idle balances could be found; it was they who sent their messengers to Brooklyn and Newark and the river towns, and who telegraphed to Boston and Philadelphia, and Baltimore and Washington, and brought together all the money that could be spared in any quarter; it was they who strained their credit with foreign bankers to obtain advances not usually granted. To class these men with the originators of the lock-up is simply absurd. They were the worst enemies of the men engaged in making money scarce, for their efforts were constantly tending to make it plenty. And to suppose that business men would do this work from charity, or from love of their fellow-men, is, if possible, more absurd still. They obtained a liberal remuneration. They deserved it. They did not even have to ask for it. The leading borrowers habitually sought those brokers and bankers who were known or supposed to hold loanable funds, and obtained, as an act of friendship, the use of large sums, stipulating, of their own accord, that they would pay the highest rates of interest paid by any one. The smallest brokers were eagerly besought by leading houses to send in their balances, however small, at the highest rates of the day; and even on such terms loans were accepted in the light of favors. To make a crime of the services of men who strained every nerve to remedy a grave public evil, is one of those intolerable perversions of public sentiment which disgust the most sanguine. The only excuse that thinking men were able to give for the sudden forced revival of a barbarous and obsolete usury law was, that it could be distorted into a means of punishing the gamblers who disturbed the community by creating an artificial stringency in the money market; and forthwith the resuscitated law is applied, to the grim delight of the gamblers aforesaid, to punish the very men who had done everything in their power to alleviate the mischief complained of.

In the same mistaken way the public sympathizes with the efficient prosecuting attorney and the public-spirited grand jury that so cleverly and perseveringly brought the criminals to grief. But how is it that, throughout all the proceedings, no complainant has ever appeared? Can it be that the original complainant was ashamed of his position? Can it be that the complainant was one of the leading men of the Vanderbilt party who, day after day, borrowed large amounts of money from the men accused of usury, with the understanding that he accepted the loan as a favor, and expected to pay the highest rates of the day therefor? Can it be that the complainant did not even personally appear, but employed legal counsel to convince the officials of the justice, the necessity, the legality of the proceedings? Or can it be that the immaculate grand jury, not one of whom, from the foreman down, was ever guilty of usury, could not basely endure the wickedness they had to witness daily, but began proceedings of their own accord? There is evidently a mystery here. We have some opinions in regard to the natural depravity of man which make us doubtful if the pure souls of the grand jury were stirred to action by their own spontaneous impulses. With our experience of the vis inertiæ of official bodies, we are amazed at the energy of the district attorney. It is a remarkable fact that, within a few days past, brokers in Wall and Broad Street who are known to have been large borrowers of money during the tight times, have been informed that they were expected to pay up promptly their share of the expenses of the usury proceedings. What, in all the world, is the nature of these expenses? The sum demanded is not large enough for purposes of bribery, and, of course, all ordinary expenses of the trial are borne by the State. This money can only have been used to pay the legal counsel and other persons employed to "lobby" judge, jury, and attorney. This, then, is the motive-power at bottom of the proceedings: a regularly organized and paid "lobby" of men, who (of course, impudently and falsely) pretend that they can influence a jury to frame an indictment, or an attorney to commence a prosecution, or a judge to give a verdict. How long even the spotless purity of our grand juries and our lower courts will be able to withstand the onslaughts of an organized lobby is very doubtful, and we cannot but note its introduction into our judicial system as a novelty of the most dangerous sort. The subject is too painful to pursue in this direction; but who will hereafter praise the watchfulness of a grand jury, or the efficiency of a district-attorney, while there is a possibility that they are merely unconscious instruments in the service of a set of unscrupulous gamblers? How is it, too, that, of fifty or more indictments said to have been found, only eleven were brought to trial? How is it, too, that every one of the accused, with most remarkable unanimity, pleaded guilty, well knowing themselves innocent? Was any hint conveyed to their counsel that it was best for them to do so? Was any promise held out to them that they would be leniently dealt with if they would only not force a trial?

A FEW REMARKS ON INSULTS.

Why was it that during the earlier ages of mankind the man who received an insult was in the habit of retaliating in kind? Why was it his custom, if questions were raised by his enemy as to his honor, his personal beauty, or his paternity, to retort by raising doubts equally damaging as to the paternity, the personal beauty, or the honor of his enemy? Charles Reade asserts in one of his earlier books that the methods of retort have always been the same in all ages, and that those methods come under three categories—tu quoque, tu mentiris, and vos damnemini. We should have said that the matter was not quite so simple as this, and that the number of the possible classifications of retorts is only to be measured by the number of possible classifications of insults. This view would seem to be borne out by certain facts which we might adduce, as, for instance, the custom of Iceland—under which the person who considers himself insulted is allowed to call his insulter out to a combat of words in some public place; about the contestants gather their respective friends and admirers and a general throng of citizens, and when the appointed moment arrives one of the principals pours forth a torrent of abuse, thoroughly exposing the private character and life of his opponent, who follows with a reply which as completely does the business on his side. Then follows the replication, and after that the rejoinder and sur-rejoinder and rebutter and sur-rebutter, and whatever other additional forms are known to Icelandic law. Now, we can hardly imagine so carefully organized a system as this without imagining more possibilities at its base than the meagre scheme of the English novelist supplies. But however this may be, why was it that down to the fall of the Roman Empire custom permitted orators and poets and statesmen and, no doubt, every one else to insult to the right and left those with whom they quarrelled, without danger of violence, while the customs which sprang up with the rise of chivalry and feudalism produced a state of society in which the man who did not resent an insult by some kind of personal violence became ipso facto dishonored? And why is it that in the society of the nineteenth century a man who does resent an insult by means of personal violence is dubbed by society a fool?

The other day Dr. Mackey, Collector of the port of Charleston, was superseded by Mr. George W. Clark. As soon as the latter appeared on the scene, and demanded the keys of the Custom-house, Dr. Mackey, with Icelandic inventiveness, vituperated his successor as a "third-rate sutler," and declared that it was his intention to retain possession of the office until he should have protected the interests of the United States against the felonious designs of this same successor by taking an inventory of all the public property, and receiving a receipt. Now, if Mr. Clark had been a Roman of the Ciceronian epoch, he would undoubtedly have felt called upon to let Dr. Mackey know what his opinion of him was. He would have reminded him of his early life, the sorrow he had been to his parents, the prophecies of his ruin that were uttered with no reforming effect by the sages of his native town: then passing to his subsequent career, he would have pointed out the various schemes of villany in which the late collector had been engaged—his burning of churches, his robbing of provinces, the amounts of plunder received by him; then taunting him with the memory of the sums he had aimed at, but had failed to secure, he would have finally wound up by passing to the consideration of his latter end, and the prediction of a miserable old age and neglected grave. On the other hand, had Mr. Clark been a Middle-Age Christian gentleman, he would have quietly informed the Doctor "where he could be found," and immediately placed the affair in the hands of a trusty friend. One of the two collectors would probably have been killed or disabled, and the Government relieved of all difficulty as between them. But Mr. Clark was, as our readers know, neither a Roman nor a feudal knight; and being neither more nor less than a progressive politician of the nineteenth century and these United States, mark well what he does. All the accounts agree that he smiles! He receives his predecessor's insults with silence, indifference, and even sweetness. He wins the day—he not only gets possession of the office, but receives the sympathy and applause of all the progressive newspapers and men throughout the country. If he had behaved in this way a hundred years ago, he would have reaped as his reward the scorn of his fellow-citizens and of society at large.

The records of the Boston Police Court have recently furnished an instance of the same sort of coolness. A certain Mr Churchill (again, we believe we violate no confidence in saying it, a progressive man), coming into a railway car very nearly full, sees before him two seats turned over toward one another, and three gentlemen sitting therein. He enquires if the fourth seat is engaged, and, finding that it is, immediately takes it, saying, as one of the witnesses testified, in an incredulous manner, that he would keep it until the gentleman came for it. And now begins a controversy with one of the three gentlemen, a certain Mr. Curtis, as to the amount of personal baggage which a passenger is entitled to place about his person when he is sitting in the same seat with another passenger, the remarks of Mr. Curtis being, according to one version, insulting—according to another, "polite, but somewhat pointed." At any rate, when the fourth gentleman, for whom the seat has been reserved, appears, Mr. Churchill rises to leave the scene of the dispute, telling Mr Curtis, "in a low tone," that if he had ever seen a gentleman, Mr. Curtis cannot with justice be called one. To this "somewhat pointed" remark the latter replies by doing what he himself has since described on the witness-stand as "taking hold of his nose and turning it in a moderate and quiet manner." We pause here for a moment, and consider what, in another age, the person so attacked would have done; afterwards, let us proceed to the consideration of what Mr. Churchill actually did do.

The position which the nose has occupied ever since the capture of Constantinople by the Turks as an instrument of revenge, would offer to the philosopher a various and interesting subject of study. The fact is of course undoubted, but the explanation has never been given. The prominence of the feature in question furnished a partial but not a complete solution of the problem. A priori, we should be inclined to think that the peculiar sense of indignity which even the most moderate and quiet "turning" has till lately been supposed to generate in noble minds, was caused by some original instinct, implanted in the human breast by Providence for its own good purposes. But then, if that were so, we should expect to find in the history of Greece and Rome, and the earlier Eastern nations, some trace of the existence of that instinct. And yet there are no recorded instances of its manifestations. To be sure, this may be explained by saying that in those early days the simplicity of mankind had as yet prevented them from discovering what a wealth of insulting revenge the organ in question brought, as one may say, within every one's reach. Of course, there must have been a time when it first occurred to some one to pull the nose of some one else. But the whole subject is involved in obscurity, which we are unable to fathom. At some future day we may return to it. For the present, we merely call attention to the fact that from the destruction of the Eastern Empire down to the fall of Richmond, the man who had his nose pulled was always regarded as affording to the disinterested spectator a ridiculous spectacle, and that he who succeeded in pulling the nose of another was always regarded as one who had succeeded in trampling under foot the tenderest feelings of humanity. Had Mr. Churchill been an aristocrat of the feudal period, under the circumstances in which he now found himself he would have drawn his sword and run his adversary through, or got himself run through. Had he been a Roman, we are unable to say what he would have done, because, as we have already suggested, the method of revenge adopted by Mr. Curtis was unknown to the Romans; but undoubtedly something terrible should have taken place. Being, however, a very different character from either Roman or aristocrat—being, in fact, an altogether new kind of man; that is, the "modern man"—he adopted a very different course from the effete practices of a bygone time. As soon as he felt that the deed was accomplishing itself, he turned upon his foe and remonstrated with him for using violence in the presence of ladies. It is true that, according to one version, he aimed a blow at Mr. Curtis's head. But, according to his own testimony, the line of defence adopted against the most direct insult which the ingenuity of man has yet discovered, was that of Christian expostulation.

There are those who say that this meekness may be explained by the assumption that a truly progressive man does not know when he is insulted; or, in other words, that you cannot insult a truly progressive man. Let us say here, by the way, that our conviction that Mr. Churchill is a truly progressive man arises from two facts proved subsequently on the witness-stand: first, the fact, already mentioned, of his taking a vacant seat immediately on receiving information that it was engaged; and, secondly, his Christian demeanor when taken hold of by Mr. Curtis—determination, combined with meekness, being the characteristic trait, as all our readers will admit, of the truly progressive. Yet this explanation will hardly answer, for it is after all only stating the difficulty in another form. Why is it that the really spiritually radical are impervious to insult? For it is only the radical. The aristocrat of to-day, whether impetuous Southern or calm Northern blood flows in his veins, is just as sensitive as he ever was. Witness the revenge taken upon Mr. Grenville Murray in England by Lord Carrington. Mr. Murray had merely published a few "reflections" on Lord Carrington's father—such as a dozen progressive papers in this metropolis of ours are publishing every day—on which Lord Carrington straightway seeks out Mr. Grenville Murray and thrashes him. And in France, where the traditions of aristocracy still hold, the duello is invariably resorted to as the only means of wiping out editorial insults. How interesting it would have been, in view of these facts, if Tocqueville could have devoted a small portion of his great work to the discussion of the Influence of Democracy on Sensibility to Insult! For it may well be argued that the insensibility of which we see so many instances about us is the result of equality of condition. "In a society," if we may imagine what Tocqueville would have said on this subject,—"in a society in which a few men are placed above the rest, and look down as from a vast height upon their fellows, the isolation of their position breeds a feeling of superiority which we commonly call pride. There grow up two codes: one, a code of equality, arranged to meet the needs of the aristocracy in the relations of its members to one another; the other, a code of superiority, arranged to meet the necessities of the relation of lord and villein. If, now, one of the dominant class infringes the code of equality by using methods of treatment among those of his own class which he had only the recognized right to use towards his inferiors, his equals feel that he does this because he wishes to imply that they are really beneath him, and that he has the right to treat them as if they belonged to the lower order. What deadlier wrong could he do than this? Aristocrats are treated as if they belonged to 'the people!'—in other words, they are insulted. On the other hand, in democracies there is no room for such feelings to arise. When each man considers himself as good as his neighbor, and there is one code of manners common to all, it is impossible that insults should be felt as they are in countries where they imply an attempt to degrade. All now are on one level; there is no inferior class into which submission to degradation would lower a man. Consequently, insults are felt to be mere words, and beneath notice. Insensibility to insult grows up, and what was in former times regarded as grievous insolence, is received at length with indifference or contempt. And it is soon found that insults can be returned with great ease—a discovery which generates the really democratic practice of 'an equal chance.' When each man has an equal chance to insult with every other, he can no longer complain that he is defrauded of any substantial right."

Correspondence.

THE INFLUENCE OF SEX ON CHARACTER.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: In a review of Mr. Mill's "Subjection of Women," you suggest a possible weakness in his argument, because he affirms that the only way of getting at a knowledge of the present difference between the two sexes is by means of "an analytic study of the laws of the influence of circumstances on character," a work which you truly say is "in its nature almost impossible of accomplishment." But the point that Mr. Mill intends to make, I think, is this: that while this study is possible to a certain extent, as has been repeatedly proved in the case of men, it has never been attempted in the case of women; and not only so, but "even the preliminary knowledge, what the differences between the sexes now are, apart from all questions as to how they are made what they are, is still in the crudest and most incomplete state." And he goes on to show that the reason why this preliminary knowledge is wanting, is that these circumstances, always so powerful in moulding character, have actually sealed the lips of woman herself, the only competent witness in the case.

And herein, I conceive, lie the originality and force of his whole argument. In the case of men, their functions and occupations are generally of their own choice and bear a certain relation to the public, while their own interest and the demands of society are continually inviting them to the fullest assertion of themselves in all directions. The precise opposite of this has been true in the case of women, and not until they have for a long time lived under similar circumstances of entire freedom and invitation to self-assertion can their real nature be fairly estimated.

There is no proposition in the whole book to which thoughtful women will more fully respond than to this; and those of them who, in self-sacrificing devotion to the well-being of the race, have ventured to brave public sentiment in advance of their time, can testify to the existence of a deep-rooted prejudice against every assumption by woman of any function which brings her as an independent and thoughtful and self-asserting being before the public.

In the State of New York there lives to-day a finely-educated and cultivated woman, who, with one fellow-worker of her own sex, has obtained an entire alteration of the laws of the State with regard to the rights of married women to their property and their children, securing to them in great part that justice which is still withheld in most of the States of the Union. But who has ever counted the cost to her of this so great gain to all her sex, or dreamed of the self-renunciations by the way? To be counted a "coarse, obstreperous woman, with whom sensible wives and mothers can have no sympathy," and to be publicly stigmatized by press and pulpit, has been the least of her trials; that her children, to whom she has always been a most exemplary and faithful mother, should have been thus cruelly wounded through her, one may easily understand, has been the bitterest drop in a bitter cup.

I do not see that Mr. Mill makes any positive assertion of the "equality of woman with man in capacity," and few women care to settle that question at present. They simply claim with Mr. Mill that no restriction should be placed on the full play of her faculties and the free enjoyment of her rights. When this has been conceded for a hundred years or so, it will be in order to make comparisons, but not before.

In closing, you say woman's present position "cannot be really and permanently improved without treating her maternal function as her principal and highest one, while making ample provision for the happiness and activity of all those who are prevented by either inclination or fortune from undertaking it, or who are conscious of the possession of gifts of more value to society and the owner in other departments than that of rearing or educating children."

Nothing truer than this was ever uttered on this question, and there is no mother in the land who will not respond Amen and amen. This is the foundation underlying the whole appeal for suffrage. Give us, say the mothers, the right to protect ourselves and our children—we ask nothing more; we shall be satisfied with nothing less. And how reasonable is this asking may be inferred from a consideration of the nature of the female sex, whether among the lower animals or mankind. The highest instinct of this order of beings is that of desire for offspring and the affection which protects and nurtures it. Unconsciousness of self, devotion to her young, is the token of motherhood from the tiniest bird in the nest to the savage lioness of the wilderness: the tender grief of the one and the fierce rage of the other over her despoiled home are matters of history since time began, and in them both are typified the true nature of the diviner mother—of her whom God created in his own image.

If this be so, some one may ask, why has woman so long consented to her own subjection? and the answer is plain. During the long, dreary reign of force, she herself needed protection in her function of maternity, and, with that utter unconsciousness of self which is essential to the true mother, she accepted with thankfulness the protection of the strong arm and powerful will of man, little heeding that she was all the while forging chains for herself. Hence it is that she is emerging at last from this personal subjection a truly noble being; defective, it is true, as all partially developed natures must ever be, but with the crown of unselfishness upon her brow.

What saith the Master upon this point? "He that is greatest among you, let him be servant of all." "Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven." Who has ever fulfilled these conditions of humility as the mothers of the human family?—and by this token the world has consented to their crowning.

But in the fulness of time it has come to pass in all civilized lands that power belongeth unto the active brain, and no longer resides in the strong right arm; and these mothers, rejoicing in this millennium of peace, and considering in their heart of hearts the welfare of their children, discover that they themselves have not been duly considered in the organization of the state and the customs of society, and that they are thus shorn of power to protect either themselves or those dearest to them. They find, too, that not only have they and their daughters been set aside in the economy of affairs, to the cramping and belittling of their intellects, but that fathers and sons have lost ground morally by this long assumption of power, till they no longer entertain the idea of managing either the family or the state on the Christian plan of truth, justice, and love, but are drifting hither and thither on the waves of moral and political expediency. By their very instinct of motherhood, then, they are moved to stretch out a saving and reclaiming hand, and to offer whatever of wisdom and moral strength they may have gained in the sanctuary of home for the help of all. And that they are not aroused a moment too soon is apparent on every hand. How deeply wrought into the mind of every young boy is the sense of his supremacy—of superiority of some sort over the mother who bore him and the whole order of beings whom she represents! How ineradicable in the young girl the idea that she has no power of self-maintenance, but must look to another for food and raiment and the guidance of her daily life!

To my mind there is but one remedy for so serious defects in both sexes. Our daughters must be trained to large responsibilities both in the family and the state, that they may no longer be borne down by a sense of inferiority and subjection, and our sons must be taught to accept as sharers of their political power and responsibilities those whom they have so long, to their own great loss, looked upon only as dependents, or as helpers and associates only in the narrow limits of domestic life.

Let us discriminate. A woman with fine brain carefully disciplined by study and early assumption of all human responsibilities, of rich physical development, the result of intelligent exercise of every bodily function, will be no less a wise and happy mother than if she were cramped in soul and body by a humiliating dependence upon man. And a man who has from youth up associated with such women on terms of perfect equality will be no less a wise father and a good citizen that he has acquired thereby the feminine virtues of personal purity and self-abnegation.

You will perceive, then, that in my view sex does influence character most seriously, but not in the way to make a state of subjection in accordance with the higher nature of woman; on the contrary, to protect is her divine mission, and to command obedience through the power of a great love. The comparison of "a woman's position and that of other subject classes" is therefore eminently fair to my mind, or lacks fairness only because, whatever else her sex may indicate, there is not in her own consciousness a suggestion of fitness for subjection other than that commanded by the Apostle Peter, "Yea, all of you be subject one to another, and be clothed with humility."

ISABELLA B. HOOKER.

[Mr. Mill says the difference between men and women is no greater than the difference between patrician and (male) plebeian or seigneur and (male) serf would have been had the plebeian and serf been educated as woman has been. This is certainly an assertion of equality of capacity in the sexes.—ED. NATION.]

Notes.

LITERARY.

MESSRS. LEE & SHEPARD, it is known to our readers, have in preparation a complete edition of the "Works of Charles Sumner." The first volume is nearly ready, and contains matter that takes us back to 1845, before Mr. Sumner was known outside of Cambridge and Boston. The first article in the book is to be the essay or oration on "The True Grandeur of Nations," which was delivered in 1845 on the Fourth of July, and praised peace, if we remember, and made a comparison, which got into all the school-books, between the cost of supporting a college and supporting the line-of-battle ship Pennsylvania, which was then aground on her own beef-bones—and training seamen, let us hope, for Farragut and Foote. Other speeches and articles—reminding one of Faneuil Hall and the columns of the old Boston Advertiser, and of "the wrongful annexation of Texas," and of the Mexican war, when Hosea Biglow began to delight the faithful and disgust Caleb Cushing and "The Unterrified," and of the beginning of anti-slavery in Massachusetts, and of the Phi Beta Kappa Society, and other ancient events and people that caused much speechifying in their day—bring us down to the twelfth title of the first volume, namely, "White Slavery in the Barbary States," which is "a lecture delivered before the Boston Mercantile Library Association in the Tremont Temple" in the winter of 1847. On the whole, we may expect to find the next volume, or the next but one, of rather more interest than this one. The last of the series is to contain a life of the Senator, we believe.——Messrs. Little, Brown & Co. announce the fourth volume of Mr. Francis Parkman's set of works relating to American colonial times. "The Discovery of the Great West" is the title of it, and it embraces the exploits of the first European explorers of the Valley of the Mississippi, the efforts of the French to secure for themselves the whole interior of the continent, and the life and projects of Le Salle, and his violent death. The work is founded entirely on contemporary documents, and how the superstructure is built no one needs to be told who knows Mr. Parkman's "Conspiracy of Pontiac," "Pioneers of France in the New World," and "Jesuits in North America."

—Messrs. Hurd & Houghton are out with their autumn announcements, which include some very attractive and some valuable works. They will publish, in one volume octavo, Mr. James Jackson Jarves's "Art Thoughts; being the Observations and Experiences of an American Amateur in Europe." We have mentioned before, we believe, the "Contributions Relating to the Surgery of the War"—which, published at the order of the Sanitary Commission, is to be edited by Dr. F. H. Hamilton. The hygienic and practical aspects of our military surgery are those which Dr. Hamilton has kept in view. "The Heart of the Continent" is by Mr. Fitz-Hugh Ludlow, and describes a journey to Oregon across the Plains. "A Chaplet of Leaves," by Jeanie T. Gould, may be poetical or botanical; "Among the Trees," by Mary Lorimer, is very likely both—being "a journal of walks in the woods and flower-hunting by field and brook." "Concerts and Caprices" is from the French of "Bluertes et Boulardes," and will appear in what is known as the "bijou" form. Mrs. Emma C. Embury's poems, now first collected; Mr. William Wilson's, edited by Mr. B. J. Lossing; and a "Lady of the Lake" illustrated by Darley—are all the poetry that we observe in Messrs. Hurd & Houghton's list, unless we except "Hymns for all Christians," containing "the cream of hymnology," skimmed off, as our ancestors would once have said, by Dr. Charles F. Deems and Miss Phœbe Cary. It is designed to take only hymns which have always, since they were known, been universally acceptable to the church in general. Possibly, among the verses, we ought to put Mr. Edward Hopper's "Old Horse Gray;" for the catalogue which we have received is not seldom indefinite in its descriptions, as is apt to be the case with American catalogues. "An American Family in Paris" seems to be partly of the nature of a book of travels and partly of the nature of an illustrated guide-book. The number of Messrs. Hurd & Houghton's "juveniles" is not very large, but it seems to contain several good ones. "Two Lives in One," by Vieux Moustache; "White and Red," a personal narrative of life among our Northwestern Indians, by Mrs. Helen C. Weeks; "William Gay, or Play for Boys," by Mr. Jacob Abbott; "Ting-a-Ling," a fairy tale, by Mr. F. R. Stockton; "Country Sports and Scenes"—which is twelve illustrations by Mr. Herrick, accompanied by descriptive letterpress; a complete revised edition of "Mother Goose's Melodies," illustrated by Mr. H. L. Stephens and Mr. Gaston Fay, who does the ten smaller designs while Mr. Stephens does the eighteen full-page pictures; "Stories from my Attic," by the author of "Dream Children;" "A Little Boy's Story," translated from the French of Julie Gouraud by "Howard Glyndon;" "Dame Nature," from the French of X. B. Saintine, and—the best at the last—two volumes by Hans Christian Andersen, with revised translation and new pictures, in addition to some of the popular German ones. The "Wonder Stories told for Children" are contained complete, and now first complete in English in the one volume, and "Stories and Tales" likewise now first complete—in the other. Besides these, we are to have for older readers the same author's "Improvisatore" and "Two Baronesses." An early specimen of the former which we have seen promises a very handsome series—to consist in all, we believe, of eight volumes.

—Some months since the Prison Association of this State sent out to various sociologists—such as Mr. F. B. Sanborn and M. Bonneville de Marsangy; to various men—such as Warden Haynes and Sir Walter Crofton—skilled in the practical management of prisons; to various officials—such as Governors of States and Commissioners of Public Boards of Charities—a circular containing two resolutions, to the effect that it is expedient to hold an International Congress on Prison Discipline, which shall be composed of delegates commissioned by the several States of the Union, by the Dominion of Canada, and the governments of Europe. A great many replies have been received by Dr. Wines, the corresponding secretary of the New York Prison Association, and all of them but two have been very favorable, and only one of them opposes the project. That the result would be valuable we make no doubt. Such a Congress would, as some of the correspondents suggest, do great good if only by attracting the attention of the people, and thus assisting those who have been trying to enlighten public opinion. Let the Governor of the State of New York, for instance, appoint a commissioner who should be capable of intelligently reducing the voluminous reports with which such a Congress would no doubt cover itself up from the popular eye, and who should be able to make a brief, plain, weighty report of his own, which a St. Lawrence County legislator could understand, and ten years from now we should not have a grand jury in all the State that would think of proposing, as our Bedford grand jury did the other day, a return to the cat, strait-jacket, and shower-bath as the normal instruments of turning prisons into reformatories. The mere expense to society of operating a system which supposes the dangerous exceptional cases, the costly cases, to be the cases which should furnish the general rule of management, is alone a condemnation of such a theory, which, however, is moribund, and on which it would hardly be worth while to expend words, if it were not that such things die slowly, and that it is for everybody's interest, the taxpayer's as well as the moral reformer's, that it should die at once. Our Bedford grand jury, by the way, proposed a return to the cat in a prison which has long been the prey of politicians, who have made it a burden to the State and a storehouse of future criminals, and who are themselves so rascally in all ways, that one of its honest officials declared not long ago that he believed it was only out of consideration for the comparative decency of the criminals that God did not destroy the building with fire out of heaven. Presumably the cat is not of necessity the only choice to which we are restricted in this case.

—The hasty drawing of right conclusions ought to be almost as displeasing to the strictly scientific mind as the hasty drawing of wrong ones. At the least, it always gives a little shock to the observer of it to see the scientific man making haste to conclusions, and getting heated by the way, as he often does—oftener of late years, since the men of science become so excellently well satisfied with themselves that one is almost minded to pity their arrogant ancient opponents. It is bad to be a Scotch elder demonstrating that from all we know of the nature of the Adversary of Souls, and from all we know of Genesis, nothing is more probable than that fossil remains, stone implements, lake dwellings, and the like, may have been fabricated in hell, and scattered up and down the world by devils out of spite toward the cosmogony revealed to us in the Scriptures, and out of envy at the prospect of fallen man's future glory. But if this is bad, neither is it good to be an epigrammatic geologist, pouring contempt on mathematicians for daring to offer remarks on the physical sciences; nor to be a mathematician, in a rage with the geologists; nor to be some other scientist, demolishing the feeble theories of all other scientists, till at last, if we want any "sweetness and light," it is to the poor, despised transcendentalist that we are almost forced to turn. These remarks are suggested by an article on the "Rochester Knockings" in the last number of Dr. Hammond's Journal of Psychological Medicine; but they were only suggested, and are not offered as being at all fully applicable to that essay, which is good-tempered, and which reaches its immediate conclusions by slow and plain steps. But suppose the Rochester knockings were a humbug, the inference that spiritualism generally is a delusion does not follow of necessity, and might better have been spared. We are not going to deny that, so far as we know about it, spiritualism is "unimportant if true;" but to say that some of the phenomena are not as yet inexplicable—or, at all events, unexplained—seems to us to be going against a vast deal of evidence of the highest class, which we never should think of rejecting if it were offered about an ordinary matter. Some of it, too, is evidence from what the Spiritualists call "sceptics," and hardened ones at that; and the cloud of witnesses is great. Probably every man in the country knows some perfectly honest relative or friend—and a good many thousand men know some friend perfectly honest and of high intelligence, and of a sceptical turn—who has seen dozens of things done at private séances which would not be explained even though we accepted in its fulness Dr. Flint's explanation of what happened in Rochester eighteen years ago. Another noticeable article in this number of the Journal is a translation by Dr. Dunster of an essay from Le Correspondant, which makes a presentation and a critique of Virchow's and Claude Bernard's doctrines in regard to the nature of life. A clever article, and one adapted to popular comprehension, is Dr. H. B. Baker's "Thought as a Form of Force." Then there is an essay—not too close to the subject—on "Pleasure;" two or three strictly technical articles—one of them by Dr. Jeffries Wyman; a good many pages devoted to the usual reviews of medical works; and the "Chronicle," devoted to the physiology and pathology of the brain and nervous system, and to medical jurisprudence. We may, perhaps, again refer to the "Project of a Law Relating to the Insane," which was drawn up after a great deal of discussion by the superintendents of asylums at their late meeting, and which is worth the attention of lawyers and physicians.

—The smallness of the classes in the Divinity School of Harvard University has for some time been a source of regret on the part of the Unitarian community in all its branches, from the evangelical branch away over to the liberally eclectic. And this partly, we suppose, because each "liberal Christian," knowing that the course of instruction affords very great scope for independent study and thought, unbiassed either by instructors or text-books, believes, as he is bound to believe, that a course of study in the school is quite as likely to give him converts as to give them to any other of his Unitarian co-religionists. The course certainly does afford free scope; and seems rather to offer the opportunity for critical scholarship in theology, ancient and modern, than to propose the teaching of dogmas of any kind. As the constitution of the school declares, it is the purpose of the institution to give every encouragement to the serious, unbiassed, and impartial investigation of Christian truth, without requiring from instructors or pupils any assent to the peculiarities of any denomination of Christians. In another respect, the school has a liberal air, and that is in the large provision which appears to be made for lightening the pecuniary burdens borne by the student. The Hopkins Fund is divided among six students, and gives to each of them three hundred and fifty dollars, or thereabouts. "The annual income of the other funds," we are told, "will allow about $200 to each beneficiary, according to the number of applicants"—a statement which is not very definite; but, doubtless, the fact is that the whole number of students is expected to be so small that no probable number of beneficiaries will be able to reduce the share each one may get. In addition to all this, assurance is given that in special cases assistance can in all probability be got from other sources, so as "to enable the most necessitous to defray the estimated expenses." Class-books are lent to scholars who cannot afford to purchase. The sum of about three hundred dollars covers the necessary expenses of a year, both those for rent and tuition and for board. The conditions of admission are easy. Bachelors and Masters of Arts are admitted without examination; all others after an examination in rhetoric, mental and moral philosophy, and the ordinary branches of an English education. The studies in which one must pass a satisfactory examination include Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and German, Church History, History of Ethnic Religious Literature, the Exegesis of the Bible History, the Grounds of Opinion in Natural Theology and Christian Doctrine, and the other usual studies of a theological seminary.

—To excite public interest in the "physical character, the languages, the civilization, and the religions of the various peoples" under the dominion of Great Britain, the London Ethnological Society has determined on holding a series of meetings, at which each one of the British possessions shall be taken up and described in turn. A beginning has already been made in the case of India, whose ethnology and archæology are treated of in several instructive papers that quite fill the Society's Journal for July, leaving more yet to come. One of these, by Major Fosberry, "On Some of the Mountain Tribes of the North-West Frontier," appears to have been suggested by the author's apprehension of a Central-Asian collision between Russia and Britain, and takes the position that "these mountains are our national frontier and defence; these tribes are those who ought to be, not merely neutral spectators of what is to follow, but heart and soul our allies offensive and defensive. At this moment it is but the dread of some fresh imbroglio that keeps their hands from our property, and their swords from our throats." These people, who might possibly thus hold the balance of power in case of an invasion of the British rule, are highly complimented in the sequel for bravery and other manly qualities. A small portion of them, who live on the lower hills, resort to plunder for subsistence, and even "pass the new-born infant through a hole dug in the wall of the dwelling, saying over him three times, Ghal Shab, or, Be a thief. It is they who, being at one time in difficulties, owing to their having no shrine of their own, and being unwelcome at those of others, lay in wait for a holy man proceeding to Cabul, murdered him in the Khyber, buried him in their lands, and to this hour pay their devotions with much satisfaction at the ziarut, or place of pilgrimage, thus improvised and thus consecrated." There are in these papers, besides this exquisite bit of superstition, abundant proofs of the fact that India contains almost every degree of human condition to the lowest and most primitive, and offers perhaps the richest area of investigation to which the ethnologist can apply himself. How recent this science is, is well remarked by Colonel Meadows Taylor, when, referring to the "minute topography of the great trigonometrical survey department," he expresses his wonder that "discoveries of prehistoric remains were not made. In the details of that great work, which were minutely laid down on the very large scale of four inches to the mile, in the filling up of lesser triangulations by plane table-work, every rock has found a place, every streamlet and brook has been traced to its source, and the positions of remarkable trees, temples, tombs, and ruins accurately described; yet the very notable groups of cairns, cromlechs, and other cognate remains, over which the surveyor's marks have passed, were never, to my knowledge, noticed at all."

—A field which the woman's-suffrage advocates might work to advantage is the history of the marriage institution; but it must, of course, be worked in a scientific way. Such is not that chosen by Mr. E. J. Wood (who aims merely to satisfy omnivorous and not specially intelligent curiosity, and not to throw light on a grave social question), in his "Wedding-Day in all Ages and Countries." There is neither science, nor method, nor authority behind his too pretentious title, though the contents of the book may perhaps lay claim to being authentic. A pioneer of the true sort, who may serve as an example to others, is Professor A. De Gubernatis, who has just published "Storia comparata degli usi nuziali in Italia e presso gli altri popoli Indo-Europei" (Milan: E. Treves & Co.) This little work briefly describes some of the nuptial usages formerly in vogue in the several provinces of Italy, and then compares them with those of foreign nations, and particularly of India. The author's plan has been to treat his subject in a popular style, while inspiring confidence in his statements by copious references on every page to original sources. It follows, of course, that he has not exhausted, even for Italy, the materials for a purely scientific discussion, and on the other hand he is said to have handled his theme with becoming delicacy. The author of a "History of Sacerdotal Celibacy" should be able to take an authoritative part in these researches.

—An able French writer—well known by name to Americans, and, like many other able French writers, not so well known to Americans by his works as he should be—M. Eugène Forcade, is the subject of a piece of news which his admirers will be very glad to hear. Like almost every other celebrated literary Frenchman, Forcade is anti-Bonapartist, and in his case hatred of the Empire springs from a sincere belief in popular institutions. In 1868, after the cession of Venetia, when the remains of Daniel Manin, the Italian patriot, were transferred to the city which he had ruled and defended during its brief period of freedom, Forcade went on to Venice to be present at the ceremony, and while there was prostrated by sunstroke, and on recovery from the immediate effects of this misfortune gave plain evidence of unsoundness of mind, of which, indeed, there had been some slight suspicion before. He has not since done any mental labor—the Civil Tribunal, at the instance of his family, having taken cognizance of his case, and issued an order in lunacy. He soon began recovering, and so long ago as last spring applied for a revocation of the order—which application was, however, not successful, his father objecting that the supersession would be premature until after it had been seen how the son's brain endured the heats of summer, from which he feared there might be ill effects. This ordeal having now been safely passed, M. Forcade has within the month been declared sane—his father making no objection—and probably the Revue des Deux Mondes has one of its most brilliant contributors restored to it.

THE WEST OF FIFTY YEARS SINCE.*

THE curiosities of the colonization of the United States are too familiar to us to seem so curious as they really are. The romance of the settlement of new countries and of the gradual invasion and conquest of the forest primæval and the aboriginal savages by civilization, is not yet far enough removed from us to take upon itself its full romantic character. Yet, when we compare the present condition of populous regions and wealthy cities with what it was within living memory, there is something in the change which makes a lively impression on the imagination. The "Recollections" of Mr. H. M. Brackenridge will be found to possess this interest in a particular degree, from their having to do with scenes and societies, in their earlier parts, which have not found their way as yet much into books. It is odd to think that one yet living, and not much past fourscore, should remember Pittsburg before it was christened, when it was only known as the little straggling village of Fort Pitt, and should recall an alarm of Indians there, and the running to and fro of the people in the night because of it; and that he should have been where Cincinnati is now some fifteen years before the Queen City was born, and when the ground whereon she now sits in state "was covered with vines and lofty trees."

Mr. Brackenridge was born at Fort Pitt "about the year 1786," as he tells us with an indifference to his chronology which is a defect throughout his book. His father was a lawyer, a graduate of Princeton in 1771, in the same year with Mr. Madison, and the first in college rank, while the future President was the last, as he himself once told the author in the White House. Mr. Brackenridge the elder attained local eminence, and became a Judge of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. He was not a fond father to his motherless boy, nor yet a judicious one in his early attempts to drive the child along the thorny paths of knowledge. One sensible thing he did in that direction. Finding that the boy had picked up Pennsylvania German on a visit to the family of his second wife, he resolved to send him to one of the settlements of what was afterwards the Territory of Orleans to learn French. The description of the voyage down the Ohio and Mississippi in the age of flat-boats is very curious and entertaining, though too short. And the same may be said of his account of the French village of Ste. Geneviève, situated a little way back from the river, in what is now Missouri. Mr. Brackenridge's story of these simple, worthy folk is really idyllic, and would make no unworthy pendant to the tale of the good peasants of Grand Pré in Acadie. Evangeline might well have rested there forty years before from her sad quest of Gabriel, and found herself at home. We wish we had room to quote his account of their simple ways, their comfortable cottages, their gardens, and orchards, and excellent cookery, their piety, their church processions, their Sunday balls, at which the minuet was the principal dance, and their mutual politeness. Think of a community where "peltry, beaver-skins, and lead constituted the chief circulating medium," and where "all politics or discussions of the affairs of government were entirely unknown," the commandant taking care of all that.

Here "le petit Anglais," as they called him, spent three happy years, learning French and forgetting English. Besides their tongue, the good M. and Madame Beauvais taught the little boy, in his own words, "to reverence my parents, to respect the aged, to be polite to my equals, and to speak the truth to every one, . . . to restrain my temper, to practise self-denial, to be compassionate to man and beast, and to be thankful to God for every blessing." No bad education for the child of a Presbyterian lawyer to receive from Catholic peasants. Thence he had an interesting voyage homeward, stopping for near a year at another French settlement —Gallipolis—inhabited chiefly by artisans from Paris and Lyons; "carvers and gilders to the king, coach-makers, friseurs, and peruke-makers;" warm royalists, all of them, utterly unfitted for their new home, and, notwithstanding two balls a week, far less happy than the contented peasants of Ste. Geneviève. Mr. Brackenridge's description of this settlement and his worthy host, Dr. Sangrain, innkeeper and physician—Dr. Slop in size and Dr. Sangrado in practice—is very good; and, should an enlarged third edition ever be called for, we beg the author to enlarge the portions relating to these French villages, if his recollections furnish the material, as this phase of our many-sided infancy has entirely passed away, and will soon be entirely forgotten. Some fifteen years afterward he revisited these places, and found Gallipolis Americanized and spoiled, and the French dead or dispersed. Ste. Geneviève remained unchanged, excepting as the hand of time had worked on the worthy inhabitants. The little girl he had left three years old was to be married that day; and the good Madame Beauvais entreated him to make her loss good, and to make it his home with them. "Restez, Henri, restez avec nous!"

* "Recollections of Persons and Places in the West. By H. M. Brackenridge, a Native of the West; Traveller, Author, Jurist." Second Edition, enlarged. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1868.

The whole book is very readable; but these sketches of the French communities, so curiously preserving their national characteristics under such strange surroundings, have seemed to us the most attractive parts of it. Mr. Brackenridge's account of his education after returning to Pittsburg, and of his childhood and youth there, are not without the interest which belongs to any simple and natural details of the early life of any human being. It may be a question whether his classical strugglings under his father were the worse purgatory to the teacher or the pupil; but the English studies which relieved those agonies—"Don Quixote," "Gil Blas," "Tom Jones," "The Vicar of Wakefield," and the Spectator—must have made some amends to both. His education was mainly private, and he seems to have scrambled into a good deal of miscellaneous knowledge of books and of languages. We cannot follow him in his various removals in search of practice after his admission to the bar. His account of himself ends about the year 1820; but we infer, from what he takes it for granted that his readers will know about him, that his career was a useful and honorable one in public and private life—as to the particulars of which, however, we are forced to confess our ignorance. Indeed, the provincial and ephemeral nature of American reputations—especially of professional ones—has been brought afresh to our mind in reading Mr. Brackenridge's book. Of the eminent lawyers whose characteristics he describes—men of real learning and ability, stranded on obscure country towns or fresh-water cities—how many are now remembered even within the narrow bounds in which they once predominated? How many were ever heard of outside of them while they lived? His father appears to have been eminent in his day and his State, and to have been a man of legal and general knowledge, and of some pretensions to authorship. He wrote a novel, as we suppose, entitled "Modern Chivalry," which, his son informs us, is "a work second only to that of Cervantes in the seasoning of genuine wit sprinkled over the surface of true philosophy!" But the worthy judge has gone to join the brave men who lived before Agamemnon, and his works have followed him.

We are indebted, however, to our author for lifelike sketches of some celebrities who have passed into general history, and whose names one should be ashamed not to know. Notably, Judge Samuel Chace, Robert Goodloe Harper, Luther Martin, and William Pinkney. There could not be a greater contrast than between these last two great men. Martin was slovenly to filthiness; his countenance heavy, his voice thick and disagreeable, and his pronunciation uncouth. Yet "he had the finest capacity for discrimination and analysis"—"wit, philosophy, a prodigious memory, and unsuspected stores of learning." In speaking, "he seemed to blunder along for an hour or two—nothing could be more confused and obscure. It was in his recapitulation that he was great. He became warm, his language more happy, his leaden eye seemed to kindle, and for fifteen minutes or half-an-hour he spoke with admirable force and power." His great powers, unhappily, were clouded by gross and habitual intemperance. He is best known to the general reader by his admirable defence of Judge Chace on his impeachment, and to anti-slavery men by his bitter diatribes against negro slavery in a slave country. Here is the description of Pinkney as he came into court: "He was dressed and looked like a mere Bond Street lounger. His hat, beautiful and glossy, in his hand; his small rattan tapping the crown. He was dressed most carefully. His coat was of blue broadcloth, with gilt buttons; his vest of white Marseilles, with gold studs, elegantly fitting pantaloons, and shining half-boots; he was the polished gentleman of leisure accidentally dropped down in a motley group of inferior beings." Pinkney, though immensely laborious, and of great capacity for labor, had the weakness to wish to be thought to improvise his most elaborately prepared efforts by the mere force of genius. We wish we had room for Mr. Brackenridge's picture of his personal appearance, which is the most vivid we remember to have seen. We imagine it is the best ever made. This is his description of the delivery of the American Erskine—probably the greatest forensic orator the country has ever produced: "When he began, his tones were low and even plaintive. As he proceeded, his musical voice gradually rose with the subject. There was an occasional swell and then a lull, with but little gesture or effort. The distinctness of his articulation was remarkable, and free from all theatrical rant or fury. His voice was not of the clear, ringing kind, which often draws off attention from the subject, but rather the softened sound of the piano when the pedal is applied. The words and sentences seemed to flow into each other in perfect harmony, but rising or falling or changing with the subject, still retaining an irresistible hold on the hearers. No one stirred; all seemed motionless, as if enchained or fascinated, like persons entranced." And this very speech, which Pinkney assured the court he was unprepared to make, the author overheard him rehearsing in the woods the day before! But we can afford no more space to this pleasant book, further than to say that we began it for criticism, and continued and ended it for pleasure.

A LITERARY VETERAN.*

Mr. Neal recollects very well the days when "Paul Allen was at the zenith of his glory." Mr. Allen had not then written his "Noah," to be sure; but he had "been declared by Mr. Jefferson himself, after the publication of 'Lewis and Clark's Tour,' to be the very best of our American writers." It was at this same time that Mr. John Pierpont "was acknowledged by common consent for the leading poet of America," and that the famous Mr. Simpson divided with Doctor Watkins the credit of being the first of American critics. And Mr. Neal having been not merely among these men, but having been also of them—he was "A." of the Portico—assuredly may be called A Literary Veteran. Indeed, to remember Simpson, and Watkins, and Allen when at the height of his fame, might give one a colorable claim to be Professor Huxley's, or somebody's, pre-Adamite man, or a saurian, almost. Just at the point of time we have spoken of—the time closely following the publication of "Lewis and Clark's Tour," Mr. Neal had himself produced both poetry and criticism which entitled him to rank with the best of them. In Philadelphia there was a faction in the literary world which was maintaining tooth and nail that certain criticisms on Byron, which were appearing in the Portico, could have been written by nobody but Paul Allen, and another fraction were as strong in the belief that nobody could have written them except Doctor Watkins. In reality, they had been dashed off in four days' time by Mr. Neal, then a young man of twenty-three years, without education or previous acquaintance with Byron's poetry. And Mr. Neal assures us that they were good, and that they would be pretty much the same if he were to write them over again. "I was rather astonished at myself," he says—on occasion of looking over these essays again, not long ago—"the opinions I expressed being such as I entertain at this moment, and the language about as well fitted to the subject as anything I have written since. The selections, too, were pre-eminently characteristic of Byron, and, I might say, of myself, and such as I am willing to abide by, for the justification of all I said of that wilful, wayward man, who persisted in sacrificing himself, or rather in throwing himself away, lest he might be overlooked, or forgotten, if he did not keep the whole world in a perpetual feese and fidget and flutter."

Mr. Neal's poetry, also, like his prose, was such as to put him fully on a level, in the opinion of some persons, with those leaders of our literature whom we have already mentioned. Allen emphatically pronounces "Niagara" and "Goldau" "a swash of magnificence," and Pierpont, who was less enthusiastic than Allen, yet used the following strong terms in relation to it: "Oh! I had nearly forgotten to tell you that Neal has published a volume of poetry. It contains two poems of considerable length: one entitled 'Battle of Niagara,' founded upon the battle that was fought during the late war, just by the Falls of Niagara, called the battle of Lundy's Lane; the other named 'Goldau,' founded on a scene that took place among the mountains of Switzerland, which is more particularly stated in the little biographical sketch prefixed to Mr. Buckminster's sermons. The poems are both very great, admirable, astonishing, indeed. He has thrown his whole character into them; and either of them contains more of the greatness and madness of poetry than any other poem that was ever written in America. True, they have great defects, of which I think their not unfrequent obscurities are the most conspicuous. But all the defects are more than a thousand times counterbalanced by the beauties. There are some inaccuracies, but they are nothing to the splendor, beauty, and grandeur of the great body of the poems. They will do him immortal honor, in my humble opinion. He does not publish in his real name, but under his club name of 'Jehu O'Cataract,' which for his 'Battle of Niagara' is peculiarly appropriate. . . . But the man who has a soul for poetry, and will take it and treat it as it deserves, will be treated in his turn to such poetry as has not heretofore been written in this country; by such poetry, I mean distinctly that the poetry is better, more grand, sublime, and original, than any other American poetry. The 'Airs of Palestine,' as a whole poem, is more correct and more harmonious; more polished in the structure of the verse, but immeasurably more tame."

* "Wandering Recollections of a Somewhat Busy Life: an Autobiography. By John Neal." Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1869.

And this opinion Mr. Pierpont more than confirmed by his after-judgment of his rival's merits. He by-and-by sends him a most enthusiastic and gratifying critique, written by the Rev. Edward Gilman, in Major Russell's paper, and says, in addition to its praises:

"He ought to have given you as d ecideda preference to Gray as he has to Thomson and Scott. My opinion of the book is chiefly this: that no English poet has, within the same compass, so much poetry; nay, that no man now alive has written so much good poetry as that book contains. Now you know what I think of you. Pity me, if you please, and petition the legislature for a guardian, or the managers of the Pennsylvania Hospital for lodgings; but that is my opinion of Jehu O'Cataract's poems;"

—and there is no doubt that it was.

So we used to go in those old days, when Genial Criticism, unheavenly maid, was young, and worse than she is now, even. Mr. Neal's own estimate of himself—which is to-day as unchanged as the notable judgment on Byron that we have quoted above—is a curious specimen of the sort of opinion which the forerunners of our New York Knickerbocker men used to entertain of themselves and each other—or that they used to express of each other; not all of them were so courageous in expressing their opinion of themselves, nor so honest in expressing only truly the opinions which they held concerning their literary contemporaries, as Mr. Neal always is. He is frankness and courage personified. He never dissimulates the good opinion he has of himself, nor conceals from his reader what must have been the truth as regards his opinion of his rivals—namely, that he thought none of them his equals. He writes of his first novel, which he calls "Keep Cool:" "As for the characters, the situations, and the incidents generally of this, my first novel, I have to say that I think them worthy of great praise; the story itself dramatic, and earnest and plausible, and the language far beyond the trash of the hour; but, then, the jokes, the pleasantries—they are, according to my present recollection, and I must confess that I have not courage enough to look at them again, both tiresome and silly."

These jokes, by the way, were not put in with the author's good-will, but to make the book more captivating to the publishers.

"Logan" is published not very long after "Keep Cool," and Mr. Neal quotes with approval this tribute to the merits of a work which, he says, burst on the world in meteoric fashion:

"'Yes,' said I, as soon as I had put down the book, 'he might as well have placed his name upon the title-page; for every sentence, every line—nay, every thought, idea, phrase, expression—has the living impress of O'Cataract's mind upon it. Logan, a family history! A family! Why, a family of such men as Oscar or Harold would occupy the world entire. Not another name would live in the vast universe; and angels and archangels would once more descend from their celestial habitations to battle with this human family for the mastery of the earth and skies!' etc., etc. . . . In sober truth, my dear N., 'Logan' is one of the most extraordinary productions of the present age. Such is my opinion of it, in the general. In detail, I have many faults to find with it, etc., etc. . . . . Yes, yes: no other man could have written such a book."

And Mr. Neal adds:

"Others took it as they took opium or exhilarating gas; and everywhere it was treated as what William B. Walter called it, 'a gigantic phantom.'"

Another of Mr. Neal's novels was "The Spirit of Seventy-six," and when he went to England, not long after its publication, this is what happened to him when he dined with Mr. Griffith's "Sylvanus Urban." The book was talked about, and Mr. Griffith was speaking so highly in its praise that Mr. Neal felt called on to acknowledge the authorship:

"He colored to the eyes; but, after a short pause, added, 'Well, I don't care who wrote the book; what I had to say, I will say, nevertheless.' And then he went on, with all eyes fixed upon him, and glancing occasionally at me, and ran a very clever parallel between 'Seventy-six' and what he called the best of Sir Walter Scott's romances, then in the very zenith of their fame; and wound up with declaring, to my unspeakable surprise, and I might say amazement, that he would rather have written my book than anything Scott had ever produced.

"Of course, I made all proper allowances; Mr. Griffith being a Radical, or at least a Whig, and Sir Walter a Tory to the backbone, dyed in the wool, like some of our leading abolitionists."

And again, in another place, he says of his prose and poetry:

"Poetry—grand, glorious, and beautiful poetry—I have written heretofore, and may write again, before I pass away; and I do think—between ourselves—that much of my prose writing, most of it, indeed, is likely to be read hereafter, and that, on the whole, not a few of my story-books, and stories, and magazine-papers are well worth remembering and preserving. There! that will do for the present, I hope!"

But it is, perhaps, hardly worth while to recur to Mr. Neal's estimation of his own value and the estimates of it which were made by the Watkinses of his day. Still we are not yet wholly free from the influence of them and the like of them even now, and some years more of this generation will pass away and numbers of plants which from the start have never had any hot-house air will have to be raised to maturity, before the principles of unforced, healthy, open-air culture are understood, and before we have literary growths that will fructify and propagate their kind; and to be made to see, as in a magnifying glass, the follies and absurdities of our old-time habits in this matter of critical geniality, will be of help in bringing about the better day.

In all things Mr. Neal showed the same traits of character that he showed in literature, though there were few things to which he turned his hand in which he did not accomplish more. In all things he showed himself vain, boastful, generous when not blinded by vanity and self-conceit, candid, loyal, kind-hearted, and brave quite up to the point of being generally suspected of foolhardiness and a love of quarrelling—a charge which he denies more than once in a sufficiently amusing way, as for instance, on page 65:

"I never went to bed, since I was a boy, with a feeling of bitterness toward a human being; and I never saw the time when I would not have instantly forgiven the worst enemy I had the moment he seemed sorry. And yet I have always been in hot water, and have always had, until within the past few years, half-a-dozen serious quarrels upon my hands, on account of other people, whom I have supposed to be misunderstood, or misrepresented, slandered, wronged, or cheated. On my own account, personally, I have not had a regular toss-up with anybody for many a long year, so that some of my best friends have thought, I fear, that I was spoiling for a fight, and have even ventured so far as to tell me so, thereby proving themselves mistaken in my character."

And in other places he recounts battles of all kinds with tongue, pen, and fists—which he waged from the age of eight years up to the time of writing this present volume, in the last pages of which General Neal Dow comes in for as thorough a tongue-thrashing as ever a very peaceable old gentleman inflicted on an acquaintance. It is quite worth reading.

A more generally interesting proof that Mr. Neal is not afraid to speak his mind, however contrary it may be to the voice of mankind in general, he gives in his diatribe against an old acquaintance of his youth—Mr. John Stuart Mill. No doubt, he means it in all honesty; but he so habitually performs the feat of putting himself between himself and the object of his vision, that no sensible person would think of taking his unsupported word to the prejudice of any person who may possibly have offended his egregious vanity and stirred his impetuous and bitter temper:

"But by far the most remarkable man I met with over sea, often enough and intimately enough to understand him in all his bearings, was the individual who has since become the political economist, the metaphysician, the logician—I had almost said the statesman—John Stuart Mill. Cunning, timid, politic, without originality, wholly destitute of imagination, enthusiasm, and warmth, all which he stigmatized as different degrees of sentimentality, and, but for his wife, a man who would have lived and died with no more heart than a sphynx or a syllogism, he has managed, nevertheless, by borrowing largely from others—and especially from Bentham, as did his father before him in his 'British India,' where the account of Warren Hastings's trial is taken altogether from Bentham, even to the language—to establish for himself a reputation well worth living for.

"His logic was the logic of Jeremy Bentham, and of nobody else, with a few unimportant changes; and so were his metaphysics. Of Bentham, he learned to question the attributes and being of God, though never willing to be called an atheist, but only, at the worst, a free-thinker and philosopher. But his want of moral courage I foresaw—while he was yet a beardless boy in appearance, hardly out of his teens, and, if really over two-and-twenty, looking as if not more than eighteen, with a small head, light-brown hair, a girlish face, and a boyish manner—would lead him into some dreadful scrape at last, notwithstanding his uncommon talent of a certain kind—that of a drudge and assayer, and his excessive caution and craft; and so it turned out. . . . .

"Before this, however, although his finger-prints were on the margin of the proof, he had positively denied to me all agency and all participation in the dastardly and treacherous manœuvre which I have already mentioned as the work chiefly of John Bowring, Esquire, LL.D.—by virtue of a Dutch diploma, for translating a few Dutch verses into what passed in Holland not only for English, but for English poetry.

"Long after this, and within the last two or three years, we find the gentleman getting ambitious, or, as Robert Walsh, Junior, the 'American gentleman,' thought proper to say of President Madison, 'presuming to be ambitious,' and soon after successful, so far as to become a Member of Parliament, without contributing a penny—from principle, of course—to the cost of his own election; and, again, we hear of him as a candidate, and trying to make speeches, and failing, of course, as he always must, notwithstanding his acknowledged talents as a writer and as a reasoner, for lack of natural and even of artificial warmth and earnestness. Demonstrations, axioms, and syllogisms are not speeches, and are never listened to with patience, nor ever understood by the people, when they are announced from the platform, and without even a show of earnestness.

"In the heat and hurry of the late canvass, we find him seriously questioned about his religious belief; but instead of answering, 'That is none of your business,' and stopping there, as he might well have done, without losing caste, or his own self-respect, or the respect of others; instead of owning up to what he made no secret of when I knew him, he answered with a special plea, just as Bowring did when called to account for his dealings with the Greek-Commissioners about the Greek loan, and refused to answer, lest he should make a precedent for all eternity. As if any man who believes anything has a right to withhold the acknowledgment of his belief, when seriously questioned! As if, in a matter of so much consequence to himself, he has a right to shuffle or evade the enquiry, or refuse to answer even an impertinent question, for such a reason! How much better to say, 'Hands off! I do not choose to answer; nor will I condescend to give my reasons for not answering. Let us do as we like, and, when the pinch comes, take the consequences.' But no! such plain dealing is not Mr. Mill's way. He would call it sentimentality, and being of those who 'never take their tea without a stratagem,' and who prefer to gain their ends by overreaching or outwitting others, he has succeeded at last in cutting his own throat from ear to ear, with a dull pocket-knife, and will most likely never be heard of more, in public life.

"In his book on liberty, which, instead of being a diluted tincture, like portions of the 'Rationale of Judicial Evidence,' is but another decoction of concentrated Benthamism, he acknowledges the inspiration of his wife. When I knew him, he was not only incapable of acknowledging, but even of feeling, obligation to anybody. Hence I infer that she was really a woman of great power, and of uncommon worth; and although I do not believe what he says of her judgment and sweet influence, taking the whole of that dedication for a sentimental flourish, still I must say that she appears to have humanized him; and that, on the whole, having satisfied him that he was a creature of flesh and blood, and not an icicle, nor an abstraction, inert and lifeless, I am sorry she did not live long enough to prevent his making a fool of himself, by such a pitiful subterfuge as I have mentioned."

It was at Jeremy Bentham's that he made the intimate acquaintance of Mill and Sir John Bowring—whom he hates thoroughly and fiercely—and others of the Utilitarian school. His account is of some interest, but, for the reason we have given, not, we imagine, of any value. We must, at all events, refer our readers to the book itself, in which they will find, beside the account of the good old philosopher, much matter of interest—as how Mr. Neal was a cheating clerk in a store, how everybody admired his sharpness, how he fought many battles, how he went into the dry-goods business with John Pierpont and failed, how he read law—doing four or five years' work in a twelvemonth, and at the same time writing enough in the papers to earn his living, and moreover studying five or six languages; how he was admitted to the bar; how he burst forth in poetry and prose; how some one putting to him the Edinburgh's contemptuous query, "Who reads an American book?" he forthwith transferred his law business, and went to London to vindicate his country's fame in Britain itself; how he wrote for Blackwood's, and was not a little pleased by it; how he fought bullies in the theatre; how he beat everybody at fencing; how he came home, and was going to settle elsewhere, but heard it said that the Portland mob would not allow him to settle in his native place; how then, having no taste for hot water, he swore he would settle just there, and nowhere else, and did settle there; and, after fighting three or four street fights, was left in peace, and has lived in peace—perhaps—ever since; how he took sound views on the question of free speech for abolitionists, and sound views also on the question of temperance as opposed to total abstinence, and very advanced views in regard to the woman question, and fought for these opinions, and for the right to express them, and came out victorious in the end, despite his relative above-mentioned and a wicked world. In short, till he compels him to read his novels and poetry, the reader will give this pioneer author of ours hearty, though somewhat qualified, respect and liking, as a brave man, an honest one, and one who has worked hard and done good service, cheerfully, in his day and generation.

Mopsa the Fairy. By Jean Ingelow. (Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1869.)—The imperfectly imaginative character of Miss Ingelow's mind is more plainly seen in this little book than in any of the others which she has published. These arbitrarily fantastical incidents and personages, which are more like the incidents and personages of a dream than anything else, are not the work of the imagination, in any high sense of that word, but of the fancy, in a low sense of that word, producing distortions, and what we may pronounce monstrosities. The "incidents and personages of a dream" have recently been used with great effect as the subject-matter of a child's book. But "Alice's Adventures in Wonderland" is a piece of strict realism. It is the reflection, in the warped and blurred mirror of dreams, of the daily waking dreams of the little girl whose sleeping adventures are told; and it makes no professions of being anything but realism, nor of offering us imaginative truth. Miss Ingelow's book gives us the arbitrary fantasticalness of an impossible dream—if there are any impossible dreams — and furthermore seems trying to offer us something beyond this—what, we do not clearly make out; but an attempt there is at making the events, or some of them, address the imagination; and the result is a mixture — meaningless to us, from whichever side it may be viewed. We may say "impossible dreams," we think. What very small boy—a person five or six years old, say—among a number of things of which he dreams, some being very childish in one sense of the word, and some in the other, dreams out one or two love affairs in which he is a chief party? None, as we believe—if he does his own dreaming, and it is not done for him by some gentleman or lady a number of years past his time of life. The latter part of "Mopsa the Fairy" is highly sentimental in this respect. Far be it from us to say that quite young boys may not and do not get up warm affections of a not strictly childlike kind for lovable women old enough to be their elder sisters or their mothers; for we see that happening; and dreams of lovable beautiful women, or fairies, are probably the natural results of such loves and admirations. But still the love is not at all of the kind which strikes the note of these verses, for example, in which the finch flies home from her dead mate:

> "The finch flew back to her cold, cold nest—
> (Feathers and moss and a wisp of hay):—
> Mine is the trouble that rent her breast;
> And home is silent, and love is clay."

Yet a good deal of our hero's love is of this more aged character, or hovers on the verge of being so; and the effect is not pleasant, if only for its incongruity with the rest of the book, to say nothing of its essential falseness.

Of the poetry scattered through the volume, some is borrowed, and some is original, and little of it is not good. Here is a breezy picture of the sort that Miss Ingelow is fond of:

> "When I sit on market-days among the comers and the goers,
> Oh! full oft I have a vision of the days without alloy;
> And a ship comes up the river with a jolly gang of towers,
> And a pull'e, haul'e, pull'e haul'e, yoy! heave hoy."

The children will like it, though children have nothing to do with the first two lines of it any more than with Miss Ingelow's sentimental use of the bereaved finch. By the way, the disagreeable pitching-tossing metre of this latter extract gets few imitators, we are glad to see, among the verse-writers. It is rather a wonder it should be used so much, or at all, by a writer some of whose "songs sing themselves," as has been said—some of whose songs move prettily, at all events. The style of the story is agreeable, as all Miss Ingelow's prose is sure to be.

Julius Cæsar: Did he Cross the Channel? Reviewed by John Wainwright, Member of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, etc. (London: John Russell Smith; Philadelphia: John Campbell. 1869.)—It would hardly seem to require one hundred and twenty-six pages of discussion to disprove so improbable a theory as that Cæsar, in his invasion of Britain, crossed from Holland to the coast of Norfolk, instead of from Flanders to the coast of Kent; especially as Mr. Surtees, the propounder of the theory, is obliged to suppose a mighty convulsion of nature which has since widened the sea between England and Holland. For Cæsar may be supposed to have meant what he said when he asserts that he chose his route because it was brevissimus in Britanniam trajectus. What real arguments Mr. Surtees advances it is hard to make out from Mr. Wainwright's rambling and many-worded refutation, for he nowhere takes pains to give us the language of the writer whom he is answering; and he appears to be incapable of stating an argument, whether his own or another person's, in a clear and connected form. Possibly Mr. Surtees has really some ground for his opinion; if so, his reviewer has sadly failed to appreciate his position, for he mentions hardly a single point that is worth the trouble of refuting. Mr. Wainwright very well shows the absurdities of Strabo's Geography of Britain, upon which Mr. Surtees appears to have relied; and he accepts Napoleon's solution of the words of Florus: Bonnam et Gessoriacum pontibus junxit, from which Mr. Surtees infers that Gessoriacum was on the Lower Rhine instead of on the site of Boulogne. "He connected these two distant places by building bridges over the many intervening streams." Mr. Wainwright aptly adds, in a note; "Admitting that Gessoriacum was at the mouths of the Rhine, . . . the bridges were indeed long ones. Bonn is distant from the mouths of the Rhine 200 to 250 miles."

It is unfortunate that this pamphlet was printed in England, for the proof-reading would be a disgrace to a country printing-office, and the author complains that he was not able to revise the proofs. The contents of the page of errata (which itself reads Verolanium for Verolamium) would seem to have been selected at random; for there is hardly a page that would not afford additional errors. Take for instance this Latin, p. 103: "Multitudo hominum es infinita, que ædificia, creberrime fere consimilia Gallices numerous pecoies magnus. Caes. B. G. v. 12." But Mr. Wainwright's English is nearly as remarkable; in particular, he seems quite unable to cope with the relative which. For instance, p. 22, Cæsar "espied the Britons marching, in full force, towards the river Stour, which, becoming troublesome, he repulsed"—a small task, one might say, after conquering the Rhine. Again, p. 56, in speaking of Carausius, a Menapian by birth: "Menapia is a place of dubious identity, and whether born in Ireland, Wales, or Belgium, is not known." And these are but specimens of his ordinary style.

Beatrice, and Other Poems. By the Hon. Roden Noel. (London: Macmillan & Co. 1868.) Beatrice. By the Hon. Roden Noel. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1869.)—Evidently we have in Mr. Noel a poet who is still youthful, and, if we knew just how young, we should either say that evidently he is going to do quite good work, but none of the better sort of work, when he shall have got older; or else we should say that, being only twenty or twenty-one, and having done so well as in "Ganymede" and some other pieces, some work of true excellence may fairly be expected of him. And even if he has considerably passed his first youth, there are things here which justify decided praise. Above all, though there is no great power of thought, nor warmth and depth of feeling, nor musical capacity, exhibited in these poems, there is very little morbidness of feeling—none we should think that is real, out-and-out morbidness—and that is a good sign in a young writer of poetry. Scarcely less good signs are the purity of feeling which is seen throughout the volume, and a prevalent healthy objectiveness, which is of good omen for Mr. Noel's future, and which his readers will find refreshing.

The faults of his poetry we have glanced at. It is immature in thought—or else it shows that its author has no great ability in thinking; and that he does not know too much; it is not particularly well finished, and its want of finish is not due to exuberances and heat, but apparently rather to the thinness of the soil and a want of intelligent carefulness; it is not impassioned, and not musical. But of one excellence—some degrees of which are common enough—that which consists in the capacity to make a clear-cut picture or image of a scene in nature, Mr. Noel possesses so high a degree as to warrant a qualified but real belief in his artistic capacity. It is not one of our ordinary poetasters who does things like this from the "Ganymede" we have mentioned above. The boy lies beneath a locust tree in the midst of this Ægean scene:

> "Azure the heaven with rare a feathery cloud;
> Azure the sea, far-scintillating light,
> Soft rich like velvet yielding to the eye;
> Horizons haunted with some dreamlike sails;
> A temple hypæthral open to sweet air
> Nigh on the height, columned with solid flame,
> Of flutings and acanthus-work, instinct
> With lithe green lizards, and the shadows sharp
> Slant barring golden floor and inner wall.
>
> "A locust-tree condensing all the light
> On glossy leaves, and flaky spilling some > Sparkling among cool umbrage underneath;
> There magically sobered mellow, soft,
> At unaware beholding, gently laid
> A youth bare-limbed the loveliest in the world,
> Gloatingly falling on his lily side,
> Smoothing one rounded arm and dainty hand
> Whereon his head conscious and conquering
> All chestnut-curled rests listless and superb."

A scintillating sea is not much like velvet, and perhaps there is too much, or too many, made of the lizard, and we are all the less inclined to think the multitude of them a true touch in the picture, because "instinct with lithe green lizards" is an affected phrase; and there is roughness to be complained of. But still the conception is good, and it is carried out better than usual. More successful still—indeed, very good of its kind—is this from "Palmyra:"

> "Listless and weary silently we crouch
> Under the sun's intolerable face,
> For ever forward heaving dreamily,
> Each on his camel with a noiseless foot,
> Swift, sure, and silent like the feet of Time,
> And nose protruding level on the air:
> Our brilliant-hued and flowing-vested guards
> Drowsily bowing to the camel-stride,
> Our shadows blotted sharp upon the sand,
> And ne'er a sound but in the barrel slung,
> A gurgling as of wells among the palms!"

"Beatrice," which Messrs. Lippincott & Co. have chosen out of the English volume to reprint, is not at all one of its author's best works. It is a story—a boy's invention—which turns upon the passions of love and fierce revenge, which the boy plainly knew little or nothing about. Some of the lyrics were, perhaps, put in somewhat later. The tale is of a noble youth who weds a peasant girl; after a pretty courtship takes her to some indefinitely described district in Italy; goes away on a journey, and returns to find his wife gone; is assailed by a wicked lady who once had loved him, and who pretends to know that the wife has eloped with a duke and to believe that Clement had better love her, the marchioness; discovers that the duke is in Corsica and that the wife is an unwilling prisoner; goes over there, and, meeting the profligate, kills him by throwing him over a cliff; takes the wife from the castle, but loses her by death before their own shore is reached; buries her and returns to the North somewhere and lives a mysterious and gloomy life, which is much commented on by all his neighbors. Yet in this puerility there are occasional flashes of the characteristic excellence we have spoken of, though nothing like so many of them as to make "Beatrice" worth reading, and to such persons as wish to make Mr. Noel's acquaintance we commend the English volume, which contains the shorter pieces.

A Treatise on Admiralty and Prize, together with some Suggestions for the Guide and Government of United States Naval Commanders in Maritime Wars. By David Roberts. (New York: Hurd & Houghton; Cambridge: Riverside Press. 1869. In one volume.)—Many writers of law-books employ assistants to collect and arrange authorities from which they themselves prepare the text of the book, leaving the assistants to cite and explain the authorities in voluminous notes, but it is evident that Mr. Carter has not prepared his book in this way. He has evidently done his own work, and all of it. The text is his, and as for the notes there are none.

His aim was to write "a useful and readable book." Of the twenty-one chapters on admiralty he has made those on collision, salvage, and mariners' wages and rights the most useful, and they are good. He devotes a separate chapter to whaling. His plan throughout the chapters on admiralty has been to present the question discussed; then, give simple lists of authorities, American and English, on each side; and sometimes, after a discussion of some leading case, but more frequently without discussion, state the law as he thinks it to have been decided. This plan makes the book "readable," and especially to officers of the navy, for whom we judge it to have been particularly written, but it by no means impairs the value of the book to a lawyer with a good library or to the law student.

To prize law he devotes the remaining third of the volume. This part of the work does not contain much that will be valuable to the profession as a text-book. It discusses at length various international questions that arose during the rebellion, and distinctly maintains that England's neutrality during the rebellion, beginning with the Queen's Proclamation of May 19, 1869, was a quasi belligerency; but the discussion, however good in itself as an article for a review, should never have been put into this book. Mr. Sumner will find something to approve, but Mr. Motley, even in court dress, will scarcely be expected to inform her Majesty "that the wound caused to the Queen by the early removal of the Prince-consort during Palmerston's premiership could not have been deeper than was that inflicted upon the United States by the Foreign Secretary."

A Parser and Analyzer for Beginners, with Diagrams and Suggestive Pictures. By Francis A. March, Professor of the English Language and Comparative Philology in Lafayette College. (New York: Harper & Brothers, publishers, Franklin Square. 1869. 16mo, pp. 86.)—If anybody wishes to drill into a class of young scholars the technicalities of English grammar, we think Professor March's little book perhaps the best he can find for its use, inasmuch as it is brief and compact, aiming to combine the minimum of abstract rules with the maximum of practice. The principle upon which it is prepared—"to task memory as little as possible, perception and judgment as much as possible"—is undoubtedly sound; for if the study of grammar is good for anything, it is as an exercise of the reasoning powers. But, then, for this purpose it is too difficult and abstruse a subject for pupils of the age for which this book appears to be designed; and those of a suitable age for the study, say fifteen or sixteen, do not need the copious illustrations and diagrams, which would be of great service to a younger scholar. By the way, the most valuable hint in the book is the introduction of these pictures as a basis or material for the construction of sentences: this feature might be developed by itself to great advantage for even younger scholars. But if we were going to give children technical grammar at all, we certainly would not afflict them with all the absurdities which have been foisted upon English grammar by a mistaken imitation of Latin and Greek. We see, for instance, no reason for classing the articles as a separate part of speech; and in the sentence, "No one will help us unless we help ourselves," the verb of the condition "we help" appears to us to be clearly an indicative and not a subjunctive.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Andersen (H. C.), The Improvisatore: a Tale	(Hurd & Houghton) $1 75
Chase (W. H.), Day by Day	(Dennis Bros. & Co.)
Dumas (A.), Love and Liberty: a Tale	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 1 75
Elliott (S. H.), The Attractions of New Haven, Ct.	(N. Tibbals & Co.) 1 00
Evans (F. W.), Autobiography of a Shaker	(C. Van Benthuysen & Sons)
Fetridge (W. P.), Harper's Handbook for Travellers in Europe and the East, 8th year	(Harper & Bros.)
Feydeau (E.), Revue Internationale de l'Art et de la Curiosité, Nos. 1—6, swd.	(F. W. Christern)
Greenwood (J.), The Seven Curses of London	(Fields, Osgood & Co.) 1 50
" " " swd	(Harper & Bros.) 0 25
Mills (A.), The Literature and Literary Men of Great Britain and Ireland, 2 vols.	(Harper & Bros.)
Proceedings of the Am. Antiquarian Society, April 28, 1869, swd	(Worcester)
Packard (Dr. A. S., jr.), Record of American Entomology for 1868, swd	(Salem) 1 00
Reade (C.), White Lies, swd	(Harper & Bros.) 0 35
Robertson (Rev. F. W.), Sermons preached at Trinity Chapel, Brighton, 2 vols.	(Fields, Osgood & Co.) 3 00
Smith (W. R.), Diomede: from Homer's Iliad, swd	(D. Appleton & Co.)
Soi-même: a Story of a Wilful Life	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.) 1 25

ANTHONY TROLLOPE'S NEW STORY,

"The Vicar of Bullhampton,"

AND

Magdalena,

By the Author of "Gold Elsie," etc., are continued in this Number.

JUST ISSUED:

THE SEPTEMBER NUMBER

OF

Lippincott's Magazine,

WITH TWO FULL-PAGE ILLUSTRATIONS.

CONTENTS:

I. "THE VICAR OF BULLHAMPTON:" A Novel. Part III. Illustrated. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE.
II. SONNETS. By PAUL H. HAYNE.
III. GROUSE SHOOTING. By JANUARY SEARLE.
IV. MYRA'S MIRROR. By J. FRANKLIN FITTS.
V. LAND MONOPOLY. By GEORGE FITZHUGH.
VI. UNHEARD REPLIES. By EPES SARGENT.
VII. BEYOND THE BREAKERS: A Novel. Part IX. By Hon. ROBERT DALE OWEN.
VIII. A WEEK IN AN AQUARIUM. By MALCOLM McEUEN.
IX. THE NATIONAL DEBT. By Gen. FRANCIS A. WALKER.
X. MAGDALENA: A Novelette. Part II. By the Author of "Old Mam'selle's Secret."
XI. SNOW UPON THE WATERS. By Mrs. L. H. HOOPER.
XII. THAT MAN.
XIII. AN EMBASSAGE. By G. HERBERT SASS.
XIV. OUR MONTHLY GOSSIP.
XV. LITERATURE OF THE DAY.

 For sale at all the Book and News-stores. Yearly Subscription, $4; single number, 35 cents.

CLUB RATES—Two copies, $7; five copies, $16; ten copies, $30; and each additional copy, $3.

SPECIMEN NUMBER, with Premium List, sent to any address on receipt of 35 cents. Address

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO., Publishers,

715 and 717 Market Street, Philadelphia, and 449 Broome Street, New York.

CHOIRS ARE DELIGHTED WITH IT!

THE CHORAL TRIBUTE!

BY

L. O. Emerson,

Author of "Harp of Judah," "Jubilate," etc.

Universally pronounced to be the best book of Church Music issued during the last ten years, and greatly excelling the author's previous works.

Price, $1 50; $13 50 per dozen. Sent post-paid on receipt of price.

O. DITSON & CO., Boston.
C. H. DITSON & CO., New York.

TO THE AMERICAN PRESS.—CORRESPONDENT IN ITALY.—An English Gentleman, residing in Florence, Italy, and who is accustomed to literary work, will be happy to act as Correspondent in Italy for some American Newspaper. Address, stating requirements and remuneration, "Italian," care of the Publisher of the Nation, Box 6,733, New York.

LITTLE, BROWN & CO.'S

LIST OF LAW-BOOKS

FOR SEPTEMBER.

LAWS OF THE LAST SESSION OF CONGRESS. The Government Edition of the Statutes at Large and Treaties of the United States, passed at the First Session of the Forty-first Congress. Edited by Hon. GEORGE P. SANGER. Royal 8vo.

CURTIS'S EQUITY PRECEDENTS. Fourth Edition. Designed as a supplement to illustrate and accompany Mr. Justice Story's Treatise on Equity Pleadings. By GEORGE T. CURTIS, Esq. 8vo.

UNITED STATES STATUTES AT LARGE, VOL. XV., containing the Public Laws, Resolutions, Proclamations, Private Acts and Treaties, and Alphabetical List of Persons in the Act for the Removal of Legal and Political Disabilities. Royal 8vo.

BLACKWELL ON TAX TITLES. Third Edition. A Practical Treatise on the Power to sell Land for the Non-payment of Taxes. Edited by F. V. BALCH, Esq. 8vo.

TAYLOR'S LANDLORD AND TENANT. Fifth Edition. A Treatise on the American Law of Landlord and Tenant. By JOHN N. TAYLOR, Esq. 8vo.

CROCKER'S NOTES ON THE GENERAL STATUTES OF MASSACHUSETTS, containing References to all changes in the same by more recent laws, and to such Decisions of the Supreme Court of this State as explain the various Provisions of the Statutes. By URIEL H. CROCKER and GEORGE G. CROCKER. 8vo.

BENNETT AND HEARD'S LEADING CRIMINAL CASES. Second Edition. Edited by E. H. BENNETT and F. F. HEARD, Esqs. 2 vols. 8vo.

110 Washington Street, Boston.

The American Freemason.

CONTENTS OF AUGUST NUMBER.

Abraham and the Sabeist. OUR MONTHLY RECORD: To the Brethren, our Subscribers—Much Law: a Daniel come to Judgment—Have our Grand Lodges all been legally organized?—Invasion of Jurisdiction.—CORRESPONDENCE: The African or Prince Hall Grand Lodge, Part 3—The Grand Lodge of New York—The Rights of Lodge Past Masters—What does it mean?—Dr. Epstein's Discovery. OUR MONTHLY MASONIC CHRONICLE: United States, England, Ireland, France.

Sixteen quarto pages monthly, for one dollar a year. Address subscriptions to

J. FLETCHER BRENNAN, Editor,
114 Main Street, Cincinnati, O.

New and Old Books.

DAVID G. FRANCIS (formerly C. S. Francis & Co.), 3 Clinton Hall, Astor Place, New York, keeps constantly for sale an extensive Stock of New and Second-hand Books in various departments of Literature.

Catalogues, issued from time to time, will be forwarded FREE to any address.

NEW

HOMŒOPATHIC PUBLICATIONS

THE HOMŒOPATHIC TREATMENT OF DIARRHŒA, DYSENTERY, CHOLERA, etc., etc. By JAMES B. BELL, M.D., of Augusta, Me. Philadelphia: A. J. TAFEL. Pp. 170, 12mo, price $1 25.

CHARACTERISTIC MATERIA MEDICA. By WM. H. BURT, M.D., of Lincoln, Ill. Philadelphia: A. J. TAFEL. Pp. 460, 12mo, price $3.

THE HOMŒOPATHIC TREATMENT OF SYPHILIS, GONORRHŒA, SPERMATORRHŒA, AND URINARY DISEASES. By J. H. BERJEAU, M.D. Revised, with numerous additions, by J. H. P. FROST, M.D., late Professor of Physiology and Pathology at the Hom. Med. College of Penna. Philadelphia: A. J. TAFEL. Pp. 270, 12mo, price $2.

SELF-ENERVATION: ITS CONSEQUENCES AND TREATMENT. By C. S. ELDRIDGE, M.D., of Bay City, Mich. Price $1.

JAHR'S THERAPEUTICAL GUIDE: the most important results of more than forty years of practice. By G. H. G. JAHR, M.D., Chevalier, etc. Translated by C. HEMPEL, M.D. Price $3 50.

N. B.—Any of above works will be sent free of postage on receipt of price. Address

A. J. TAFEL,
HOMŒOPATHIC PHARMACEUTIST AND PUBLISHER,
48 N. Ninth Street, Philadelphia.

The Fifth Volume of the "Hahn. Monthly," edited by R. J. MCCLATCHEY, M.D., commences in August. This is one of the best conducted Homœopathic Journals in the country.

Subscription price, $3, payable in advance. Sample numbers sent for 25 cents. Address A. J. TAFEL, Philadelphia, P. O. Box 2,332.

TO BOOK AGENTS.

N. TIBBALS & CO. have added to their extensive trade in Sunday-school, Theological, and Miscellaneous Books the Subscription business.

We have one book which will contain several hundred first-class engravings, and will be the best book for Agents yet published. Be sure and not engage until you see our circular and prospectus. Ready Sept. 1.

N. TIBBALS & CO.,
37 Park Row, New York.

BACK NUMBERS OF THE NATION.

The following numbers of the Nation are desired by the Publisher, and if sent to his address within a week will be paid for at the rate of twenty-five cents for each number of Vol. I., and fifteen cents for the rest:

Vol. I. 1, 3, 5, 6, 7.
Vol. V. 108, 109, 124, 128.

 The Publisher offers for sale complete sets of the Nation (eight volumes), unbound, for $26; bound, for $42; transportation not included.

For a Million American Homes.

THE COMPLETE ART OF

DRESS-MAKING

For Ten Cents!

 Public attention is called to the great practical value of the forthcoming number of

Harper's Bazar,

Dated September 4, 1869,

which will contain a FULL COMPENDIUM OF THE ART OF DRESS-MAKING, consisting of 51 Diagrams and Engravings, accompanied with clear and simple instructions whereby every lady can become her own dressmaker, and cut, fit, and make her entire wardrobe. Directions are also given for fitting patterns to every figure; for sewing various seams, making trimmings, etc., etc.; and, in a word, for all the details that pertain to the making of wearing apparel.

This number of HARPER'S BAZAR is also enriched with various other attractive features, especially

A DOUBLE-PAGE CARTOON,

"HUSBAND-HUNTING,"

BY

THOMAS NAST.

Harper's Bazar,

AN ILLUSTRATED WEEKLY JOURNAL OF FASHION, PLEASURE, AND INSTRUCTION.

10 Cents a Number; $4 a Year.

A Supplement containing numerous full-sized Patterns of useful articles accompanies the paper every fortnight, and occasionally an elegant Colored Fashion Plate.

From the Nation, July 22, 1869.

HARPER'S BAZAR, far from being the trivial paper that one might hastily suppose, is an excellent one. Like all the periodicals which the HARPERS publish, it is almost ideally well edited, and the class of readers for whom it is intended—the mothers and daughters in average families—cannot but profit by its good sense and good taste, which, we have no doubt, are to-day making very many homes happier than they may have been before the women began taking lessons in personal and household and social management from this good-natured mentor. Then, apart from its claims to feminine respect and liking, the more important part of humanity and creation may properly be much obliged to it for its services to the great cause of dressing well, and particularly for helping on the cause of dressing well at not too great an expense. No doubt, a certain appreciable percentage of the beauty which to-day makes American women the envy of the foreign feminine world, and a chief glory of our native land, is due to little hints that they get from the BAZAR. Of the WEEKLY and the MONTHLY there is nothing that our readers need to be told.

HARPER'S BAZAR contains, besides pictures, patterns, etc., a variety of matter of especial use and interest to the family; articles on health, dress, and housekeeping in all its branches; its editorial matter is specially adapted to the circle it is intended to interest and instruct; and it has, besides, good stories and literary matter of merit.—New York Evening Post.

It has the merit of being sensible, of conveying instruction, of giving excellent patterns in every department, and of being well stocked with good reading matter.—Watchman and Reflector.

To dress according to HARPER'S BAZAR will be the aim and ambition of the women of America.—Boston Transcript.

TERMS FOR HARPER'S PERIODICALS:

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, one year	$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, one year	4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, one year	4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10; or any two for $7.

Address:

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

LIBRARY OF EDUCATION.

LOCKE (JOHN), "SOME THOUGHTS CONcerning Education," Essays on "Study," "Reading," "A Tutor's Business," "Knowledge: Its Extent and Measure," "Error;" with a Life. 2 vols. 32mo, paper. Price 40 cents, or 50 cents by mail.

MILTON (JOHN), "A TREATISE OF EDUcation," being his letter to Master Samuel Hartlib; with a Life. 1 vol. 32mo, paper (Vol. II. of the Library of Education.) Price 20 cents, or 25 cents by mail.

MANN (HORACE), "ON THE STUDY OF Physiology in Schools," being his Annual Report for 1842; with a Life. 1 vol. 32mo, paper (Vol. III. of the Library.) Price 20 cents, or 25 cents by mail.

MILL (J. S.), "ST. ANDREWS ADDRESS." 1 vol. 32mo, paper (Vol. IV. of Library.) Price 20 cents, or 25 cents by mail.

FROUDE (J. A.), "ST. ANDREWS ADdress." 1 vol. 32mo, paper (Vol. IV. of Library.) Price 20 cents, or 25 cents by mail.

CARLYLE (THOMAS), "EDINBURGH ADdress." 1 vol. 32mo, paper (Vol. IV. of Library.) Price 20 cents, or 25 cents by mail.

For an appreciation of the character and object of this series, see the Journal of the American Social Science Association, No. 1, just published by Leypoldt & Holt.

J. W. SCHERMERHORN & CO.,

PUBLISHERS,

14 Bond Street, New York.

TO LYCEUMS, LECTURE COMMITTEES, ETC.

THE American Literary Bureau is now prepared to make Lecture engagements with Lyceums and other Lecture Associations throughout the country for lecturers and entertainments of a musical and literary character. The Bureau's list includes Justin McCarthy, editor London Morning Star, Mark Twain, T. W. Higginson, Rev. Robert Laird Collier, Edwin P. Whipple, Olive Logan, Kate Field, Benson J. Lossing the historian, P. B. Du Chaillu, Dr. Isaac I. Hayes, C. Oscanyan, Prof. E. L. Youmans, Saml. L. Hewlett, Wirt Sikes, John G. Saxe, Henry Nicholls, Prof. Hitchcock, Josiah Phillips Quincy, Rev. George H. Hepworth, Prof. Rufus Adams, Thomas W. Knox, George Wakeman, John J. Pinkerton, E. P. Nowell, Editor American Odd Fellow, Professor Homer B. Sprague, Cornell University, Rev. T. E. Kittredge, B. T. Taylor, Rev. J. D. Sweet, Dr. Griscom, George Kennan (the Siberian traveller), Maria A. Stetson, Annie E. Potter, Stephen Massett (Jeems Pipes), Wm. H. Pope (the Recitationist), W. R. Alger, Hon. Ingersoll Lockwood, Mrs. Carter, Hon. M. Bovee, Miss Susan B. Anthony, Rev. Elias Nasin, O. D. Munson, T. S. Townsend, the Hutchinson Family, Mr. and Mrs. W. Fox Leggett in Shakespearian Rehearsals, and many others, whose names appear on the circular.

NO CHARGE WHATEVER TO LECTURE COMMITTEES.

Applications promptly attended to. Send for Circular to

AMERICAN LITERARY BUREAU,
132 Nassau Street, New York City.
JAMES K. MEDBERY, } Associate
S. HUMPHREYS GURTEEN, } Directors.
P. O. Box No. 6,701.

JUST PUBLISHED.

A NEW EDITION OF

HALF-HOURS WITH THE BEST AUTHORS.

With short Biographical and Critical Notes. By Charles Knight. Illustrated with twenty-four full-page wood engravings, printed on toned paper. 6 vols. crown 8vo, cloth, in box, price $10 50.

COMPANION TO THE ABOVE.

Half-Hours with the Best Letter-Writers and Autobiographers.

Forming a Collection of Memoirs and Anecdotes of Eminent Persons. By Charles Knight. 2 vols. crown 8vo, cloth, price $6.

"Literature that will not ignobly interest or frivolously amuse, but convey the wisest instruction in the pleasantest manner, and in a form that will find its way to tens of thousands of homes, to be well thumbed and dog-eared by the children and the grown people, on the journey and at the fireside."—Alexander Strahan, in Good Words.

 The above will be sent to any address, post-paid, on receipt of price by the publishers,

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS,
416 Broome Street, New York.

The Nation Press.

The Proprietors of THE NATION PRESS give notice that they have established a Book, Pamphlet, Job, and Newspaper Printing-Office in this City, and are prepared to execute at moderate prices, for cash, the best of work in any and all of these branches.

For BOOKS they will furnish Electrotype or Stereotype Plates, as desired, and will guaranty unusual accuracy in their preparation.

PAMPHLETS of every description, embracing Prospectuses, Statements, and Reports of Corporations, Statistical, Scientific, and Literary Papers, Law Pleadings, etc., etc., will receive the same attention as books, and be printed with especial care.

JOB WORK, in all its details: Cards, Circulars, Programmes, Bills, Receipts, Forms, etc., will be promptly dispatched, with taste, and in the newest varieties of type.

NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, and other Periodicals will be printed on reasonable terms, and strictly upon time.

In short, the Proprietors undertake to satisfy first-class custom in all that pertains to a general Printing Business.

Orders may be sent to THE NATION PRESS, 27 Rose Street (a few doors North of Frankfort), or to this Office; and estimates will be furnished at either place.

JOHN ROSS, Manager.

Office of THE NATION, 3 Park Place,
April 26, 1869.

NINTH VOLUME.

With the number for July 1, the Nation entered upon its Ninth Volume, under the same management as from the beginning, and with the same objects as a truly critical and independent journal. Its circle of contributors is wider and richer than ever before, while its influence is believed never to have been so great as now.

TERMS: Five Dollars per annum, in advance. Clergymen, Four Dollars.

Address

PUBLISHER OF "THE NATION,"
3 Park Place, New York.

AGENTS.

GREAT BRITAIN.—George Street, 30 Cornhill, London, E. C.

FRANCE.—Bowles Brothers & Co., 12 rue de la Paix, Paris.

SWITZERLAND.—Vérésoff & Garrigues, Place Bel-Air, Geneva.

ITALY.—Furse Brothers & Co., 9 Piazza di Spagna, Rome. Cerulli & Co., 5 Vico Satriano a Chiaja, Naples. Fairman & Co., Palazzo Orlandini, 2 via dei Buoni, Florence.

TERMS TO FOREIGN SUBSCRIBERS.

Five Dollars per annum, plus postage, in advance.

PRESERVE YOUR PAPERS, AND BIND THEM YOURSELF.

The Eureka Self-Binder

Is simple, and binds stronger and better than a book. No. 6 is adapted to the Nation. Price $1 25; or, if sent by mail, $1 50.

Address SCHUMANN & LATHAM,
18 Dey Street, New Yo k.

BINDERS FOR THE "NATION."

The Publisher of the Nation, considering the binder described above to be the best yet brought to his notice, has made arrangements for supplying it at the above prices, in cloth, to subscribers and others. The number of any volume will be stamped upon it without charge, to order.

Papers bound in this way really need no other binding for permanent preservation, and present the same appearance on the shelf as the usual bound volumes.

Address, with price enclosed,

PUBLISHER OF THE NATION,
Box 6732, New York City.

The Suburban Home School, first-class, New Haven, Conn. Rev. Dr. SHEARS, Rector. See Circulars.

COTTAGE HILL SEMINARY, FOR YOUNG LADIES,

POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.,

REOPENS SEPTEMBER 15.

The best features of European and Home Schools. Especial attention to Modern Languages, Music, and Art. Mr. Walter R. Gilbert, Mus. Bac. Oxon., has charge of the Department of Music.

For prospectus, with references, address the Rector,
REV. GEORGE T. RIDER, A.M.

The Nation.

VOL. IX.—NO. 217. THURSDAY, AUGUST 26, 1869. { FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM / TWELVE CENTS PER COPY

THE WEEK 161

EDITORIAL ARTICLES:
The Industrial Condition of the South 164
A Plea for the Individual Man.—His Drink 165
His Food and Clothing 166

The Byron Horror 167
The Philosophy of "The National Game" 167
England 168
France 169

CORRESPONDENCE:
Women and Religion 170

NOTES:
Literary 171

Viollet-le-Duc's French Mediæval Architecture 173
The Magazines for September 174

CURRENT LITERATURE:
The Literature and Literary Men of Great Britain and Ireland 176

Books of the Week 176

Terms:—Five Dollars per annum, in advance; Clergymen, Four Dollars.  Remittances at the risk of the subscriber, unless made by draft, check, P. O. money order, or registered letter.

The date of expiration of each subscription is indicated on the printed label. A delay of more than three months in renewing subscriptions will endanger their continuance.

ADDRESS, PUBLISHER OF "THE NATION," BOX 6732, NEW YORK.

PUBLISHING OFFICE, 3 PARK PLACE.

The Week.

ALMOST at the same time that our readers have this paragraph before them, they will be getting the news concerning the inter-collegiate boat-race on the Thames; and it would be merely for the gratification of our vanity as a prophet that we should predict the victory of Harvard, which, therefore, we shall refrain from doing. The reading of the English papers for the last few days has been amusing. At first, the gentlemen who do the rowing for the daily press seemed to look on the idea of the American crew's being able to do anything with Oxford as a pitiable delusion. Even our own Tribune's English correspondent, whose boating was done at the period when Yale rowed in eight oars—which is much like saying that it was done with Noah's eight in the ark—informed us that the American crew appeared to be four stout young fellows, or fine young fellows, or well-grown young fellows, who "might be taught to row." But within a few days there has been a general impression that to find a four to teach them a very great deal would be a work of difficulty. The fact probably is that since they have been on the Thames they have not forgotten a way which they learned on the Charles—a way of doing better in races than in practising before critics on the river-bank. As we write, the opinion of some of these English judges is that, under such and such conditions, Harvard may win—which is a much more civil opinion than any which, a fortnight ago, we were expecting to hear till after to-morrow. With the exclusion of Messrs. Bass and Rice, and the admission of Mr. Fay and Mr. Lyman, the rowing crew is now of New England stock, and the race is New England against Old—a fact which we suppose we may say is not ominous of good to that monarchy.

There is still a vigorous controversy going on in the newspapers over the question whether Senter, the new Governor of Tennessee, was the real Republican candidate, and ought to have received the support of the Republicans or not. The fact seems to be that he only received the support of a very small number; but that these, combined with the whole force of the Democrats, sufficed to elect him, and that, as we remarked last week, he is now apparently almost the only man of the Senter party in Tennessee. The Democrats, having conquered under him, have not unnaturally repudiated him. On the other hand, the Radical papers which are now abusing him must make up their minds to receiving very little attention. It is true he was a very short time before his nomination a Brownlow proscriptionist of the most extreme type, and that he and Brownlow both began to shout for universal suffrage and universal amnesty with great and remarkable suddenness. But, then, few sensible people outside of Tennessee ever thought much of either Brownlow or his followers as politicians, and those who persisted in singing their praises, and making Brownlow a governor and senator, can hardly expect people to turn about now and listen respectfully to their vilification of him. He is no worse and no better than he was a year ago; and perhaps the worst thing that could be said of the Tennessee Republicans is that a year ago he and Senter were two of their principal idols. What has occurred in Tennessee is instructive, mainly, as indicating what we must expect to occur shortly in all the reconstructed States. We cannot force water to run up hill; and we cannot, in a democratic country, long keep the government out of the hands of the majority. The proscription of the majority by the minority, and that minority the feeblest and most insignificant section of the community, after the military control had been laid aside, must end everywhere, as long as men are men, as it has ended in Tennessee. The exclusion of the newly elected Conservative candidates in Virginia by the administration of the iron-clad oath will be a misfortune. It will, doubtless, secure the election of two Radical senators, but the presence of these gentlemen in the Senate will be a sorry compensation for the exasperation roused in the hearts of the majority, who two years hence are sure to rule, by the conviction that they have been swindled egregiously, besides being oppressed.

In saying all this, we are not defending the Southern Democrats or Conservatives. We are willing to admit the truth of the worst charges made against them, of pride, obstinacy, dissimulation, and blindness. If we could make them over again, we would turn out very different men. Every one of them, had we the control of them, should confess his guilt in aiding or abetting in the war against the United States, lay aside all caste hate and prejudice, clamor for the adoption of the Fifteenth Amendment, help to establish common schools, swear allegiance to the Federal Government every Monday morning and keep his oath, besides using machinery and artificial manures on his farm, pay his laborers on Saturday night, and subscribe to the New York Tribune and Harper's Bazar. In certain cases, we would even prescribe the reading of "Kathrina," and would deliver up some bad districts to be ravaged by book-agents. But we cannot have our way with them, and we may assert, without conceit, that we are as near having our way with them as any politician or body of politicians in the country—that is, that we are ever so far removed from it. In short, they have to be taken and governed as they are. In our day and latitude, there are two kinds of government possible—Cæsarism and democracy, or brute force and the majority. If we give up brute force, we must govern through the majority—the bad character of the latter to the contrary notwithstanding. Anybody who does not like the latter ought to advocate the indefinite continuance of martial law.

A Herald correspondent having found Colonel William B. Stokes "in his room quietly smoking a cigar," in a Washington hotel, proceeded to interview him with the following results. The colonel said, "in the first place, the Republican party in Tennessee has gone to hell," having been sent there by the fraudulent votes of 86,000 disfranchised persons and minors whom Senter's new registrars allowed to vote. Seymour's vote last fall was 33,000, Senter's the other day was 119,000—the 86,000 difference between these two votes represents the extent of Senter's cheating. Wherever the Republican party has gone, there is no doubt, we suppose, that Senter is a bad man. Stokes, it appears, got Grant's vote of last year, 56,000, so there really was no division worth speaking of in the Republican party. As for Brownlow's being on Senter's side, the Colonel accounted for that by saying that "the old man is in his dotage," and is governed by his son and sons-in-law—and "the Brownlow boys" being receivers of railways, with fat pickings, and knowing well what "the Bald Eagle of East Tennessee" would do with the railroad rings should he become governor, carried the Parson over to the Senter side. It will take a good man—in a Tennessee sense of the word—to beat Andrew Johnson for the senatorship, the Colonel thinks; but as some of the Democrats do not yet forgive his military governorship, there is no certainty that some comparatively unknown man may not be taken up. To the question if Grant is going to let Federal office-holders who are Senter men retain their places, the Colonel concisely replied, "Not much." Finally, the Colonel said that he was in Washington for the purpose of seeing if he could not get an extra session of Congress on the 20th of September to take measures for regulating the internal affairs of Tennessee. He was obliged to add, however, that this scheme was too much even for Mr. Forney, who admits that the election of Senter was an outrage, but is far from clear in his mind as to how Congress can do anything in the premises.

Outside of Tennessee political affairs are quiet, though there is some preliminary stir in Ohio, where Senators Sherman and Morton and Governor Hayes have taken the stump, and Mr. Pendleton is out with his letter of acceptance, which is a true Peace Democrat's performance. Mr. Pendleton never, so far as we know, has risen above acrid, unsuggestive criticism of Republican policy; and this letter is no more than that. In Pennsylvania, there is great dulness and inactivity. Over the line in Maryland, there is a little local quarrel between Judge Bond and some associates of his on the one hand, and Mr. Fulton, of the American, on the other—the Judge apparently being practically in that most forlorn of all conditions, "read out" of the party, and lying under the accusation of having favored and of favoring the aspirations of Mr. Chase, whom so many credit with extreme and untiring willingness for the Presidency. Judge Bond is a man of ability; but the reputation is given him—for some reason—of being inclined to bolt. He and his associates indignantly denounce the American's imputations on their fidelity. The condition of the Republican organization in Maryland is not unlike its state in this city, and Judge Bond and his friends are playing the part of come-outers.

From Virginia we learn that in the late campaign the total number of Conservatives who enrolled themselves for the seeming purpose of voting to reject the constitution was but 9,136. At any rate, so many votes were cast against it, while in its favor there were 210,585. We may infer from the returns that there was no great amount of calculation used, for just about five-sixths of all the negro electors went to the polls, and just about the same fraction of the white voters—22,000 of the one race and 24,000 of the other staying away. We may infer, also, that a pretty heavy negro vote was given in favor of the liberal policy in regard to enfranchisement, for with 97,205 negro voters at the polls, there were but 84,310 votes, white and black, in favor of retaining the proscriptive clauses of the constitution. General Canby seems determined to enforce the letter of the law regulating the reconstruction of Virginia; and if he does, there will be a Wells legislature after all. There is talk in some of the Democratic papers about the General's trying to make himself senator, and using his power in this instance for that purpose—a charge which no one will believe who knows his character; he is one of the best results of West Point, and, we do not doubt, will in this, as in other cases, do neither more nor less than his exact duty. In Mississippi, there is doubt if Dent will be nominated after all; his ridiculous letter to Secretary Boutwell certainly ought to spoil his chance. The Democratic press, we see, is enjoying the agreeable task, which it always imposes on itself, of shouldering this gentleman as it shouldered Mr. Binckley and Andrew Johnson and Senator Sprague, and every other man, no matter how silly, who would fling mud at Republicans.

The Labor Convention at Philadelphia, which has just closed its sittings, was remarkable for the admission of colored delegates on a footing of full and perfect equality, and for the attention and respect with which they were always listened to. What was more gratifying, though not half so surprising, was that no speeches were so well worth listening to as those of these same delegates, or contained nearly so much good sense and good feeling. The remarks of one of them about the national debt, concerning which there seemed to be a good deal of confusion, if not of unsoundness, in the convention, were especially worthy of note, and ought to have put many an ignorant or hardened white man to the blush. We regret to say, however, that there was little work of a practical kind done in the convention, and if it were not that it had set on foot some useful enquiries, and that all discussion of obscure problems is apt to be beneficial, we should be unable to say that the world was any the better of its having met. Miss Anthony was finally turned out under the dictation of the New York printers—not as a woman, however, but as "an enemy of labor." The convention resolved in favor of the equality of women in all fields of industry, and, while protesting against the importation of Coolies, denied that it had any objection to the voluntary immigration of Chinese; made a statement in defence of the Pennsylvania miners, containing some interesting facts relating to their condition and treatment by their employers, which, if set forth with more calmness, would have been very valuable. The platform of "The National Labor Union," as adopted, denounced the national banks and asked for the substitution of legal tenders for their currency; called for the payment of the Government bonds in currency and the taxation of the interest, and the reduction of the legal rate of interest; denounced land monopolies; and warmly commended co-operation as the best solution of the labor problem. The principal members of the convention were, we believe, men of European birth; and the discussions had the breadth and wideness—not to say wildness—of range which have marked the proceedings of similar conventions on the Continent, but were sadly wanting in the close practicalness which distinguishes the discussions of the workingmen's organizations in England, and has made them literally the most wonderful combinations ever seen, as well as the most powerful of their kind. The fact is that American workmen have yet a great deal to learn, apparently, in this matter from their European brethren, and they could not do better than import a leading man, say of the Amalgamated Engineers' Trades-union, to give them some insight into the working of that great body—the strongest, probably, ever arrayed against capital.

Everybody who has the interests of working-men at heart, and who believes that it is their right and duty to organize for the protection of their own interests, must regret to see them so much disposed to go into politics, and to try to influence legislation on such a vast number of problems, many of which they do not in the least understand, if we may judge from their speeches, and most of which only concern them very remotely. If, on the other hand, they would devote themselves singly to the work of raising wages, of building up co-operation, of providing funds for strikes and for the relief of their members in sickness and old age, for the diffusion of information in their own body regarding the condition and prospects of labor, for the provision of rational means of arbitration between employers and employed, and for the maintenance of communication with the working-men of other countries, they would achieve an amount of success of which foreign workmen do not dream, because they have more familiarity with business, move in a more favorable atmosphere, and enjoy more sympathy from the community. In politics they are sure to come to grief. We are sorry, too, to notice amongst them a want of faith in individual freedom, and a disposition to whine for Government protection against even the natural ills of life.

The jurisprudence of Massachusetts, to which the whole Union is already largely indebted, has been enriched, within the last week, by a decision on appeal condemning the defendant in the great nose-pulling case, of which we spoke last week, to two months' imprisonment in the common jail, thus according the nose that protection which we believe is still, in spite of its exposed position, the delicacy of its functions, and its intimate connection with the finest feelings of human nature, denied it in the legislation of all other countries. This prominent and important organ may now be considered, in Massachusetts at least, in the enjoyment of that peculiar inviolability which the Romans described by the term sacrosanct. The injury done to it or its owner by a pull at it may be absolutely null; but the offence is nevertheless so rank, and so "smells to heaven," that the proudest has to expiate it by a prolonged sojourn in the common jail amongst the vilest criminals. It is not easy to see, however, on what principles the Court fixed the punishment. If the pull be regarded merely as simple assault and battery, two months' imprisonment is surely a monstrous penalty to inflict for it; if, on the other hand, it be regarded as a personal indignity, the provocation ought to have been taken into account, which it apparently was not; and, as well as we can make out from the report, the defendant's social position, which makes him very susceptible to punishment of any kind except a fine, was treated simply as an aggravating circumstance.

To the social philosopher, the proceedings in Court were well worth study. A dweller in the darker parts of the country would naturally regard the affair as a mere police-court case, which a sensible magistrate would dispose of by making the parties apologize mutually, or at worst by a sentence of three or four days' imprisonment on the assailant. But in Boston it seems to have risen to the dignity of a state trial. The Judge and the District-Attorney were evidently suffering from mental inflammation throughout, and the latter thundered against the defendant as if the State was infested by turbulent nobles who amused themselves by pulling the noses of roturiers, and running those who complained of it through the body. What made all this fuss was apparently the "social position" of the parties—one is, we believe, a lawyer, and the other a banker; and from the frequent allusions to it, and the heroic struggle of the Court not to be influenced by it, one might imagine that Massachusetts was groaning under a cruel and powerful aristocracy, the fact being that all talk in a Ma sachusetts court of justice about "social position" being of consequence or no is about as becoming, and produces much the same effect on the moral stomach, as frequent declarations from a lady in easy circumstances that, come what may, she is determined to preserve her chastity.

There have been fresh rumors through the week of the sale of Cuba to the inhabitants for the sum of $200,000,000, or thereabouts. The correspondent of the Boston Advertiser, who is usually well informed, mentioned this sale, as our readers may remember, before General Sickles's departure, as something which the General had been instructed to suggest or press upon the Spanish Government; and the state of affairs in Cuba is so hopeless that, if the Spaniards could see a prospect of getting the money paid down or guaranteed by the United States, they would probably accept the offer. That unendorsed Cuban bonds would be worth anything, the Spaniards would be the last men to believe. Their hold on the island seems to be daily relaxing, owing to the increasing weakness and disorder of the mother country. The reinforcements are sent out in driblets, and are consumed in desultory operations, without producing any sensible effect on the insurrection—the main reliance of the Home Government being apparently on local volunteers, who are Spaniards, but are an undisciplined though well-armed mob. They have recently offered to be mobilized and take the field, but nobody seems to want to command them; and there is a report that Rodas asks to be recalled to save his reputation, or what is left of it. In the meantime, the accounts of "battles" between the troops and insurgents furnished by the New York papers are melancholy as well as amusing reading, and almost all the composition of the "reliable gentleman," aided by "the intelligent contraband." Their vast and varied experience in our war is, of course, a great help to these persons in their present labors; but, then, how barren and unpicturesque Cuban battlefields must seem to them compared to what they witnessed here.

Affairs in Spain apparently could not easily be worse. The declaration of the Captain-General of Madrid, Señor Irquierdo, one of the leading revolutionists, some weeks ago, that he had begun to despair of the revolution and would retire into private life if a monarch were not speedily elected, was the first intimation the outside world received that things were really as bad as they looked. The Carlist movement, contemptible as it has been from a military point of view, has been evidently a serious one politically and socially. It has aggravated the feeling of unrest and uncertainty which has been the greatest obstacle the revolution has had to contend with, and has tempted the clergy into more active hostility than they had previously ventured on—many of the priests having taken the field at the head of insurrectionary bands. It has, moreover, betrayed the Government into resorting once more to the atrocious measures of repression—the shootings and deportations which have been the scandal and disgrace of all Spanish and Spanish-American revolutions. The latest news is perhaps the worst—that there are numerous signs of insubordination in the army, which has hitherto been the main guarantee of order. The small amount of interest in the course of political events taken by the mass of the people outside the great towns, and the small amount of influence they have exercised on them, have constituted one of the greatest difficulties of the Provisional Government, and say but little for the sagacity of the Republicans. General Sickles has been very cordially received by Marshal Serrano, who permitted him to drive in the garden of La Granja in a pony basket-phæton, which must have been a sweet pretty sight, particularly as riding or driving in these gardens is a privilege hitherto reserved to royal persons, and which Marshal Serrano, Regent though he is, has not ventured to accord to himself.

Major Haggerty's appointment as consul to Glasgow has been cancelled in the frankest manner, the London papers say, by this Government, on learning that Haggerty's antecedents were such as to render it impossible to give him an exequatur, the appointment having been made, it appears, in ignorance of these antecedents. It is not quite pleasant, and certainly is not correct, and ought to be humiliating to have our Government informed for the first time of the antecedents of its own agents by a foreign Government. But although General Grant and Mr. Fish may not have known that Haggerty was a Fenian, the politicians who recommended him for the place, and got it for him, as a reward for his stumping during the last canvas, knew it perfectly well, and we are sure that they are now enjoying the joke at some of the watering-places.

The news from England, apart from the boat-race, is of little interest, except a scandal about the Duke of Edinburgh, who, it appears, made a number of cheap presents to various people in Australia, and then, when he got home, sent in a very large bill for them to Parliament, which was voted amongst the other appropriations. But the Australians, on hearing that the money did not come out of the Prince's pocket, and that, moreover, it was a great deal more than any presents they had heard of were worth, are making a most unpleasant uproar, and the English press is taking up the tale, and there is a very fair amount of indignation expended on the affair. It is one of the incidents which are every day making it more and more doubtful whether the principle of hereditary monarchy can stand very much longer, and whether the public of any modern state can bear very well with royalty deprived of divine right, and debarred from active work. The position of the royal princes is one which in many ways, in the light of the present day, wears a ludicrous aspect, or rather would, even if it were filled by able and useful men; as matters stand, there is every reason to believe that the royal family is the worst enemy of royalty in England. No modern people can endure very well the affectation of respect with which the Prince of Wales and Prince Alfred, for instance, are treated, and the case is aggravated by the frequency with which English customs compel them to show themselves in public. The press, too, is a terrible microscope, which the kings and princes of the olden time had not to face, and personal loyalty is not only dead, but is fast becoming a curiosity of history.

THE INDUSTRIAL CONDITION OF THE SOUTH.

Two Boston brokers—Messrs. Loring and Atkinson—have been making an effort to supply what begins once more to be greatly needed, and that is accurate information, not only as to the social and economical condition of the South, but as to the feelings of the white population. A good deal was done by way of exploration at the South immediately after the war. The public curiosity as to the state of things the Confederacy had left behind it was intense, and the newspapers did much to gratify it by despatching correspondents in every direction; and from their descriptions, if not from their inferences, one got a fair idea of the way the people were living and thinking and feeling. When the Reconstruction process began, the South entered on a new phase, in which the press and the planters were constantly tempted—and generally gave way to the temptation—in all their published accounts of the South to color things in such a way as to alarm or discourage the Northern Radicals and support their own friends at the North, and they resolutely assumed what might be termed a waiting attitude, in the hope that something would turn up that would save them from negro suffrage and all other incidents of political equality.

It may be said safely, however, that during the past two years the Southern whites have been gradually giving up all hope of a reaction, or of saving anything that was peculiar in Southern society from the general transformation. All classes have now for a year or two been trying to adapt themselves to the new order of things, however ill they may like it, and have formed pretty fixed opinions about it, and, what is of perhaps more importance for us, have given up looking for a change. There, therefore, has not before been as favorable an opportunity for asking Southern men what they think of the present condition and future prospects of Southern industry. In the pamphlet before us we find, in extracts from the letters received in reply, the result of enquiries addressed to about two hundred Southerners of prominence, planters, brokers, and factors in various parts of the country, touching the state of Southern agriculture, the defects and advantages of the present system of labor, the condition and prospects of the negroes, and their relations with their white employers, and the opening offered by the South to white immigration—forming, on the whole, perhaps the most interesting body of testimony on these subjects we remember to have seen; and its value is not diminished, but increased, by the fact that it is almost invariably colored by the feelings of the writers. We are apt to forget that the feelings of Southern whites—even their wildest and most foolish prejudices—are elements which must enter largely into the calculations of every man who thinks of settling in the South or wishes to speculate in it, or whose duty it may be to legislate for it, and there are but few people at the North who have been at all familiar with the anti-slavery controversy, who are not now perfectly capable of making the necessary allowances for the effect produced on most Southern utterances on all political and social subjects by the mania about the negro, which has made the whole community one of the curiosities of the modern world.

One of the first things which strikes one in reading the letters is, that there is a general agreement amongst the writers, not only that the working force of the black population has been greatly diminished by disease and casualties during the war, and by the general refusal of the women to labor in the fields since the war, but that they are not multiplying, owing to the increasing indisposition of the women to bear children — this inference being drawn partly from the fact that the births have diminished greatly within the sphere of the writer's observation, and partly from the notorious increase of the practice of abortion. That it is a correct inference, nobody need feel much difficulty in believing who remembers that the care of the plantation children now devolves on the mothers, and not, as formerly, on old nurses detailed for the duty; and that impatience of child-bearing is not confined in our day to the negroes. The effects of the diminution of births, combined with the less careful treatment of disease—which is the natural result of the sick negro's ceasing to be property, and being left to get well by his own devices—the neglect of vaccination, and the greater irregularity of the negro's habits in freedom than in slavery, and the sudden access of anxiety caused by emancipation, and falling on a race unused to anxiety and all forms of nervous wear and tear, except physical fear, have also probably done much to raise the bills of negro mortality, or would, if any such bills existed. They would make the prospect of an early extinction of the race very strong, if it were not for the probability that the race will, with fair play, before very long adapt itself by a process of natural selection to the new conditions of existence. The shiftless, licentious, vagabond, and stupid will inevitably die off rapidly; they cannot keep their footing very long in a busy industrial community such as the South, no matter what race supplies the labor, is sure to be; the sober, industrious, strong, and enterprising will hold their own, acquire land and trades, and bear large families, and eventually present to the world a new and select negro type, adapted to the new order of things.

But we do not, we confess, see much probability that the negroes can be relied on to meet the insatiable demand for cotton with which the South is now assailed, and seems likely to be assailed for an indefinite period, unless the form of the cotton culture is entirely changed. There is no likelihood that the large farms can be kept up in the South, any more than anywhere else, without the presence of a numerous proletariat, and this cannot be had permanently, even if it were desirable, in a country with a boundless quantity of waste land. Whatever be the merits of the large farms as regards production, they are not possible without a large and degraded and very dependent laboring class. The system has never been seen anywhere in perfection but in the South during slavery and in England, where the hind's condition is one of the scandals and reproaches of modern civilization; therefore, if cotton can only be raised in large quantities on large plantations by hired labor, it is safe to say that no very vast increase can be looked for at the South. Neither the negro nor the white man will sacrifice himself that mankind may be clothed cheaply or the South retain the monopoly. Both one and the other will always raise corn or potatoes, or steal hogs, or run errands, or brush boots, or even loaf in the towns, sooner than fish or hoe in the fields, if he finds the life is easier. The letters before us supply some very interesting details as to the possibility of cotton culture on small farms, showing that the climate presents no real difficulties in the way of white settlers, and that the profits of careful cotton culture are enormous. The only objection which presents even apparent importance is the cost of the ginning machinery; but there is no more reason why a man should gin his own cotton than grind his own corn; and there is every reason to suppose we shall yet see ginning and packing carried on as a separate business at the South, just as corn or wheat grinding is in other countries.

The testimony of the letters as to the way in which the negroes are now working is very varied; the preponderance of it is, however, unfavorable. They describe negro labor at present as uncertain, whether paid in shares or in cash, and as very much less productive than in slavery; but there is nothing to show that it is more uncertain than white labor is, wherever the demand for labor is brisk; or that it can be fairly charged with unproductiveness except when compared with slave labor. There seems to be no doubt that more bales to the hand were produced in slavery than will ever be produced by the hired laborer in freedom; but then we cannot get at the comparative advantages of the two systems without calculating what a bale costs the producer under each system; and here it is that the scale turns in favor of freedom. The free laborer takes charge of his own person and the persons of his family, and his future and the future of his children, which to the slave-owner were a formidable source of expense.

The continued dependence of the South on the Northwest for provisions, and especially pork, the letters ascribe to the thieving propensities of the blacks, whom they describe as having a perfect passion for hog-hunting, chicken-stealing, and so forth—a weakness which many of the writers connect in a mysterious manner with the Reconstruction policy of Congress, and which some seem to think would be cured by the establishment of a despotic form of government. But here again the remedy is only to be looked for from social training. Nothing teaches men to respect property so well as the possession of it; and it is too short a time since the negroes were themselves the victims of wholesale theft for them to have acquired very clear notions touching the sanctity of other people's possessions.

The majority of the letter-writers, besides charging them with thievishness, deny them the possession of accumulating power; or, if they admit their possession of it, speak slightingly of it; but the fact that the diversity of negro wants in a state of freedom is making the South a better market for all kinds of manufactured goods than it has ever been before, is a more reliable indication of the condition of the blacks as regards this point than any amount of direct testimony. Mr. Olmsted speaks in one of his volumes of a whole county in Mississippi, if we remember rightly, in which there was not a single store; such a state of things can never be seen again, it is safe to say.

The testimony as to the comparative merits of the two systems of working plantations on shares and working for wages, seems to be that negroes work more steadily and less wastefully, and with less superintendence, when working on shares, and are in greater dread of being discharged; but, on the other hand, they will not under this system do much, if anything, in the way of repairing fences and buildings, or draining, inasmuch as this will not affect the coming crop; and consequently the farm may run down greatly, while the crop is receiving good care. When in receipt of wages simply, the tendency to idle is of course strong, and so is the tendency to sudden desertion. On the whole, the impression left on the mind by the pamphlet is that the negro is uncommonly like the ignorant and untutored Caucasian. For abhorrence of hard labor, his only match on this side of the water is his white neighbor. His tendency to drift to the towns is shared in the fullest degree by the Irish and French; and the negro woman's love of finery and objection to large families, as well as her manner of showing them, is found in quarters to which we are too bashful to "allude more particularly," as the reporters say.

A PLEA FOR THE INDIVIDUAL MAN.—HIS DRINK.

The individual man undoubtedly plays a more important part in modern times than he ever played before. His wants, wishes, and tastes exercise a great and growing influence on legislation and on manners. We let him dress, eat, and sleep almost exactly as he likes. Instead of bullying him into civility, we let him be as unmannerly as he pleases; instead of marrying him for life, we let him marry as many times as suits him. We throw open all professions to him, almost leaving it to himself to decide whether he is fit for them or not. We encourage him in doing as he pleases, and resolutely refuse to criticise what he is pleased to do. All the forces of modern society, seen from one point of view, seem to work for his emancipation from all sorts of restriction—those of authority and custom especially. We are, indeed, getting apparently more and more reluctant to ask him even to submit himself to the ordinary laws of morality. It sometimes seems as if lying, cheating, and stealing might before long be relegated to the category of pardonable "personal peculiarities." And it is this faith in his capacity to work out his own salvation which is in reality the distinctive characteristic of modern progress, and which supports and consoles those who are amazed by the crash of falling thrones and altars, of creeds, systems, and rules. It is not, we now believe, in the state that the seeds of growth lie, but in each member of the state; and the state is best served by giving each member plenty of room, and letting him choose his work.

One meets, however, now and then, in spite of the general leaning to freedom, and general growth of freedom, some curious displays of want of confidence not only in the individual man's goodness, but in his common sense, and in his ability to take care either of his mind, body, or estate; and one finds them in our day, strange to say, oftenest amongst the fiercest enemies of the past—that is, amongst the moral and social reformers. Take for one illustration of what we mean—and perhaps the most striking one—the prohibitory movement in Massachusetts and elsewhere. Here we see a large body of excellent people laboring with might and main not only to have the sale of intoxicating drinks prevented by law, and indulging in the foulest and most ribald abuse of all who deny that the sale of intoxicating drinks can or ought to be prevented by law. They say that individuals cannot be trusted to decide on the quantity of alcohol they will consume; that, in order to put an end to the evils growing out of the abuse of it, the state must step in and stop the use of it by penal enactments—or, in other words, take charge of the morals of the individual, even in the matter of personal habits; that all talk of the efficacy of moral suasion or of confidence in the general progress of society is mere trash, and anybody who indulges in it is a villain, and merits, and will probably receive, eternal damnation.

Now the question which most readily suggests itself to any intelligent person who reads the speeches at a prohibitory convention is, how did there come to be prohibitionists at all? How is it that there is in every State a large body, and in some States a preponderating body, of persons who advocate prohibition; and a larger body who never use intoxicating drinks themselves and never offer them to their friends, and consider all resort to them sinful and injurious; and a still larger body still who rigidly confine themselves to the moderate use of them? There were neither temperance men nor prohibitionists in this or any other country fifty years ago. At that period everybody drank; a great number of very respectable people drank to excess. Liquors stood on every sideboard and in every closet, and gross indulgence in them was hardly considered shameful. To what do we owe the immense change which has since taken place? How is it that most men are now temperate, and that a very large portion of the community consider drinking one of the foulest of vices? There has been no special revelation on the subject. Whatever testimony the Bible bears against strong drink was as clear and emphatic in the year 1700 as in the year 1869. Whatever reason there may have been for thinking that the wine used at the wedding in Cana of Galilee was unfermented, was as potent then as now. The change has not been brought about by legislation either. There have been no acts passed anywhere for the prevention of drunkenness by the removal of liquors; drunkenness, it is true, has been punished more severely of late than it used to be, but this is because public opinion has visited it with severer reprobation.

But what bred this public opinion? To what agency do we owe the existence of this vast band of infuriated and implacable prohibitionists—this vaster band of quiet teetotallers—and still vaster band of strictly moderate drinkers, to all of whom drunkenness in every degree is a revolting offence against morals and decency? Why, we owe it to the very agency which the prohibitionists most loudly deride and ridicule, namely, to the reason of the individual man working on the facts of life. The whole teetotal camp is filled with the results of moral suasion. The ferocious Dr. Miner himself is one of its products—not a very admirable one, we admit, but still a product. He was not legislated into his beliefs or dragged into them by the State Constable. He was not told by an angel in a vision to hate alcohol; whatever light he has on the temperance question, like his light on all other subjects, came to him through his understanding or whatever it is that produces his opinions for him. The agitation in which he is engaged; the influence he and his colleagues exercise on the public mind; the prohibitory law itself, whether it be well or ill executed, are due to the play of individual consciousness on the various phenomena of society—to the fact that individuals have a moral sense and use it; that they on the whole love order and decency and pursue them; have an interest in their neighbors' welfare as well as in their own; and are conscious of their responsibilities in this life and in the life to come. Whatever is hopeful in public sentiment on the subject of intemperance or of any other social evil is, in short, due to the force in human affairs which prohibitionists ask us to trust no longer—the force which has carried the world out of barbarism into civilization, out of darkness into light—which has produced the greatest empires and profoundest philosophies and most enduring codes—namely, the action of individual minds influenced by or influencing other minds through arguments, sympathy, and example. We do not mean to say that all reformatory work should be left to public opinion, and that legislation can never exercise an educational influence, but we do mean to call attention to the absurdity—and worse—of blackguarding people who are disposed to rely wholly or mainly on the individual man's capacity for self-discipline for further advances in the matter of temperance—this being the very field of all in which that capacity has produced the most striking results.

HIS FOOD AND CLOTHING.

Another illustration of the same distrust of him is to be found in the state of excitement into which some economists and social philosophers work themselves every year when they see the year's customs returns, over our "importations of luxuries" and our consequent "foreign indebtedness." To read what they say on this point, one might fairly conclude that the individual man was as incompetent to buy his clothes and furniture as to regulate his allowance of intoxicating drinks, and that every citizen ought to be attended by a receiver appointed by Government to superintend his expenditure of his income. The account of our imports and exports during the past year has just been rendered by the Bureau of Statistics, and it shows as usual a considerable balance against us; that is, we have received goods to a greater amount than we have sent goods out—the difference being paid either in gold or in bonds or other evidences of debt, on which we pay interest. Over this difference a certain class of economists every year raise a most dismal howl, and say we are running so heavily in debt to foreigners that we shall be ruined unless we retrench. We notice, however, that this year there is a slight modification in their tone. They begin to admit that to give bonds or mortgages to foreigners in order to secure money to make railroads or canals or work mines is, after all, not such an idiotic performance, even though we have to pay interest on them regularly—a feature in the transaction which is always spoken of as something of peculiar hardship and atrocity—and for two reasons. One is, that money invested here makes more than the interest paid to foreign lenders, and the difference is therefore one of clear profit to this country, no matter where the money comes from; the other is, that even if a railroad or canal or mine or other work does not pay, the foreigner who has money in it has absolutely no remedy. He can foreclose his mortgage, but he cannot carry off the thing mortgaged, or, if he does sell the pledge, he has to sell it at a low rate to Americans, who thus gain on the transaction more than ever. Most of the lamentation over foreign indebtedness is, indeed, due to a kind of vague belief either that foreign investments made here do not pay ordinary interest on the amount, or that, if the foreigners are not satisfied with the investment, they may any day come over, roll up the road or the mine or canal, pack it into the hold of a ship, and carry it off. The fact is, the material security foreigners hold for their investments is almost worthless apart from the good faith of the American people.

But on the subject of our large importations of foreign luxuries, these economists are as inconsolable as ever; and when they see, or think they see, that the goods are paid for in bonds, like the Emir in the "Arabian Nights," they "weep till they become insensible." Nevertheless, as regards this matter of importing "silks, laces, Brussels carpets, Paris furniture, and multifarious gauds," as well as in the manner of paying for them, the average individual American may be fairly depended on to do what is best. We have only to follow the matter out into its details, indeed, to see how foolish the alarm is. The silks, carpets, laces, and champagne set down in such immense quantities in the custom-house receipts are in reality, of course, ordered by great dealers; but they are ordered for sale to individuals. The silk is all sold in single dresses, and the lace in trimings and shawls, to individual women; the carpets are used to carpet the houses of individuals; the champagne is disposed of to individual men, to be drunk bottle by bottle at dinner-tables. The dealers do not bring all these things over for their own use; they bring them for their customers; and they regulate the amount they order by the amount which experience has taught them their customers are likely to require in the course of a year. So that, when we sift the matter, we find the commodities which so terrify us are simply the purchases of a great number of different families, brought over together for convenience, and distributed afterwards here. If, therefore, we are importing too much of these luxuries during a series of years, it must be that the people who buy silks and wines among us are living beyond their income, and enjoying indulgences they have not the means of paying for—a supposition simply ridiculous. Many persons, doubtless, live beyond their incomes; but the mass of this as of every other community live within them. When we see a woman buying a silk dress, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred she has the money to pay for it, and pays it down; when we see a man ordering a basket of champagne, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred he can afford it; he has got a surplus which he feels at liberty to lay out in that way. We may say the same thing of persons whom we see buying carpets for their houses. The writers who make the uproar about foreign luxuries would think us insane if we proposed to have the Government stop all these purchasers at the entrance of the stores, and examine them as to the condition of their affairs, and not allow them to buy till they had proved their solvency; and yet, if there be any truth in much that we read on this subject, this is what ought to be done.

Now, the individual buyers having paid the dealers for their luxuries, the dealer proceeds to pay his foreign correspondent; and the transaction then for the first time meets the public eye, and furnishes the basis on which the speculations on which we are commenting are built up. If he sends over the cash he has received from his customers, after having pocketed his own profit, he hears all round him wails and lamentations over "the drain of gold" from the country, although, as he well knows, it is simply money which the people who owned it can spare, and have spent in gratification of perfectly legitimate tastes. If, however, he and the banker with whom he deals come to the conclusion that if, instead of sending cash, he buys bonds in the New York market, and sends them for sale in the London or Hamburg market, he will not only pay his debt, but make a profit on the bonds, and he accordingly makes his remittance in bonds, he hears louder yells than ever over the alarming increase of our "foreign indebtedness." If he asks what the matter is, he is told that the interest on these bonds will amount to so much, and will have to be "sent out of the country" to aliens every year. "But what difference does it make," he will enquire, "whether I keep the bonds myself, draw the interest, and send it over in payment of my debts, or sell them to my creditor at a good price, and let him draw the interest?" to which the only reply will be more wails and lamentations and increased production of editorials on "foreign indebtedness."

We pointed out a few days ago one way, and the only way, in which what is by a sort of fiction called our "foreign indebtedness" may inconvenience us. A sudden outburst of folly amongst our "War-horses," threatening us with a foreign war at a moment when neither our purse nor our morale was ready for it, might send back on us suddenly a large amount of our bonds and other securities held abroad; but they would not be brought back by angry and frightened creditors. They would be brought back, like any other commodity, by owners who wanted to sell them in our market, and the way they would affect us unpleasantly would be in lowering the value in the market of similar securities held by ourselves, and thus plunging us in a financial crisis. No foreigner would come to demand payment of us of anything whatever. Nobody here owes any foreigners for silks, laces, champagne, or other luxuries, except the regular importers, and they only owe on their current accounts, and settle at the ordinary trade intervals. No foreign manufacturer gives indefinite credits to Americans or anybody else for luxuries, and we import none that are not paid for in ready cash, or in something which we purchase with cash, and send abroad instead of it, as being more profitable to export than cash. In fact, the whole outcry about "foreign luxuries" is due to a queer notion, that we issue bonds to pay for luxuries. We do nothing of the kind. We issue them to pay for great public improvements, and we sometimes transfer them to foreigners, when we find we can make a better use of cash than sending it abroad.

Foreign indebtedness is, doubtless, somewhat of a burden, inasmuch as it makes our market liable to be inundated inopportunely with securities by persons who do not know the country, and, therefore, cannot tell what importance to attach to bunkum speeches and resolutions; but this is a burden inseparable from rapid growth. We could do without foreign capital; but if we did, we should have to diminish the rapidity of our material growth by one-half. So, also, the United States could have done without foreign immigration. From a moral and social and political point of view, it has undoubtedly been an evil; but there are two overwhelming reasons for submitting to it: one, that it could not be kept out; the other, that without it the nation would be a great deal poorer, weaker, and more dependent than it is with it.

THE BYRON HORROR.

It is said that all secrets come to light at last. The Iron Mask may yet drop from the phantom face of the victim of Louis XIV., and Junius may issue forth into the light from beneath the shadow of the great name under which he has lurked for a century. The time has come when the secret of the separation between Lord and Lady Byron has been given up to the world. And what a secret! The raising of the veil of Mokanna revealed a less revolting spectacle to his expectant hosts. And how marvellously was the secret kept! More than fifty years it had perplexed the curious world, and no hint of it had ever got into print until Mrs. Stowe gave it to the Atlantic Monthly. Whether the truth should not have been for ever buried in darkness is a question which will be discussed and pronounced upon according to the different points of view and the different ways of looking at things of the disputants.

There can be no doubt of the sincerity of Mrs. Stowe's purpose to justify Lady Byron before mankind, nor of her belief that she has effectually done so; but we are compelled to say that she has made a fearful mistake, if the facts she tells are indeed as she states them. That we have some reason to think that this is not the case we shall presently explain, though without any imputation on Mrs. Stowe's truthfulness of intention. But if the story be as she relates it, it would have been better if it had slumbered for ever in darkness, and been an enigma to the end of time. As it seems to us, Mrs. Stowe's narrative places Lady Byron in a position only less revolting than that of her husband and his incestuous paramour—in the position, to wit, of an accessory after and during the fact to their hideous guilt. Her expression is somewhat clumsy; but, as we understand her, Mrs. Stowe means to say that after Lady Byron was fully informed of the incestuous relations existing between Byron and his sister, "she would neither leave her husband nor betray him," and this during "two years of convulsive struggle!" That is to say, Lady Byron continued to live with her husband as his wife for two years after knowing of his incestuous intrigue; and, of course, in relations of friendly intercourse before the world with his detestable paramour! We believe this to have been impossible. No woman, not herself infamous, could have done such a thing. But that Lady Byron, who impressed every one who approached her as being all purity and goodness—whose character and appearance Mrs. Stowe herself so describes—that she could have been guilty of condoning such a crime for two years, is about as near an impossibility on its face as we can easily conceive of. If there be no error in the revelations made by Mrs. Stowe, she has done—unintentionally, of course—what will send her friend's name down to posterity covered with disgrace and ridicule—disgrace for having condoned this infamy for so long a time, and ridicule for having done so in the hope of converting her husband—and Byron of all men!—from the error of his ways! But we think that it will be found that Mrs. Stowe must have mistaken or misremembered some of Lady Byron's statements; and, in her desire to make as striking a picture as she could of her friend's sufferings during her marriage, overlooked the influences so damaging to her memory which the world would draw from the story as it stands.

And we have these reasons for thinking so. In the first place, part of Mrs. Stowe's statement of the case is manifestly impossible. Lady Byron could not have had "two years of convulsive struggle" with this horror unless we suppose that Byron told her of it six months before he was engaged to her. The separation took place in the middle of January, 1816, and the engagement was entered into in the middle of September, 1814 — only sixteen months before. The marriage was performed—we can hardly say solemnized or celebrated—on the 2d of January, 1815. Ada was born on the 10th of the next December following, and Lady Byron left her husband, never to return, in the middle of January, as we have just said. Their married life, therefore, covered but a few days more than one year, to which Lady Byron's sufferings from this cause must have been limited, supposing that Byron made the communication on the marriage-day. This, however, does not go to the bottom of the matter; for a day's condonation of such a crime would be, in the eye of the law and of common sense, a guilty consenting to it. But there is another version of the story which, while it does not change the central infamy, is most honorable to Lady Byron's character and memory, and which we feel sure will be ultimately established as the true one. We were told the main facts of this history something more than ten years ago, and this was how it was told to us: At whatever time the incestuous connection between Byron and his sister may have begun, Lady Byron knew nothing of it, as we heard the story, until after the birth of her child. Some time after that event, probably about the beginning of January, 1816, Byron told her of the intrigue, saying that he had never loved any other woman than the partner of his guilt. She, naturally, supposed it to be a delusion of insanity; and it was under this impression that she consulted Doctor Baillie about him, which is one of his main charges against her in his letters and in "Don Juan." It was while under this belief that she wrote the playful letter to Byron, after leaving him, which is also one of the counts in the indictment against her. After reaching Kirkby Mallory, her father's house, she had certain proofs of the truth of what her husband had told her, from which time she left him for ever.

Now, we do not affirm that this version of the story is absolutely authentic. We tell it as it was told to us; but most certainly it is inherently more probable than the one given by Mrs. Stowe. It is a key to the whole mystery, and the solution is greatly honorable to Lady Byron. It accounts for her silence as to the cause of the separation. Her lips were sealed as long as Mrs. Leigh lived. It accounts for her consultation with Dr. Baillie, and for her letter after leaving Byron, and before knowing that a separation was inevitable. It accounts, too, for Dr. Lushington's statements confirming her own, saying that "a reconciliation was impossible," and that "if such an idea should be entertained he could not, professionally or otherwise, take any part towards effecting it." Of course he could not, as a man of honor. It may be doubted, however, whether he would have considered it as impossible, though equally he could have taken no part in it, if he had been told by Lady Byron that she had continued to live with her husband as his wife for months, weeks, or a single day after knowing his guilt. We are not sure if Dr. Lushington is still alive; we believe he is not long since dead; but we trust that, if he is living, he will now make a brief, clear, lawyer-like statement of the facts in the case, with which he is better acquainted as Lady Byron's counsel than any other person, such as will put this matter for ever at rest in the solid foundation of truth. Indeed, it is due to Byron, his wife, and to the public that everybody who can throw any light on the circumstances should now tell everything in relation to the affair that they know. And this burden rests with peculiar weight on Mrs. Stowe, who is responsible for the publication of the charge, and who is bound to produce the evidence which seemed to her a sufficient justification for making it. It is clear, from Mrs. Stowe's account, that Lady Byron intended that the facts should be known at a proper time. We know that it was not to Mrs. Stowe alone that she confided the accusation; but that, years before her death, one, at the very least, of her familiar acquaintances had been fully informed of it, and had thought herself at liberty to make talk about it, and not without mentioning Lady Byron as her authority. We wish Lady Byron could have entrusted its full revelation—if the revelation of it was absolutely necessary—to a more judicious hand than that which has now given it to the world. We at least hope that Mrs. Stowe's article will have the effect of bringing the whole truth authentically to light, which we are equally sure will exonerate Lady Byron from the faintest shadow of complicity with the hideous crime alleged against her husband.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF "THE NATIONAL GAME."

Cricket has, for some reason or other, always been a failure as an American game. Although various attempts, and very vigorous attempts too, have been made to naturalize it, they have all broken down, and i cannot be said by any one whose enthusiasm has not perverted his sense of truth that cricket is to-day one whit more in favor with the ball-playing public than it was thirty years ago. Notwithstanding the fact that New York and Philadelphia and Boston all encourage the game, and that the first of the three can boast of the St. George's Club, it still remains true that the sport is watched by most American crowds with suspicion and dislike, as an imported invention not suited to the peculiar institutions of the country, while the enthusiasm called out by a match-game of base-ball has been for some years steadily on the increase, year by year throwing the rival amusement more into the shade. This general fact, we take it, is not open to dispute; but what is the explanation of it? After sighing for generations that Providence should vouchsafe us a "truly American" literature, and "truly American" architecture, and "truly American" schools of painting and music, Providence, it appears, at length answers us (with the usual Providential derision of lofty aspirations) with a truly American game of ball. Let us not repine at the decree of fate, but examine with a cheerful spirit the peculiar traits of the game which, from Maine to the Gulf of Mexico, and from Key West to the extremest point of Alaska, is dignified by the name of "National." Let us say, by the way, that it is by no means an insignificant fact that the recent riot in Charleston should have been caused, not by the entry of a Savannah cricket club into the city, but by that of a base-ball club. In such slight things there is a meaning. Had it been a cricket club, none would have cared enough about the matter to turn out, and so there would have been no mob, and so there could have been no riot. But it was a base-ball club; the throng was immense; the riot ensued; and thus did a little game of ball affect the great game Reconstruction. But let that pass; we revert to our theme.

The game of cricket being an English game, and the base-ball being American, we should expect to find in the national differences of character an explanation of the differences in the two national amusements. And we should expect this all the more because the basis of both games is the same. Both games rest, first, upon the desire of the Anglo-Saxon—(we do not say Caucasian, or Aryan, because we like to be exact)—upon the desire of the Anglo-Saxon to arm himself with a stick and drive a small round body with it; and, secondly, upon the desire of any other Anglo-Saxon who happens to be in the way to stop this body, deprive the other of his stick, and "bat" himself. In these fundamental instincts may be clearly seen the germs of the two games of cricket and base-ball. Let there be, instead of two men, two sides, one of which has the bat, while the other's function is to stop the ball, and let the rude violence of nature be restrained and regulated by law, and you have at once a game of ball. As the methods of striking and stopping, or "batting" and "fielding," vary, you obtain now cricket, now base-ball. It is the fundamental similarity of the two games, then, which enables us to say that their superficial differences are the result of national differences of character. If the difference between the favorite amusement of English and American boys were something intrinsic, the case would be changed. Suppose that English boys found their highest amusement in surf-swimming, like the boys of the Sandwich Islands, while the sport most keenly enjoyed by American boys was vivisection—it would certainly be difficult to say how far such wide differences could be accounted for by analysis of national tendencies. But in the actual case, the generative principle of both games being the same, the investigator is confident at once that the explanation of what diversity exists must be found in the diversity of the character of the two nations.

Now, in two points at least, it may be said with certainty that the American character differs from the English—in being less brutal, and in being more fond of novelty, of change, of the excitement which novelty and change produce. And to any one who carefully watches the two national games, it becomes evident that they also differ in the same way—cricket being the more brutally dangerous, and also affording the least excitement of the two. The first point will probably be readily granted, inasmuch as it is obvious that the much greater solidity and hardness of the ball used in the English game greatly increase the chances of danger; it is, in fact, no uncommon thing for cricket-players to have their limbs broken; and in order to guard against this a system of pads has been invented, which affords the spectacle of the nearest approach to a suit of mail that any modern nation has made. Even with these guards against him, an experienced bowler can easily break the teeth, or ankle, or wrist of the man at the bat; not that we mean to accuse the lovers of the sport of any such nefarious desire, but merely to point out the incidental dangers to which the cricket-player lays himself open. These dangers the English like, and to the English mind they give a gusto to the game for which they would otherwise hardly know where to look. To the American, on the other hand, the spectacle of suffering of any kind is distasteful, and hence the first change in the game. The ball is made soft. The ball once rendered harmless, bowling along the ground, as in cricket, becomes impossible, and batting in the air becomes a necessity. We have already the rudiments of quite a different thing from the game of cricket.

The next step is to obtain excitement. Cricket is essentially a slow game, a game without chance, a game of science. Each side consists of eleven men, and before the sides change ten individuals must be "bowled," "stumped," "caught," or "run" out. In addition to this, each side goes to the bat twice, and thus the game is always long, and sometimes even tedious; it is no uncommon thing for it to occupy parts of two days. We might be sure that Americans would never learn to play at a game like this; and accordingly we find that, just as we have substituted for the meditative and slow game of whist the exciting and rapid euchre, so in outdoor sports steadfast persistence has given way to dash and movement. The "side" in base-ball is already reduced to nine in number, though that is of small consequence; the principal change is that putting out three men puts out the whole side, which gives an opportunity for nine innings instead of two, and an amount of variety in the chances at different stages of the game that the steady-going cricketer has no conception of. To explain what we mean, let us go more into detail: Suppose that a game of cricket is to be played between the St. George's Club and the All-England Eleven, and that the latter have the first innings. The St. George's men distribute themselves over the field, while A and B of the other eleven go to the bat. The St. George's bowler does his best; the St. George's wicket-keeper does his best; the St. George's fielders do their best; and between them they manage in the course of half an hour to get A out. In comes C, and the process is repeated; out goes C, and in comes D, and so on through E, F, G, and all the rest of the eleven. In base-ball, this is all different: As soon as A is out, the "outside" knows that by getting B and C out their turn will come. B and C are put out, and the whole nine is out—those that have not struck a blow as well as those who have. And in order to make this process quicker, it is required that the striker should run as soon as he has hit the ball, and thus stand his chance of being put out on the bases. In cricket this is not the rule, and in the case we have supposed, A and B might go on striking the ball to all eternity without running, if they please. Of course it is for their interest to run in order that their side may score, but their not being obliged to do so makes the game much longer than it otherwise would be.

Such are the changes which have been introduced into the game of cricket, or rather the game of ball, by American players, and the alterations are, as we believe, of a truly national character. We do not believe that cricket will ever be naturalized here, but that its rival is destined for evermore to be the national game. To those who would object to our explanation that it is fanciful, we can only say that we believe it violates none of the known laws of reasoning, and that it certainly answers the great end of accounting for the facts. To those other objectors who would contend that our explanation supposes a gradual modification of the English into the American game, while it is a matter of common learning that the latter is of no foreign origin but the lineal descent of that favorite of boyhood, "Two-Old-Cat," we would say that, fully agreeing with them as to the historical fact, we have always believed it to be so clear as not to need further evidence, and that for the purposes of this article the history of the matter is out of place. We have throughout spoken of cricket as "changing" into base-ball, not because we suppose these words represent the actual origin of the latter, but to bring more vividly before the mind the differences between the two. He would indeed be an unfaithful chronicler who should attempt to question the hoary antiquity of "Two-Old-Cat," or the parental relation in which it stands to base-ball.

ENGLAND.

August 3, 1869.

Before dismissing finally the subject of the Irish Church, it is, perhaps, worth while to make a few remarks on the results of the conflict by which it has been overthrown. I would especially notice one point, to which I have frequently referred in previous letters, and which to me at least seems to be very characteristic. I speak of the singular absence of anything like strong feeling in the minds of the English people. Newspapers have occasionally uttered as brave words as you shall hear in a summer's day. Orators have waxed warm at public meetings. Mr. Gladstone, I do not doubt, believes that he has accomplished a gigantic task, and written his name imperishably on the annals of his country. But I venture to say that from the beginning to the end of the struggle the British Lion has been remarkably drowsy; through all the blowing of trumpets, and flourishing of banners, and letting off of fireworks, he has preserved a stolid calm, and really wished that the business were well over. The abolition of the Irish Church had somehow got itself inscribed at the top of the Liberal programme, and had to be settled before we could proceed to other business. We have done it, and are truly thankful for this, amongst other mercies; but it is impossible to say that the nation has been deeply stirred about it, or that there is any special cause of triumph in our having at last done something which ought to have been done half a century ago. Two or three causes may be assigned in partial explanation of this comparative lukewarmness of feeling. In the first place, few subjects will bear talking about for two years consecutively, especially by Irish orators. In the next place, the battle was really decided last November, and Parliament has been merely carrying into execution the clearly expressed will of the people. A little more or a little less left to the Church mattered a good deal to a few clergymen and curates, but could excite little interest in the people at large. Thirdly, though we were doing an act of justice, and doing it from motives of justice—for which, I think, we deserve some little credit—we were doing it rather against the grain. John Bull doesn't like a Papist; and to speak more generally, an alliance between Liberals and Catholics will always be a very half-hearted alliance. We will take away your grievance, was the general tone of feeling, but we don't by any means do it out of love to you. For this little matter we can act in harmony; but once get it out of the way, and then—you shall see. But, besides these causes of indifference, there is another and a very much deeper cause. To say the truth, there is something lamentable about the spectacle we have been witnessing. The Irish Church was a grievance. For two generations at least no reasonable statesman, not brought up in the very thick of English prejudices, could have defended it for a moment. Mr. Gladstone is a man of genius; so is Mr. Bright; and the Cabinet, of unusual ability, has at its back a Liberal majority of overwhelming strength. Now this great majority, with these first-rate leaders, have spent nearly their whole time and energy for many months past in doing nothing but getting rid of one gross abuse. It ought to have fallen at the very sound of their trumpet; it has, in fact, been the one object of a long and doggedly contested campaign. The victory, too, however desirable it might be, was not one calculated to bring any immediate or conspicuous result. Irish orators will have one topic the less, and there will be rather less show of reason in denouncing English rule. But the monster evil remains unchecked and unaffected. Ireland will be as miserable as before; its population will continue to diminish; and, in counting up the fruits of their victory, the most sanguine Liberals are only able to say that probably in time we shall be able to stimulate a better feeling between the countries; whilst even they will admit that the Protestant part of the country will probably be less loyal than before. All this time matters are waiting for determination which are of the very deepest importance to the country, and which impatiently demand the interference of Parliament. When, one cannot help asking, shall we get to the end of knocking down old restrictions and begin some process of reconstruction? By slow degrees, inconceivably slow they seem to be sometimes, we are putting men of all creeds on a level. One or two restrictions still remain at the universities and elsewhere, and there is the whole question of the English Established Church; but we may be said to have arrived at free-trade in religion as in commerce, or to be clearly on the road to it. Meanwhile, statesmanship might surely be shown in something better than the removal of the obsolete machinery; the attention of the country might be called to some loftier objects. We want, for example, a new system of education, from the very highest to the very lowest classes; from universities to ragged-schools, every class is crying out for improvement, and the ignorance of large masses is telling against us even in a commercial point of view. Then, again, the poor-law is at present so far from fulfilling its purpose that it produces constant ill-will between classes, and increases instead of diminishing that vast mass of pauperism which presses on our resources. The law requires systematic improvement in every direction; the army requires reconstruction; the church will have to be dealt with; and there is that great question of land-laws, which sooner or later must come to the front. With all these and many minor questions hanging over us, it is vexatious to see the whole energy of our legislature and our ablest statesmen employed in upsetting one obsolete institution, whose fall will probably produce no very sensible effect for years to come.

The real interest which has been felt is more in the indications of the future course of events than in the matter actually at issue. What will be the first great question to stir men's mind's, and what will be the rival forces? Are there symptoms of the approach of a revolutionary period, or are we likely to be dawdling on for some time longer, spreading our reform over years? Is democracy going to burst upon us like a deluge, or will the good old British prejudices last through a few more years of slow wear and tear? The answer to these and many other questions would lead me far beyond any permissible limits, even if I possessed it. I will content myself for the present with mentioning one or two points which appear to me to be tolerably clear. The House of Lords has not for many years been a very important assembly, but it has attracted an amount of public attention during this session which is rather remarkable. Conservatives say—and with some truth—that it has distinguished itself by debates fully equal in excellence to those of the lower house. It may be so; but that is a matter of little importance. The fact which has been more clearly established than ever, is the fact that in any serious question the House of Lords will not fight. Given a House of Commons elected by household suffrage, and pledged to decide some question which really stirs the feelings of the householders, and the House of Lords will not dare even to make a show of fighting. The various attempts which have been made to reform some parts in its constitution indicate the sense of weakness, which they are very inadequate to remedy.

What, then, will be the most likely question to bring on a very serious struggle? For an answer to this, I would refer you to Mr. Beresford Hope's exceedingly naïve remark the other night, that landholding was become a luxury of the rich, and a part of the ars vivendi of a highly civilized country. In other words, it is a result of our high civilization that the land of England is in the future to be in the hands of a small body of very rich men, who are to take it for purposes of game-preserving, and to maintain an ornamental peasantry to fall down before the squire and the parson. If the English people once understands that the view so pithily expressed is the serious and settled opinion of the English landholder, the landholder will be invited to consider certain proposals which, as we may judge from the precedent of the Irish Church, it will be hopeless to meet by any cries of confiscation and sacrilege. He will be taught who is his master. Few English gentlemen would fall in with Mr. Beresford Hope's theory in so many words; but the battle of the future will be between the spirit of which it is an embodiment, and the modern ideas with which it conflicts. The House of Lords will be a weak tower of defence. If we ask whether that conflict will break out soon, and what will be the pretext for its commencement, I can only say that I am no prophet, I do not think, however, that there are any symptoms of an immediate outbreak. I hope that before such questions arise our statesmen will have begun to put our house in order, and will have seriously grappled with the great problems at which I have hinted. I fully believe that they are disposed to do so; and that Mr. Gladstone and his colleagues are as anxious as men can be to do some real work in the ensuing session. The immediate difficulty is in the many divisions of the Liberal party, now that the question upon which they were all united has been removed. Thus, in the educational and other questions, we have the division between the laissez-faire Whigs and the more active modern school of politicians who renounce that doctrine. Mr. Lowe, for example, holds that the state should do nothing: and Mr. Forster holds that it should interfere with great energy. We shall have a struggle in which the old watchwords of self-government and bureaucracy will play a considerable part; and though I believe personally that our changes will be chiefly in the direction of centralization, there is a large and influential party on the other side. A real democratic agitation which would open up the great questions of the land and the church would, for the time, put these matters out of sight; but I confess that I do not believe matters to be ripe for such an agitation at the present moment.

FRANCE.

PARIS, August 6, 1869.

WHAT I took occasion to remark to you in the very beginning of this crisis is duly showing itself to be more threatening—namely, that the Emperor's own tendencies are of a nature that go far further onward than do those of his ministers or other advisers, and that they take a totally different direction. The Emperor strongly and instinctively dislikes political reforms and political liberties which put a control over his actions into the hands of educated and responsible men; but he has no objection whatever to socialistic theories, no matter how avancés, so that he himself preserves a right of initiative, or, in other words, of dictature. This it is which frightens even those venerable invalides of the Empire, the senators; this it is which induces them to lend a hand toward the fashioning of a political reform which may save them from something worse.

In the meanwhile, these "potent, grave, and reverend seigniors" are of opinion that the Emperor has bid adieu to his senses; and their discontent and annoyance are positively comical. If you set aside the question of expediency—as in this case, where these aged worthies are accepting liberty as expedient—you will find the love of freedom to be in France, nine times out of ten, a question of years. The young respect and love freedom; the old dislike it, and put a bitterness into their animosity which you rarely see anywhere out of this country.

"If there is a thing more odious and more contemptible than all others, it is a young Bonapartist," said poor Montalembert, some ten years ago, when he began the unsparing war upon Imperial despotism which he has carried on till this day, and which has, during the last few years, raised up so many brave recruits. And when Montalembert uttered those words, there actually were some "young" Imperialists—men of between twenty and five-and-twenty, who, prematurely old in spirit, and preternaturally timid in their opinions, were not ashamed to prate about "order" and the "salvation of society." But these have long since ceased their cackling, and left the panegyrics of the policy of compression to sabre-trailers and old women. Young men in France, for the last six or eight years, have been growing more and more manful, consequently more and more hostile to the régime under which they were governed. The Mexican Expedition ruined any hope the Empire might ever have conceived of finding support among young Frenchmen. It being now impossible for Napoleon III. either to employ war as a "derivative," or to refuse the home liberties which France will have, the next modification we shall witness is a most interesting and quite gradual one—so gradual as to be almost insensible. We shall witness the various and inevitable modifications of manners, habits, customs—modes of life and modes of thought.

Something is done already, and a vast deal is in process of doing every day. Education, moral and physical; the relationships to each other of the two sexes; the economy of domestic life; and the willingness or unwillingness to seek a livelihood abroad—these are some of the points on which modifications will and must become visible as time rolls on. If you want to mark how near to accepting what he still calls an "outlandish" theory a French man or woman may be, you must watch them as a "public" at a theatre when any novelty is set before them by a more than usually enterprising and innovating author. Don't forget that, before the Revolution of 1830 (not above forty years ago), it was impossible to make a French audience accept Shakespeare unadulterated. The great poet had to be "put into shape" and made "proper;" and Hamlet, for instance could not kill Polonius behind the tapestry in the Queen's chamber, nor the Moor strangle his wife on the stage.

Well, not very long since a little essay was made at the Gymnase in the form of a three-act play, entitled "Miss Suzanne," the reception whereof by the public marked an epoch in the manners and opinions of the French exceedingly curious to note by any person who is well acquainted with them. Miss Suzanne was no other than a young American girl whom sudden misfortune had obliged to become a governess on the Continent. Of course the hero married her in the end, and his whole family learned to love and admire her, and look up to her with the profoundest respect. But before this "consummation" was achieved, every prejudice of French education and opinion was shocked by the independence and apparent "fastness" of Miss Suzanne. It was "self-reliance" in its most unmitigated garb; self-assertion à outrance brought to bear upon conventionality and tradition, and conventionality and tradition went to the wall; and a French "public" was pretty generally agreed that, after all, a woman might make a good, honest wife and mother and yet be independent in her habits and mode of life; and even (!) be allowed to travel in a railway carriage alone without irretrievably losing her good name.

I hinted just now at another modification to French customs, consisting in the greater or less willingness to emigrate: this is the vital question of the future. In reality, your superiority over Europe, your freedom from the evils which are crushing the Old World, lies in the excess of space over population, whilst our "mortal ill" is the excess of population over space. The Anglo-Saxon races neutralize the evil by their readiness to emigrate, whilst one of the chief causes of distress in France is attributed by economists to the time-out-of-mind attachment of the Gaul to his one particular spot of earth. There he chooses to live and die. This is in some respects undoubtedly true, but not so absolutely so as political writers and statists imagine. There are provinces of France in which, through long years, the habit has been to emigrate. In Auvergne, for instance, the poorer classes have such a migratory disposition that they slip away from their native hills as quite little boys and try to earn a living for themselves away from home. The charcoal-dealers and water-carriers of Paris are all but invariably Auvergnats. But this is a most unhealthy state of things, for it is simply internal emigration, and constitutes plethora. Paris has, heaven knows, population enough, and what is needed is that Parisians should wander forth. That this may occur in the end, is possible among other modifications; and a little anecdote that has fallen under my own observation would tend to prove that improvement is coming on in that direction.

This spring the Comte de Beauvoir, a young man of 22, published a small volume, describing his travels around the world in company with the Duc de Penthièvre, son of the Prince de Joinville. He dwelt, especially, at great length upon his stay in Australia, and told of the way in which British and German immigrants had made their fortunes, by dint of courage, prudence, and tenacity. His book made really an extraordinary sensation, and two editions sold off in no time. But what was not the surprise and delight of the young author at receiving several times small deputations of workmen—those spare, pale, over-intelligent, muscleless children of the Paris suburbs—who came to ask of him how it would be possible for them and such as they were to get out to Melbourne or Sydney or any of the places he had written of, and what they could do when they got there?

But there is, in the shape of emigration, genuine transatlantic outwandering—a fact of which your readers have, perhaps, never heard. There is, in this stay-at-home land, an entire race of men who, in all ranks, practise emigration upon a most extensive scale: these are the inhabitants of the so-called Basque provinces; the countrymen of the greatest sovereign France ever had—of Henry IV. From Bayonne onward, eastward and southward, from the slopes of the Pyrenees to the shores of the ocean, there is scarcely to be found a family that has not its wanderer. Throughout Béarn, if you ask news of a young man who is missing, the answer is: "Over the seas"—gone to America. This is not your America, but the Spanish settlements: Buenos Ayres, Peru, Chili, Venezuela, and wherever the Spanish tongue is to be heard.

If you go toward the Lower Pyrenees, the word "American" is for ever meeting your ears. As you stroll through the long, lovely lanes or follow the snaky, fern-grown paths of the low hills inland, behind Biarritz or St. Jean de Luz, you are sure to find, to right and left, large dwellings rising up, massively built, very unpicturesque, but indicative, in many ways, of solid wealth in the owner. When you enquire who that owner is, the answer is almost always the same, "An American." If you ask your road, you will pretty surely be told, "Close to the American's house is such and such a turning." At first, you fancy that the beauty of the country, the salubrity of the climate, the vicinity of the sea, have attracted an unheard-of number of rich Americans, who have awarded themselves the luxury of a summer villa in the South of France. But when you ask the name of these proprietors, you will find out that they are all French: "Ce sont les Américains d'ici," will be the commentary of your guide. And so it is. These are simply emigrants, who have resolutely left their Pyrenean home, worked hard, made a fortune, and come back to France to live comfortably in their own native place. Railways, cables, telegraphs, and all communication by sea or land will increase the familiarity with the idea of emigration, and a great point will be gained. The French were, up to the moment of the coup d'état of '51, the Chinese of the West. Many things have altered them since the last eighteen years, and further alterations will take place in them now every year. The traditional Frenchman is fast dying out.

Correspondence.

WOMEN AND RELIGION.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: My attention has been lately directed to a striking fact pertaining to religious statistics, which has scarcely received the attention due to its singularity and importance. I refer to the great numerical disparity between the male and female members of Protestant churches—a disparity which merits the more serious concern because (in the popular thought) it has reflected more discredit on the religion which is declined than on the men who decline it.

It has been usual to explain this inequality by the hypothesis that women are naturally more religious than men. This theory has been kindly received, not merely by women, but by the sex which it defrauds of spiritual dignity; the disparaged party (with a cheerful sense of having had the best of the bargain) laying claim, as an offset, to a natural mental pre-eminence. There is, however, a class of persons who believe that both men and women were "created free and equal," and who ascribe the difference in their influence and dignity to primitive circumstances, whose effects have been unjustly perpetuated. Such persons, acknowledging the essential, and perhaps increasing, distinctions of sex, still maintain that, as civilization develops these distinctions, it also separates science, mechanics, art, politics, literature—every field of human activity—into subdivisions of labor, these subdivisions being increasingly fitted to the ever-diverging capacities of the sexes.

The class that holds such views considers any theory monstrous which denies to men a natural equality in that highest gift of God—a spiritual nature; it therefore refers their comparative religious apathy to some other cause than a native inaptitude for divine worship. The nature of this cause is as yet the unknown quantity in ecclesiastical proportion. Sometimes we are told that the temptations of men are greater than those of women, because their struggling and outdoor life peculiarly expose them to certain vices; but, on the other hand, it would be hard to conceive of any condition less favorable to that noble elevation and elation of the soul, of which religion is the natural food, than the life which most women are either forced or tempted to lead—a life replete with petty cares, social frivolities, dispiriting occupations, and vulgar aims—a life whose vices are indeed less gross than those of men, but whose tendencies are not less worldly. The temptations of Mohammedan women can originate only in their homes, yet they take but little interest in religion—not because their souls have no independent legal existence (for this oft-repeated statement is erroneous), but because the extreme degradation of their lives robs them of spirituality. Believing that these facts refute the theory against which they are cited, I venture to suggest another cause for the preponderance of females in our churches.

All conversions are effected through human means; and so close is the relation of these means to the end, that preachers of a given class make their converts in a corresponding class, and no other. Now, if we keep in view the fact that the sexes naturally influence and attract each other, we are easily led to the conclusion that (other things being equal) the sphere of a man's influence would be wider among women than among his own sex, and vice versa. If this inference be correct, it should not surprise us that since the work of evangelization has been committed to the care of men, the great mass of converts should be found in the opposite sex. Had we but a few women in our pulpits who possessed somewhat of that influence in religion which Hypatia enjoyed in philosophy, or Madame Roland in politics, we should soon exhibit more men in our pews.

Well! it may be said that female instruction is impracticable. Yet it was not so to Huldah or Deborah. Or, again, the objection may be urged that all souls are of equal value, and that the sex of the converts is of no importance. The sex of the converts, however, gives character to the religion. Women are at this moment governing the Protestant Church; they sustain it by the funds which their influence commands; they direct it by the preachers whom their suffrages elect—and the class of preachers that women, in their present state of culture, usually select and admire every virile mind has the misfortune to know. It is a class which, in concert with its female allies, has given to religion that effeminate, illogical, sentimental cast too well adapted to prejudice and revolt a vigorous soul. There is a theory, as yet unestablished by experiment, that our race can only attain its highest possibilities in any general department of life when that department receives and encourages the activity of both sexes. It is certainly no slight confirmation of this idea that the church, which in our day is governed by women, lacks practicality and vigor; and that the state, which is controlled by men, is so alarmingly deficient in political conscience.

KEOKUK, IOWA. ELIZABETH WAKING.

Notes.

LITERARY.

WE may mention among our announcements, as not having mentioned them before, these works from the press of Mr. W. V. Spencer: "Studies in the Evidences of Christianity," by the Rev. Dr. Stephen L Bulfinch, which is a fuller development of the same author's "Manual of the Evidences of Christianity"—a work that is praised highly; "The Worship of Jesus," by the Rev. Mr. Samuel Johnson; and a republication of Mr. James Martineau's "New Affinities of Faith," a brief essay in paper covers. The same publisher has in press "The Science of Thought," which is a system of logic, by Charles Carroll Everett, and a juvenile by Elsie Gorham, with the title "Rainy Days in the Nursery."

—There is a good chance now for some enterprising publisher to get out a half-dollar edition of "Don Juan," and the rest of Lord Byron's works. We doubt if literary history presents another case of an author so thoroughly advertised as he has just been. The Countess Guiccioli's book was a stupid one, with nothing new in it, and read only by the reviewers—who, by the way, generally did full justice to Lady Byron's character; but this later revival of the poet is a revival indeed.

—The extreme heat of the weather last week making all exertion, bodily or mental, double and treble labor, it is a wonder that the Educational Convention at Trenton was so very well attended as it was—more than a thousand delegates were present—and that so much interest should have been taken in the proceedings. The heat had something to do, no doubt, with the inefficiency of the reporters, whose accounts of the proceedings were neither very full nor very good; but, as we have remarked once before, we believe, the sad truth in relation to reporters is, that they are a mentally dissipated race, and that nothing so devoid of excitement as a convention of school-teachers is able to stimulate the jaded spirit of the lively writer and stir him into lively writing. We suppose the best thing accomplished by the meeting was the meeting itself, and the encouragement which it gave the participants. The work of education will always be to a great majority of those engaged in it a wearying, humdrum round of labor, in the performance of which it is easy to become dispirited, or, at any rate, difficult always to be fresh, energetic, and pleased with the daily task. The sense of sympathy which it gives to meet so many fellow-laborers must alone be of great value; and of course, too, among much that is worthless which is said and done in the convention, there is something that is really of service to all, and there would be more if some means could be devised to put a stop to the indiscriminate orating in which the weaker brethren like to indulge. The committee of management ought to arrange the programme beforehand, and secure sensible practical essays from sensible men. Two things this convention did which are of interest to the general public: it appointed a committee to report next year on the expediency of establishing a National University, of which we are just now hearing so much, and another committee to take measures for the establishment of a Department of Education with well-defined powers, so that it shall be something more than the organization now known by that name, which is little more than a bureau for the collection of educational statistics, and which has no real power in that particular. Inasmuch as without good universities—although too many of our legislators cannot be made to see it—there can be no good system of education of the lower grades, common-school teachers and superintendents have the right to busy themselves with the National University project, and something worth getting may be got as a result of their discussion of a question which needs a great deal of discussion. One of the delegates, Dr. J. W. Hoyt, made a report on the subject, in which he argued that institutions for the higher culture are at present our most pressing need in this country, where universities are of lower grade and narrower limitations than those of almost any other country in the world; that even the foremost universities of Germany—the foremost in Europe—with their numerous high courses of study and their magnificent array of professors and matériel, really fall below the demands of the age; that the realization of the true idea of an American university involves the necessity for the expenditure of larger amounts of money than are likely to be granted for a long time to come by even the most powerful of our individual States; and, finally, that the upbuilding of such an institution looks to a great national object, and should command the national effort. Dr. Hoyt—whose address is Madison, Wisconsin—was made chairman of the committee we have mentioned.

—Mr. Albert Lea, now a resident of Galveston, Texas, writes to the Minnesota Historical Society, that in 1841, he being then Acting Secretary of War, he gave the names to several of the States of the Union which were at that time unorganized. We owe to him, it appears, the names Dakota, Iowa, Nebraska, and Kansas, which certainly speak very well for his good taste, and should procure for him the contempt of Admiral Porter, the worst of godfathers. The name Dakota has been given to a region further West than that to which Lieutenant Lea applied it—a still better name, Minnesota, having been bestowed upon the latter by "my friend Sibley," as the lieutenant calls him—a gentleman whom we do not identify. A name which has not yet been used—Ozark—the lieutenant wished to give to a State which, as we make out, would have included the present Indian Territory, which would be all the better off for having a name so good as that. On the whole, we may thank fortune that we have had no worse luck in our system of State nomenclature. Unless we choose to find fault with the names containing "North" or "South" or "New"—New York, for example, and South and North Carolina—we have nothing to find fault with except the name of Wyoming, which by right belongs to Pennsylvania, and to which Campbell has given associations a little sentimentalistic and artificial. The resident Indians had already given the region in question a very good name too—Absaraka, the Home of the Crows, as the tribe is called—and it is a thing to be desired that Congress should change the present designation.

—In new English Religious literature, the Ritualists seem still to be more active than any of their brethren. The Rev. Orby Shipley announces new editions of his "Lyra Eucharistica," "Lyra Messianica" (revised and enlarged), and "Lyra Mystica." A second edition is announced of "The Liturgies of Saints Mark, James, Clement, Chrysostom, and Basil, and of the Church of Malabar." It is the work of the late Dr. Mason Neale and of Dr. R. F. Littledale, who is one of the ablest and best read of the Anglo-Catholics—a body who, in fact, do not want for reading, and may, we suppose, safely be called the most learned, as the strictly Evangelical wing of the Established Church may be called the least learned, of the Episcopalian clergy. That the reasoning powers of the Anglo-Catholic men are, however, not in all cases at the point of perfection—or were not a while ago—we have no doubt the reader may see if he will look into another book by the same Dr. Neale we have just mentioned—namely, his "Catechetical Notes and Class Questions, Literal and Mystical, chiefly on the Earlier Books of Holy Scripture." Mystical interpretation is a sort of cobweb-spinning that was a delight to him in his lifetime, and in which his ingenuity—which was the exact measure of his lack of sound judgment in this particular—was very great. "The Spiritual Exercises of St. Ignatius of Loyola" is the title of another of Mr. Shipley's translations of devotional works, and the same gentleman is the compiler of a "Glossary of Ecclesiastical Terms," which is about to be published by Rivingtons. We follow foreign example, which we do not undertake to justify, in putting under the head of "Religious" Professor Huxley's "Lay Sermons and Addresses," which Macmillan announces. "Ecce Christus" has for its second title "Jesus of Nazareth tried by the Tribunals of his Country," and is anonymously written, as we believe all the "Ecce" literature has been. It must, by the way, now amount to a dozen volumes, more or less. The untheological and unreligious reader will be glad to hear—if he is rich enough—of the fifteen-shilling edition of Fuller's "Pisgah Sight of Palestine and the Confines Thereof," which is republished, with fac-similes of all the maps and illustrations of the quaint original. The general reader will be interested, too, in Mr. Charles J. Hemans's "History of Mediæval Christianity and Sacred Art in Italy" (from A.D. 900 to 1350), and in a new "Dictionary of Christian Antiquities," prepared under the supervision of Dr. William Smith. A shilling edition of Paley's "Evidences" takes its place in the "Cottage Library."

— One of the most noticeable of new volumes of verse in England is Mr. W. J. Courthope's "Ludibria Lunæ," which is a satire on the woman's-rights women. It relates how the women undertook to colonize the moon, and how the gods, resolving to subject them, employed the wiles of Love, and had nearly accomplished the conquest without a struggle, but, being discovered, were compelled to wage open war, in which they were of course victorious. This does not seem to be a very admirable plan, or plot, for the satire, and, indeed, it is said that, as a satire, the poem fails, while in places it is very pretty as a poem. Mr. W. Carew Hazlitt is praised for his edition of the works of Herrick, the most delightful of English minor poets, whom somewhere Mr. Lowell calls the most Catullian of poets since Catullus—the Catullus to whose memory his descendant used to drain bowls in the "loathed Devonshire"—which loveliest and most springlike county of England was, by the way, the very home for his muse. Mr. Hazlitt is said to be abusive of previous editors, and to have earned the right to be so by being very thorough in the preparation of his edition. Roundly abusive his subject could be, as witness his droll "epigrams," as he called them, which have as much point as a cudgel, and as much good manners; but there would be something very much out of keeping in a preface to Herrick that should be at all ill-natured. Worth mention as a curiosity is Mr. Henry Denison's translation into Latin of Shakespeare's "Julius Cæsar." Mr. Denison believes that translation into Latin is the best means of learning that language; and it is for this reason, and not because he enjoys seeing Shakespeare made into a classical Roman, that he has done what he has. We hear of No. 30 of a work which, seemingly, is issued with regularity; "College Rhymes, contributed by members of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge," is the title of it, and it is a paper-covered duodecimo. Mr. Whyte Melville offers a volume of "Songs and Verses;" and Mr. Percy Fitzgerald, who has had no success as a novelist or as a biographer, is now trying his hand at "Home Dramas and Comediettas," a volume of which Mr. Strahan is to publish soon. In Fiction we see nothing so attractive as Mr. Ralston's translation of Ivan Turgeneff's "Nest of Nobles," which, however, Mr. Ralston has called "Liza." The change is appropriate, perhaps; though it looks like taking an undue liberty with an author to rebaptize his offspring. But it is said that the interest of the story centres in the mournful history of the heroine, and that to this the pictures of life in a Russian province, which are the reason for the first title, are wholly subordinate. This, however, does not prove that the objection to the title is well taken. Turgeneff's melancholy genius delights in the sombre irony of the circumstances about his personages; and it is his way to bring out tragedy in contrast with the surrounding commonplaceness which heightens it. Besides, there is none of his novels which has not a purpose, moral or political; though it is true that he is so really an artist that he is sure eventually to let his purpose slip a little, and to devote himself to the persons he has created. In this novel the purpose is to teach the necessity there was in Russia for a law of divorce, and to satirize various types of the Russian nobility and gentry. The story of the book is a painful one, but very impressive, and, being Turgeneff's, contains much that is powerful and much that is beautiful. We, indeed, hardly know a living novelist—we ought, perhaps, to except Björnson—a new book from whom we should take up with so much expectation of pleasure as we should have in taking up one by Turgeneff. We notice nothing else worth mention under the head of Fiction if we except the "Wyvorn Mystery," by Sheridan Le Fanu, who once could write well, and a three-volume edition of "My Enemy's Daughter," by Mr. Justin McCarthy.

—Of History and Biography in England we have little to say in addition to what has previously been said. Mr. Walter Dickson, a Scotchman, who has seen Japan, has written a book on the "History, Government, and Offices" of that country. The third volume is just published of our Mr. Amos Dean's "History of Civilization," of which, we observe, the Saturday Review speaks with civility—the "American Literature" department of that journal being conducted in the feeblest manner. Its manager seems neither to know the field of American literature nor to know what to say about such specimens of it as he gets together on some singular principle of selection that baffles us completely. Another book from this side of the water is a one-volume edition of letters written home from London in 1856, '57, '58, '59, and '60, by George Mifflin Dallas. The Saturday Reviewer above-mentioned abuses him, we see, for printing his letters, which are not so reserved as an ambassador's might be. But the fact is that Mr. Dallas is dead, and it is his daughter who has just published the work, and the fault condemned has therefore no existence. Surely we may call biography "All the Essays of the Seigneur Michael de Montaigne," which is a seven-and-sixpenny reprint of the third edition—that of 1700—of Cotton's translation. "Robert Owen, the Founder of Socialism in England," is a thin octavo published by Trübner, and written by an author whose name is not given. In Professor J. E. Thorold Rogers's "Historical Gleanings," we see it stated, he allows himself, under cover of Cobbett, Walpole, and Adam Smith as stalking-horses, to take occasional shots at some of his political antagonists, but that, apart from this, the book is to be commended. Bourienne's "Napoleon" goes into another of its many editions, and so does Lockhart's little biography or history of the Emperor. Miss C. M. Yonge, an industrious compiler, and not one whose works in this field are much to our liking, makes a "Book of Worthies Gathered from the Old Histories and now Written Anew," which goes into Macmillan's "Golden Treasury Series." Murray announces the new "Biographia Brittanica," being "Lives of the Worthies of Great Britain and Ireland." Among Miscellaneous books the most important is Mr. Gladstone's "Juventus Mundi," which will raise his reputation for industry rather than for sound critical judgment. He reaffirms in it the main positions which he affirmed some ten or twelve years ago, in his work entitled "Homer and his Age"—positions now generally given up. Still this work is said to show what that one showed—a lively sense of the poetical beauties of Homer, and a clear conception of the outward life of the time. Merits like these atone for such literary defects as the comparison of Pallas Athene to the electric telegraph, and such errors as tracing Iris to a knowledge of the covenant concerning the rainbow which God makes with Noah in Genesis.

—The latter part of Goethe's life is to be copiously illustrated from a source till now but little known. A writer in the Preussische Jahrbücher for July reveals the intimacy of the great poet with a Frankfort lady—Marianne von Willemer—who made Goethe's acquaintance in 1814, at a time when she was a widow in independent circumstances, and the centre of a cultivated circle of her fellow-townsmen. The correspondence which grew out of this intimacy was confided by Madame Willemer to the city library, on condition that it should not be published for twenty-one years after her death. That period has nearly expired, and the interest with which the publication should be expected may be judged from the statement of the writer referred to. In 1849, he was informed by Madame Willemer of her former relations with Goethe, and she then told him that their intimacy was reflected in the book "Suleika," of the "West-östlicher Divan," and was the only key to the understanding of it; that Goethe adopted several of her songs, with little or no alteration, into his collection; and that two of these are the favorite lyrics beginning:

"Was bedeutet die Bewegung?
Bringt der Ostwind frohe Kunde?"

and

"Ach, um deine feuchten Schwingen
West, wie sehr ich dich beneide"

—which have been often set to music, and hitherto supposed to contain the very spirit of Goethe himself. What the other songs were cannot yet be determined; but the above, whether fair samples of the whole or not, suffice to raise Madame Willemer to a very high place among the poets. As the greatest of these cannot or do not always do their "level best," it would not be surprising if their inferiors should sometimes excel their poorest efforts. In the present case, however, Madame Willemer lays claim to songs particularly admired, and not only challenges the acumen of critics, but extorts from them an immediate recognition of her unsuspected talent.

— An exceedingly useful book for students of Russian literature and bibliography has just appeared, called "A Systematical Catalogue of Russian Books, for sale at the Bookshop of Alex. F. Bazunoff, at St. Petersburg." It is prepared by V. J. Mezhoff, a well-known Russian bibliographer. It is an octavo volume of more than 1,000 pages, and gives the titles of 11,993 books, arranged according to subjects, with a separate index of authors. What immensely enhances its value is, that under each title are arranged references to all the criticisms and notices of that book that have appeared in Russian journals and periodicals since 1825. There are more than 20,000 such references. There are also notices of more than 400 separately published translations of Russian books in foreign languages. There are mentioned 69 translations, complete or partial, of Pushkin alone, in French, German, Italian, Danish, Swedish, Polish, Dutch, Bohemian, Servian, and English. Only two, however, are English—"The Talisman and Other Pieces," St. Petersburg, 1835; and "The Bakchesarian Fountain. By A. Pooschkeen, etc. By W. D. Lewis:" Philadelphia, 1849. A few of the shorter poems are loosely and badly translated in Sir John Bowring's "Russian Anthology," and are not mentioned here. Of Lermontoff there are 22 translations in German, French, English, Polish, Danish, and Swedish. The prose story, "The Hero of Our Own Times," is the only thing translated into English, and that has been done twice. There are 26 translations of Gogol, only one of which is in English, and that a shocking version of "Dead Souls." There are 22 translations of Turgeneff, three of which are English. With the exception of an English translation of Count Leo Tolstoi's charming story, "Childhood and Youth" (published by Bell & Daldy), not mentioned in this catalogue, German translations of Gontcharoff's "Oblomoff," Dostoyefsky's "Dead House," and Prince Odoyefsky's stories, and of the old authors, such as Lomonosoff, Zhukofsky, Kryloff, and Karamzin, the other translations are of books utterly valueless from a literary point of view, and thus have sunk into oblivion. Among the American authors whose works are translated into Russian are Cooper, Henry C. Carey, Mrs. Beecher Stowe ("Uncle Tom's Cabin" and "Minister's Wooing"), Bayard Taylor ("Hannah Thurston"), Longfellow ("Hiawatha"), Prescott ("Philip II."), Motley ("United Netherlands"), Irving ("Columbus"), and Dr. Kane.

—One of the last places in the world to which we should naturally turn in search of prehistoric remains is the Greece which has been so thoroughly ransacked for its historical antiquities. And in Greece we should expect to discover least in Attica. Yet Herodotus gives us an account of a lake-dwelling people in Macedonia whose houses were built on piles; and the flint chippings and implements found about the tumulus on the plain of Marathon, that went by the name of Persian darts, have been noticed by many modern travellers unable to disprove the popular tradition. As in Germany, the stone implements found in various parts of Greece were vulgarly supposed to have fallen from heaven, and were hence styled ἀστροπελέκια (Donnerkeile); and, in fact, some of them were undoubtedly made from aerolites. We have before us, in pamphlet form, some observations on the subject of these remains in Switzerland and in Greece—"Παρατηρήσεις ἐπὶ τῆς ἐν Ἑλβετίᾳ καὶ Ἑλλάδι προιστορικῆς ἀρχαιολογίας ὑπὸ Γεωργίου Φίνλαν" (Athens, 1869.) Mr. Finlay, after recounting the principal facts of prehistoric investigation in the countries named, offers a series of woodcuts representing, of their actual size, a number of the objects contained in his collection, which we will name to indicate their distribution: a polished axe of a greenish-gray stone, found at Dobrena, near Thisbe, in Bœotia; a polished hammer of dark serpentine, found at Tanagra; a small axe of black-stone, found at Orchomenos; a chisel of iron flint, also from Dobrena; a small axe of pure copper, found in Eubœa; knives of obsidian, found in tombs at Placoto, in the island of Ios; pieces of obsidian found on the coast of Attica near Trakhones, at the Heræum of Argos, and (1836) on the tumulus at Marathon. The engravings are rude, but answer every purpose.

VIOLLET-LE-DUC'S FRENCH MEDIÆVAL ARCHITECTURE.*

(SECOND NOTICE.)

Mr. Ruskin's work as student and teacher of architectural art may be contrasted with the work of our author in the same direction. The close study of architectural art in France and Italy, to which Mr. Ruskin has given several almost unbroken years of his life, and which he has never quite relinquished, has resulted in the publication of the most admirable drawings of architectural detail that have ever been given to the public. The early studies in the "Seven Lamps," marred by imperfect etching, and afterwards re-engraved from the original drawings, were, as their author said in a later work, "faithful to a degree never before attempted in architectural subjects;" that is, they were absolutely photographic in their accuracy, reproducing every light, shade, and shadow upon the stone as at the hour when the drawing was made. If he had occasion afterward to enquire concerning any detail, he could turn to his sketch with the same confidence as to the building itself or to a photograph of equal scale and of absolutely perfect quality. This precise delineation of imperfections and beauties alike was undertaken and carried out for the purpose of studying the spirit of the work, and the character and purposes of the workmen who designed and cut it. A hesitating and blundering interpretation of a thought was often more worthy of careful note than perfect workmanship would have been, because revealing more of the spirit which had animated the old sculptor. It was little trouble, then, to keep up to a standard of accuracy which would have been otherwise unattainable. The accuracy was not slavish, but loving. The later works contain careful line engravings, elaborate mezzotints, and lithographs of wonderful beauty, both colored and plain; all copied in fac-simile by the best engravers from Mr. Ruskin's own drawings. And in all these—even in the large pictorial representations of the "Porch of Saint Mark's" and the "Arabian Windows," in the folio "Examples of the Architecture of Venice," the same exact setting down of every effect, intended or accidental, is to be found In the hands of a draughtsman of less consummate power, these would have become insufferably hard and unlovely. Mr. Ruskin, fortunately, had drawn from Nature even more than from buildings.

It cannot be said that in any of M. Viollet-le-Duc's characteristic sketches this exactness is to be found. There are, indeed, engraved plates in the "Mobilier" which seem faultless—see, for instance, the Encensoir in the second volume. But these, even if they are, like the woodcuts, his own work, are exceptions to his general practice. In the "Dictionary of Architecture," under "Chaire," are two engravings of elaborate marble chairs—bishops' chairs, if we remember aright. The same chairs are given by Mr. Waring in his Architectural Sketches, and he calls attention to the want of exactness in M. Viollet-le-Duc's woodcuts. A comparison of the two works is very instructive, and shows quite well our author's way of proceeding. It may be said, firstly, that he repairs a little, smoothing the jagged edges, and resetting the dislocated masonry; secondly, that he restores somewhat, supplying lost parts of the original work; thirdly, that his published drawings, made from sketches, some of them many years old, are almost confessedly illustrations of a general principle rather than necessarily exact copies of an actual monument. A skilled draughtsman and a thoroughly accomplished and well-informed architect—practised in construction and in design, and familiar with every style of building and of decoration of which monuments are found in France—his task has been to produce these thousands of drawings to illustrate the principles set forth in his writings. He could not afford to delay—to spend two days in making an exact drawing of a sculptured doorway when an hour could give him a sketch sufficient for his purposes; he could not undertake to vouch for every detail—perhaps unessential—when such accuracy would have involved increasing the amount of his work by half. But accuracy in the place where it is needed, certain success in giving the true character of the work represented—from the construction of a cathedral to the expression of face of a statue—these qualities we learn to look for in M. Viollet-le-Duc's drawings.

In like manner, in his writings we may find truth in all essential particulars, establishment nearly always complete of the theories advanced, an almost complete freedom from unfounded assumptions. This is the more remarkable, because the vast and many-sided subject is very unequally lighted up by documentary evidence. History helps along bravely enough in studying the architecture of one province or of one epoch, and at another time wholly deserts the student. Our author is generally brave enough to say "I don't know." Moreover, there are plenty of places where more might be said if more were known; the reader feels that there is no such thing as exhausting the subject, and that another Viollet-le-Duc, with this encyclopædia to start with, would be able to add to it many things which have remained outside the circle of observation of even this shrewd and indefatigable observer.

* "Dictionnaire Raisonné de l'Architecture Française, du XIe au XVIe Siècle, par M. Viollet-le-Duc, Architecte du Gouvernement, Inspecteur Général des Edifices Diocésains." 10 volumes, of which one is a table, 8vo; about 5,000 woodcuts. Paris: formerly Bance, now A. Morel & Co. 1857-1869.

It would be hard to find, for instance, a more complete and satisfactory treatise on any similar subject than that on vaulting, contained under the two principal heads, "Construction" and "Voûte," with references elsewhere. The system of Roman vaulting in brick and concrete, with temporary wooden and permanent masonry centres—the Roman dome vaulting—the Byzantine round cupola supported on a square, or on four piers only—and all the steps in the advance from these to the perfected Gothic vault, are carefully and most intelligently described and explained. So far as we know, there is no other treatise existing from which an unprofessional reader could get any accurate knowledge of the subject. The one peculiarity of Gothic vaulting, its double organization of self-supporting arched ribs, and a filling-in arched from rib to rib, so that every panel or separate division is a vault, and would stand alone—this is more clearly explained here than in all other works together which are known to us. And yet, while every step in the progress of this art of constructing masonry vaults is, as we have said, described, outlying and exceptional varieties exist which are not described. It is clear, moreover, that considerations which had escaped the notice of the writer of the article "Construction" are thoroughly stated in the article "Voûte," in a volume published eight years later. The worthy successor of our author will be led by these admirable treatises to further investigation of the subject, and to the examination of its every abnormal and peculiar phase.

It is peculiarly fitting that this great work should have been undertaken in France, because that country is the home of the pure Gothic architecture. The Gothic vault took its origin there; the whole combined system of construction and decoration which we call Gothic architecture was built up in a few years by the lay freemasons of Central France, and its grandest and most perfect monuments were erected there, and there remain.

M. Viollet-le-Duc, knowing this, feels strongly the unworthiness of the trifling architecture, at once illogical, unconstructional, and uninspired, which the France of our day is—not content with, but occupied with for the moment. His exposition of the principles of building and of decoration of the great ages of architecture is continually interrupted by discussion of the application of these principles to the criticism of modern practice. The unity and grace of his work are marred by this; moreover, there is very frequent repetition of the same leading ideas, urged and again urged in a score of ways, apropos of as many different things. But this has been inevitable, because no one will ever read through these many volumes; the points our author wished to make and insist upon he has been obliged to offer to his readers under as many titles as possible.

THE MAGAZINES FOR SEPTEMBER.

Except the Galaxy's instalment of Charles Reade's novels, there is almost nothing in any of the magazines that is at once attractive and well done. The tale about the Byrons in the Atlantic, which no doubt is a very great success as a magazine article, is not one of its author's happiest things, so far as concerns style. The story told is of so dreadful a nature that a nice artistic sense would seem to command that the telling of it should be free from anything like heat of any kind. When we have said of a man of great genius, who for two generations has had a home in all minds, whether or not he has had a home in all hearts, that he has committed incest with his sister, there really is nothing more to be said to the stupidest and most illiterate magazine reader. All of us know Byron, and all of us know the degree of sin involved in incest; criminal and crime unite to ensure our attention. So there seemed to us, as we read, no need that there should be so much effort at heaping up indignation on Byron's head as there is in the article referred to. It seriously hurts the effect which the author meant to produce. Objurgation the most eloquent appears to fall flat, to have no real life in it, to be hollow and false, when brought beside the naked horror of wickedness so extreme. Mrs. Stowe's article, then, appears to be, as a strictly literary performance, not a success upon which she can congratulate herself. Of course, merely as a magazine article it is one of the greatest successes ever achieved in any country. It would not be surprising to hear that three or four times as many copies of the September Atlantic had been sold as of any other number of the magazine that ever was printed; and, whether or not, the amount of notice which the article has received and will receive from the press is so great as almost to constitute an era in the history of periodical journalism.

But, as we have said, except the Galaxy's chapters of Charles Reade's novel, there is almost nothing in the month's magazines that is not only attractive by reason of its subject, but also well executed as a piece of literary workmanship. Even "Put Yourself in His Place" we find unsatisfactory when we recollect its author's better work. Clearly, we should say, the story is written—extremely cleverly as it is written—rather for magazines coming out once a month than for the legitimate three volumes, all together, in which it is one day to appear. Much seems to be sacrificed to the purpose of making each month's instalment an interesting fragment by itself, and also—worse yet—of making it interest the reader in the fragment that is to come next month. This is not the way in which great novels can be written. Any of the immortal novels doled out in small bits, as magazine novels are now, would each month leave us wishing, as we do now, for next month's dole. But when the immortal novels were made the writer's inspiration was not the desire to do September's batch of chapters in such a way as deliberately to put us on pins and needles for October's batch. The present method is strictly sensational, and no man whose best work is not essentially bad will ever do his best work after any such fashion.

For the rest, the September Galaxy is light and tolerably readable rather than good and worth reading. "Susan Fielding" has got on to its twenty-eighth chapter without having tempted us to read more than here and there a page of it; and to ask anybody else to do even so little as to follow our comparatively good example would be, so far as we recollect the story, an act of simple malevolence. Mr. Eugene Benson continues in this number of the magazine his series of articles on "New York Journalists," and the essay before us deals with "Theodore Tilton." In his essay upon "The Unsociableness of Society," Mr. Grant White forgets that "society" exists and is what it is mainly for the sake of the young men and young women who are marriageable and to be given in marriage; and that the various things which he wants "society" to give us are to be got from our friends and families rather than from our acquaintances. However it may be elsewhere, among us men and women of Anglo-Saxon blood people "do their duty" by "society," and do not pretend to enjoy it. It was among the wicked French, whose language, as Mr. White ought to recollect, "has no word for 'home,'" that the arts both of making and enjoying "society" were invented—arts which had no existence in the ancient world. "Little Bopeep" is a story by an unpractised hand; but the writer escapes very well the common danger of writers who have no real "vocation" for literature; and if she is not interesting, and is rather uncertain and feeble, she is not imitative, and has a degree of freshness which most story-tellers of her ability lack. It would be hard to speak too uncivilly of the poetry of this number of the Galaxy. "The White Flag" is a specimen, such as its author regularly furnishes, of the weakest sort of minor poet's poetry, polished and elaborated as if it were truly worth attention. Mr. Sill's "Two Ways" has rather less polish, and is better in taste and temper; but there is nothing in it. The obscurity of Mr. Calvert's "Without the Stars" does not hide anything, so far as we can see. The practice of making such verses as these it is nobody's business, doubtless, to say anything about; but to publish them certainly does not minister to edification, mental or spiritual. There is a superstition, however, that magazines must have poetry. We wish they must.

The countless readers whom Mrs. Stowe has set all agog for everything they can hear of Byron will be glad to see what Mrs. Hawthorne has written about her visit to Newstead Abbey. Her article is charming, being in substance a letter, such as a cultivated, unliterary woman writes home to her friends from abroad. Utterly without pretence, even quite careless in places, it gives better than anything we have read for a long time the pleasure which it is peculiar to women's letters, as literature, to give. Some things in it remind one distinctively of the pensive reflectiveness of Hawthorne himself. One passage we may quote for the sake of its kindness and charity, which just now may not improperly be borne in mind:

"There was a spell about the spot, very difficult to analyze; for I could not tell whether it were more pleasant or sad; but it was the spell of genius and beauty, at any rate. I felt a poignant sorrow when I thought of Byron, brought so near as he was by standing on his very homestead.

ground—when I considered his ruined life and poisoned genius—his fiery heart, once innocent and true, turned to wormwood with hate and indignation, and the golden promise of his dawn darkening into a lurid storm before his noon—and no purple sunset when his mortal life sank into the night of death. It is certainly one of the saddest of all histories. But his Father in heaven alone could know all his temptations and all the hindrances to the development of his better nature, and he only knew all the gracious aspirations and motions of his spirit, veiled from the world, which so sternly repelled and scorned him, and too savagely dishonored his remains, even when they were brought from Greece, where he endeavored to do a noble deed. I hope that those persons who rejected him were quite sure that they were holier than he, and it is just as well for him that his body lies in Hucknall Church, instead of the glorious old Westminster Abbey. I remembered the divine words, 'He that is without sin among you, let him cast the first stone.'"

Another passage we quote as partly accounting for some of Mr. Barnum's success in life:

"But we were taken to this avenue especially to see the twin trees, upon one of which Byron cut his name, when he was last at Newstead—his own name and that of his sister Augusta. This tree, so precious to all who value the poet, has withered from the root, I believe. At any rate, the trunk is sawed off a few inches above the inscription, and a bit of India-rubber cloth is carefully tied over the place. The twin tree flourishes finely, so that the doom of the race involves the other, with the illustrious name. Colonel Wildman thought once of putting the portion that has such a melancholy interest into a glass case, so as to preserve it more effectually; but the old gardener told him he had better let it stay in its original position; for it would be more valuable to all who came to see it to stand on the spot his lordship stood upon when he carved it, and that it would certainly last as it is now during the Colonel's own life. So it remains. When Barnum, the American showman, came, he sent into the house to request Colonel Wildman to sell it to him for five hundred pounds! The gardener took the message, and the Colonel returned word that he would not take five thousand for it, and suggested that the man who proposed such a monstrous thing should be shot."

Mr. F. S. Cozzens, in "The Bassos," relates how an Italian singer walked on board a vessel on the Hudson River and entered into competition in the matter of low notes with a small calf which was tied there. One has only to recollect the famous contention between the nightingale and the musician, which makes a green spot even in the great English dramatic literature, in order to cause this performance of Mr. Cozzens's to seem doubly offensive. It has a farcical cleverness, too. "Left Wounded on the Field" reads like a true story, and is agreeable reading. So in its way is "The Old Hospital," by Dr. D. B. St. John Roosa, who writes of the hospital whose buildings at Leonard and Worth Street are now undergoing demolition. Everybody who walks up and down Broadway shares Dr. Roosa's sorrow that the noble trees are cut down and the green lawn gives place to a cellar, and that in lieu of one of the most beautiful spots in the city we are to have only more big buildings. But it is easy to grieve too much over our deprivation. Long ago the place ceased to be fit for the site of an hospital. The never-ending roar of Broadway is alone a sufficient reason for removing the sick to other quarters. And as for the nearness of the old hospital to those parts of the city in which accidents are most common, that constitutes no objection to the change. Two smaller hospitals, one in Brooklyn and one on the west side of the North River, approachable by the noiseless and easy-moving ferries, would be of much more convenience to the sick than the Broadway hospital has ever been. And, if there was nothing else to be said, it seems to be well established that a large hospital stands in use no great number of years before it becomes so saturated with disease as to be a means of death to those who seek it for cure.

Mr. Vincent Colyer, who has been journeying among the Indian tribes upon the Reservations, asks the question, "Shall the Red Men be Exterminated?" and supplies some reasons, if any were needed, for a negative answer. It becomes tolerably plain, day by day, that the Indian is the scoundrel he is partly because we are the scoundrels that we are. "Village Improvement Societies," by S. F. Cooper, is well worth the attention of a majority of our fellow-countrymen. At a very small expense of money and care and time, we of this generation may at least leave a country beautiful with trees to our descendants; and the expense need not be great, as Mr. Cooper points out, of doing more than that. But that at least may be done, and with no more trouble than is involved in making a motion in town-meeting. Our "hereditary feud with trees," as Mr. Lowell calls it, is pretty much dead within us, now that there is no American Indian behind each bole waiting his opportunity to "raise hair;" and there are few towns, from New England to California, which could not be persuaded into a small annual appropriation for lining the streets with shade-trees. "Deceived," by Mr. Edgar Fawcett, is superior to most of that gentleman's poetry, which usually has the ear-mark of poetry for the magazines, and some other poetry, for that matter, and is truer to the writer's feelings than to the truth of nature. Mr. Lea's "Monks and Nuns in France" is the work of a writer who deserves to be considered an authority upon the matter of which he treats in the essay before us. It is not, however, of less value as being open to the objection that can be urged against all the surprising and shocking tales that can possibly be told of the Catholicism of our day and generation—the objection, namely, that what it relates must be exceptional and not the rule. Catholicism is to be put out of the way by other weapons than stories, no matter how true, of the stupidity and treachery of Belgian and French monks. We may assume, we think, that the Catholic controversy has now reached the stage in which it is not necessary to call one's opponent a liar and ravisher and murderer, but is necessary only to prove him a Catholic; the main battle is joined at something like the key of the situation, and it is no longer much worth while to do any fighting on the outskirts.

The Atlantic's opening article, "Why Henry Jones did not go to Canada," is by the Rev. Walter Mitchell. It seems to give proof that its author was at one time a practical opponent of the Fugitive Slave Law, and his experience as an anti-deputy-marshal has been of some service to him, in enabling him to succeed in his "local coloring." In other respects, he seems not very well qualified to tell stories, and he makes rather a failure than otherwise. "Jacob Flint's Journey," by Mr. Bayard Taylor, might safely be bound up in a volume of stories by Miss Alice Cary. It is so good-natured or soft-hearted, and so improbable and weak in construction, that at first we took it for Miss Cary's work. Miss Cary, however, is free from the appreciation of morbid feeling which Mr. Taylor very clearly displays in this story. Morbidness of feeling increases, we are sorry to say, in "The Foe in the Household," which, however, we shall not cease praising as the work of a writer to whom some of the springs of the heart are known. Hardly one of her characters is now in a situation where he or she can healthily gratify healthy natural feelings, or seems capable of entertaining them.

Mr. Parton's article on "log-rolling" at Washington does not call for particular notice. It is readable, but contains nothing particularly new. It has been said somewhere that Mr. Parton intends making an article on corruption at Washington, in which he will take up some subjects suggested by criticisms that have been made upon his "Strikers of the Washington Lobby" and that shall be made upon this second paper. We hope he will give careful attention to a letter recently written to the Cincinnati Gazette by its regular correspondent, Mr. Boynton. That gentleman is one of the two or three really honest, independent, well-informed newspaper correspondents who write from Washington, and we see that he gives a pretty flat contradiction to nearly everything said by Mr. Parton in his article in the August Atlantic. Or, better still, we wish Mr. Boynton might find it compatible with his remaining in Washington to tell all he knows about Senators and Representatives whose votes are bought and sold. We have no doubt at all that ten minutes' talk with Mr. Boynton would convince any "fine young Radical" that some of the seven Senators who "voted No on the Eleventh Article" are, at the very least, as spotless as some of their colleagues who voted Yes—and would do so again to-morrow for sufficient cause. Mr. Boynton has neither Mr. Parton's qualified faith nor the unlimited faith of Mr. Henry Wilson, which we cannot but think does more credit to this gentleman's heart than his head.

Mr. Howells's "First Cricket" is a piece of poetry characteristically delicate and subtle, couched in a metre of which we had been hoping that we had some time since seen the last—rhymed hexameters being sad things. We are disposed to be liberal to the British or American hexametrist in the matter of feet; no man, before or since Edgar Allen Poe, ever succeeded in scanning any English hexameter that was not made for the express purpose of being scanned, and we are content to admit that real hexameters must be put entirely out of mind by whosoever wishes to enjoy the domestic, contemporary sort. The classical hexameter is one thing, and ours is another, and—so far as our liking goes—is a thing not so much worse than the original, and decidedly pleasant. But the introduction of rhyme into the structure, whose chief beauty must of necessity be rhythm, is, to begin with, the introduction of one more difficulty where already there were enough; and, in the second place, is the introduction of a difficulty the surmounting of which gives so much less than corresponding pleasure that it gives, to our mind, positive displeasure. Mr. Howells is to be found also in "A Poetical Lot," where he lets out the life of several songsters, and puts, we think, a little life into one gentleman who sings of mountain scenery without, so far as we can see, hurting himself, or doing the scenery any particular good.

The "New Timothy" goes on in Harper's, and so does "My Enemy's Daughter," and these stories are the best things in the magazine. The worst things are the futile article on "An Author's Memories of Authors," which is devoted too much to the opinions and too little to the recollections of Mr. S. C. Hall—whose recollections have a value that his opinions have not—and which contains also some of the writer's criticisms which cry aloud for the editorial scissors. "Leander Doolittle" is another article of concentrated helplessness; and the "Puritan Captain" might be stronger, though we cannot say that we suffered in the reading of it, which, on the whole, was not unamusing and not inappropriate labor for the weather. Mr. Curtis, in the "Easy Chair," is severe with the Prince of Wales, for whom, indeed, nobody in the world seems to have a good word.

The Catholic World has for its article of most interest a reply to the New Englander, which has been aiding and abetting the Rev. Mr. M. Hobart Seymour in his efforts to prove that Roman Catholics, taken by and large, are much more unchaste and generally immoral than Protestants. Figures being notorious for not lying, the World finds no difficulty in taking statistics and completely turning the tables upon Mr. Seymour, the New Englander, and the Protestants, who evidently are quite bad enough. A more agreeable article consists of some notes from the diary of an American lady who became an inmate of a French convent, and who kept a journal for the perusal of a friend. It is natural, and in parts it is affecting.

Lippincott's for September partakes of the general dulness of the month's magazines, and we do not know that any remark concerning it occurs to us as necessary to be made. There are two sonnets by Mr. Paul H. Hayne, of whom, we believe, it was said by Mr. Longfellow that he was the best sonnetteer in America, or had written the best sonnet that any American had written. In saying this, Mr. Longfellow, we have thought, had an eye rather to the workmanship—which, to be sure, counts for very much in sonnets—than to anything the work contained; for we have never been able to find any poetry by Mr. Hayne that bears the test of memory, or, to speak plainly, that is worth more than a minute of any one's attention. The two sonnets by him which are contained in this number have this disadvantage, and, in addition, the technical defect of being connected by a necessary tie and being incomplete alone.

The most interesting article, we think, that ever appeared in Hours at Home is Mr. Henry Villard's story of MM. Erckmann and Chatrian's early life, long struggle with poverty and neglect, and final prosperity. Mr. Villard, it appears, in 1849—when he was about fourteen years of age—took permission from himself to go to the wars and fight for liberty in the revolutionary militia of his native Bavaria. He made, it must be confessed, a brief and inglorious campaign, as he ingenuously admits, with considerable levity of manner. In short, he narrates that he, with the rest of the patriot forces, became demoralized, and, after valiantly running away from home, very willingly ran home again. His father, being a royalist, was less pleased with the young hero's escapade than he might have been had he shared his son's incendiary sentiments, so he packed him off across the line to the college at Phalsbourg, a little town in Alsace, to which it was the fashion for the Germans of that part of the country to send their children to undergo the rigid discipline of the French school. Here Mr. Villard met Alexandre Chatrian, then a young tutor working hard to get money enough together to pay his expenses up to Paris, where Émile Erckmann, his friend, was trying to make his living at law. Already the pair of friends had done jointly some slight literary work, and formed the determination to work for fame in partnership. Mr. Villard formed the friendship of the junior member of the firm, and is able to recount their story fully and accurately, which accordingly he has done in a simple and pleasing way, so that we commend his sketch to general perusal, and his next one, if Hours at Home will permit us to say so, to somewhat closer attention on the part of the proof-reader.

The Literature and Literary Men of Great Britain and Ireland. By Abraham Mills, A.M. (New York: Harper and Brothers. 1851.)—It is some eighteen years since Mr. Mills's lectures first appeared, but they have just been put upon the market again, and may properly be noticed now. The author, whose death prevented the carrying out of his whole scheme, intended to pass in review the literature of Italy, of Germany, of France, of Greece, and of Rome, as well as of Great Britain and Ireland; but this last-mentioned part of his task was all that he was able to perform. He has done it well, not servilely following in the very footprints of his predecessors, but not varying from their general course; so that in these two volumes we have a body of sound criticism, by the best critics, upon all noted English, Scotch, and Irish writers, from the days of Alfred to those of Junius; and this criticism is illustrated by selections, which are very judiciously made. The compiler himself does not appear too often in the character of critic, but is not unwelcome when he does; not even, we find, when he remarks of the "Canterbury Tales" that, after all, he is compelled to say that he can discover in them "no moral lesson." We ought hardly to quote this little remark, perhaps, for we have noted nothing else which is absurd. Generally, throughout the work, Mr. Mills gives the impression that he is a sensible, well-read man, with a true relish for good literature of all kinds, and a cultivated taste in poetry. To be sure, one hardly knows, in reading a compilation like this, how much of one's satisfaction may not be due to the pleasure it gives to be again in the company of old favorites, but this compilation we have read with real satisfaction. We should much prefer it as a text-book to Mr. Cleveland's well-known compendiums, the criticism in which is almost always very feeble where it is not borrowed. In fact, we should prefer it very much indeed to those compendiums, nothing being worse than goodiness. Mr. Cleveland's works have another disadvantage, too, as compared with this; and that is the amount of "solid information" which they convey, and which a judicious teacher, who knows how much more important it is that young ladies and gentlemen should know English literature than that they should know the names and middle-names and dates thereof, as Mr. Greeley says, will never be at pains to cram into his pupils' heads. However, it is to the criticism that the main objection is to be brought.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Allen (Prof. W. F. and J. H.), Manual Latin Grammar, 12th ed.	(Edwin Ginn)	$1 25
Hugo (V.), The Man who Laughs, Parts I., II., swd.	(D. Appleton & Co.)	1 50
Marlitt (E.), Countess Gisela: a Tale, Part II., swd.	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)	0 75
Meyer (Dr. M.), Electricity in its Relations to Practical Medicine.	(D. Appleton & Co.)
Niemeyer (Dr. F. von), A Text-book of Practical Medicine, 2 vols.	(D. Appleton & Co.)
Sadler (T.), Diary, Reminiscence, and Correspondence of Henry Crabb Robinson 2 vols.	(Fields, Osgood & Co.)	4 00
Vanny Croft: a Child's Story.	(Pott & Amery)	0 80
Wagner (R.), Das Judenthum in der Musik, swd.	(L. W. Schmidt)
Walker (Mary S.), The Rev. Dr. Willoughby and his Wine: a Tale.	(J. N. Stearns)	1 50
Wireman (H. D.), Gems of German Lyrics	(Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger)	2 00

THE RIVERSIDE MAGAZINE

FOR YOUNG PEOPLE.

SEPTEMBER, 1869.

Contents: Frontispiece—Town and Country. Woodcock Shooting, by John Radcliffe; White and Red, by Helen C. Weeks; The Maze, by Francis Johnson; The Child's Signal—a Hospital Incident, by Margaret J. Preston; Stories from Old English Poets—III. Patient Griselda, by Abby Sage; The Young Virginians, by Porte Crayon; Wee Alice, by Mary E. Atkinson; Children at Casa Guidi Windows, by Gould B. Mumford; Snaring Shanks, by Dr. C. C. Abbott; The Judge's Pets, by E. Johnson; My Fairy Boy, by Annette Bishop; The Story of a Book—II., by the Editor; The Alphabet Party; A New Play, by Marian Douglas; Fall Pippins; Golden Slumbers kiss your Eyes—a Lullaby of the Seventeenth Century.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION:

$2 50 a year, in advance; three copies, $6 50; five copies, $10; ten copies, $20, and an extra copy gratis. Single copies, 25 cents. All Booksellers and News Agents will supply the Magazine. "The Quack Doctor," Stephens's celebrated picture, is still given to every subscriber who sends $2 50 for the Magazine.

HURD & HOUGHTON,
459 Broome Street, New York.

INSTRUCTION IN MATHEMATICS.

The undersigned will, during the coming academic year of Harvard College, receive special students in Analytic Geometry, Spherical Trigonometry, the Differential Calculus, and Elementary Theoretical Mechanics. The instruction in these branches will be arranged in three courses, two lessons a week being given in each course; and the fee for admission to each course will be $10 a term or half-year, payable at the beginning of the term. Pupils will be presumed to have a thorough knowledge of Geometry, Algebra, Plane Trigonometry, and Logarithms. The lessons will begin on the 13th of September.

J. M. PEIRCE.

CAMBRIDGE, August 23, 1869.

New and Old Books.

DAVID G. FRANCIS (formerly C. S. Francis & Co.), 3 Clinton Hall, Astor Place, New York, keeps constantly for sale an extensive Stock of New and Second-hand Books in various departments of Literature.

Catalogues, issued from time to time, will be forwarded FREE to any address.

TO BOOK AGENTS.

N. TIBBALS & CO. have added to their extensive trade in Sunday-school, Theological, and Miscellaneous Books the Subscription business.

We have one book which will contain several hundred first-class engravings, and will be the best book for Agents yet published. Be sure and not engage until you see our circular and prospectus. Ready Sept. 1.

N. TIBBALS & CO.,
37 Park Row, New York.

BACK NUMBERS OF THE NATION.

The following numbers of the Nation are desired by the Publisher, and if sent to his address within a week will be paid for at the rate of twenty-five cents for each number of Vol. I., and fifteen cents for the rest:

Vol. I. 1, 3, 6, 7.

Vol. IV. 83.

 The Publisher offers for sale complete sets of the Nation (eight volumes), unbound, for $26; bound, for $42; transportation not included.

The Nation.

VOL. IX.—NO. 218. THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 2, 1869. { FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM / TWELVE CENTS PER COPY

THE WEEK 181

EDITORIAL ARTICLES:
The Democratic Programme 184
The New Turn of Affairs in China ... 184
Financial Advertisements 186

The Boat-Race 187
Was it a Mystification? 189

CORRESPONDENCE:
What the Harvard University Lectures Really will be 189
A Mistranslation by Lord Byron 190

A Word for Cricket 190

NOTES:
Literary 191

President Hopkins on the Woman Question 193

CURRENT LITERATURE:
The Innocents Abroad.—Select Orations of Marcus Tullius Cicero.—The Law of Carriers of Goods and Passengers ..... 194—195

Books of the Week 195

Terms:—Five Dollars per annum, in advance; Clergymen, Four Dollars.  Remittances at the risk of the subscriber, unless made by draft, check, P. O. money order, or registered letter.

The date of expiration of each subscription is indicated on the printed label. A delay of more than three months in renewing subscriptions will endanger their continuance.

ADDRESS, PUBLISHER OF "THE NATION," BOX 6732, NEW YORK.
PUBLISHING OFFICE, 3 PARK PLACE.

The Week.

THERE is more interest in the political situation in Tennessee than elsewhere. It is said that there is no hope that the new Legislature can be got to ratify the Fifteenth Amendment, and that Governor Senter will assemble the present one in extra session, for the purpose of getting that business safely done. This would be one of those little bits of hand-to-mouth sharp practice which are so common in our politics, and which have done much to debase them and make them all but untouchable. One party gerrymanders a State this fall, then why should not another next year do the same thing? and then, what better example is there for a set of legislators who find that they can prevent unpalatable legislation by coolly resigning in a body, thus practically committing treason by evading the force of law in a manner more fatal to its authority than open and armed resistance to it? And then, why should not the "previous question" be used to gag speakers; or why should not we see Senators and Representatives of the United States practising some little unworthy trick to spring a trap on their opponents? Whether, however, Mr. Senter will call the Legislature together or not is undecided. It would effectually kill any chances he may have for being sent to the United States Senate; but perhaps the story that he cherishes aspirations is not true. Emerson Etheridge is still a candidate, and so is Andrew Johnson; but some correspondents, who appear to be well-informed, deny that Johnson has any chance.

In Virginia, the Sun reporter has interviewed General Canby, without getting much more from him than that he makes a point of keeping himself uninformed as to politics, as he wishes to have nothing to do with them, and that he has the Reconstruction acts before him, and shall follow the course laid down in them—the only course open to him. Now, will some of the journals that have been counselling him not to do so, tell us why not? Are they to evolve laws, and he rub out his oath and execute them? And how often in a year is he to do it?

We understand the Congressional Committee on Retrenchment, which lately visited the New York Custom-house, found things in such a bad way in the matter of corruption that they made up their minds to report a Civil Service bill of some kind next session, not Jenckes's, they say, but something of the same kind. The President is understood to be of the same way of thinking, and will recommend a reform of some kind, without mentioning any particular measure. One thing made a deep impression on the committee—and that was, that men from all parts of the country were exceedingly anxious to get places in the Custom-house here, the salaries of which would not yield them a decent subsistence, showing that the pickings must be something handsome. Our friend "Clericus's" Vermont Congressman would probably say that what they wanted was to qualify, by a little custom-house experience, for the governorships of territories, but our opinion is that this gentleman's kind, simple heart has here led him into error. What they seek is simply "pickins," or "perkisits," or "swag," or "stamps," by all of which names booty or plunder is known to them.

If the Democratic party lives much longer, it will not be for want of good advice; there is medicine enough offered it to kill it out of hand. Last week it was Mr. John Quincy Adams; this week it is the henchmen of Supervisor Tweed in the Seventh Ward of this city, and General Rosecrans, who writes from California. Our New York Democrats think Mr. Belmont does not give money enough to the treasury, and is only an ornamental figure-head, and that the man who planned Hoffman's and Seymour's peculiar victory last fall is the man to make majorities in 1872. But the affair looks more like a little toadying to Mr. Tweed than anything else, he being one of the two or three men who hold this city in the hollow of their hands. The party gets more money from Mr. Belmont, as chairman, than it will get if he should be put out, we may rest assured; and there is nothing in the way of power and dignity which the Democratic party in the State can bestow upon Mr. Tweed that he cannot now bestow upon himself whenever he pleases. He has just decided to go up to Albany as Senator, we see. And supposing Mr. Hoffman were to become President, would the distinguished gentleman for whom the majority was made refuse the distinguished gentleman who made it anything he wanted in payment for his services, whether he was chairman of the National Committee or not?

General Rosecrans rises above the "practical politics" of our friends in the Seventh Ward, and admonishes the party of many things, in a letter which is as long-winded as good, sound Democratic documents must of necessity be. The substance of it is that the people of this country are Democrats by nature, and—we may say so, though the General puts it discreetly—that the Democratic party is not, in its present constitution, democratic at all. He specifies the planks of a platform which has a good enough look, and, on the whole, is creditable to him; but he had to bear in mind the fact that the Ohio Democracy just now are fighting against the Amendment, so he vaguely talks about enlarging the basis of suffrage, but of letting women and inferior races exercise their legitimate influence on legislation by some other means than the ballot. What he says about the caucus system, the public debt—which he would not repudiate in any way—offices, and so on, is all very well; but he will die before he sees the party on that platform, unless, indeed, the South should get the negro out of her head and put forward some leaders. The Democracy has had only imbeciles for chiefs since the Southern ones went into delirium; but madness seems more curable than idiocy, and that still prevails in the councils of our Northern sachems.

The excitement in Massachusetts about the nose-pulling seems to continue with but little abatement. The Springfield Republican, discussing Mr. Curtis's plea in extenuation, rebukes him for having "vindicated his honor" in the railroad car, to the disturbance, if not terror, of some fifty well-bred and inoffensive people—from which we conclude that it thinks that, when a nose has to be pulled, it should be done privately, and in some secluded place; but we must say that this is a very unscientific view of the subject. Deliberate nose-pulling, in cold blood, on ground selected for the purpose, is a very much graver offence, in the eyes of both the lawgiver and the moralist, than nose-pulling on the spur of the moment and in the heat of passion; so that, had Mr. Curtis postponed the commission of his offence in obedience to reflection of any kind, however laudable, he would have aggravated it. That sweet, sensitive, fastidious moralist, the Commonwealth, also discusses the question, and is satisfied—as well as we can make out the sense of what it says—that Mr. Curtis's offence was part of a deliberate attempt to establish "caste" in America, and that the man himself is an illustration of "a class delusion;" but it says it won't do. The spirit of the age is against it. Jefferson and his school made the thing impossible. "We may all," says this saintly sheet, "become gentlemen, in that we may all succeed in making the best and kindest use of the faculties that God has given us"—which is true and affecting.

But then, coming down to particulars, should a young man take for his model that great Massachusetts "gentleman" whom the Commonwealth held up to admiration last fall, and, when one of his brethren abuses him or insults him, go straight home, concoct a neat and rather droll lie about him, and, putting his tongue in his cheek, mount the nearest moral and progressive stump and tell it, with such additions and amplifications as the occasion may suggest? Is it really awful to pull a nose, or to give way to a hot human impulse and strike a blow, and quite allowable to defile your own soul and avenge yourself on your enemies by any amount of cold-blooded slander, vituperation, foul inuendo, and foul epithet? Is this really what "the spirit of the age" prescribes, and what we are all coming to? We hope the preacher will "clear his head of cant," as Dr. Johnson said to another proser, and enlighten us on these points. But in doing so he must not scream or throw mud, or say the Nation defends nose-pulling. It does nothing of the kind. It is simply sickened by the horror of nose-pulling displayed by people for whom a human tongue, degraded by lying, vituperation, cant, and humbug, and small cheating, has nothing repulsive whatever.

We know, from General Butler and Mr. Parton, that about seven of the Senators are abominably corrupt, having sold themselves to the Whiskey Ring during the impeachment trial, and then covered up their tracks with such skill that not a particle of proof against them was ever discovered. On hearing this about several of the leading members of the Republican party, we felt satisfied, as we suppose everybody did, that there must be plenty of corrupt fellows amongst the others also, who escaped, owing simply to the fact that they voted on the "right" side. Things leak out about them occasionally, however. For instance, the Tribune, on the 5th of August, ascribed the defeat of General Frémont's Southern Pacific Railroad Bill, last session, to Mr. Howard, the Chairman of the Pacific Railroad Committee, having got it "referred to that committee and held it there," and added, significantly, that his reasons could not have been "creditable to him." To this he, trying to wriggle out, replies that the bill was never referred to his committee at all, whereupon the Tribune said that, at all events, Mr. Howard killed it by "threatening to talk the session out if the Senate consented to take it up"—all the wily Howard had said being that it was too late in the session to take it up, or that, if it was taken, "he had a good deal to say about it," and other corrupt fellows having said the same thing; but the Tribune nails him by again observing, pointedly, that Mr. Howard is Chairman of the Pacific Railroad Committee, and that this "is a very important position, in which a true man can effect great good, and in which a corrupt man may make a great deal of money." It may seem incredible, but it is nevertheless true, and it shows how brazen-faced the Senators have become, that Mr. Howard, in the teeth of this complete exposure of his corruption, writes to the Tribune, on Tuesday, denying indignantly that any act of his, in the Senate or on the committee, had been directly or indirectly influenced by pecuniary considerations.

It seems that the Harvard men, in the late race, gave their boat "the Harvard start," and put her at once ahead of the Oxfords, going at the rate of forty-four or forty-five strokes a minute, and probably a little more. It is a start that looks a little flurried, and would look particularly so, probably, in English eyes, so the go-off has been spoken of as nervous, which it probably was not. Two miles out, Harvard was leading, but not going, we may be sure, at the rate of any such number of strokes to the minute as the rate with which she set out. Just past Hammersmith Bridge, at the top of the horseshoe which the river makes between Putney and Mortlake, the Oxfords overlapped and passed, and it looks very much as if they had been making a waiting race, and as if they might have passed before if they liked. Our men had a little bad steering to contend against, some sickness in their boat, and an overpowering flood of English sympathy with the Oxfords. But was it any of these, or all of them combined, that lost us the race? Only the crew can tell. It will be time enough for us to talk about the relative merits of the two styles of rowing when we hear the opinions of the American crew on the question whether we shall stick to our style in races here—three miles, with a turn, bow-oar steering—and whether, also, we shall stick to it when next we row them over a four-and-a-quarter mile course, with no turn, and with a hundred-and-odd pounds of dead-weight in the stern of the boat. These are nicer questions than any but expert oarsmen and men of science can determine. The "American style of rowing" could really no more have been on trial in the race and fairly tested than the American horse could be fairly tested by taking a trotter of ours and setting him against a running horse at the Derby.

And now, what to do about it? Go over again till we do beat, will probably be every Harvard man's—not to say every American man's and woman's—first thought, unless, indeed, he and she think first that Oxford ought to send a crew over here. We wish she would; and we see that two enthusiastic citizens have offered, the one five thousand dollars, the other an unlimited amount, to pay the expenses of the Oxford men should they choose to come over here—where certainly a warm welcome would await them, and where—we must confess it—everybody, from infancy to hoary age, is hoping and expecting to see them beaten. But the truth is that we went over there and took on ourselves the conditions imposed by English racing law, and we have nothing to do but go again until we beat, or else "shut up," as the sporting world says. Perhaps we never can turn out so good a crew again, but it is equally probable that Oxford, too, will not next year have a crew so practised as well as so strong as this best of all her crews. At any rate, we are in a manner bound to try. Meantime, Mr. Emerson's great law of compensation comes into play, and there is a dash of sweet in our bitter cup. What could have been done with Boston if we had won? There would have been no living in the same country with her, and probably she would have dragged us into a foreign war before the year was out. Her pride is almost unendurable now; but with three Bostonians and a Concord man as victors over Oxford, she would have been altogether past bearing. We should have the spectacle that the World prefigured the other day, when it described Boston as being ninety-five millions of miles from the sun, slightly flattened at the poles, and revolving on its own axis once every 23 hours 56 minutes 4 seconds, thus causing the alternation of day and night.

Miss Catharine Beecher has published a letter addressed to the "Honorable Conductors of the Public Press," rebuking them for the circulation of divers small and silly and impertinent stories about her father, brother, and sister, and requesting them to abstain from it. The "honorable conductors," we observe, have in several instances, while acknowledging their faults, shown an unseemly disposition to "sarse back" at Miss Beecher, and to insinuate that if they have taken liberties with the names and private affairs of her friends, they, the conductors aforesaid, were not exclusively to blame. Miss Beecher now requests us, in case we notice her letter, to impress upon these gentlemen the fact that it is not the publicity or impertinence she complains of, but the falsehoods—falsehoods "injurious to character, and which not only tend to wound private feeling, but to lessen confidence and respect for the public press." We had not intended noticing her letter. We do not publish cackle about people's private lives ourselves, and doubt whether anything we could say on the subject could induce those of our brethren who do to give up the practice. But since Miss Beecher requests it, we are happy to place before them her explanation.

A conference was held last week between Governor Hoffman and some of the prison officials of this State and Professor Dwight and Dr. Wines of the Prison Association, touching the sad state of things at Sing Sing and other prisons of the State. The prison officials all agreed that one great cause of the existing disorganization was the influence of party politics on the selection of prison officers; and that the sudden abolition of the old modes of punishment by the Legislature at its last session, without at the same time providing proper substitutes, had had a very bad effect on discipline, and actually put prison officers in peril of their lives. Governor Hoffman excused himself for signing it, on the ground that public opinion demanded it, and that "the best way to procure the repeal of a bad law," etc. But how did he know public opinion demanded it; and is not the very first object of the veto power the prevention of hasty legislation; and is not all legislation hasty in which a crowd of persons deal with a delicate problem in total ignorance of its nature? There are plenty of experts of the highest order to be consulted on the subject of prison discipline,—Messrs. Dwight and Wines, for instance, in this State; F. B. Sanborn and Haynes, in Massachusetts; and governors at least ought to know better than sign bills regulating the public prisons about which the opinion of no expert has been asked.

The subject of removing the Federal Capital to some place in the West is undergoing vigorous agitation, St. Louis being at present the principal competitor for the honor of succeeding Washington. There is really only one objection to the scheme, or rather only one thing to be said in favor of Washington, and that is, that the expense of removal would be enormous, owing to the abandonment of the Government buildings. The Chicago Tribune calculates that new buildings could be erected elsewhere to meet all the wants of the Government for a century to come for $50,000,000; and by deducting from this the amounts that will have to be expended in providing new buildings at Washington during the next few years, it makes out the total cost of removal to be only $10,000,000. It is possible that the Government might provide itself with what buildings it needs for $50,000,000; but surely nobody who reflects on the influences which preside at the planning and execution of great public works can seriously believe that accommodation for the Government would be provided for anything like that sum. But then the expense is, after all, a small matter. The main question in deciding on the propriety of moving, and on the place to move to, is whether anything would be gained by it, politically or morally. Geographical considerations are of little consequence in these days of railroads and telegraphs. Every place is near every other; and the United States may now be said to answer one definition of space, in having its centre everywhere. But the capital ought undoubtedly to be a real city, having a life of its own; and we venture to say, at the risk of making Westerners laugh, that the Federal Government would gain more and do more good by moving to New York than to any other place. We believe indeed that this scheme already has its serious advocates, and their arguments, if not overwhelming, are very strong.

The negotiations about Cuba seem to have advanced one stage, in that the Spaniards have been asked to sell the island for bonds, not exactly to be guaranteed by the United States, but to be paid by customs duties, which the United States are to receive in trust and hand over; but this last assertion is denied. The offer has been refused. Spain, it is said, will not negotiate for a sale as long as the insurrection lasts, and there thus only remains the alternative of getting her to make thorough political reforms in Cuba or beating her out of the island. She is still there; neither "Yellow Jack" nor the various important "movements" which Quesada is constantly said to have on foot have yet driven her out. The exertions of the filibusters have, however, been languishing under the influence of the hot weather or the vigilance of Marshal Barlow, or it may be that the fall will witness a renewal of the terrible "battles" of last spring. But the mere continuance of the insurrection is, for Spain, in her own disorganized condition, a real and it may be fatal cancer. Her finances are in a state which makes war, and above all distant war, little short of madness.

There is no foreign news worth mention except that from China, which consists principally of the address of the foreign merchants to Mr. Ross Browne, and his reply, on which we have commented elsewhere. The Shanghai Newsletter, the American paper published at Shanghai, makes a good deal of what may be called sober fun of the ideas which seem to be springing up here as to the predominating interest of the United States in Chinese trade and in the Chinese welfare, and quotes Consul Medhurst's statistics in support of its criticisms, showing that of imports into China, excluding opium, valued at 31,670,166 taels, the British send 27,765,634, the Americans 833,000; of exports, valued at 39,153,329, the British take 29,221,884, the Americans 4,673,872. Of the Chinese customs revenue, amounting to 2,501,436 taels, the British contribute 2,084,148, and all other nations put together 417,288; of the total foreign trade of the port of Shanghai the Americans contribute just 5 per cent. After citing these figures the Newsletter laughs over Mr. Howard's advice that the President should increase the Legation at Pekin, "in view of the fact that there is to be a sharp competition between the United States and England during the next few years," and asks if he supposes that an increase in the size of the Legation would lead American merchants to bid higher for Chinese goods than they do now.

The Newsletter thinks the bulk of the trade will inevitably belong to England for a long time to come, because she has trained her own people and their near neighbors to drink enormous quantities of tea, and possesses the best ships and a superabundance of capital, for which she can find no employment at home; and because the English have so cheapened their textile fabrics, and adapted them to Eastern wants, that they have almost monopolized Eastern markets. The Americans, on the other hand, have not nearly as much capital as they can profitably employ at home, and are occupied rather in building up domestic manufactures and keeping them alive, than in pushing the sale of their products abroad. The Newsletter mentions, as bearing on the question, "that duplicates of the American letters by the last Pacific mail reached Shanghai by the European route a week before the originals; and that by telegrams viâ London, they knew of the sailing of the Japan, with particulars of her cargo, several days before her arrival." The writer, however, thinks American trade with China may yet, by "wiser laws" —meaning, we presume, the adoption of a free-trade policy—and by increase of population, make cotton fabrics at so low a cost as to take a larger part in supplying Chinese wants; but even that will be more in the nature of an increase of the trade than a division of that already existing.

Mr. Ross Browne has in the meantime been recalled, and is on his way home. A report was circulated here a few days ago that he had announced that the Chinese had refused to ratify the Burlingame treaty, which he has since contradicted, but not in time to prevent his receiving a severe castigation at the hands of some of the great dailies. It came out that he was bribed by the British and French to bring Mr. Burlingame to nought; and this, and a reasonable amount of other baseness on his part, were accounted for by his having been appointed by Andrew Johnson, as if nobody but the most depraved could possibly have entered into the service of the United States during that monster's term of office. Poor Reverdy Johnson suffered in the same way. He was unanimously nominated by the Senate, and went to England with a letter of introduction from Mr. Sumner to John Bright, praising him in terms so ardent that Bright was near going to London in hot haste to look at him as a kind of moral curiosity; but in a few short weeks the poor man had sunk to the grade of a mere creature of "the greatest criminal of the age;" and even Mr. Sumner expressed his astonishment that British statesmen should have entered into negotiations with one so lost, and so utterly without authority or consideration. It must be a curious sensation to go abroad with the applause of one's country men, lead what one considers a sober, moral, and industrious life during one's absence, and then suddenly to open the papers of one's native land and find one's self described as a disgrace to one's home and kindred, and a person to whom a bare subsistence is all that the groaning and indignant earth can possibly owe.

THE DEMOCRATIC PROGRAMME.

We believe we are now in a position to institute an enquiry into the programme of the Democratic party for the coming year or two. We have, besides the platforms of three or four State conventions, the utterances of Mr. Pendleton in Ohio and the utterances of Mr. John Quincy Adams in Massachusetts, and the comments of the Democratic press thereupon; and the inferences which a plain man may draw from them all are, as nearly as possible, these: That opposition to reconstruction—meaning by that the mode in which the Southern States have been restored to their places in the Union—and to its accompaniment, negro suffrage, has been—though it is still mentioned—given up, and will before long not even be spoken of even at "Confedrit Cross-roads;" that there is still a strong hostility to the payment of the public debt in the rank and file of the party, although the leaders are content to mask it under a demand that the bonds should be paid according to "the letter of the contract"—that is, that the majority of them should be paid in greenbacks—Mr. Pendleton, for instance, abusing Mr. Boutwell for buying bonds at a premium when he is entitled to pay them off at par (in paper); that there is a good deal of hostility to prohibitory liquor legislation and to heavy taxation; that there is little, if any, of the old Democratic leaning to free trade, or that, if there is much of it, it is not strong enough or widely diffused enough to find expression; that the party, as a party, has no views on currency or taxation—the only one of its organs which propounds any positive theories on these subjects being the New York World, the "good and regular standing" of which is often doubtful; that it is in a position of great embarrassment about the Chinese immigration—being, on the one hand, impelled to favor it by the desire of swamping the negro, and, on the other hand, impelled to oppose it by the fear of offending the Irishman; that, in the dispute between labor and capital, it is anxious to get along without committing itself, and is discouraged by the eagerness displayed by the Republican politicians to cut down the hours of labor to any required extent, and by the consciousness that, though the laborers supply votes, the capitalists supply the money for the canvass, and that it is as dangerous and less agreeable to alienate the latter than the former. The main article in the creed of the party seems to be, however, that Grant is not a good man for the Presidency, and the strength of most of the Democratic papers is devoted to abusing him, and accusing him of corruption, ignorance, and light-mindedness. About administrative reforms the party says nothing beyond denouncing Republican corruption, which warrants the conclusion that its only remedy is to appoint politicians of its own to the places now held by Republican politicians. Of any attempt to reorganize the Civil Service, or withdraw it from the arena of party politics, it does not speak. On the whole, the only thing the party declarations warrant us in expecting from its accession to power is the substitution of Democratic officials for Republican ones; it does not identify itself with a single legislative change now talked of, or likely to be talked of, and offers us no reason for expecting that, even if it were allowed to fill the public offices, it would display more care in the selection of the public officers than it has ever displayed.

On questions of foreign policy, its attitude appears as meaningless as on questions of domestic policy. The World is singularly clear and able in its treatment of all points of international law; but there is no evidence that the bulk of the party pays much heed to its utterances on this class of subjects. The State platforms contain just as much vague declamation about the duty of protecting the rights of American citizens abroad as seems likely to satisfy, or at least pacify, the Fenians—that is, the most gullible portion of the community; but we have never yet seen in any Democratic speech or article a direct mention of rights of American citizens abroad which the present Administration was not seeking to protect by the negotiations it has concluded with the principal European states. There is in the Fenian mind a lurking suspicion that, amongst the rights of American citizens abroad, is the right of waging private war; and this certainly the Administration shows no sign of protecting; but then the Democratic party has shown no sign of recognizing the existence of any such right. Upon the Alabama matter, none of its organs have called for anything more than payment of actual damages, and nobody denies that Grant's Administration will claim, or has claimed, at least this. No papers have indulged in more ridicule of Mr. Sumner's "rule of damages" than the Democratic papers; and about Cuba we have not as yet seen a certain word from them, except that whatever the President either does or leaves undone is wrong.

In fact, after we have sifted Democratic declarations thoroughly, the only thing substantial left in the way of a policy seems to be hostility to the Government creditors—a disposition either not to pay them at all, or to pay them in paper, in defiance of the understanding when the contract was made, of the uniform practice of the Government, and of all the traditions of the Democratic party, and to reduce the interest by taxing the bonds. All else is mere barren criticism, and much of it positively childish; so that even if the Republican party had no other claim to support, its position as the defender of the public credit against the attacks of repudiators would be sufficient. Here the Democrats offer a positive and unmistakable gain in money to every reckless and dishonest person. They put down on paper the precise sum that may be saved by putting them in power, while all their other promises have no appreciable value. Without this, therefore, it would be hard to say what the party had to offer as a reason for its existence, except a refuge to men of an easy temperament. Its hostility to the prohibitory liquor law in Massachusetts, for instance, does not seem to rest on any principle of government, but expresses simply the desire of "good fellows" to be let alone over their glass and pipe.

Of course, where party lines are sharply drawn, and include the press as well as the voters—newspapers feeling it to be their duty to stand by their own flag through thick and thin—the party in power would be subjected to no criticism whatever if it did not come from the opposition; and even if it had no policy of its own to propose, the Democratic party might, both lately and during the war, have rendered valuable service to the country, both in and out of Congress, simply as a critic of the Administration. A good working, inquisitive, sharp opposition is nearly a necessity in a constitutional state. But the way in which the Democracy has played the part of an opposition has been, as we have often remarked, really lamentable. In Congress, the speeches of the Democratic members were during the war about as effective and pointed as the cackling of so many hens; and since the war the Democratic opposition has consisted mainly in small personalities—the World alone making an attempt to strike serious blows; but even in its case, its habit of allowing its fool to keep jangling his bells and making grimaces all the time its sages are talking takes all weight out of their discourses. It seems almost incredible, but it is nevertheless true, that the main cause of the dissatisfaction of the Democratic press with the Republican Administration of late, if we may judge from the amount of space it has devoted to it, is the visits of the President to the watering-places, and his participation in divers festivities of the summer visitors. There is nevertheless no doubt that the Democratic papers are mostly edited by adults, and that there is nothing peculiar or in any way calculated to cause anxiety to their friends in their daily walk and conversation. We ought in fairness to mention, before closing, one sign of progress that we have seen in one of the Democratic organs, viz., commendation of Mr. Pendleton, of Ohio, for the governorship on the ground of the purity of his morals. As this came from a shrewd politician, there is undoubtedly something hopeful about it; but it remains to be seen what effect it will have on the rank and file.

THE NEW TURN OF AFFAIRS IN CHINA.

We have received from an American correspondent in China, who has from the first been a hearty advocate of the Burlingame Embassy, and has warmly defended it in these columns, and in whose judgment about Chinese policy we have great confidence, a formal expression of his belief that Mr. Burlingame has been greatly deceived by the Chinese Government, and that the facts of the case fully warrant the deductions drawn by Mr. Ross Browne in his recent reply to the address of the foreign residents touching the policy of the Imperial Government and its relations with the Western world, and which have been received here by last mail. The correspondence has, no doubt, been perused by all those who take an interest in this subject, and, whatever may be the differences of opinion on the merits of the question, all will admit that the opinions of the merchants are entitled to consideration as well as those of our late minister—for, however we may question his mode of expressing them, they are without doubt his honest convictions, derived from personal experience and observation. The British merchants justify their own communication to the American minister on the ground that the interests of both peoples in China are inseparably connected—that whatever affects the condition of the one, either favorably or unfavorably, alike affects the other.

Both communications convey to Mr. Browne the most cordial approval of his official course, deplore the mistake of the home governments in yielding to Mr. Burlingame's suggestions, and express great regret that he, Mr. Browne, should have been removed for favoring the only policy which in their judgment is the true one. Mr. Browne's reply, which is addressed in common to both, contains an elaborate exposition of his views upon the China question, and he probably intended it to be a public justification of his course. He could not have expected that his own Government would approve of this, but he probably felt that his mission was at an end, and that he was at liberty to express himself with perfect freedom to any one. He is evidently an earnest and progressive American, who desires to see all other nations practise the intellectual freedom and energy which have accomplished so much for his own country. When he assumed the duties of United States Minister to China, he was under the impression that the Chinese Embassy which he left with us really meant progress; that while Mr. Burlingame was working to that end in Europe and America, he, Mr. Browne, ought to be stimulating the Chinese Government to increased activity in the same direction. He soon found that he had come in contact with the most impassive and rigid conservatism on the face of the earth; that, far from seeing any evidence of a desire for progress, he saw a decided opposition to it—a disposition to seize every opportunity that might offer to restrict rather than to increase intercourse with foreigners; and that nothing but the moral pressure of the foreign ministers in Peking induced the Government to fulfil the treaty engagements which it had already assumed. He plainly, perhaps bluntly and unwisely, suggested to the Imperial Government the adoption of certain measures for the development of the internal wealth of the country, and for the early establishment of railroads and telegraphs, but he found them to be very averse, and at length he observed indications that the leading mandarins were entertaining hopes that the result of their embassy would enable them to repress rather than promote progress. We can easily imagine the disgust of our thorough American envoy when such indications became plainly apparent.

But, with few exceptions, people here, including the members of Congress, have very inadequate conceptions of the true character of the Chinese people and their government, and hence they are unable to indicate the true policy which should govern our relations with them. The arrival of the Chinese Embassy upon our shores, under the leadership of Mr. Burlingame, who at once announced that his mission meant progress, created enthusiastic interest among all classes of our people, who believed that ancient China had immediately come out from the walls within which she had so long been secluded, for the purpose of offering the hand of friendship and of taking her proper place in the family of nations, of establishing reciprocal relations of free and friendly intercourse, and, in the words of her chief envoy, "of interchanging ideas as well as merchandise." But these expectations have been by no means realized; indeed, there is some excuse for the belief that the main object of the mission was quite the opposite of the one we had hoped. A treaty was made in Washington, and it was ratified by the Senate, but we confess our inability to see anything in it that is of any value to us beyond what was already secured by the previous one, while there are some clauses which specifically, and still more by construction, give the Chinese certain rights which they might easily exercise to our disadvantage. It has been eulogized by some writers for the magnanimity which it evinces on the part of our own Government towards the Chinese and because it is altogether in their favor. We consider this a very questionable merit. We were surprised to hear that the Chinese should have hesitated to ratify it, and we are not at all surprised to find the story flatly contradicted.

We should always remember that "the favored nation" clause exists in all the treaties which China has made with the Western nations, and which provides that every treaty power shall enjoy all the rights and privileges which have been, or which hereafter may be, granted to any one of them; but there is no provision that the restrictions which any single power may agree to as applicable to herself are thereby binding in any way upon the others. If the Burlingame treaty ties our own hands in any way—as it surely does—it has no effect upon those who have not entered into like engagements. It is quite certain that none of the European governments will do so, and we shall be left to enjoy exclusion by the merit of our magnanimity towards China in binding ourselves not to attempt to intervene in her domestic affairs in any way—that is, not to help her on in the path of progress. This treaty, if ratified by the Chinese, would very properly be used by them as a complete bar to any suggestion which an American minister might offer respecting internal improvements, and would justify the return of a letter like that of Mr. Browne to Prince Kung unanswered. All the moral influence of progressive America would be ruled out.

It is very well to advocate and practise the duty of applying equal justice to all our dealings with others, and to recognize the independence and sovereignty of all other governments; but while we should always act justly towards other nations, there are instances where yielding to their full sovereignty may be modified. Among the nations of Christendom, the people have so many ideas and habits in common, and their relations with each other are so governed by the rules of civilized international law, that they form a kind of commonwealth, within which the people of any country can freely travel or reside in each, for business or pleasure, and enjoy the common privileges and the equal protection of the laws. Such is not the case between Christendom and the Mohammedan and pagan nations; the maxims and usages of the latter are such that civilized governments have not deemed it safe or honorable to allow the lives and properties of their own people to be left to the uncontrolled jurisdiction of these non-Christians, but have made special treaties in their favor. The higher civilization must often dictate to the lower, and there can be no greater confession of inferiority than the fact that the semi-barbarian nations have accepted this demand for exterritoriality. But under the Burlingame mission China asks to be acknowledged by the governments of Christendom as entitled to that full sovereignty and independence which they claim and exercise for themselves, and that she should be left free to regulate her internal and external affairs in accordance with her own views. This request seems very fair upon its face, and there are many among us who would freely assent to it; but if we should formally agree to this, and act in full accordance with its spirit, we should tear up our present treaties, on the ground that they were extorted from her by violence, and then leave her to grant such terms of intercourse as only her own pleasure would dictate. In such an event, the Chinese would surely re-establish the old régime that existed in Canton in the days of Governor Loo and Lord Napier, and would subject us to every ignominious restraint they might fancy, under pain of expulsion.

The trading people of China, like those of all other nations, undoubtedly desire freedom of trade with all; but the literati or governing class are devotedly attached to the traditions and usages of thirty centuries; they yielded only to irresistible force, and they would gladly re-establish the ancient exclusive policy. It now looks as if the real object of the Burlingame mission was not progress, but an endeavor to make some treaties by which they might at least check any further encroachments on the part of foreigners, and even gradually to restrict them in some degree in the use of privileges already granted. We have no idea that Mr. Burlingame so understood it; for we believe that he really desires to see China come out of her circle of exclusiveness, and maintain free and equal intercourse with all nations, and adopt the literature and science of the West; but he wishes her to be left alone, to make the advance in her own way and time. The foreign residents in China, almost without exception, deem this a fatal policy, and that, if left without pressure from abroad, she will never advance a step. Such is also the opinion of Mr. Browne. The impression that the Burlingame policy had completely taken possession of the home governments is the cause of that extreme dissatisfaction so apparent in the correspondence under our notice.

If Mr. Burlingame is to blame at all, it is for drawing rather too highly colored pictures of Chinese civilization. That he did so honestly, we have not the least doubt; and that Chinese civilization is of a kind to produce a deep impression on the Western imagination, and therefore to excite very false expectations with regard to it, is also very certain. But, no matter how the affair may end, he will be entitled to the credit of having made a really noble effort to establish between the Chinese Empire and Christendom relations in which the former might find refuge from a long period of anarchy, in which nearly everything that is valuable in Chinese civilization will be lost; for if, through any cause, the empire should be broken up, anarchy must ensue; no Western power has the means of assuming the reins of government; and even if any Western power ventured to undertake the task, it would take many years to effect even a partial reorganization of so vast a body.

One of the signs of what the foreign residents consider the perfidy of the Chinese, and which has made most impression on them, is the great increase in the number of attacks on foreigners which have taken place within the last few months; and they anticipate, and not unnaturally, this increase to continue should the European powers, as well as the United States, persist in their determination to refer all such cases for redress to the Imperial Government at Peking, through diplomatic channels, instead of, as heretofore, seeking satisfaction from the local authorities at the cannon's mouth. Men who pass their nights and days surrounded by swarms of Chinese, and who have reached, no matter through what channel, the conclusion that the Imperial Government is engaged in a great game of humbug, and has no desire, even if it had the ability, to make the sojourn of foreigners in its dominions either safe or comfortable, are of course very likely to be just now extremely nervous and suspicious, and to put a worse construction on Chinese doings than they merit. As our readers know, we believe thoroughly in the power of justice and fair dealing over everybody—barbarian, Scythian, bond, and free—and believe that they have never yet been fairly tried on the Chinese; but we nevertheless confess we attach a good deal of importance to the opinions of European and American residents in China on Chinese affairs. There is something very amusing in the scornful indignation with which some of our writers, in New York and elsewhere, knowing very little more of China than of the moon, treat any opinions of the Christian residents there which clash with any à priori conclusions we happen to have formed here of what our policy towards China ought to be, or what the Chinese are likely to do. To read some of the diatribes heaped upon them, one would imagine that anybody who had lived ten or twenty years in China as an American or English merchant was ipso facto disqualified for forming or expressing any opinion whatever on Chinese politics, government, or society, and that the true sources of light on all such questions were writers in the home papers here who had "got themselves up" on China out of Appleton's Encyclopædia and missionary reports. We do not think traders, established in factories on semi-barbarous shores, are always enlightened or impartial judges of what is going on in the country in which their lot is cast, or that their opinions are by any means always uncolored by selfishness; but we must say we have never seen anything in the character and standing of American residents in China to cause us to pay no attention to what they say on a subject about which they possess all the knowledge there is to be had, about which few other persons possess any knowledge whatever, and on which knowledge is extraordinarily difficult to get.

FINANCIAL ADVERTISEMENTS.

In looking over the rows and columns of widespread "financial" advertisements contained nowadays in almost every paper of any circulation, many persons are reminded of the unceasing growth of our national and individual activity, some will reflect upon the profitableness of enterprises that can afford such lavish expense, and here and there one will speculate upon the handsome income the newspapers derive therefrom. But who troubles himself about what, after all, is to the general public, or at least should be, the most important consideration, namely, the manner in which these costly advertisements affect the honesty, the truth, the independence of the press? It is not too much to say that there is no power in the Government, in the parties, or the church, that can influence the press as effectually as the financial class do by means of their advertising patronage. Far be it from us to assert that the financial classes, as a rule, seek to corrupt the press; still less that the press, as a rule, is venal; but undoubtedly the system of financial advertising has been developed to a degree of perfection that almost destroys the dividing line between a business bargain and downright bribery. Few persons have any idea of the insidious influence over the press acquired by means of this system. There are, to begin with, a certain class of journals devoted to financial and business specialties, that have an extended list of subscribers, who frequently are called on very irregularly, or not at all, for their subscriptions. As long as these so-called subscribers allow the paper to be brought into their offices, to lie on their tables and desks, and thus be seen habitually in respectable places, that is all that is required of them. These papers form the very ground-work of the fabric to be reared. To them are given the first advertisements of any new enterprise about to be brought before the public in the orthodox way. The bargain between the publisher and the advertiser generally reads: so many dollars per week for a whole column of advertising and half a column of editorial notice, the editorial notice to be furnished by the advertiser. In these papers the advertiser is not restricted by any consideration, except his own views of what is politic. He may state, editorially, what he pleases. If his assertions are controverted by correspondents, the letters are not published as long as the advertiser is willing to pay for keeping them out. If other journals deny his statements, he can expose their venality and corruption in his next "editorial." Such a paper is owned, body and soul, by any one who chooses to pay a certain number of dollars a column for advertising in it; and yet such papers, by means of a variety of useful information not readily found elsewhere, and of a forced circulation, manage to maintain a certain interest and an uncertain respectability, without which they would be useless as a vehicle for the financial advertiser. The financial agent of any new scheme—a mining company, a railroad, a life-insurance company, a steamship line—begins his course with an illustrated, monogrammed, or otherwise noticeable advertisement in the Broad Street Press or the Weekly Steamship, accompanied by a modest editorial, full of latent and compressed enthusiasm, setting forth, amid statistical tables and historical parallels, the undoubted merits and glorious future of the new undertaking.

Of course it is not expected that this glowing account will be extensively read in the obscure journals in which it is published. It is indeed not published to be read; it is only published to be quoted. A day or two after the first appearance of the advertisement in the Broad Street Press, the advertising agent appears at the office of some of the respectable but struggling dailies or weeklies, and, after bargaining for a month's advertising, makes the stipulation that the paper shall occasionally copy and insert semi-editorially extracts from other papers in relation to the new company, which will be kindly furnished by the agent himself. In this way many a newspaper editor, striving to be honest and fair, is yet induced to reprint an outrageous puff from the Weekly Steamship, and soothes his conscience with the excuse that every reader sees that the paragraph is an extract from another paper, is not endorsed by him at all, and is given merely as a piece of general news. In this paper the notice copied from the editorial furnished to the Weekly Steamship by the company's advertising agent begins to do mischief; for many of its readers do not discriminate between extracts and editorials, some fail to notice that it is an extract, many have confidence in the paper, and some know the editor personally and believe in his honesty and financial shrewdness. But this is only a very insignificant portion of the effect aimed at; for the individuals induced to subscribe money to any enterprise by this class of journals are comparatively few in number and limited in means. The main purpose of inserting the advertisement and puff in the feebler dailies and weeklies is to gain access thereby to the principal journals in the large cities all over the country, the great leaders of public opinion, the papers having the largest circulation. These have to be approached with considerable caution and tact. First, the financial editor, whose business it is to give information on such topics, is invited to examine the scheme. He is requested to call attention in a general way to the advertisement "in another column," and to notice how favorably the undertaking is commented upon by the whole press, especially the highly respectable but not over-flourishing daily and weekly papers referred to. The financial editor is noted everywhere for his affability. His professional success depends upon his popularity with the men from whom financial information is obtained. He knows the high character and business standing of the firms having the new undertaking in charge. He has confidence in their representations. He recommends investment in the enterprise as one that cannot fail of success, and his recommendation carries considerable weight. Few people, however, read the financial column of any paper; it is the grave editorial on the fourth page, that every one believes to have been written by the editor-in-chief, that carries the day. Armed with all the endorsements of the press, the advertising agent now approaches the editorial sanctum of the chief editor and proprietor of the Daily Thunderer. The enterprise itself is undoubtedly sound, the financial editor of the Thunderer has already endorsed it, and—although this, of course, is a consideration of no moment—the advertisement of the company will be worth $500 a month. And next day there appears in the editorial columns of that widely read and trusted journal a gross puff of an enterprise which in itself may be most profitable and desirable, but of the real merits of which the editor is totally incapable of judging.

We have no idea of suggesting ever so remotely that any one of the important enterprises which have had the public support and confidence during the last few years of stupendous activity has failed to merit that confidence, or that any of the numerous enterprises now before the people are other than sound and eminently safe. We are totally incompetent to express an opinion thereon; but what we do suggest and assert is, that the system by which the editorial endorsement of such schemes is obtained is unsound, demoralizing, and totally destructive of the independence and usefulness of the press.

The ability to judge of the value of any kind of security as a permanent investment is by no means common; the knowledge necessary to form such judgment is acquired only by special study; neither the ability nor the knowledge comes naturally to the editorial fraternity. On the contrary, their ability in that particular direction is, in the very nature of things, apt to be limited; while the knowledge which they may acquire is almost in every single instance derived from the very parties in interest, and is generally accompanied by an advertising fee, which inevitably predisposes the most incorruptible of men in favor of the person or enterprise offering it. On this account, all recommendations in the press of any security whatsoever should be looked upon as valueless, and, whenever accompanied by liberal advertising, as actually suspicious. Such opinions are not only valueless and open to suspicion, but they may be actually mischievous. That editorial jewel, consistency, binds the newspaper man to adhere eternally to an opinion once expressed—to adhere to it not only in the columns of his paper, but in the daily intercourse of private life. The enterprise which he honestly recommended yesterday, to-day may seem doubtful. He cannot now admit that he gave that warm support on insufficient information. He accepted the liberal advertising fee with the implied obligation of editorial endorsement. He cannot now turn round and stab his client in the back. He has to stand by the judgment once uttered, and continue to praise, though he may doubt if praise be merited; and thus, from unintentionally misleading his readers, he gradually drifts into conscious deceit.

Of course there are journals, here and elsewhere, whose commendation cannot be purchased at any price. Two or three of our great dailies are notoriously above suspicion; but they maintain themselves free from taint solely by absolutely and entirely abstaining from all reference to any financial enterprise advertising in their columns. In no other way can any newspaper maintain its independence, its self-respect, its usefulness, and the confidence of its readers. But even in these cases the financial advertisement exercises a powerful influence over all but the most resolute and unflinching. It is not only positive support and endorsement that the advertiser claims, he also stifles adverse criticism. Not only must the paper refrain from unfavorable comment upon the special scheme advertised, but it must not eve reflect upon other similar schemes. An exposure of the mismanagement of one life-insurance company has been known to deprive respectable journal of every life-insurance advertisement in its columns. A reflection upon the conduct of a railroad company caused one paper to lose the advertisement even of the time-table of all railways, while another more recently was, in addition, denied the sale upon the cars of the road unfavorably mentioned. Few people form any idea of the value of such advertisements as a source of income to the newspapers. When a large life-insurance company, recently organized in this city and elsewhere, with a capital of one million of dollars, held its first meeting of directors, it was resolved to spend at once one hundred thousand dollars, ten per cent. of its capital, in advertising. Another life-insurance company of great wealth and old standing is recently said to have expended nearly fifty thousand dollars in less than two months in advertising an extract from its annual report. Advertising agents estimate the expenses of the Union Pacific Railroad at certainly not less than several hundred thousand dollars for advertising its bonds. Any one familiar with the cost of advertisements can point to half-a-dozen enterprises that are at this moment expending from five to ten thousand dollars a month in recommending their securities to the public. It is easy to see that the financial advertisements of the present day constitute one of the principal sources of income for the whole press.

To lose this income is, of course, a serious blow, even to the wealthy daily papers; it is annihilation to the weaker ones. What confidence, then, can the public have in the recommendations of financial enterprises contained in newspapers that so largely depend upon those enterprises for their support? Evidently none. What can financial enterprises gain by recommendations that must ever be exposed to the suspicion of being bought? Evidently nothing. The bargain between the newspaper and the advertiser is simple. The advertiser pays for the privilege of submitting his advertisement to so many thousand persons at the expense of the newspaper. Anything beyond this is corrupt and dishonorable, and opens the way for the gravest frauds. It is high time that a healthy public opinion should be awakened on this subject. Without it, the weaker newspapers will become the merest tools of financial advertisers, and even the stronger ones will not long be able to maintain their purity. Let it once be understood that an editorial recommendation of any financial enterprise advertised in the same is necessarily corrupt, and there will soon be an end to the present debasing system; and no one will have better reason to be pleased than the sound and substantial concerns whose meritorious undertakings need only to be brought to the attention of the public to secure at once its support and co-operation. The editor who, without more knowledge than any editor can pretend to have, recommends any security as a safe investment to widows, orphans, and aged persons, is guilty of one of the most heartless and inexcusable of frauds.

THE BOAT-RACE.

We doubt if many people have rightly appreciated the difficulties with which the American crew had to contend last Friday—although one or two journals, the World certainly, pointed them out early in the season—because few understand the extent to which what may be called the athletic mania prevails among the upper classes in England. The state of things among them at this moment is one the like of which has probably never elsewhere been seen. In more than one of the great public schools—Eton at the head of the list—the time and attention of a large portion of the boys are occupied almost exclusively with boating and cricket, the studies of the school being treated by them as of little or no consequence, and the acquisition of skill in outdoor amusements being set down as the principal object of being at the school; and all this not only with the connivance, but the approval, of the masters. Indeed, the other day an advertisement for an assistant master appeared in an English paper, in which good bowling was mentioned as an essential qualification; and at Eton a considerable portion of the time of the masters is taken up with teaching the boys cricket and rowing; and it is by his excellence in these that a boy's standing in the school is measured. Success in study is not treated as a merit at all unless accompanied by skill in athletic sports; it was testified before an Endowed Schools Commission that, years ago, a studious boy "was not thought the worse of" for being studious if he was good in the cricket-field or on the water. In fact, the public schools of England at this moment are little better than gymnasia in the literal sense of that term. Many of the masters profess to deplore this state of things, but say they cannot help it. The great increase in the national wealth has crowded the schools with the sons of the nouveaux riches, who are anxious to have their children associate with the children of the older aristocracy, and to acquire their tastes and habits; and, as long as they do this, do not care about their receiving any mental training whatever. The origin of the evil, however, goes a good way further back. The ideal youth of the landed class in England has never been a youth who knew a good deal, but a manly, truthful, reserved, plucky fellow. The eldest sons were of course not expected to do anything for a living, and would have scorned even the appearance of qualifying themselves to earn one. For the younger sons, on the other hand, there existed the army and navy, and the diplomatic and Indian and Civil Service, and in none of these were educational qualifications of any kind exacted. Places and promotion in them were got by favor and connection, not by education; and as far as mere personal quality went, a man got on better in them by the possession of certain moral and physical traits than any mental ones. The schools, consequently, prepared the kind of man which the upper classes of English society called for, to which there would have been no special objection on the part of other people, if the upper classes had not coolly appropriated the rich endowments left for the instruction of the poor, and used them in fitting up and carrying on these curious institutions for their own sons.

The habits and ideas of the schools have of course been carried to the universities. During the recent Parliamentary enquiry into their condition, many graduates of the highest standing—Mr. Charles Roundell, secretary of the Jamaica Commission, for one, himself a boating man—expressed in strong terms their sense of the injurious effect, both on scholarship and character, of the prevailing rage for athletic sports. They occupy by far the larger share of the time and interest and attention of the larger portion of the students of Oxford and Cambridge, leading to a sort of ill-concealed contempt for knowledge, and a deep and deepening worship of muscle; and several of the witnesses spoke in strong terms of the brutalizing effect of this on the tone of the students; others, too, have found no difficulty in connecting it with the mode of suppressing the Indian mutiny and the Jamaica rebellion, and with the attitude of the upper classes of late years towards weak people of all races.

Now the general effect of this is, that most of the English boys at least of three of the great public schools and two of the universities may be said to be training for a boat-race from the age of twelve to twenty-four. They live during these twelve years in a society in which little but rowing, cricketing, riding, and shooting are talked; in which the things which make for muscle, wind, and bottom are constant subjects of experiment and discussion; in which all the niceties of rowing are as familiar as daily practice and precept and the traditions of three or four generations can make them; and in which muscular vigor and dexterity may be said to be transmitted from father to son. The consequence is, that the captain of a Cambridge or Oxford University crew has, it is fair to say, his pick of about a thousand young men in first-rate physical and moral "condition." We do not mean, of course, that he actually chooses out of that number; but the dozen he does choose from have been presented to him by a process of natural sifting performed on the whole body.

If we contrast this state of things with that in which the Harvard crew was formed, we shall have some idea of the unfavorable conditions under which the Americans rowed the late race; even if we leave out of sight altogether the change of climate, food, and water, and the presence of a vast multitude whose sympathies were with the other side—no unimportant matter, as everybody knows who has ever had to struggle, with nerves at high tension, for anything whatever, under unfriendly eyes. The taste for athletic sports in America is not over fifteen years old. It is only within the last ten or twelve years that it can be said to have found a firm foothold in the colleges. Even now the schools do little to encourage it, and most boys come up to Harvard and Yale in complete ignorance of boating and most other outdoor games, though base-ball has been of late years a good deal cultivated. At both colleges, too, the number of students who cultivate rowing is small, very small; it costs money, and the mass are poor; it costs time, and the mass are busy preparing to earn their living at the earliest possible moment. The consequence is that a dozen is, perhaps, as many as the captain of a crew has to choose from, and this dozen have comparatively little experience, and no great boating traditions—which, as regards morale, is no light matter—behind them.

All this is to be taken into account, not in judging the American crew which rowed last Friday's race, but in judging the value of the race as a test of the comparative capacity of the two universities, or of the physical endurance of the young men of the two countries. To try this question fairly, we shall probably have to wait a few years longer—till base-ball and other sports have raised the physical value of the contributions of the schools to the universities here, and till the taste for boating is diffused amongst a larger class in the universities. This will give a wider field of selection in making up the crews, and will probably furnish in them a better index of American prowess than is now possible. We need hardly say that we do not by all this mean to insinuate any disparagement of the gallant fellows who last week represented Harvard on the Thames. We looked, if not for victory, for even a closer result than actually occurred, and we shall need more details than are now in our possession before we can form anything like an accurate judgment of the causes of the defeat. Upon the facts, as now known to us, it would appear, however, that it was neither the American stroke nor strength that was at fault; that the direct cause of the failure was a want of bottom; and bottom is, perhaps, the thing of all others which is most dependent, let the physical constitution be ever so good, on diet, climate, and surroundings. It is largely a matter of nerves, and, therefore, very readily affected by slight and even imperceptible influences. The over-excitement caused by preparation for an arduous task in a strange milieu, and still more by its performance in a comparatively unfamiliar scene, before a foreign and necessarily hostile audience, would account readily for the failure of the Harvards to maintain to the end the tremendous pace which they led during the first part of the race. Considering everything, no American need contemplate it without pride, and we may feel assured the spectacle has been by no means what Englishmen looked for when the challenge was first given.

As regards the future, there is of course little doubt that the trial will be repeated. In fact, it is not improbable that we shall before long witness periodical competitions between English and American universities; but to ensure something like an equality of conditions, either the state of society in America would have to be greatly changed—a large and rich class of the population literally going into training, fathers, mothers, sons, and all—or the field of selection have to be greatly extended in making up the crews. The American crew ought really in fairness to contain the rowing cream of all the American colleges, and even then it would suffer from want of experience, because it is neither likely nor desirable that we shall ever see in any American university as large a supply of rowing men as Oxford and Cambridge contain.

The difference of climate, and other differences of surroundings, must still remain. Whether Americans go to England to row, or Englishmen come here, a certain inequality, and often a serious one, must be caused by the change of air and diet; and every crew must suffer from having the banks lined with unfriendly witnesses. Yale suffers from it every year at Worcester—suffers from it so much that Harvard ought in fairness to consent to change the course at least every alternate year; Harvard suffered from it on the Thames; if Englishmen came here to row, they would, owing to certain peculiarities in the national character, probably suffer from the newness of their surroundings far more than Americans. The Englishman, though wonderfully adventurous, is not by any means an adaptable animal; and in foreign countries, no matter how amiable he may be, undergoes an immense amount of nervous tear and wear from mere exposure to novelties of one sort or other. This difficulty can, of course, never be overcome entirely. If, as we think by no means unlikely, there should eventually be an Anglo-Saxon Olympic—bringing together the rowers, batters, bowlers, yachters, runners, leapers of the race for a trial of strength, once in four years, from all parts of the world—some, if not all, would inevitably have to suffer a good many serious inconveniences. All could not enjoy their native air, their familiar diet, and the shouts of admiring friends, and the uncertainty there will always prevail as to the exact effect of external changes on the physical powers, will always make these trials in a measure unsatisfactory, and may make them a source of perennial contention. The party which leaves its home will always expect a good deal of allowance to be made for it, and the party which stays at home be unwilling to make any, and hence will flow more or less bickering and discontent. By taking up all the little differences, and exag-gerating them, and inflaming all disputes by throwing in a little abuse of its own, the press on both sides of the water may make these international games curses to the human race, instead of benefits to either country. The English press has only to assume a sniffing, incredulous tone every time Americans offer to try conclusions with Englishmen in some field of activity which Englishmen exclusively have hitherto cultivated, and the American press has only to suspect John Bull of a constant and incurable desire to cheat, and threaten to take "the stiffening out of him," to drive every lover of his kind into wishing before long for a revival of the old monkish contempt for the body.

WAS IT A MYSTIFICATION?

We presume that the public has nearly supped full of the horrors of the Stowe-Byron business, and are ready to turn away surfeited from the loathly topic—at least, until it is sent back in a rehash from London, and the appetite is revived by the new sauces with which the old scandal may be served up. The truth of Mrs. Stowe's story seems to have been almost universally denied by the press. Some think Lady Byron had lost her senses by brooding over her wrongs, and that this story was a figment of her disordered brain. One or two have taken the ground that it was a pure invention of deliberate wickedness, laid by until everybody that could contradict it was dead, and the author of it as well, so that she could not be called to account for it. She has been treated somewhat as Byron says he was by his wife, under the metonymy of Don José and Donna Inez in "Don Juan:"

> "Failing to prove that she was 'mad,'
> They next decided she was only bad."

And this is one of the cleaving mischiefs of Mrs. Stowe's story, that it lays Lady Byron open to this imputation to the end of time, preposterous as the suggestion seems to all that knew her personally or through common friends of unquestioned authenticity. Perhaps the most comical of all the denials of this particular crime of Byron's—if a smile may be permitted when dwelling on so grave a subject—are those resting on his poems to his sister and the allusions to her in different parts of his works! As if a man capable of such a crime were not capable also of employing his prodigious powers to hide it from the world, and perhaps partially even from himself, by the charms and graces of his poetry!

Now, no one can be more desirous than are we that the perfume should be restored to those delicious flowers of song, and that they should not be changed into loathsome weeds springing out of the foulest corruption, from which every pure mind must turn with disgust. We trust that every trace of the trail of this serpent may be made to disappear from those sweet blossoms whose fragrance has always seemed to smell the most of heaven of all in the magic wreaths of the poet. And we will contribute our conjecture towards this lustration. We confess that we could at first see no way of escape from the acceptance of Lady Byron's explanation of the cause of her conduct at the time of the separation. It was impossible not to believe that she firmly believed the fact to be in substance—though it could not have been in form—as Mrs. Stowe has given it to the world, and it was hard to believe that she should believe this without sufficient evidence. The perfect explanation which this story gave to every part of the mystery which had hung for so many years over this transaction, as we showed last week, was a strong corroboration of her statement. But it has occurred to us that there is yet another hypothesis, which we have not yet seen broached, not improbable in itself or inconsistent with the characters of the principal parties, which would clear away the thick and gloomy shadows which now brood over them, and leave them as they were before this murky cloud gathered about them. We would submit whether this delusion on the part of Lady Byron—for such we would most joyfully believe it to be—may not have had its origin in a mystification on the part of her husband? His whole poetical character, as the wandering Childe, is one entire and perfect mystification. He was no such kind of a man as he shadows himself forth in "Childe Harold." Dallas, while he does not deny that Byron was a debased youth, declares that all the particulars of his life as given in the first Canto are merely fanciful. He had not the fortune to support such a state of things. And the moody, melancholy youth which he personated in the poem was merely masquerading for effect. Either Dallas or Medwin—or both, for we have not their books at hand—tells us that he used at times to hint to his friends that he had been guilty of some frightful crime, remorse for which was gnawing at his heart. This style of mystification in his poems and in his life was to try and make people think him worse even than he was—a most superfluous extravagance, one would think.

Now, is it impossible that, in some one of the moods of mind which he used to gratify by these dark intimations to his friends, he may have tried the same game on his wife? May he not have first hinted this horror, or plainly told it to her, to try his power over her, to see the effect it would have on her nerves, and to gratify whatever morbid instinct it might be which prompted him to his other blackenings of himself? His whole life shows him to have been destitute of all proper delicacy of feeling which it might be supposed would have prevented his using his sister's name in such a connection. Though a genius of the highest order, he was also a blackguard of the lowest. He was more than "half dust," though what he had of "deity" was far beyond the range of most great geniuses. There was nothing to hinder his telling this tale of horror if the freak took him. Was there anything to hinder his wife from believing it? On this point, every one must form his own opinion according to his opportunities of making it up. We know there are persons into whose head, as Charles Lamb said (or was it Sidney Smith?), a joke could not be got without a surgical operation. It is barely possible that Lady Byron may have been of this order. There are others, and sensible people too, who will believe any statement, however absurd, if it be made with a grave face. There is no great credence to be given to Byron's caricature of his wife as Donna Inez; but that her turn of mind was mathematical and scientific rather than imaginative may perhaps be received even on his authority. That she was a pure-minded, benevolent, excellent person, of considerable talents, but rather matter-of-fact and prosaic in her temperament, seems to be the general impression made on the average of people that knew her. Such a person is often the very fittest one to play such poor trick upon.

That she did not believe it to be a sane statement at first, as we have said formerly, there is good ground for believing. But the fact of her husband's sanity established, what ground had she of doubting his statement? And as for the lack of evidence, is not the confession of a criminal the very highest kind of evidence against him? What did she need more? The whole question resolves itself into one as to her veracity, which, we imagine, hardly any one will seriously or permanently doubt. If her testimony were to what she had seen and known, we should hold the case closed and conviction assured. But where it is only to what she believed, the question is still open as to whether she were right or wrong in her belief. We shall probably never know what it was that came to her knowledge between the 8th and the 15th of January. It may have been proof of the crime, indeed. But, on the other hand, it may have been only evidence which convinced her of her husband's sanity, and so of the sufficiency of his confession. And thus it may be true that Byron really did not know the reason of the separation. He may have been "getting drunk with Sheridan" when he told the story, and have entirely forgotten it. Or he may not have supposed it possible that his wife would seriously believe it. If there be a shadow of doubt, as surely it must be allowed there is, let him have the benefit of it, and yet more his sister. This idea has been a comfortable one to ourselves, and we throw it out for the benefit of others. But it is a calamity to all concerned, whether true or not, that Lady Byron ever allowed this story to be told. She should have let it die with her—for the imputations from which it frees her, if believed, were trifling ones, that did not touch her good name in any way. That good name will be none the brighter for the telling of this tale, be it true or false.

Correspondence.

WHAT THE HARVARD UNIVERSITY LECTURES REALLY WILL BE.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: You and your correspondents have two or three times mentioned, with interest and approval, the proposed course of university lectures at Harvard College. The hopes, however, as well as the fears expressed in regard to the undertaking seem to show that neither they nor you have exactly apprehended its real purpose and spirit. It is spoken of as an important and rather novel course of lectures by really able men, affording an agreeable variety of entertainment and culture for persons of leisure in the neighborhood of Cambridge, and one which may at any rate be made serviceable to the undergraduates on the spot, if the somewhat excessive fee of $150 does not keep them away. As for people at a distance, they are hardly likely to go so far to hear lectures read, which, by waiting a year or two, they will probably have a chance of reading to themselves. The natural inference from this presentation of the subject, though it is an inference you kindly refrain from drawing, is that the experiment, although interesting in itself, and especially so as marking the infusion of new blood into the veins of our oldest university, does not concern the general public, and must owe what little success it is likely to achieve to local favor and patronage.

This conclusion would be just, and indeed inevitable, if the scheme were just such as you suppose. In point of fact, it is as unlike as possible. It does not, in the first place, contemplate a series of popular lectures, easy expositions of difficult subjects, like those of the Sorbonne and the Collége de France. These have their place; but it is not a place the universities of this country need go out of their way to fill, so long as their more serious and legitimate work remains undone. Nor is it proposed to use this means to stimulate in the undergraduates a livelier interest in their work. Changes and reforms are doubtless to be looked for with this object in view, but the present undertaking is not among them. Its purpose is not so much to improve the methods of the academic cultus as to extend its range, to cover new and higher ground, and to offer to those who have accomplished their college course, or otherwise mastered the elements of a liberal culture, an opportunity of pursuing into the higher regions of scholarship the education they have begun. It has been the reproach of American schooling that, while it has provided abundantly for the lower education, it has not offered the means of pursuing a single subject of thought into its highest branches. The establishment of various schools of pure and applied science has done something to redeem us from this reproach, so far as concerns the exact and natural sciences. But in literature and philosophy, except so far as the ground is covered by the advanced courses at New Haven, our students have still to look abroad if they wish for any assistance in carrying their studies beyond the elementary text-books. This is not because we have no men of literary or philosophical eminence, but because there has existed no means of bringing these students to their feet. It is this want that these lectures, or lessons, as you will observe that they are called, as better conveying the idea of personal counsel and instruction, are intended to supply. It is clear that, if they are properly adapted to this end, they are unsuited to boys in college, and almost equally so to the general body of the intelligent public. They constitute, in fact, in the branches of which they treat, a system of post-graduate instruction, and are intended, with the study necessary to enable the student to profit by them, to occupy the whole of his time and attention for the thirty or forty weeks they cover. This means serious, hard work—such work as neither the undergraduates nor the general public have time or inclination for. It may turn out that there is really nobody in the country that cares to work in this way. It may be that nobody really cares enough about philosophy, for example, to give up a year to its study, even under the inspiration and guidance and personal advice and direction of the best men, take them altogether, that the country affords—very much the best men that it has been found practicable to unite in this service. If so, the experiment will fail; but those who have projected it and those who have consented to take part in it will have the satisfaction of knowing that the fault lies with the community for lack of zeal, not with themselves for slackness in duty. But if there are found half-a-dozen, men or women, young or old, to respond to this call, the experiment will have succeeded. It will prove that there is in this country a demand for a higher culture, and the college will be encouraged to extend the scheme, and to establish permanent instruction not in literature and philosophy alone, but in all the humanities—political economy, for instance—the fine arts, philology, politics, or jurisprudence.

In this point of view, it is plain enough that what interest the undertaking possesses is general, and not local; and that it immediately concerns a small and special class of serious students, wherever found, who are willing to pursue for a year a really scholastic life. The work is not less important or the instruction less valuable than in the professional schools. The fees are the same as in them. The real pecuniary obstacle to such students, as in the case of those schools, lies not in the amount of the fees, but in the expense of supporting life during a year of unproductive labor. The fees, as it is, are likely to afford only a nominal compensation to the lecturers. In this connection, indeed, it is to be observed that a considerable pecuniary sacrifice is involved in the regulation that prevents attendance upon the lessons of any special instructor. The income that might be derived from thus casually entertaining the general public is deliberately foregone for the sake of the students—select, though few—whose work could not fail to be interrupted by the irregular attendance of an exoteric crowd. It is wise, also, to protect the lecturers themselves from the perplexities, not to say temptations, that a mixed audience presents. This restriction is a guaranty to those who may be proposing to avail themselves of these privileges that no pains will be spared to prevent the scheme being diverted from its purpose and to maintain the high character proposed for it.

The substance of some of this instruction may ultimately, it may be presumed, find its way into print in one form or another; but, even if this could be done at once, it is not what the student needs. What he needs is not one book the more, written by however learned and advanced a thinker, but the thinker himself. There is an advantage to be gained from personal contact with scholars quite beyond what can be got from their writings. It is that they may furnish this that seats of learning exist, and it is this in great part that distinguishes men educated at college from the self-educated. For men in colleges whose poverty obliges them to teach the students by herds, this advantage is not altogether lost. It is fully enjoyed only in the case of absolutely private instruction; but lessons given to small and select classes, such as these promise to be, are the next best thing, and are a much better sort of thing than has hitherto been publicly offered. Two or three lessons a week in successive courses, covering three or four weeks apiece, taking up not the commonplaces of information, on which the student may equally well inform himself by his reading, but special points of interest—each treated by a man specially qualified to discuss it—promise to fill a year's time as profitably and agreeably as the student could desire. AMICUS CURIÆ.

BOSTON, August 27, 1869.

A MISTRANSLATION BY LORD BYRON.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mrs. Stowe's promulgation of a hideous story, long current in secret, yet little believed, has had among other effects that of making some of us re-read our Byron with additional interest. In the course of such a re-perusal, I have just stumbled upon a queer mistake. The accuracy and power of Byron's versions from the Italian would never lead one to suspect him of inaccuracy in a kindred tongue; yet in his ballad of "Alhama," we find the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth stanzas thus rendered:

"'He who holds no laws in awe,
He must perish by the law;
And Granada must be won
And thyself with her undone.'

"Fire flashed from out the old Moor's eyes;
The monarch's wrath began to rise,
Because he answered, and because
He spake exceeding well of laws.

"'There is no law to say such things
As may disgust the ear of kings.'
Thus, snorting with his choler, said
The Moorish king and doomed him dead."

The second of these stanzas runs thus in the original:

"Fuego por los ojos vierte
El Rey que esto oyera,
Y como el otro de leyes,
De leyes tambien hablava"—

that is, literally:

"The king who heard this darted fire from his eyes, and, as the other (had spoken) of laws, he spoke of laws also"—

or, metrically:

"Then the monarch's eyes flashed fire;
What he heard had moved his ire,
And what of laws the other said,
He turned back on the old man's head."

Byron's mistake seems to have originated in taking tambien—"also"—as if it were two words: tan bien—"so well." I believe this portion (though not the whole) of the mistranslation has already been noticed by some critic. CARL BENSON.

A WORD FOR CRICKET.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It is so very seldom that any but a sporting paper concerns itself about the game of cricket in this country, that your incidental remarks on it in the Nation of the 26th inst. have excited particular comment amongst cricketers.

You rather put it that a man would lie if he said "that cricket is to-day one whit more in favor with the ball-playing public than it was thirty years ago." But being backed by a numerous and muscular body of cricketers in these parts, I make bold to say that, and invite you to come on—come on to Germantown, that is, and see the next match. Thirty years ago, cricket had not been heard of here, unless dimly as an English "institution;" but now, on the beautiful ground of the "Germantown" or "Young America" club, you may sit in the shade of fine old trees on a match-day and see a pretty sight, keenly enjoyed by hundreds of lookers-on, lots of pretty girls among them.

Philadelphia and Germantown maintain three first-class cricket clubs, "The Philadelphia," "The Germantown," and "The Young America," each of which has defeated the "St. George" club of New York. There are certainly 500 members of these three clubs. This is a ball-playing community, yet there are not three first-class base-ball clubs in Philadelphia and its vicinity.

Cricket in New York holds about the same relation to American cricket that the ships in Philadelphia held to American shipping before the war; and the reason is not far to seek. Did you ever go over to the "St. George" cricket ground at West Hoboken? It only takes two hours to get there from upper Broadway; and the journey includes omnibus ride, ferry-boat, horse-car through bad smells on New Jersey flats, a long drag up a steep hill, and then a walk of some distance.

Permit a cricket ground in Central Park, on the plain where the Paris-like shepherd feeds his flock, and you will soon have in New York a swarm of your best young men playing cricket—who do not now, and probably never will, play base-ball—who have leisure for cricket, and spend their leisure in no better way. No one supposes that cricket could become a national game for Americans; but there is a large class in this country who will take it up under favorable conditions. And on fields easy of access, there will then be no lack of spectators, for well-played cricket is in itself a beautiful game; athletic figures in white flannels, on a green sward, are very picturesque; and where there is a contest of manly skill between young fellows, then the people of their own class, at least, if they conveniently can, will certainly gather together. Y. A. C. C.

GERMANTOWN, Pa., August 8, 1869.

Notes.

LITERARY.

"RUBY GRAY'S STRATEGY" is the title of an entirely new novel by Mrs. Ann S. Stephens, of whom her publishers say that "while this gifted authoress is a conscientious follower of nature, she has also that fine artistic sense which teaches that nature, when shown within the lines of art, must be measurably heightened, colored, and enlarged;" and we may add that what her artistic sense teaches, Mrs. Stephens's artistic hand performs with great boldness. Messrs. T. B. Peterson & Brothers are to publish the novel. The same house have in press Mrs. E. D. E. N. Southworth's "Prince of Darkness."——The Free Press Association of Burlington, Vermont, is about to issue a contribution to the history of the late war, in the shape of a work with the title of the "Vermont Brigade in the Shenandoah Valley." Its author is Colonel Aldace F. Walker, and it is said that he in tends to prove that the credit of the stand which restored the fortunes of the day in the battle when Sheridan made his famous ride is due almost entirely to a division of the Sixth Corps—General Getty's division—of which the Vermont brigade was the centre. A bad regiment never came out of Vermont, and there is certainly no inherent improbability in what Colonel Walker says.——Messrs. Lee & Shepard, of Boston, announce no less than five new stories for boys, by "Oliver Optic," and also, as everybody will be glad to hear, a new story by the author of "Little Prudy." The same publishers have in preparation two books by Mrs. Rosa G. Abbott, whose success as a writer for youth is, like "Oliver Optic's," as good a proof as Oxenstiern himself could have desired of the smallness of the amount of wisdom with which men and women govern the world of children. A new writer of "juveniles," whom Messrs. Lee & Shepard introduce to us, is "May Mannering;" and one whom they introduce to us for the second time is the Rev. Mr. Elijah Kellogg, whom some readers may recollect as the author of "Spartacus at Capua" and "Spartacus before the Roman Envoys in Etruria"—two tremendous things, which compel us to warn all parents and guardians against him, as a bad companion for the young. Whether or not Miss Louise M. Thurston's two stories, and Mr. J. D. McCabe's, and the Rev. Mr. Charles H. Pearson's, and Mrs. S. A. Southworth's—one a-piece—are for adults or for minors we are not sure; but probably we make no mistake in assuming that they are for minors. "Sermons, Letters, and Speeches on Slavery and its War, from the Passage of the Fugitive Slave Bill to the Inauguration of President Grant," is clearly for adults. It is the work of the Rev. Mr. Gilbert Haven, and may not unlikely have an interest hereafter which it cannot have now. "Jubilant Voices" is a collection of "New Hymn Tunes, Chants, Sentences, Motets, and Anthems," which is designed for use in congregations of any denomination, and is compiled by Mr. B. F. Baker and Mr. D. F. Hodges.——Messrs. Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger announce a book called "Deus Semper," which, we are told, is by the author of "Semper Deus." Mr. W. W. H. Davis, of Doylestown, Pennsylvania, announces a "History of the Spanish Conquest of New Mexico," written by himself. There are old colonial records in New Mexico which are as yet known only vaguely to historical literature, and Mr. Davis's work will be looked for with some expectation. ——Messrs. Allen Brothers announce a number of illustrated books of the kind considered suitable for presentation purposes. The poetical works of Mrs. L. H. Sigourney appropriately heads the list. Then follow "American Female Poets," by Caroline May; "British Female Poets," by Mr. G. W. Bethune; "Pearls," taken from both the foregoing, but which contain only five steel engravings instead of nine; "Pearls" also, of sacred poetry, by the Rev. Mr. Henry Hastings; "Elegant Poetical Extracts on Every Subject," by J. T. Watson; and "Elegant Poetical Extracts on Every Theme," by the same compiler, but also with five pictures instead of nine; "The Young Lady at Home and in Society," by Mrs. Tuthill; and "Famous Old Fairy Tales in Words of One Syllable," in four volumes, by Harriet B. Audubon. ——Messrs. D. Lothrop & Co., of Boston, announce "The Queen of the Adriatic; or, Venice Past and Present," with thirty-one illustrations and some letterpress by Mr. W. H. Davenport. This house also—like Messrs. Scribner & Co. and Messrs. D. Appleton & Co.—seems to be doing something with the French "Wonder Series," and has in press wonders of "Creation," of "Vegetation," of "Nature," and "In Many Lands."——Messrs. J. B. Lippincott & Co. announce "The Great Empress," by Professor Schele de Vere; a "Memorial Volume of Howell Cobb," edited by Mr. S. Boykin; "The Masterpieces of Living English Painters," "The Sheepshanks Gallery," and "Turner's Celebrated Landscapes," which three latter, no doubt, are expensive holiday books.——Messrs. John Murphy & Co., of Baltimore, will publish Mr. Bowden's life of Father Faber; the Rev. Mr. Thomas Heyden's "Memoir of the Rev. Prince Demetrius A. Galitzin;" and "Order and Chaos," by Mr. T. W. M. Marshall. "Man in Genesis and Geology" is by the Rev. Dr. Joseph P. Thompson, and has for its second title "The Biblical Account of Man's Creation tested by Scientific Theories of his Origin and Activity." Mr. S. R. Wells is the publisher.

—Messrs. Charles Scribner & Co. announce a part of the list of new publications and republications which they have in hand for the fall and winter. As was to be expected, it includes more than one work that is of importance to the American religious world—a public which this house keeps in view, and to the taste of the more studious portion of which it caters with success. In September, Messrs. Scribner & Co. will add to the seven volumes of Dr. Lange's commentary on the Scriptures—which they have already published—an eighth, which contains the author's explication of the Epistle to the Romans. Later in the season, they will issue the ninth volume, containing the commentary on Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Canticles. The Rev. Mr. H. C. Alexander, a son of the Rev. Dr. J. Addison Alexander, who was a Presbyterian clergyman very well known in his day for his labors in the pulpit and with the pen, has written a life of his father, which will appear in October or November. The Rev. Dr. J. F. Hurst translates and writes for Messrs. Scribner & Co. Hagenbach's "Church of the Nineteenth Century." "Bible Animals" is a book by Mr. J. G. Wood, which will have one hundred illustrations. Dr. John Lord, a writer whose insufficiency has been very well exposed, but who still keeps a place among American literary workmen, is the writer of a work entitled "Ancient States and Empires," which will be uniform as regards external appearance—and, doubtless, as regards the value of its contents—with the same author's "Old Roman World." It would not, however, be correct to say that the contents of Dr. Lord's books are valueless; in good part they are taken bodily from other men's works; but there never yet was a mere plagiarist who could be depended upon to do plagiarism judiciously; and none of Dr. Lord's readers can read him with safety unless they are as well informed as he is, or better. Eleven volumes are in preparation of the "Illustrated Library of Wonders," which Messrs. Scribner & Co. have had translated from the French, or have republished from translations made in England, and of which two volumes have already been published. The eleven that are now under way are the wonders of "Egypt Thirty-three Hundred Years Ago," of "The Human Body," of "Light-houses," of "The Heavens," of "Pompeii," of "Architecture," of "The Bottom of the Ocean," of "Acoustics," of "The Sublime in Nature," of "Great Hunts," and of "The Intelligence of Animals." Of school-books—another specialty of this firm—we find in the list before us three: an "American Speller," by Professor H. N. Day; "A Modern and Systematic Explanation of the Science of Chemistry," by Professor Le Roy C. Cooley; and a work on "Practical Composition," with numerous models and exercises, by Mrs. M. J. Harper. There are three titles, also, under the head of books designed for the holiday season: "Lady Geraldine's Courtship" is Mrs. Browning's poem, profusely illustrated with engravings by Mr. Linton, after designs by Mr. W. J. Hennessey; "Pictures of Edgewood" is a set of photographs —by Rockwood—with illustrated text by Mr. D. G. Mitchell, whose portrait constitutes the first picture in the volume; "Songs of Life" is made up of poems selected from the "Folk-Songs" which this house published some two or three years ago, and of illustrations by Messrs. Hennessey, Fenn, Griswold, Darley, Herrick, Bensell, and Hoppin.

— The American reading public will welcome to a place in the ranks of American publishers the very well-known and highly respected firm of Macmillan & Company, of London, who have taken the premises in Bleecker Street once occupied by Messrs. Ticknor & Fields, and afterwards by Messrs. Fields, Osgood & Co., and now formally style themselves Macmillan & Co. of New York. It is intended that all the books published by the house shall be obtainable at this branch of it; and, in addition to these, the American agency will offer for sale the Oxford University and the Clarendon Press series of text-books. The house's own list contains some titles of very good school-books, and the stores added to it by these two famous sets of books will make its collection well worth the attention of persons seeking works of instruction—the attention particularly of the managers of the more select private schools and academies. In general literature, the imprint of Macmillan & Co. may be said to be a guarantee of a high order of excellence. Turning the pages of the catalogue, we see the names of Sir Francis Palgrave; Francis Turner Palgrave; William Gifford Palgrave; Matthew Arnold; Dr. Austin; Lewis Carroll; Professor Airy; Sir Samuel Baker; Barnes, the rural poet; Gilchrist; Dante Rossetti and his sister—the truest poet among the women who write English poetry, and, for the genuineness of her gift, if not, indeed, for the value of it, among the first three or four of the American and English poets, male or female; Mr. John Morley; Arthur Hugh Clough; Archbishop Trench; Edwards; Freeman, the Author of "Ecce Homo;" Furnivall; Gladstone; "Tom Brown;" Hamerton; Huxley; both the Kingsleys; Maurice; Harriet Martineau; Phillimore; Arthur Helps, and many more whom we might mention if these were not enough to prove the distinction of the firm and the value of their books. The catalogue from which we have been quoting is a priced one, and we should judge from it that the American reprints of Macmillan's publications which have been so common over here have not been any cheaper than the originals will be hereafter.

— We do not know much about the "Theta Delta Chi Fraternity," but we learn that at its meeting in May last it was ordered that "a periodical should be published in the interests of college societies," and that one number of such a periodical has already been issued. The answer to its appearance is a very respectable list of subscriptions—not less than two thousand persons, in twenty-four colleges and universities, having put their names on the books. The College Review, as it is called, is hereafter to be a monthly journal of about the dimensions of this paper, though with four less pages, and its editors—without telling us what the "interests of college societies" may be—make some good promises as to its character. They intend to devote a considerable space to the review of college text-books, and if they can do this thoroughly well the existence of their paper will be fully justified. We make in this country some excellent text-books for both schools and colleges—more good ones for use in schools, perhaps, than for use in our higher institutions of learning. Probably there is no country where much better works of this class have been turned out. But if it is true that we make many excellent text-books, it is true, too, that in the immense number of such books that we make, very many bad ones can be found, and that there is just as much money and as much energy expended in the business of pushing the sale of these worse than worthless books as in pushing the sale of good ones. Any honest and intelligent criticism in this field, then, is of real service to the public, and we hope the editors of the Review will never mind the publishers, but even seek out bad books, and expose them. The Review will have regular correspondents in Berlin, Paris, and Madrid, and also one—Professor Otto—at the University of Brunswick. Regular communications may be expected also from Mr. Geo. William Curtis, President Angell of the University of Vermont, President Caswell and Professor Lincoln of Brown University, and Professor Wilson of Cornell. It seems to be intended that the strictly educational department of the Review shall be the department of critical notices of text-books, and to make the rest of it more generally literary in character, though we suppose it is nearly all to be more or less educational. We may without discourtesy express the hope that the new paper will be free from a vice to which too many educational journals are addicted—the vice of permitting its columns to be filled with long-winded discussions of "the educational problem," which, in the hands of the seventh and eighth-rate educators who have now got well hold of it, is a bore of the first magnitude. Half of our educational journals are filled with platitudes on this and kindred topics, and it is not an exaggeration to say that of all the writing in such journals, the greater part ought to have been left unprinted at least, if not unwritten.

—We cannot speak particularly and precisely of the character of the several newspapers in Memphis, but the Avalanche of that city gives but a bad account of its neighbors the Ledger, the Appeal, and the Sun; and the Post also we suppose it means to describe as worthless; for we believe it is the Post that is the "Radical organ" in Memphis; and the Avalanche says of the Radical organ that "for three years it has been the filthy receptacle for the abuse and slander of every lying scribbler." Of the Appeal and the Ledger it remarks that for two years they followed itself, the Avalanche, "as naturally as the shadow follows the substance, or the sun-flower turns its head towards the luminous orb of day; it was the mill that ground all their grist. They opened their mouths and gulped down everything it said with that reliant faith with which a nest of young birds receive food from the bill of a protecting mother. These satellites revolved around the Avalanche as the earth and planets revolve around the sun." But the Avalanche, it seems, took to supporting the doctrine of universal suffrage, and then its fellow Democratic contemporaries adopted very different courses. "Our doctrine," says the Avalanche, "seemed to invigorate their pens, and they abused us with that vigor which the hope of rising upon the downfall of others always inspires. For two or three days the Ledger would peg away on the Avalanche. It would sting it; it would bite it; it would gouge it; then it would pause to rest and survey the damage it had done." The Appeal was, if anything, worse than the Ledger: "but there was no repose for the poor Avalanche; for next the old, wheezing, phthisicky, decrepit Appeal would hobble into the ring, pick up the Ledger's cast-off epithets, thoroughly chewed and ejected tobacco quids, and roll them under its tongue as sweet morsels." The Post, of course, was not idle, but was "still squirting its filth." It was found, though, that even with the assistance of the Radical organ the conspirators were not strong enough for their old mentor, whereupon a call was made for reinforcements, and the Sun ran to the assault. Not, however, to any purpose. The Avalanche says: "But the recruit to the ranks of our assailants makes no new assault. The Sun editor picks the old beef-bone already gnawed by one bull-dog, two curs, three mongrels, four whelps, and a dozen mangy hounds; and he worries over it with all the earnestness of a puppy mumbling an old cast-off brogan. Instead of having three assailants, as formerly, we now have four, all yelping and barking in full chorus." And so it goes on. One objection to this "forcible writing"—that it has no force—we do not find that any one of the forcible writers, in Memphis or here in New York, seems to understand. We might add Louisville to the list. Says the Courier-Journal, the other day, being angry about the charges made against Byron: "Sooner than even have contemplated it" (namely, the commission of "so low, vulgar, unnatural, debasing, and monstrous a crime"), "he would have thrown his naked head upon a dunghill, or plunged into a furnace of molten iron. Perish the thought from men's minds." We see this editor has been taken to task for his terrible violence by some of his brethren across the Ohio —which is a new illustration of Northern timidity, we should say.

—There is no saying whether there always will be, but we suppose that without doubt there always has been—since the foundation of Christianity, at any rate, if not since ever the earth and the world were made—a class of people whose ludicrous manner of supporting religion leads to exhibitions of what they would designate as blasphemy, but which it would be fairer to call exhibitions of that perception of the comic from which not even piously disposed persons are always exempt. Here, for example, is a slip of paper purporting to be the prospectus of "The Christian Life Insurance Company." It begins with the words, "I am the Life," which it says are taken from "the President's address." Next comes the legend in prominent type, "The largest in the World" — the company, namely—followed by the words, "A great multitude, which no man could number, of all nations and kindreds and peoples and tongues"—which words are credited to a "Report of a General Meeting." "Assets more than all other Companies combined" is followed by the sentence—taken from "The Auditor's Report"—"All things are yours." "A special agent" is the authority for the statement that the "Premiums are low," his exact language being "Without price." There are also declarations, fortified by irreverent handling of various texts, that there are "Special Inducements to the Sick and Diseased," that "the Vaults are Burglar Proof," that the "Charter is Perpetual," that "there are Large Dividends," and so on. "I came not to call the righteous, but sinners, to repentance," is a text described as being taken from a "Reply to a Member of Opposition," which last word seems to indicate that the prospectus is English. Indeed, these things usually are; for we hardly have here in the United States the sort of people with whom appeals of this kind are very powerful. Some such we have; but not a sufficient number to furnish an effective demand. Grotesque conceptions of divine things are common enough amongst us; but there is in literature of the order to which this prospectus belongs an unimaginativeness which marks it as done by a more prosaic mind, and intended for blanker unintelligences than those of our illiterate religionists.

—A nearly perfect list of the immortals of the French Academy, which we have recently had occasion to prepare, may very probably have considerable interest for our readers:

	Born.	Received.
Comte Philippe Paul de Ségur	1780.	1830.
Duc Charles A. V. L. de Broglie	1785.	1855.
Pierre Antoine Lebrun	1785.	1828.
François Pierre Guillaume Guizot	1787.	1836.
Abel François Villemain	1790.	1821.
Jean B. A. A. Sanson de Pongerville	1792.	1830.
Henri Joseph Guillaume Patin	1793.	1842.
François Auguste Alexis Mignet	1796.	1836.
Charles Marie François de Rémusat	1797.	1846.
Adolphe Thiers	1797.	1833.
Jules Armand Stanislas Dufaure	1798.	1863.
Saint-Marc Girardin	1801.	1844.
Samuel Ustazade Silvestre de Sacy	1801.	1854.
Félix Antoine Philibert Dupanloup	1802.	1854.
Duc Paul de Noailles	1802.	1849.
Vicomte Victor Marie Hugo	1802.	1841.
Louis Vitet	1802.	1845.
Alfred Auguste Cuvillier Fleury	1802.	1866.
Prosper Mérimée	1803.	1844.
Comte Louise Marie de Carné	1804.	1864.
Charles Augustin Sainte-Beuve	1804.	1863.
Joseph Auguste Alphonse Gratry	1805.	1867.
Jean Marie Napoléon Désiré Nisard	1806.	1850.
Ernest Wilfrid Legouvé	1807.	1855.
Claude Gabriel Jules Favre	1809.	1867.
Comte Charles de Montalembert	1810.	1851.
Léonard Sylvain Jules Sandeau	1811.	1858.
Comte Alfred Pierre de Falloux	1811.	1856.
Pierre M. V. R. de Laprade	1812.	1858.
Charles Camille Doncet	1812.	1865.
Octave Feuillet	1812.	1862.
Joseph Autran	1813.	1868.
Claude Bernard	1813.	1868.
Guillaume V. E. Augur	1820.	1857.
Prince Jacques V. A. de Broglie	1821.	1862.
Lucien A. Prévost-Paradol	1829.	1865.
Comte d'Haussonville		1869.
A. Bashier		1869.
Comte de Champagny		1869.

The three last on the list were elected to fill the places of MM. Viennet, Empis, and Berryer. M. d'Haussonville was elected on the first ballot, receiving 19 votes out of 33; MM. Victor Hugo, Villemain, Montalembert, and Claude Bernard not being present. His opponents were Jules Lacroix, Léon Halévy, Xavier Marmion, Théophile Gautier, and M. Bashier. M. Bashier was elected on the fourth ballot, by 18 votes to Gautier's 14. For Berryer's place there were but two candidates, Duvergier de Hauranne and Comte de Champagny. There was but one ballot: for Champagny, 17; Duvergier de Hauranne, 15. From the days of Piron, who was "nothing, not even an academician," down to the present, it has always been easy to name a certain number of members of the Academy, and ask why they should be in while others were out; and to-day we may wonder why MM. de Noailles, de Carné, and de Champagny are academicians, while such other men as Littré, Philarète Chasles, Jules Janin, and Théophile Gautie are not. The answer to the query would involve a secret history of social and political as well as literary France, and would be much more interesting, we fear, than edifying. It would have been a field for the elder Disraeli—the story of the quarrels, and intriguings, and abasements, and hypocrisies of authors who wished to get in, or who wished to keep others out.

PRESIDENT HOPKINS ON THE WOMAN QUESTION.*

THE views of President Hopkins on female suffrage differ so much from those of Mr. Stuart Mill, that one might well suppose a chapter in his last work on moral science was intended as an answer to the English philosopher, if it were not that the book was published several months before the more recent work of Mr. Mill. But upon one point the two writers are agreed. President Hopkins holds that the question should be discussed "not in the form of a partisan discussion, but of a mutual enquiry what the rights of woman are, and how she may be elevated to the highest point in culture and legitimate influence. And upon such an enquiry man should enter with no less alacrity and candor than woman; for if there be anything which must react with swift retribution upon society, it is any needless ignorance or degradation of its wives and mothers." This acknowledgment of the necessity of discussion of the constantly recurring question of the day comes, it must be remembered, from the senior president of our American colleges.

The first position taken by President Hopkins goes to the nature of suffrage generally. By most persons it is regarded simply as a personal right or boon, possessed merely for the benefit of the possessor. Few look at the double character of the suffrage; and the mass of orators and writers who discourse upon the subject have never perceived the fact, as a fact, that, however freely it may be given, it can never reach even a bare majority of humanity, and hence, being exercised by the minority, must always be more representative than personal. To vote is to take part in government. And they who take part in government—and it makes little difference whether it be by voting or by holding office—"must act largely in a representative capacity. They must act for the children, the sick, the infirm, the insane, the criminal, the absent. If adult women were permitted to vote, there would still remain a large majority who could take no part in the government, and whose rights could be secured only as they were thus represented. Hence all concerned in government," and not merely legislators and officials, "act as trustees and guardians." So soon as the position is established that government is representative, it must follow that the right to take part in it—i. e., the right to hold office, the right to vote—cannot be a natural right; for natural rights belong to all, and all cannot hold office and all cannot vote. It must also follow that society, which confers the right to take part in government—i. e., to hold office or to vote, "will have the right to say who shall exercise that right, and on what conditions. Hence society may rightfully require that voters and office-holders shall be above a certain age, shall have a certain degree of education, shall have committed no infamous crime, and the like." And here President Hopkins brings out an important obligation which goes with the right of suffrage—an obligation too little recognized by the men who possess the right, and wholly overlooked by the advocates of its immediate and unconditional extension to women. Indeed, every violent partisan of the extension has insisted that women may vote, and has never looked at the deeper effect behind it, that then women must vote. It is true that society may not impose penalties for the neglect of the duty; but, nevertheless, when it confers the franchise it will impose the obligation. Are women ready to meet it? President Hopkins does not ask the question; nor does he indeed use it as an argument; but he broadly, and irrespective of the sexes, states the nature of the obligation and the reserved right of society to enforce it.

Having thus laid down the general principles which affect the suffrage, irrespective of the classes or individuals by whom it may be exercised, President Hopkins says fairly that it "still remains a duty for society to confer this right in the most just and secure manner that human wisdom can devise." As to the past, he thinks that "there has doubtless been from the first the spontaneous and unconscious operation of a principle which should be a controlling one; that is, that those should vote on any subject on whom the responsibility with reference to it falls. It has seemed right that those who are to go to war should determine the question of war, and that those who are liable to do military and police duty, and sit on juries, who are to work on the highways and pay the taxes, should vote on those subjects; that those, in short, whoever they may be, who do the fighting and the working and the tax-paying, should also do the voting. It would be quite as unjust that war should be declared through the votes of women and children who could take no part in it, as that men should impose taxes on property which women have acquired." And he does not hesitate to declare that "if women and children had taken an active part in the great duties and responsibilities of society, beyond question they would have been allowed to vote." But, accounting thus for what has been, he proceeds to enquire what ought to be. "On what principle ought society to confer the right of taking part in the government?" Speaking negatively, he thinks that no one should be excluded arbitrarily "unless such exclusion is required by the ends of government," and he recognizes two grounds of exclusion. "One is incompetence, the other presumed hostility to the government. On these grounds minors, foreigners not naturalized, criminals, and those who have shown hostility to the government, are excluded." Speaking affirmatively, he lays down as the first principle which should govern the bestowal of the right, that while it is not a natural right possessed by all, it is nevertheless "to be something attainable by all." "Thus society may require that all voters shall have attained a uniform and discreet age, but distinctions may not be drawn between the rich and the poor, the white and the black, the learned and the unlearned." And the next principle which should govern is that society may not impose any condition "which the mass of the people cannot comply with. Thus society may not require that voters shall be free from sin, but may require that they shall be free from crime." "Thus society may not limit the right of suffrage to men learned in the ancient languages; but it may require that every voter shall be able to read the English language, for that is attainable by every American youth, and necessary in the present age to secure an ordinary intelligence."

* "The Law of Love, and Love as a Law; or, Moral Science, Theoretical and Practical. By Mark Hopkins, D.D., LL.D., President of Williams College." New York: Charles Scribner & Co. 1869.

A distinction, however, is to be taken between two things often confounded—the right of suffrage and the right of representation. It does not follow, because one has not the right to take part in the affairs of the government, that he has no rights under it. All persons, whether they possess or do not possess the elective franchise, have a vital interest in their government, and as strong a claim upon its protection, its forbearance, or its justice as the officers who administer it and the voters who select those officers. Or, as President Hopkins clearly puts it: "Wherever there is a right to govern, there must also be a right to be governed rightly. The representative in the legislature represents far more than the minority of men who voted for him. He represents their opponents who voted against him, their wives and children who did not vote; and he represents, and is bound to provide for, the well-being of even criminals who have forfeited the right to vote." He then draws attention to another "right of representation which in this country has received but little favor or attention as yet," and this is "the representation of property." His discussion is able and suggestive; but we do not now stay to present this part of his argument.

Having carefully surveyed all the preliminary ground, and gone around and beyond the subject, President Hopkins comes directly to the question, "Whether the right of suffrage should be extended to woman?" "Not whether she has a natural right to vote, for none have that; but whether her own elevation and best influence, and the ends of society, require that the right should be bestowed upon her?" And here he thinks that the fundamental mistake has been that "this question has been discussed as if the sexes constituted different classes, and as if there were, or would be, in their real interests a conflict between them." So far from this being the case, their interests are not only similar but identical. Indeed, the very existence of society "depends on men's and women's entering into a special relation which not only unites their interests, as in a partnership, but identifies them." It will, therefore, readily be perceived that our author regards the family, and not the individual, as the "unit of society." "This character of it," he says, "should be, and unconsciously is, one of the most cherished objects of Christian civilization, and unhappy will be the nation whose legislative mind shall regard society simply as a mass of individuals, and not as a combination of families." He admits that "there are cases where this relation does not exist;" but such "are strictly exceptional, and society is not organized, and does not exist, for exceptional cases;" though if the principle be adhered to "of giving to each unit a single and equal representation," society may still "provide for exceptional cases by general laws."

But how would this theory leave men? We now allow to every man—not to every head of a family—but to every man, as such, the right of suffrage. Would not the doctrine of the family's being the true unit require the disfranchisement of the large class of unmarried men? But President Hopkins by no means proposes any such retrograde legislation. On the contrary, he holds that at present "when the sons of a family reach the age of manhood, they go forth and become in theory, as in fact, the stocks of new families, which sooner or later they support, maintain, and represent." "They may not," he continues, "instantly marry; but they are preparing for that, and are essentially doing the work of maintaining the future family by the work of preparation. The daughters, on the contrary, remain at home, and are identified in its interests with the old family until they are taken forth to form parts of new families. They do not go forth by themselves, nor undertake the work of preparation." This last remark is undoubtedly true; for though many girls do go forth by themselves to earn their bread or pay for their dresses, and some on works of philanthropy, yet none ever goes forth to undertake the work of preparation for a family. She does not lay up money to support the future husband before she finds him, nor to feed and clothe the little ones yet unborn. She may put aside money to furnish the house, but never to build it. She may prefer to have her own pin-money, but would scorn the idea of toiling and saving so as some day to provide a husband with his. In short, no girl ever goes forth, as every youth of average spirit does, to found a family. "Exceptionally," adds President Hopkins, "they may acquire property, and in the contemplation of law establish for themselves new homes. Society will never foster such a system, for it will be prejudicial to its own ends."

The question of competency he does not allow to enter in. He concedes that man "is competent to set the table and rock the cradle," and that "woman is competent to vote;" but he insists that society, being "a combination of families," its "one life will be within two spheres." Over the one sphere, within the family, "not inferior to that of man, but different from it," woman presides. "Here she has not only a right to vote, but to rule," and "nothing will be added to the dignity of the husband or to the happiness of the family by any interference with her where the responsibility properly falls upon her;" and, conversely, "nothing will be added to the dignity of the wife or to the happiness of society by any interference of the wife where the responsibility properly falls upon the husband." It is not because the man or the woman may not be competent for the duties of both spheres, but because "the one life of society will work itself out in more perfect results if these two great but interdependent spheres be left to those who naturally have charge of them." It is conceded that "women have wrongs," and that these "must be redressed;" but this can only be done by parents and children, husbands and wives, acting in the spirit of their established relations; "and the same spirit on the part of men that would concede the right of voting, would concede and secure in a representative capacity every right without that." Yet it is not the advancing employment of women to which President Hopkins objects, either in new fields of private enterprise or even in the civil service of the Government, so long as her own sphere be preserved. What he does insist upon is, that "so long as the sexes remain fused in one common mass—as has always been the case with society—so long the indiscriminate mingling of the sexes, either in the domestic sphere or in the general management of government, will be found an inconvenience—a source of embarrassment and weakness." But, at the same time, he is far from believing that nothing is to be done. After confining the sexes to their respective spheres, he is careful to add: "But while the above is said, society is to hold itself ready to make any changes which its changing modifications may require. In the primitive stages of society, when the chief business of governments was to carry on offensive or defensive war, women had no desire to take part in government, and their presence would have been an inconvenience and an injury. But society has now greatly advanced, so that there are many fields, especially that of education, in which woman may properly act, and in which her aid will be an advantage to society; and it is possible that in a future and higher state of society these fields will be increased, and woman be assigned to perform her definite part in the government."

Yet, after all, it would seem that if it be once conceded or established that the family, and not the individual, is the true unit of society, then the question will be little else than one of convenience—whether it be better that the family ballot be carried to the polls by one person or two. We may add that the whole enquiry is conducted in the calmest and most philosophical spirit, and that the slight vein of bias which may run through it is not that of a petty jealousy for the rights of man, or for the existing condition of things, but a regard for woman as she is.

The Innocents Abroad; or, The New Pilgrim's Progress. By Mark Twain. (Hartford: American Publishing Company. 1869.)—Mr. Samuel L. Clemens, who is known to many of us, and ought to be known to all of us, as Mark Twain, was one of the passengers on the Quaker City when she took her ill-assorted party of excursionists to Europe and the East, and he has just given us, in a thick book of more than six hundred pages, a record of the tour. It might better have been a thinner book, for there is some dead wood in it, as there has to be in all books which are sold by book-agents and are not to be bought in stores. The rural-district reader likes to see that he has got his money's worth even more than he likes wood-engravings. At least, such is the faith in Hartford; and no man ever saw a book-agent with a small volume in his hand.

But if some of the book is needless, none of it is really poor, and much of it very good. Mr. Clemens's plan of delivering an unvarnished tale, of giving just his own impressions of what he saw, at once made his work sure of some real value as well as much freshness, and his book is one to be commended merely as a book of travels. But, of course, the "American humor" is the great thing. It is not in the light of a traveller that one regards a gentleman who when during his wanderings in the Holy Land he comes upon the "tomb of Adam," which the monks exhibit, thus gives utterance to a natural burst of sentiment:

"The tomb of Adam! How touching it was, here in a land of strangers, far away from home, and friends, and all who cared for me, thus to discover the grave of a blood relation. True, a distant one, but still a relation. The unerring instinct of nature thrilled its recognition. The fountain of my filial affection was stirred to its profoundest depths, and I gave way to tumultuous emotion. I leaned upon a pillar and burst into tears. I deem it no shame to have wept over the grave of my poor dead relative. Let him who would sneer at my emotion close this volume here, for he will find little to his taste in my journeyings through Holy Land. Noble old man—he did not live to see me—he did not live to see his child. And I—I—alas, I did not live to see him. Weighed down by sorrow and disappointment, he died before I was born—six thousand brief summers before I was born. But let us try to bear it with fortitude. Let us trust that he is better off where he is. Let us take comfort in the thought that his loss is our eternal gain."

All the prominent characteristics of our peculiar school of humorists—their audacity, their extravagance and exaggeration—Mr. Clemens displays in fulness in the course of his ramblings, and he has some merits which belong to his individual self, and which make him a very agreeable companion when he is at ease and natural—which is not always; for as he pads so, we must make free to tell him, does he sometimes grimace, and is professionally a humorist as he was professionally a book-maker. It will be a just punishment for him to reflect that no doubt many a farmer will read all his jokes—the good ones as well as these bad ones we are speaking to him about—with profound gravity and unshaking belief in them as so much serious log-book.

There is, besides those we have mentioned, another characteristic of "American humor," which consists in a certain sort of what may be called fatuousness. When the man in the stage-coach, riding along with "the great moral showman" without knowing him, kept on telling him "some of Artemus Ward's jokes," and at the end of each one of them punched his companion in the side and said, "What a damned fool the fellow is!" he was not the worst critic that Artemus ever had. Nearly all his jokes have in them a display of mental helplessness—not to say imbecility—a drifting along of the mind from one topic to another, suggested but not really connected, topic, and are largely dependent upon this for their humorous effect. The same thing may be seen—though not nearly so unmixed nor so often—in the efforts of Mr. Josh Billings. The humor in the Nasby Papers consists rather in Mr. Locke's conception of the low, "dough-face" Democrat than in anything strictly humorous that is said or done by him after he is made, and the Cross-roads pastor and postmaster gives no exhibition of the trait mentioned. But the author of "The Innocents Abroad" has some of it—though something of what he has is acquired and imitative, we should say—and may be taken to be rather more nearly Artemus Ward's successor in this line than either of the other humorists to whom we have referred.

Select Orations of Marcus Tullius Cicero. With Explanatory Notes by George Stuart, A.M., Professor of Latin in the Central High School of Philadelphia. (Philadelphia: Eldredge & Brother. 1869.)—Chase and Stuart's series of school editions of Latin writers has already been commended in these columns for the unusual elegance and convenience of form, and the practical excellence of the annotations, which make them peculiarly well adapted to the use of schools. This edition of Cicero's orations—the third of the series—is marked by the same qualities. Mr. Stuart has done well in going outside of the set of orations usually read, and giving in addition three of the Philippics and one of the Verrine orations. We are disappointed, however, to find that he not only has not attempted to remedy the chronological confusion of earlier editions, but has even increased it by inserting the oration for Milo between those for Marcellus and King Deiotarus. It would seem that nothing could be more confusing to a boy than to commence his knowledge of Cicero with the orations of his consulship; then to go back four years to his first political speech; from this to pass of a sudden to his pleadings before the dictator Cæsar, with a piece of special pleading from the period of anarchy sandwiched in between them; and then, after specimens of the indignant eloquence of the orator's last years, to jump back nearly thirty years to the generous appeal of the young lawyer in behalf of the oppressed provincials. It would have been easy, by altering the position of the orations for the Manilian Law and for Milo, to remedy all this; for the speech against Verres would be, perhaps, too difficult to come in its proper chronological place.

The Law of Carriers of Goods and Passengers, Private and Public, Inland and Foreign—by Railway, Steamboat, and other modes of Transportation; also, the Construction, Responsibility, and Duty of Telegraph Companies, the Responsibility and Duty of Innkeepers, and the Law of Bailments of every class embracing Remedies. By Isaac F. Redfield, LL.D., Cambridge, Mass. (Published by H. O. Houghton & Co. New York: Hurd & Houghton. 1869.)—The title-page is itself an extended statement of what Mr. Redfield has attempted to do and of what he has well done. He designed in the beginning that his work should embrace only the law of carriers, including telegraph companies, and the law pertaining to innkeepers, and though he has since added a few pages relating to other classes of bailments, yet the great value of the book is, as he originally intended, in the presentation of the law of carriers, and here he has supplied a need of the profession. The arrangement is clear and simple, the citations in the text and notes include all the recent cases, the index is good, and the analysis of contents is very fine. He evidently desired that his book should be read by unprofessional men, but though it might be of value to them, yet they will hardly depend upon it after he tells them, as he does, that "it is generally cheaper and safer to consult professional advice."

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Price.
Agnes Graham: a Tale, swd.	(Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger) $0 60
Bushe (Mary C.), Rupert of the Rhine.	(Pott & Amery) 0 75
Butler (Josephine E.), Woman's Work and Woman's Culture.	(Macmillan & Co.)
Colange (L.), Zell's Popular Encyclopædia, No. 9, swd.	(T. Ellwood Zell) 0 50
Dorr (Mrs. J. C. R.), Sibyl Huntington: a Tale.	(G. W. Carleton)
Eliot (G.), Adam Bede, Household edition.	(Fields, Osgood & Co.) 1 00
Gladstone (W. E.), Juventus Mundi.	(Macmillan & Co.) 3 50
Logan (Miss O.), Apropos of Women and Theatres.	(G. W. Carleton)
Meta's Faith: a Tale, swd.	(Harper & Bros.) 0 50
Morning Light.	(Pott & Amery) 1 00
Perkins (J. E.), Sabbath Carols. The Mount Zion Collection of Sacred and Secular Music.	(A. S. Barnes & Co.
Robinson (Rev. C. S.), Songs for Christian Worship.	(A. S. Barnes & Co.)
The Norrises: a Tale.	(Pott & Amery) 0 75
Thomas (Annie), False Colors: a Tale, swd.	(Harper & Bros.) 0 50
Worman (Prof. J. H.), The German Echo.	(A. S. Barnes & Co.) 1 25
Ward (Artemus), His Panorama.	(G. W. Carleton) 1 50
Whipple (E. P.), Literature of the Age of Elizabeth.	(Fields, Osgood & Co.) 1 75

New and Old Books.

DAVID G. FRANCIS (formerly C. S. Francis & Co.), 3 Clinton Hall, Astor Place, New York, keeps constantly for sale an extensive Stock of New and Second-hand Books in various departments of Literature.

Catalogues, issued from time to time, will be forwarded FREE to any address.

L. W. SCHMIDT,

GERMAN BOOKSELLER,

24 BARCLAY STREET, NEW YORK,

Imports regularly all the leading Foreign Publications, including Periodicals.

Foreign works noticed in the NATION kept constantly on hand or procured to order.

The American Freemason.

CONTENTS OF AUGUST NUMBER.

Abraham and the Sabeist. OUR MONTHLY RECORD: To the Brethren, our Subscribers—Much Law: a Daniel come to Judgment—Have our Grand Lodges all been legally organized?—Invasion of Jurisdiction.—CORRESPONDENCE: The African or Prince Hall Grand Lodge, Part 3—The Grand Lodge of New York—The Rights of Lodge Past Masters—What does it mean?—Dr. Epstein's Discovery. OUR MONTHLY MASONIC CHRONICLE: United States, England, Ireland, France.

Sixteen quarto pages monthly, for one dollar a year.

Address subscriptions to

J. FLETCHER BRENNAN, Editor,

114 Main Street, Cincinnati, O.

TO BOOK AGENTS.

N. TIBBALS & CO. have added to their extensive trade in Sunday-school, Theological, and Miscellaneous Books the Subscription business.

We have one book which will contain several hundred first-class engravings, and will be the best book for Agents yet published. Be sure and not engage until you see our circular and prospectus. Ready Sept. 1.

N. TIBBALS & CO.,

37 Park Row, New York.

POLYDORI VERGILII DE RERUM INVENTORIBUS. The last publication of the Agathynian Club. Superbly printed, paper cover, 8vo, price $3.

Sent post-paid on receipt of price. Address PUBLISHER OF THE "NATION," Box 6732, New York City.

PROGRESSIVE TEXT-BOOKS

PUBLISHED BY

CHARLES SCRIBNER & CO.,

654 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

GUYOT'S GEOGRAPHICAL SERIES.

THE MOST PERFECTLY GRADED AND SUCCESSFUL TEXT-BOOKS IN USE.

The Practical Method of Teaching Geography.

GUYOT'S INTRODUCTION TO THE STUDY OF GEOGRAPHY.

GUYOT'S ELEMENTARY GEOGRAPHY FOR PRIMARY CLASSES.

GUYOT'S INTERMEDIATE GEOGRAPHY: A Study of Form and Location.

GUYOT'S COMMON-SCHOOL GEOGRAPHY: A General View of the Continents and all the Principal Countries of the Earth.

GUYOT'S GEOGRAPHIES will be sent for examination by mail, post-paid, to any address, on receipt of 90 cents for the "Primary," 60 cents for the "Elementary," $1 25 for the "Intermediate," and $1 80 for the "Common-School" book; and $4 50 for full set, or $3 50 for Elementary, Intermediate, and Common-School.

Special Terms for Introduction.

GUYOT'S PHYSICAL WALL MAPS,

FOR SCHOOLS.

"GUYOT'S MAPS are incomparably superior."—Prof. L. AGASSIZ.

LARGE SERIES, consisting of Nine large and splendid Maps, mounted on rollers and varnished, price $71.

INTERMEDIATE SERIES, consisting of Eight Maps, prepared and mounted in the same way, but smaller, price $38 50.

COMMON-SCHOOL SERIES, ten in number, somewhat smaller, but mounted similarly, price $25.

PRIMARY SERIES, mounted on muslin, in a portfolio, price $18.

CLASSICAL SERIES, three in number, elegantly mounted, price $45.

Any Map of these series, except Common-School and Primary Series, may be had separately.

PERCE'S MAGNETIC GLOBES.

STYLES AND PRICES.

Five inches in Diameter	Plain Stand	$ 6
" " "	Semi-Meridian	8
Seven " "	Plain Stand	12
" " "	Semi-Meridian	15
" " "	Full Meridian	25
Twelve inches in Diameter	Plain Stand	20
" " "	Semi-Meridian	25
" " "	Full Meridian	35

ONE DOZEN MAGNETIC OBJECTS, representing men of different races, ships, steamers, light-houses, and various animals, and Mrs. Smith's Globe Manual, accompany each globe, without additional cost.

 These globes are securely packed, and can be sent safely any distance.

FELTER'S NATURAL SERIES OF ARITHMETICS.

FELTER'S FIRST LESSONS. Illustrated.

FELTER'S PRIMARY ARITHMETIC. Illustrated.

FELTER'S INTERMEDIATE ARITHMETIC.

FELTER'S GRAMMAR-SCHOOL ARITHMETIC.

FELTER'S PRACTICAL ARITHMETIC. Intermediate, and Part II. of GRAMMAR-SCHOOL, bound in one volume. With Answers.

FELTER'S INTELLECTUAL ARITHMETIC. Mental Exercises, with Blackboard Illustrations.

FELTER'S MANUAL OF ARITHMETIC, for Teachers. Methods of Oral Class and Individual Instruction.

 Copies for examination will be sent to any address on receipt of Fifteen Cents for FIRST LESSONS OR PRIMARY, Fifty Cents for INTERMEDIATE OR GRAMMAR-SCHOOL, and Twenty-five Cents for INTELLECTUAL ARITHMETIC. Special terms for introduction.

MODERN, ATTRACTIVE, AND VALUABLE TEXT-BOOKS ON NATURAL SCIENCE.

I.

TENNEY'S NATURAL HISTORY OF ANIMALS,

For the Young. Illustrated with 500 engravings. 1 vol. 12mo, $2.

II.

TENNEY'S MANUAL OF ZOÖLOGY:

For Schools, Colleges, and the General Reader. With over 500 engravings. 1 vol. crown 8vo, cloth, price $3.

III.

COOLEY'S NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.

A Modern, Accurate, and Systematic Exposition of the Elementary Principles of the Science. Profusely illustrated. 1 vol. 12mo, price $1 50.

VI.

COOLEY'S CHEMISTRY.

(In Press.)

WILL BE READY SEPTEMBER 1:

DAY'S AMERICAN SPELLER.

By Prof. H. N. DAY, of New Haven, Ct.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR:

THE ART OF ENGLISH COMPOSITION. 1 vol. 12mo, price $1 50.

THE ART OF DISCOURSE. 1 vol. 12mo, price $1 50.

ELEMENTS OF LOGIC. 1 vol. 12mo, price $1 50.

AN INTRODUCTION TO THE STUDY OF ENGLISH LITERATURE. Price $2 25.

These books command the confidence of the best class of teachers. They afford good mental discipline, and are likely to ensure sound scholarship, and to make good writers, speakers, and thinkers.

PRACTICAL COMPOSITION.

With numerous Models and Exercises. By Mrs. MARY J. HARPER, Packer Collegiate Institute, Brooklyn, N. Y. 1 vol. 12mo, price 90 cents.

NOTICES.

"A brief examination of this work gives us a very favorable impression of it. It has the common-sense feature of giving the learner a gradual and judicious course of practice in composition writing, for which many good directions and models are given. The author has evidently had good experience in teaching this branch, and her work is certainly worthy of a trial in the school-room."—Maine Journal of Education.

"We are led to wonder why such a volume has not long since been produced. The instructions it contains are so plain, so admirably put, that it seems as if the dullest learner could not fail to become a tolerable writer by conning them. It is purely practical, and gives rules for and examples of about every variety of composition required of any one in practical life."—Moore's Rural New Yorker.

 DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUES and Mammoth Circular of Testimonials forwarded free of postage to any address. Most favorable terms afforded to School Boards or Teachers desirous of introducing the above Text-books.

CHARLES SCRIBNER & CO.,

PUBLISHERS,

654 Broadway, New York.

GEORGE ELIOT,
EDWIN PERCY WHIPPLE,
C. C. FELTON.

I.

George Eliot's Novels.

Household Edition. Complete in 5 uniform, handsome volumes.

NOW READY:

Adam Bede.

1 vol. 16mo, cloth, $1; half-calf, $2 25.

This edition is designed to supply the long-felt want of a uniform edition of this great novelist's works. It is in the popular "Household" style, matching Reade and Thackeray, and is like them compact, legible, handsome, and cheap. The edition is published under special arrangement with the author, as shown by the following letter:

MESSRS. FIELDS, OSGOOD & CO.:

DEAR SIRS: Your intimation that my friends in America would welcome a new uniform edition of my novels, with the latest corrections, is very gratifying to me. Some of the most intelligent and generous sympathy I have received has come to me from your side of the Atlantic, and has given me a belief in my public there which is a precious source of encouragement. I have also good reasons, not probably peculiar to myself among the English authors whose works you have reproduced, for especially wishing my books to appear under the auspices of your firm; and I therefore gladly authorize you to publish the proposed edition, leaving the form and price to your more experienced judgment.

I remain, dear sirs, yours faithfully, GEORGE ELIOT.

LONDON, May 20, 1869.

The remaining volumes will be published immediately.

II.

Literature of the Age of Elizabeth.

By E. P. WHIPPLE, author of "Character and Characteristic Men," etc. 1 vol. 16mo, $1 75.

This volume contains a series of critical and biographical essays upon the great writers of the Elizabethan age: Shakespeare, Bacon, Hooker, Spenser, Beaumont and Fletcher, Sidney, Ralcigh, and others. Mr. Whipple is universally acknowledged to be one of the first of American critics in analytical acumen. His close study and sympathetic appreciation of the literature of the age of Elizabeth give a peculiar value and attraction to the present volume, which cannot fail to become a classic in the literature of criticism.

III.

Ancient and Modern Greece.

By C. C. FELTON. New Edition. 1 vol. 8vo, cloth, $5; half-calf, $8.

To meet the demand for a popular edition of President Felton's fascinating and exceedingly valuable work on Greece, it has been issued in one volume.

"His various learning, his familiarity with the spirit of ancient culture, combined with the vitalizing influence of modern ideas; his glowing popular sympathies; his regard for the interests of common life; his love for the humorous, even the grotesque, aspect of things; and his versatile powers of expression, are stamped on every page."—New York Tribune.

 For sale by all Booksellers. Sent post-paid on receipt of price by the Publishers,

FIELDS, OSGOOD & CO.,

BOSTON.

E. P. DUTTON & Co., 713 Broadway, New York, Special Agents for F., O. & Co.'s Publications.

The Nation.

VOL. IX.—NO. 219. THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 9, 1869. { FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM / TWELVE CENTS PER COPY

THE WEEK 201

EDITORIAL ARTICLES:
The Republican Minority 204
The Chinese Question 205
Prison Discipline 206
Royal Pretenders 207

Supposing it to be True 208
The Amnesty.—Government Encouragement of Art 209

CORRESPONDENCE:
Byron's Mystifications 210
The China Merchants 210
The Harvard "Rah" 210

NOTES:
Literary 210

Our Own Birds of the United States ... 213
Current French Literature 214

Books of the Week 215

Terms:—Five Dollars per annum, in advance; Clergymen, Four Dollars.  Remittances at the risk of the subscriber, unless made by draft, check, P. O. money order, or registered letter.

The date of expiration of each subscription is indicated on the printed label. A delay of more than three months in renewing subscriptions will endanger their continuance.

ADDRESS, PUBLISHER OF "THE NATION," BOX 6732, NEW YORK.

PUBLISHING OFFICE, 3 PARK PLACE.

The Week.

ENTHUSIASTIC people—if there are any people enthusiastic about politics just now—are predicting a Republican victory in Ohio by a majority of forty-odd thousand, which seems incredible. However, no doubt the publication of Rosecrans's letter—an act which seems to hint at relaxed discipline in the Ohio Democracy—has damaged his party more, even, than his declining the nomination. In California, where there was considerable local excitement—a "ring" to break up, and so on—the vote does not seem to have been heavy, not two-thirds of the voters going to the polls. The Democrats have decidedly made gains; but there is less reason for regretting this than might at first be supposed; for the Fifteenth Amendment was probably sure of defeat in any Legislature that could be got together in California, Republican or Democratic. The Chinese question doomed it in any case; for the Democrats are wild on the subject, and the Republicans, in their convention, said by implication that Chinamen should not vote. The Supervisor "ring" in San Francisco, whose operations are said to be almost of New York County grandeur, is understood to be smashed. In Pennsylvania, politics are so fearfully dull that Governor Geary's "dancing on the field of Gettysburg"—going to a ball, that is—has been a fertile source of editorial attack and defence. Local politics, however, are not apt to be dull in Pennsylvania; we see that one of the papers informs an anonymous correspondent who had been slandering a candidate that if he will come to the office and avow the authorship of charges which the editor knows to be false, and will then "uncover his hyena countenance, we will spit upon it for him." Prophecies of the result in Pennsylvania are not made, so far as we observe. Vermont, of course, went Republican.

Attorney-General Hoar has relieved General Canby of a disagreeable duty, and the people of Virginia of what would undoubtedly have worn the appearance of a breach of faith on the part of the Federal Government—and a very exasperating one at that—by giving an opinion that the members of the Legislature elected under the new constitution may meet, organize, ratify the Fifteenth Amendment, and apply for admission to the Union without taking the iron-clad oath; and that the administration of the oath only becomes necessary in case they attempt to discharge ordinary legislative duties. The Attorney-General holds that Congress cannot have intended that the Legislature which is to bring the State into the Union under the new constitution should be subject to all the requirements of the supplemental Reconstruction Act of July 19, 1867; otherwise it would be in the power of General Canby to remove the members, and fill their places with soldiers detailed from the army. The Virginia papers generally hail the opinion with delight, and predict a return of the halcyon days of the State, or a very fair imitation of them at least; and there are probably few rational men who will not rejoice that the difficulty should have ended in this way.

The leading Republicans of the Stokes faction in Tennessee—or, we may as well say, the leading Republicans—have met in council at Nashville, and put forth a document which would be excellent if it were not for its concluding request, which is in the nature of an appeal to the "Federal Government and the whole people" to interfere and declare the late election of Senter a revolutionary proceeding. As a statement of Senter's frauds and a bearing of testimony that some day will rise up against him, the address in question is a temperate and telling paper. Governor Senter's victory is a stolen one, and he disgraced. Grant, whom both have visited, tells Mr. Senter and Mr. Stokes that he has no thoughts of interfering in any way; that he shall not turn Senter's men out of Federal offices; and that the best thing the two factions can do is to make up. There is no doubt of that; or would not be, if it were clear that there are two factions; but the fact of the matter seems to be that we might almost count on the fingers of our hand every dozen of Republicans who voted against Stokes. Senter's companionship is all the Republicans would get by a reconciliation, and that is hardly "a sweet boon," as Artemus Ward used to say.

Meantime, Senter says, with what truth we shall know next month, that the Legislature elect will ratify the Fifteenth Amendment. What is going to become of the Amendment in the immediate future it is not very easy to predict. Twenty-eight of the thirty-seven States must ratify it, and as yet only fifteen are certainly secured—namely, Arkansas, Connecticut, Florida, Illinois, Louisiana, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, New Hampshire, New York, North Carolina, South Carolina, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and Wisconsin. We suppose that no attention is to be paid to the doctrine that New York's ratification is not to be counted because after it was done the Legislature neglected to order the Governor to report its action to the Secretary of State. Yet the World, we see, which has been giving such judicious counsel to the party as to the abandonment of "dead issues," no sooner gets scent of this ghost of a chance at the African, than it reverts at once to its native instincts, and jumps savagely the whole length of its chain, forgetting incontinently how nice and tame it has been. Missouri, Kansas, and Nevada, which acted hastily on a telegraphic copy of the Amendment and ratified it, will act favorably again, we suppose, without any doubt, and that gives us eighteen States. Indiana's case is doubtful, in point of law. Nearly all the Democratic legislators seceded when the question came up, thus leaving the Houses without a quorum—certainly an unjustifiable and even shameful action. It is argued, however, by Senator Morton, that a quorum was present of all persons who at the moment, not having resigned, were members. Counting out Indiana, ten more States are needed for the passage of the measure. Rhode Island may be depended on to ratify, although, by reason of her somewhat peculiar constitution, she refused last spring. Virginia, Mississippi, and Texas must ratify, or they cannot come into Congress, and Alabama is safe to do it, as she has a Republican Legislature. It will not be amiss—in view of the World's proposal and the revolt of the Indiana men—for the Congressional lawyers to look very sharply after the necessary papers, and make sure that there is no informality either at the State capitals or at Washington when the States still unreconstructed present themselves for admission. A fatality of blundering and botching and patching may hang over the Reconstruction business to the very last, as it has from the very first. Ohio also may be counted, and so may Vermont, Minnesota, and Iowa; but which State to be sure of for the twenty-eighth—as sure of as we may reasonably be in the case of these—we do not quite see. Tennessee or Nebraska or Maryland or New Jersey or Kentucky or Delaware may carry off the honor, but certainly there will be no very hot competition for it on the part of some of them.

Parson Brownlow writes a letter defending himself for having taken Senter's side in the late contest in Tennessee, giving amongst other reasons the somewhat delicate one that he had from the outset a higher opinion of Senter as a man than he had of Stokes. He ascribes a large part of Senter's majority to the interference of Messrs. Boutwell and Cresswell in the election, and says a good many sensible things about the folly of further proscription, which would, however, have been more sensible if he had said them sooner. The air of Washington has clearly had the happiest effect on the Parson's mind, and has also, perhaps as a natural consequence of this, considerably improved his language. If the people of Tennessee will now go to work and take the State credit out of its present disgraceful condition, and put a stop to the disgraceful talk of repudiation, and make the railroads pay the interest on their bonds, they will close the Reconstruction sore for ever, even if they send Andrew Johnson to the Senate.

As we write, Senator Fessenden, of Maine, lies in a critical condition at his home, but slender hopes being entertained of his recovery. We are sure there is nobody who rates honesty and independence in public men as the dearest possessions of the nation at large who will not hear of his illness with the deepest regret, and will not earnestly pray that he may long be spared to furnish the young men of the country with one of those models of character without which no political education can be complete, and the increasing scarcity of which in public life is one of the evils of our time. We say nothing of his intellectual power or attainments, though of both we might say much, because these are less rare in our day amongst politicians than fidelity to conscience and loyalty to one's own convictions of right. The people has ten skilful janissaries for one honest friend, and it has few honester friends than Mr. Fessenden, and not one of whom it may be more justly proud. We wish we could hope that there were yet many years of useful and honored life in store for him, and that Maine might have a chance of doing herself fresh honor by sending him back to the Senate for another term. Died Sept 8th

---

Secretary Rawlins had for some years been in such a condition of health that only by the most careful attention could he hope to live from month to month; and for a long time he had habituated himself to the thought of dying suddenly and soon. On Monday last he succumbed, at less than forty years of age. His public career had not been very prominent till he reached his secretaryship—though nine years ago, at the age of twenty-nine, he was on the Douglas ticket as one of the Illinois electoral candidates, and had done his party good service on the stump—and little is known of his real capacities for statesmanship; perhaps his "manifest destiny" speech of last fall was not of great promise. His services in the army, and afterwards at the head of the War Department, gave sufficient proof of his abilities as an executive officer and an energetic man of business. Evidently he was an honest, brave, good-hearted man, and he seems to have had a marked power of attaching others to him. Grant appears to have had a very strong affection for him; but the President's power of becoming attached to his friends is one of the striking traits of his character. One or two incidents of unusual pathos, we are sorry to say, gave a tinge of bitterness to General Rawlins's last hours. His wife was not with him, but lying ill at Danbury, Connecticut, mourning the loss of her newly-born child; and he was leaving his family, as far as money goes, entirely destitute. The Army of the Tennessee have, however, announced their intention to adopt his children; and at a meeting of merchants here on Tuesday, a liberal subscription for them was at once commenced—$15,000 being raised on the spot, and more promised; so that the projected fund of $50,000 will speedily be raised.

The Springfield Republican is a very good paper, but there is really an unhealthy rashness about it which frequently causes its friends great anxiety. It said last Saturday, in contradiction of an assertion made by the Nation, that "it happened to know" that no letter of introduction for Mr. Reverdy Johnson to Mr. John Bright was written by Mr. Sumner when Mr. Johnson went to England last fall. As we have now got on delicate ground, and as it is important that the Republican should be very sure of what it means when it says it "knows" things, we shall be a little more explicit. To say that Mr. Sumner wrote no "letter of introduction" for Mr. Johnson to Mr. Bright is merely a wretched little quibble. What we assert is that Mr. Sumner wrote to Mr. Bright in the fall of 1868, when Mr. Johnson was going to England, what was far stronger and more valuable than a mere formal letter of introduction, viz., a long letter by mail, speaking of Mr. Johnson in the highest terms, calling attention to his unanimous confirmation by the Senate; assuring Mr. Bright that he had the confidence and esteem of all parties; that he was abundantly competent to settle the Alabama question, and would, in Mr. Sumner's opinion, settle it. The warmth of the eulogy was so great, in fact, that Mr. Bright was anxious to hurry up to London at once, to see this remarkable man; but, being unable to do so, wrote to Mr. Johnson to apologize, and inserted in his letter an extract from Mr. Sumner's, in order to show him (Mr. Johnson) what a high place he occupied in the opinion even of political opponents. Moreover, after the treaty arrived here, Mr. Sumner on the 17th of January last wrote to Mr. Bright commending it, and on the 19th, after dining with Grant, added a postscript, with even a stronger commendation, thus confirming the confidence of the British Cabinet in Mr. Johnson. The subsequent speech, therefore, was to Mr. Bright and others a painful surprise.

Now, we advise the Springfield Republican not to traverse this statement hastily. Our reason for making it is that, on or about the 6th of May last, Mr. Sumner submitted to "an interview" at the hands of the New York Herald correspondent, in which he laid down the extraordinary doctrine that the British Cabinet ought not to have negotiated with the ambassador of a retiring administration, and even added that "he thought once or twice of calling Mr. Thornton's attention to this, but came to the conclusion that he had no right to do it." If a performance of this sort on the part of the Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Affairs of the Senate be not fit subject for comment in the newspapers, they can hardly be said to have any duties. From a gentleman in that position to a gentleman in Mr. Bright's, about a gentleman in Mr. Johnson's, the letter under discussion had most of the characteristics and many of the consequences of a state-paper of the first order; and it ought to have made the delivery of Mr. Sumner's speech, and the uproar and alarm and loss of property which followed it, absolutely impossible.

The Byron scandal may be said to constitute the leading topic of the day, and every morning the Atlantic Cable, as well as our own papers, furnishes a fresh contribution to the controversy. The Byron family have taken the field through their solicitors; but the telegraphic report of what they say is by no means clear. The only thing certain about it is that they feel scandalized and outraged by the revelation, and consider it, amongst other things, a breach of confidence. General Butler has written a long and able letter to the Boston Journal, analyzing Mrs. Stowe's statement from the legal point of view, and applying to it the rules of evidence, and, it must be admitted, makes some very ugly holes in it. A Southern editor declares that Mary Chaworth was Byron's half-sister, and that it was she he meant when he made his confession. "The Count Joannes" writes a long letter to the Herald, the exact value of which, we think, is not ascertainable through purely human agency, owing to the Count's mental peculiarities. One thing he calls attention to which is worth notice, however, and that is that Lady Byron called her daughter "Ada Augusta:" after whom was she named Augusta if not after Byron's sister, "the partner, etc."?

The state of things in Ireland grows highly interesting. The disestablishment of the Church has, as was expected, been succeeded by a renewed, and what promises to be a very vigorous, agitation about the land tenures; and this agitation, we regret to say, derives a good deal of its power from what may be called dropping murders of landlords occurring all over the country, even in districts in which such murders have been hitherto unknown; and it has been stimulated, too, by some very cruel evictions in a district in which this species of abuse of power has been hitherto rarely, if ever, practised. The worst feature of these murders is that there is no doubt whatever that they have constituted for half a century the principal, if not the only, protection of the tenantry against landlord oppression. A period of peace has almost invariably been followed by a period of wholesale ejectment; then the shooting began, and the ejectments ceased. A more barbarous substitute for long leases it would be hard to imagine. There is no denying that it was the Fenian movement which created the public sentiment in England which abolished the Irish Church; and we greatly fear it will be a continued fusillade from behind hedges which will bring about a reform in the land laws, and that the tenants know this, and are acting on their knowledge. One of the good signs of the crisis is that the old sermons about the rent of land being fixed by competition, and about the liberty of the tenant, if he does not like the landlord's terms, to carry his capital and his labor elsewhere, begin to disappear from the English newspapers, and there are signs of acknowledgment that land is a peculiar thing, and may, and sometimes must, be treated peculiarly.

The agitation in Ireland is likely to receive powerful aid from a similar movement in England, where a Land Tenure Reform League has been founded on the ruins of the old Reform League, with Mr. J. S. Mill for chairman, and Mr. Frederick Harrison, Professor Fawcett, Sir John Bowring, and others of tendencies more or less revolutionary, on the committee. The aims of the body are of course as yet rather ill-defined, but they may be summed up by saying that it seeks to break up the great estates, and keep them broken up. There is a mistaken notion prevalent in this country that this can be done by abolishing the law of primogeniture. The law of primogeniture only operates in cases of intestacy, and might be abolished without producing the slightest perceptible change in the distribution of landed property in a thousand years. The law of entail, moreover, differs from that in this State simply in permitting a settlement in favor of one person not in being, and would do but little towards tying estates up if it were not for the strong family feeling in favor of tying them up. The whole structure of English society, in fact, rests on the devotion of the individual members of the family to the maintenance of the family position; and as long as eldest sons are ready to join their fathers in re-settling estates from generation to generation, the great estates will hold together. So that absolutely prohibitory legislation will be necessary to make a change—that is, legislation somewhat in the direction of that of France, making the division of landed estates equally among children compulsory. This would involve an amount of interference with "the rights of property" such as has never before been attempted in England—indeed, a social revolution; and yet we have no doubt it is coming. The competition amongst the new men, who have made fortunes in commerce, for the political and social honors which accompany landholding, is making the present system intolerable.

The Episcopal clergy in Ireland, after having said a good many foolish things during the passage of the Disestablishment Bill, appear to be accepting their novel situation with a good grace. The archbishops, of whom there are two, about the nature of whose duties there seems to prevail the same painful uncertainty as about the duties of "rural deans"—probably the most mysterious body of functionaries of modern times—have called a synod to organize the Church on its new basis of freedom, and display a marked desire to place the laity on a footing of perfect equality in Church councils. We fear the laity will make a terribly small show in the new organization. Those who took much interest in the Church were interested in it mainly as a political institution. Its political character being gone, we venture to say it will have less to show in the shape of religious life and feeling than any body of Christians in existence.

There seems to be no doubt that the Emperor's condition is more serious than the official journals in Paris represent. The Empress's journey to the East, for which tremendous preparations had been made, has been postponed, and she has hurried back when as far on her way as Corsica. Moreover, Nelaton, the Paris surgeon, who now occupies the position of a last resource to all the wealthy and distinguished people of the Continent, has been called in in consultation; and although it is every day announced that his Majesty's indisposition is not serious, and that he will "soon be about again," somehow he does not get about. The Bourse in the meanwhile is sensitive to the last degree, and ready for a panic of the first order. The prevailing anxiety is increased by the recent death of Marshal Niel, who was, perhaps, the one man in France who could be relied on to carry the Empire through such a crisis as the decease of its founder. Still the amnesty, as our correspondent has pointed out, has done a good deal to strengthen it.

Mr. Grant Duff made the (East) Indian financial statement in the House of Commons last month, and it contains some interesting features. The total revenue of the empire amounted last year to $242,672,060 (gold), counting the pound sterling roughly as five dollars—in other words, a larger revenue than from any country in the world except England herself, the United States, France, and Russia. The two largest items in the receipts are about $100,000,000 from the land tax and $45,000,000 from opium, the latter drawn partly from opium grown under Government superintendence, and sold on Government account, and partly from a transit duty on opium raised in the Northwest Provinces and exported from Bombay. Mr. Grant Duff, speaking of this last item, says naïvely that "nobody can feel happy about it," which is quite comprehensible; but his reason is that it is exposed to three dangers—one, that the Chinese may learn to do without it; another, that an effective competition in the Chinese markets may spring up from other countries; and the third, that there may be such improvements effected in the manufacture in China itself as may make it independent of the Indian supply. Of the first of these Mr. Grant Duff says he has no fear—although hostility to the poppy was one of the strange characteristics of the Taeping rebellion—owing to the enormous size of the country, which prevents any movement, in the present state of intercommunication, from being general. In fact, he thinks the opening of Western China will increase the traffic. One does not often, in the accounts of a great empire, meet with a more repulsive calculation; and that a man of Mr. Grant Duff's character could make it so calmly is one of the puzzles of Indian, if not of English, politics.

The Indian expenditure is a more agreeable subject of study than the revenue. The debt is about $470,000,000, on which the interest is 4½ per cent.; in 1800, it was 8½. More than a fourth of the revenue goes to the army, which, nevertheless, in proportion to the population, is not large; less than one-forty-eighth goes to education; one-nineteenth goes to the administration of justice; about the same to the police force; but one-eighth went for public improvements—canals, roads, railroads, and irrigation. The railroads are gradually opening up every part of the country, and will speedily make the great famines impossible; a larger and larger number of natives are every year entering the learned professions, and taking part in the administration of justice; and caste is slowly but steadily going down before the spread of European ideas. One of the curious duties which Mr. Maine has lately been called on to perform is to legislate for the proper disposition of European "tramps" or "loafers," mostly discharged soldiers and convicts from Australia, who now ramble about the interior, living by their wits, and bringing scandal on the European, to say nothing of the Christian, name.

THE REPUBLICAN MINORITY.

In many of the States there is to be found at present a Republican minority, discontented with one or more of the principles with which its party has identified itself. In one you will find Republicans who are aggrieved at the control obtained over nominations and legislation by the eight-hour men; in another, a minority is disgusted with the identification of the party with that of the prohibitionists; in a third, perhaps we might say in all, a small but constantly increasing number of men heretofore connected with the dominant party are filled with a profound dissatisfaction with the principles which govern the distribution of offices. And although, in almost all cases, an astute reasoner might find plenty of ground for saying that the identification complained of was in no respect essential; that the true Republican party was just what it always had been—the party of equal rights—nevertheless, such argument has very little effect in the face of the visible fact that the dominant organization does at every critical period fall more or less into the hands of some subsidiary, local, temporary "ring." Historical arguments to show that prohibition, or the eight-hour movement, or the spoils system have no connection with the principles of republicanism, are of little avail in the eyes of those who see all the "rotating" done by Republican officials, all the eight-hour laws and "anti-dramshop" laws passed by Republican legislatures and approved by Republican governors. In this State, the Tribune considers the dominant party so tainted by the intimate connection of its Legislature with the "corruptionists," that it advises Republican voters to elect honest Democrats rather than dishonest members of their own party. Could a stronger proof be found of the dangers which a party incurs from evil communications than this? It is not that the Tribune supposes a Democratic Legislature would be one whit more honest, as a general thing, than a Republican; we have its own words for that; but it feels that the simultaneous spectacle of continual corruption and continual Republican triumph induces, after a time, an idea in the popular mind that there is some necessary connection between Republicanism and corruption.

The delicate question arises, and comes into greater and greater prominence with every new election, what this minority of which we speak, discontented as it is with the new-fangled principles introduced by meddling strangers, but firmly devoted to their original tenets, are to do. They have, of course, the choice between three distinct lines of action—they may go over to the Democrats, they may scratch their own ticket, or they may decline altogether to vote. Which of these are they to do? (We leave out of view a fourth course—the organization of a new party; because this involves considerations out of place here.) Of the three modes of expressing discontent which we have mentioned, the third is certainly the simplest and most pleasing to the carnal mind. It involves no exertion, physical or mental; it is eminently gentlemanly, and peculiarly productive of a calm self-satisfaction. We have always observed that voters who stay at home and take no part in the contest, on the ground that the result is all cut and dried beforehand, invariably regard those of their fellow-citizens who go to the polls and bear the heat and burden of the day as a set of blind enthusiasts, whose devotion to the duties of citizenship is incomprehensible, and, according to the temperament of the observer, melancholy or laughable. Indeed, these posés recluses appear to look upon political life very much as the monks and hermits of the Middle Ages looked upon civil pursuits—as something which the good man had better keep his hands and eyes as far from as possible; as something necessarily evil. But for those who wish, as the minority which we have in mind wish, to do something more than nurse their discontent, the political monastic system has one cardinal disadvantage—that it has no visible result. A few thousand votes cast for a particular candidate, or for twenty different candidates, are seen and counted; but a few thousand not cast at all produce no effect on anybody's mind. The public does not notice that any one stayed at home—votes always vary by a few thousand at each election; and the consequence is that the non-voters are quietly ignored. Indeed, the plan of staying at home is hardly worthy serious consideration.

Shall the discontented, then, vote the Democratic ticket? For example, in Massachusetts, shall the Republican who disapproves of the intimate association of the Prohibitionists with the majority change his vote altogether and cast it for Mr. Adams? This course has the evident merit of effectiveness. If a sufficient number go over, the Democrats may carry the day, and then prohibition will for the time cease. The minority will have accomplished its object. But to little purpose. They will have defeated a section of their own party to whom they were opposed, but they will have done it at the expense of the victory of enemies to whom their opposition was much more deadly. It may be asked, indeed, whether one has any right to express his discontent with men who advocate principles he considers pernicious, by voting for men whose principles he considers more fundamentally and thoroughly evil. A Pennsylvanian may show his feeling about Grant's bad appointments by voting for Asa Packer, but it may well be doubted whether he does not vote at the same time in favor of repudiation. An Ohio voter who, for the same reason, casts his vote for Pendleton, feels grave doubts on the same point. It cannot be disputed that whatever faults the dominant party may have, the Democracy is much worse, or that he who votes for the latter in order to correct the faults of the former chooses a weapon which is as dangerous to him who wields it as it is to his enemy. We would not for a moment make use of the common rant about "treachery." Treachery to party is the very life and soul of political improvement—all new and progressive parties being made up of traitors and "deserters" from older camps; as, for instance, the Republican organization itself, which is nothing else than a collection of unfaithful Whigs, Democrats, and Free-Soilers, who thought that their country demanded something more of them than loyalty to a dead past. It is always a practical question with which party one should vote, not a problem to be settled by abstract considerations; and, of course, if any one thinks that on the whole he can serve more good ends by going over for the nonce to the Democracy than by staying in his own lines, by all means let him do it. We cannot ourselves see our way to this conclusion.

To our minds, the old-fashioned practice of scratching furnishes, as we have often had occasion to say, the simplest and best solution of the difficulties of the present question. By scratching your ticket, you give unquestionable evidence to the eyes and mind of every inspector of the vote that for some reason or other you were dissatisfied with both parties. Your conduct immediately excites attention. It means something. If you had done nothing more than vote the Democratic ticket, this would have attracted comparatively little notice. It would have meant that you were satisfied with that party, and the leaders, after loudly proclaiming the fact, would have gone home contented with themselves and the new accession to their ranks. It would never occur to them for an instant to make an alteration in the party creed for the benefit of the new-comers. It would, indeed, be foolish to do so; for how could they tell whether their action would not drive out as many old adherents as it attracted new? On the other hand, if a large scattering vote is cast, there can be no doubt as to the proper interpretation of it. It means that there is a considerable body of voters discontented with both parties, who may, by discreet measures, be drawn to the ranks of one or the other. There is a direct stimulus to improvement on the part of the managers. They must look about them and see in what they have been erring, what it is that these outsiders wish, where their platform is rotten, and where new planks are needed. If the thousands of Republican voters in Massachusetts who are dissatisfied with prohibition, if the thousands in Pennsylvania discontented with protection, scratch their ticket, the fact cannot fail to make the leaders pause and consider. If they vent their rage in casting their votes for the Democrats or in staying at home, they will in all probability find themselves in a much worse plight than they have yet thought possible. In those States in which the experiment of going over to the enemy has been tried, the results accomplished have been very small. For example, in Virginia, the discontented minority threw themselves into the arms of the Democracy, and, after beating their adversaries, are sadly puzzled at finding their principles confounded with those of their new allies. The triumph of Senter in Tennessee, which was partly accomplished by dissatisfied Republicans, is a very fortunate thing for Senter, but do the Republicans find their account in it? The Democrats welcome the new accessions to their ranks, but they modify no principles for them. Such Mississippi Republicans as vote for Judge Dent will do no good by it, and a year hence they will find themselves surrounded with the same difficulties which compass them now. In Massachusetts, such Republicans as vote for Adams will find, if he is elected, that they have cast their votes for a Democrat. We advise them all to scratch, and the day of their scratching will long be remembered.

THE CHINESE QUESTION.

The amount of declamation which the arrival of the last news from China has called forth has enveloped the subject in so much fog that it may be well to make one more attempt to place it before the public in its true light. We gave in substance in our last issue the opinions entertained by an American resident in China, who has in our columns been one of the warmest and, we may say without vanity, one of the most effective defenders, both in American and foreign eyes, the Burlingame mission has had. He has come to the conclusion, on a calm and lengthened scrutiny of the facts, that the Chinese Government did not mean by sending out the Burlingame mission what he believed it to mean, and that Mr. Ross Browne was substantially correct in the account given by him of the actual and prospective state of Chinese relations with Christendom in his recent correspondence with American and British residents, and that the first use the Imperial authorities intend to make of our recognition of their equality is not to take part in what we call progress, but to use whatever concessions we make to them in the treaty to repel all interference whatever, advisory or other, in their internal affairs, and to resist all progress.

Now, this may or may not be a correct view of the case; but it is the view of the American merchants on the spot—that is, of the only body of Americans who know anything about China, or who are competent to form an opinion on Chinese politics worth listening to for five minutes. The best proof that it is a weighty opinion is found in the fact that no answer has been made to it beyond vulgar abuse. Mr. Ross Browne was not perhaps the person whom those who care most for the interests of the United States in China would have selected to succeed Mr. Burlingame; but then his claims to the place, as far as antecedents and character go, were better than those of nine-tenths of the persons appointed to important missions are to theirs. There is something ludicrous in hearing it alleged against him as an accusation that he was a mere literary man and traveller, in quarters from which men who can barely read, and have hardly ever left the county in which they were born, every day draw hearty support for places in the diplomatic service of hardly less consequence than the Chinese mission, and particularly from gentlemen who "respect and esteem" Daniel E. Sickles. It is undeniable that his mode of speaking of the Chinese Government, to which he was accredited, was exceedingly ill-judged, and the indiscretion was aggravated by the fact that he was addressing it not to his own countrymen only, but to foreigners. But then those who have never uttered one word in favor of providing us with a brained diplomatic service are hardly the persons to hold up their hands in horror when our improvised representatives abroad deliver stump speeches during their term of office. We know nothing of Mr. Browne except as an author, but have never heard anything to his discredit as a man, and, judging from his letter to the foreign residents in China, are satisfied that, whether he understands Chinese affairs or not, he is undoubtedly an able man. But there is nothing known of him by anybody which can make the charge brought against him by a portion of the press on seeing this letter—that he was bribed by the English and French to betray his own country and frustrate its policy, or the more recent one, that his dissatisfaction with the Chinese Government was due to his being the agent of disappointed railroad contractors eager for work—anything but discreditable to American journalism.

We think it not at all unlikely that Mr. Browne has been very indiscreet too in his mode of testing Prince Kung's intentions. Very likely he thought it his business, and it fell in with his temperament and raining, to request that functionary to "hurry up" with his improvements, and to let him know that when anybody gives us to understand that he is going to "progress," we expect him to be "lively," and make a beginning at once; and Prince Kung appears to have told him that it was none of his business, or words to that effect. If it was Mr. Browne only that was dissatisfied with his highness, we should pause—as one usually does when one hears of a dispute between two individuals—a good while before making up our mind which was right. But then the American residents all agree with Mr. Browne, and do believe that Mr. Burlingame has been deceived; and they being a highly intelligent and respectable body of men, and having, moreover, the deepest personal interest in our relations with China, their opinions are entitled to careful consideration.

It must be borne in mind that the whole value of Mr. Burlingame's treaty depends on the intention of the Chinese authorities in sending him out. The question before the world is simply, What did the embassy mean? Ever since Mr. Burlingame came away, the persons likely to be most seriously affected by his negotiations have been carefully watching the signs of the times in Pekin; and if they see room to doubt the result of Mr. Burlingame's work, it is our duty to heed what they say, and not to abuse them. It is ridiculous to ask us to accept, instead of their testimony, the views of New York editors of what our Chinese policy ought to be. Nobody will regret to learn for certain that Mr. Burlingame's mission has been a failure more than we. We hailed it with delight; and we believe that, if it really fails, the continuance of the policy of outside pressure and interference will eventuate in breaking up the empire, and reducing its vast territory and its enormous population to a state of awful anarchy—such anarchy as the world has not seen since Rome fell. We are not yet convinced that it has failed, but the testimony against it is strong. We have on the other side now only the evidence of Mr. Burlingame himself, who of course is as liable to be deceived as anybody else.

To enable the reader to judge all the better what has actually been acquired or conceded by the treaty which was not already accorded by the treaties of 1846 and 1860, we may mention that there are really only three new stipulations in the Burlingame treaty—one which declares that the Emperor of China reserves his right of eminent domain over the lands and waters granted to the United States for trade or other purposes, and that no power at war with the United States shall be at liberty "to attack citizens of the United States or their property within the said lands or waters;" another, that the Chinese Government shall have liberty to appoint consuls at the ports of the United States; and the third, that the citizens of each state shall be at liberty to emigrate freely to the other. Everything else in the Burlingame treaty—that is, the right of reciprocal travel or sojourn, and the right of access to the educational institutions of each country by the citizens of the other—has been already provided for in the former treaties, either expressly or under the most-favored-nation clause. This will no doubt astonish many people, but it is literally true. Art. VIII. of the new treaty—which is, perhaps, the most important one—repudiates on behalf of the United States all right of interference in the internal affairs of China on any subject, and particularly "in regard to the construction of railroads, telegraphs, or other material internal improvements," and concedes to the Emperor "the right of deciding the time, and manner, and circumstances of introducing such improvements within his dominions;" agrees that "if at any time he should determine to set on foot such internal improvements," and should ask the United States "or any other Western power for facilities to carry out that policy," the United States "should designate and authorize suitable engineers to be employed by the Chinese Government," at a suitable rate of pay. As, however, the United States has never dictated to China about her internal affairs, and has never attempted to force her to make railroads or telegraphs sooner than she wished, and as no human being here ever dreamed of such a thing, the only value of this article lies in the fact that it is an expression of our good-will and an admission that China is our equal. But, then, as long as France and England do not make this admission, poor China is no better off than ever. The United States has never bullied her, while France and England have, and, apparently, will continue to do so in spite of our treaty, unless Mr. Burlingame succeeds, as we hope he will, in making similar ones with them.

It is, therefore, the sending of the embassy, and not the treaty itself, that was of special importance. As we remarked in February, 1868, "the Chinese could not hope to combat (Western) prejudices against them, or prove that they were really anxious to reap the advantages and assume the responsibilities of intercourse with civilized peoples, so long as they refused to use their privilege of being represented at the courts of treaty powers." To send such an embassy was to abandon for ever "their old pretensions that China had nothing to ask from the outside world, the nations of which were tributaries of their Emperor;" and we said the despatch of the embassy had, "therefore, a deep political significance," and added that the choice of Mr. Burlingame for it was in every way fortunate. What concerns us now to know, therefore, is not what we have gained or what China has gained by the treaty, for neither has gained anything positive or palpable, but did the embassy mean what it was supposed to mean, or was it a mere attempt to throw dust in Western eyes? Of course, neither the American residents in China nor Mr. Ross Browne can yet answer this question with certainty. We shall only get the answer to it by seeing how the Chinese now behave. But the testimony of observers on the spot counts for a good deal.

PRISON DISCIPLINE.

The Conference held in this State, of which we made brief mention last week, on the condition of the prisons, brought out some facts worth everybody's attention. The discipline of the prisons has been long known to be very bad, and it has been equally well known that the causes were the character of the officers and the contract system. The plan of appointing prison functionaries solely for political services, and changing them every time the Governor was changed and indeed oftener, at last resulted in a state of things which there is no use in trying to describe in a newspaper article. Anybody who wants to familiarize himself would do well to read the last report of the Prison Association; but some notion of it may be given by mentioning that the assertion recently made by a competent observer, that the character of the prisoners in many of the prisons was, on the whole, rather better than that of their keepers, would seem to be very nearly correct. How little conscience the political class has in the matter may be inferred from the fact—for fact it is—that a high prison official was not long ago re-nominated by acclamation by a Republican caucus in this State after proof, which there was no gainsaying, had been submitted to them of his having used a jail as an assignation-house during his previous term. Hearing what was going on, he had put forward his "soundness on the main question," and, having services in the army to show, carried everything before him. Incidents like this wear very much the look of being "a negation of God"—the term happily applied to King Bomba's administration at Naples in his latter days.

Now, to commit the power of torturing large numbers of their fellow-creatures by the shower-bath and otherwise to men of this stamp—men not only absolutely ignorant of everything relating to prison discipline, but ignorant themselves of the restraints of steady industry; the waifs and strays who, unable to make an honest livelihood in any of the ordinary callings of a busy country, had betaken themselves to the lower walks of party politics, as to gambling, mock auctions, and lottery dealing—was undoubtedly a shocking thing. Public opinion, as Governor Hoffman said, was outraged by the result. Even if it had not been opposed to all punishments of the class we have mentioned, the use of them by such hands would have excited natural indignation. Think of a ward politician—one of the bullies who "puts things through" at a Democratic and, we may add, a Republican primary meeting—being armed with the power of torturing hundreds of men within an inch of their lives, and being charged with the duty of representing the offended majesty of the law to criminals largely composed of his own old friends and boon companions, if not "pals." The prison revelations of course shocked the people, and the people demanded a change.

A chance was thus afforded of making something like a thorough reform in the prisons. The evils of their condition were well known. Moreover, the science of the reformation of criminals has received within a few years important additions, which have in most States of the Union obtained little or no recognition, although in Europe, and in one or two States here, they are revolutionizing prison management. It has been ascertained by actual experiment that there is enough of what is good in human nature, enough of self-respect, of gratitude for kindness and confidence, of appreciation of honest courses, of a desire to walk in the straight way, left in the vilest inmates of the jail to afford a fair chance of their moral resuscitation, and of keeping order with but rare recourse to punishment at all. Under what is known as the Irish System—from its having been invented and first applied in Ireland—the self-respect and good faith of criminals have been so far strengthened by kind and judicious treatment that it has been found possible to liberate them in large numbers long before the expiration of their terms of sentence, and give them another chance of resuming an honorable place in society, without subjecting them to other restraint than a slight police surveillance.

So now in Massachusetts Warden Haynes has demonstrated the expediency of relieving the prisoners from many of the more odious incidents of their condition, such as the wearing of the prison dress, and the possibility of maintaining discipline, and doing something to restore habits of self-restraint, by putting it in the convict's power to shorten his term of imprisonment by good conduct, or lengthen it by bad conduct. We are witnessing, in short, in all civilized countries the application to criminals of the great principle of which the French Revolution introduced the application in the conduct of armies—that there is more to be got out of men by love than by fear—that the highest exertions of the will are never called forth except by appeals to men's honor and self-respect, and giving them credit for the nobler as well as the baser passions. The day when the French conscripts charged over the slope at Jemappes, chanting the Marseillaise, and driving the stick-disciplined Austrians before them, was a great day for humanity.

But the application of this new principle requires, of course, the trained hands of conscientious men. The management of all men is difficult; the management of convicts peculiarly difficult. There is no harder work—work requiring more judgment, self-control, knowledge of human nature, and sense of responsibility—than the work of making criminals behave like rational beings. There is no office in a civilized state for which persons ought to be selected with greater care. We have amongst us plenty of men who are fit for its duties; who have made them the subject of reverent and enthusiastic study; who know all that has been accomplished here and elsewhere in making prisons something better than scenes of torture; but, except in Massachusetts, they have little to do with our prisons except to write essays about them or visit them at their own expense. Public opinion is shocked when it hears of the use of the shower-bath, or the cat, or the gag, and demands their abolition; but it does not demand complete reform—the cessation, for instance, of the practice of committing those who are convicts to the custody of those who would be convicts if they got their due. So the Legislature abolishes the shower-bath and the other more violent modes of punishment without any enquiry and without providing any substitute, and the result is that the politicians are left face to face with their victims, and defenceless; in other words, cruelty and tyranny are succeeded by anarchy. Their lives, the wardens say, are now in danger—which is perhaps true; but this is by no means the worst of the situation. The worst of it is that the convicts feel that they have got the people at their back, not simply in resistance to abuses of authority, but to all authority; and we have murders, escapes, attempts at escape, mutinies, and disorders of all sorts nearly every week. Yet the very same trouble it took to pass the act abolishing the shower-bath would have carried the Legislature to the root of the evil, by prescribing the qualifications of prison officers, and making their tenure of office permanent.

It is to be observed, however, that in almost every direction in which much attention is given to prison reform, there is a disposition to confine punishment to one object—the reclamation of the criminal. A century ago, society thought of nothing in its criminal jurisprudence beyond striking terror into evil-doers. It then began to be fully recognized that in the infliction of penalties the reformation of the convict should be kept as steadily and prominently in view as the frightening of the wicked at large. We are now apparently, partly under the influence of the great growth of philanthropic feeling and partly under that of the new physiological view of moral responsibility, passing into a new stage in which warning is practically dropping out of sight as one of the objects of punishment. It is easy to imagine a state of things in jails which, while exercising a very good influence on criminals, would have no terrors whatever for what may be called the criminal class, which is certainly not one whit less hardened and audacious now than ever it was. One can readily see, for instance, how prison discipline—deprived of all its harsher and more forbidding features, with few sanctions but moral suasion, no harsh punishments, few restraints within the walls, and plenty of opportunities for enjoyment—might exercise a most humanizing and refining influence on many of "Reddy the Blacksmith's" friends within the walls, while to Reddy himself, in the world without, it would simply furnish food for merriment, and would satisfy him that the only remaining restraint on his passions and appetites was gone. What the general effect of the new system on criminal statistics will be, we shall of course not know for a long time to come.

ROYAL PRETENDERS.

The romantic charm which used to attach to a "Pretender" in the good old days before the French Revolution, has almost vanished out of men's minds with many another picturesque allusion. In the days when it was a part of religion to believe that nations came into the world saddled and bridled and kings booted and spurred to ride them, the idea of a poor discrowned king robbed of his rightful estate and sent wandering and out at elbows about the world by his rebellious subjects, really caused a genuine sympathy in the breasts of many worthy persons. And we think a little of the old leaven is still left in the minds of reading people as to such of the tribe as had the luck to live long enough ago. One can hardly help feeling a degree of kindness (though a sneaking one) for the poor Old Pretender, James III., the Chevalier de St. George, or whatever title best pleased his ear; though he was but a stupid, tipsy, besotted old creature, which one would in vain try to conjure up for his half-sister, Brandy Nan, or for either of the Georges, first and second of the name, who reigned over England with bad English and worse morals on the throne to which he was laying claim all his lifetime. And Walter Scott and the Jacobite songs have thrown a glamour about the image of Charles III., better known as Charles Edward or the Young Pretender, such as no genius could bestow on the red face, lobster eyes, and bob-wig of Farmer George; though he was intemperately sober, and possessed

> "That household virtue, most uncommon,
> Of constancy to a bad, ugly woman,"

while Charles Edward used to get drunk and beat his wife. And there is something not unpicturesque in the thought of the Cardinal of York, the last of the Stuart line, striking that medal, one of the rarities of collections, to put on record his claim to the throne of England, as Henry IX., when he was supported all the while by the charity of the Elector of Hanover, better known as George III.

But since the French Revolution played the deuce with so many old superstitions, the many-headed monster has grown impatient of its divinely ordained riders, and turned restive, and thrown them over its head into the dirt oftener than it used to do. A larger party of discarded majesties might now be collected than that which Candide dined with at Venice, of which Theodore, King of Corsica, was one, who had not money enough to pay his scot, and for whom his royal companions made up a purse to buy him some shirts. The excellent Ferdinand, Count Fathom, afterwards attended his levee in the Marshalsea Prison, of which he was the Father, like the late Mr. Dorrit, where he found him sitting under the tester of a truckle-bed for a canopy, and crowned with a cotton nightcap. Let us see. There might be the Comte de Chambord and the Comte de Paris to sit at the head and foot of the table. For, though blood-relations, they are probably no fonder of one another than blood-relations, each claiming a large estate, usually are, and it might be well to put the length of the table between them. Then there is his Majesty Francis II. of Naples, surnamed Bombalino, as the worthy son of old Bomba, who commissions brigands whom the Holy Father blesses. The Grand Duke of Tuscany, Ferdinand IV., with Robert, Duke of Parma, and Francis V. of Modena, might well accompany him, since they all were sent packing together by the war of 1859. This last-named animal, who bastinadoed men and whipped women, who bought the harvests of his duchy at his own price and retailed them at his own price too, who would order his subjects to sell him their property for half its value, and, if they refused, took it without paying them anything, who carried off with him not only the treasury of the duchy, and the pictures, coins, manuscripts, and the very silver handles of the doors of the palace, but eighty wretched prisoners whom he had rotting in the fortress of Reggio,—this precious potentate may legitimately pretend to a much wider inheritance than that paltry duchy. For he is the legitimate heir to the crown of Great Britain and Ireland by the common law of England, as the lineal representative of Henrietta, the daughter of Charles I. and wife of the Duke of Orleans, brother to Louis XIV., and ancestor of the present house of Orleans, by his second marriage. On the death of the Cardinal of York, the strict title reverted to the representative of Henrietta of England, who, at the present time, we are sorry to say, is this detestable and despicable princeling we have just described.

But we must take breath, and begin a new paragraph. We suppose the poor old, half-idiotic Emperor Ferdinand of Austria would hardly be admitted to the party we are imagining, since he abdicated the throne in 1848, and does not come within the category of the pretenders. But George V., the blind King of Hanover, most distinctly does, for he pretends no less resolutely than hopelessly, and really seems to have inspired his subjects with something of the old spirit of loyalty. Frederic William, Elector of Hesse, grandson of the paternal prince who sold his subjects to George III. to have their throats cut in America, would properly make one of the company, since the King of Prussia has repeated, even more emphatically, the declaration of Napoleon some sixty years since, "la Hesse n'existe plus." So would Colonel Gustafson, the rightful heir of the great Gustavus of Sweden, the Lion of the North and the Bulwark of the Protestant Faith, as Major Dalgetty was fond of styling him. When we last heard of him he was a simple colonel of dragoons in the Austrian service, while his rival, the grandson of Bernadotte, the common soldier and his wife the wine-merchant's daughter, is firmly established on his hereditary throne. Dom Miguel of Portugal—who contested the crown so savagely with his little niece Maria da Gloria, and which she received partly by the grace of God and partly of Sir Charles Napier—he has left behind him a son, now about sixteen years old, who has precisely the same claim to the crown of Portugal that the Duke of Madrid (of whom presently) has to that of Spain; the pretensions of the present King of Portugal, as of the late Queen of Spain, resting on the disputed right of Dom Pedro in the one case, and of Ferdinand VII. in the other, to annul the ancient Salic law in favor of their daughters—a recognition of Women's Rights not likely to be accepted by the mere men who were thus set aside. We do not at this moment recollect any other suitable guest for such a goodly fellowship, unless it were King Otho of Greece. We suppose that Prince Murat, who probably may sometimes cast a sheep's-eye towards Naples, and his Imperial Highness, Prince Iturbide, whom poor Max ordained for his successor, failing heirs of his own body, but who is not likely to be very swift in claiming it, would be relegated to the side-table at best, if allowed to come into the room at all.

The only pretender in activity at present, as we hardly need say, is the Duke of Madrid, or Charles VII., as he styles himself, who is doing his best to make the political cauldron of Spain boil and bubble more diabolically than is its wont, in hopes that a spirit may be evoked out of its depths that shall beckon him to the throne. According to the ancient laws of the kingdom, he is the rightful heir—his father, Don John, having renounced his right—as his uncle, the Count de Montemolin, and his grandfather, Don Carlos, were before him. He is barely twenty-one, and is described as a grave youth, of intense bigotry and cordial hatred of modern ideas, well adapted to excite the enthusiasm of the priests and the priest-led peasantry. Dynastically and personally considered, it must be allowed that his branch of the House of Bourbon has had hard measure. The treacherous tyrant, Ferdinand VII., having had no children by his two first marriages, his brother, Don Carlos, had every reason to hope that in due time he would succeed to the throne as Charles V. But in 1831 Ferdinand married his near relation (we believe she was his niece), the notorious Christina, of Naples, sister of old Bomba; and after this marriage the late Queen and her sister, the Duchess of Montpensier, were born, respectively in 1832 and 1833. Whether they were born of it may be hardly a question. The intimacy of the Queen with Muñoz, now her husband and Duke of Rianzanares, left little doubt as to their real paternity. Had one of these been a son, his succession would probably have been submitted to without question, if not without grumbling. But when the King, just before his death in 1833, revoked the old Salic law, and settled the succession on his dubious daughters, it is not strange that Don Carlos should have plunged Spain in the long war of succession for the recovery of what was his right by all the rules of the legitimate descent of crowns. And now that the Muñoz dynasty has been kicked out of Spain, it is natural enough that the lawful heir should think that the tide is at the flood which is to bear him on to fortune. And it is by no means impossible that in the stormy effervescence and ebullition of the political waters he may yet come to the surface. That he should stay there, and not be again swallowed up and swept once more to foreign shores, is even less probable than this possibility.

The French Revolution, as we have said, laid the axe at the very root of the hedge of divinity that used to be the defence and guard of kings. Nations now demand of their kings a reason for their existence other than that they are sprung from the loins of former kings. The Age of Chivalry is past, and that of economists has taken its place. Kings must stand for the ideas of the present and the future, and not of the past, and must behave themselves accordingly, or take the consequences. If it were a possible thing that Charles VII. should have learnt something and forgotten nothing, and that he could mediate between the sixteenth century and the twentieth, and bridge over the gulf that separates them, his restoration might be no bad solution of the enigma of Spanish affairs. He would satisfy the sense of loyalty which is still stronger perhaps in Spain than elsewhere in Europe, as the undoubtedly legitimate heir to the throne, and would incarnate the idea of monarchy in the person of a young prince. Who knows but Serrano may yet bring him in as Monk did Charles II., as the best practicable compromise of all the complications of the situation? And if he could but consent to be the head of a constitutional government, with freedom of the press and religious toleration, he might lead the Spanish people from anarchy to good government, and from poverty to prosperity. But this on the violent presumption that he is a great man. None other could be sufficient for these things. And can any good thing come out of the House of Bourbon? We fear that the tribulation through which Spain must pass to her political salvation has but begun, and that the man who is to guide her out of it has not yet appeared. It is not likely that in Spain, or elsewhere, the Coming Man will arise from among the Pretenders to Crowns, even where crowns are still believed to be essential elements of public welfare. They belong of necessity to the past, and their eyes naturally turn backward rather than forward. The old feeling of personal loyalty on which their hopes mainly depend is fast dying out. Their adventures and their fates will serve to point the morals of historians and to adorn the tales of romancers, but their importance as disturbing or as reorganizing forces of society is daily growing less, and men will soon come to wonder that it ever existed.

SUPPOSING IT TO BE TRUE.

THE question whether, supposing Mrs. Stowe's story about Byron to be true, she was justified in publishing it—on which, in all that we have said about it, we have only touched very lightly—has been decided by the press generally emphatically in the negative. Harper's Weekly, however, takes strongly the ground that the revelation was not only permissible, but in some respects a laudable contribution to literary history, and maintains that Byron's position makes all revelations that throw light on his character desirable; and it says, as an illustration, that if Shakespeare had committed a brutal murder, nothing would be gained by concealing it. Now, we admit that any view which Harper's Weekly and Mrs. Stowe unite in taking with regard to such a question as the propriety of Mrs. Stowe's article is a respectable view, and entitled to respectful consideration; but it seems to us the view they have both taken is an incomplete one, in that they do not take into account the peculiar character of the offence with which Byron is charged. This is a delicate point to touch on, but it is one which it is impossible to avoid, if the subject is to be discussed at all; and on our way of looking at it must largely depend our opinion of Mrs. Stowe's article. That it might be lawful to publish bad things of Byron for the purpose of vindicating his wife we suppose nobody would deny; but then this concession has its limits, and these limits are determined partly by the nature of the charge brought against him, and partly by the nature of that from which it is sought to clear her. Now, the worst thing said of her was that she left him thoughtlessly or unnecessarily or unreasonably or heartlessly, and that she was a prude; but then enough was known of his life and habits when she left him to make those charges fall very lightly; and if they did her the least injury, they have been amply repelled by the forty years of noble living with which she has since met them, and by the growing popular detestation of Byron's character. In fact, by the time he died, what the world knew of him would have brought on her a far heavier condemnation for living with him than her worst enemies have ever cast on her for having left him. But, even if his habits outwardly were never so correct, the marriage relation is such that there may be a score of reasons, and good ones, why a couple should separate which neither of them is bound to reveal—or, at all events, not to the public—and about which it would be a gross impertinence for the public to occupy itself; and Lord Byron's being a great poet placed Lady Byron under no obligation to let the world know why she went back to her father's house. When a wife does this, she has a sufficient answer to all enquiries in the fact that she is in her father's house, and remains there. That Lady Byron suffered during her long and admirable life in the estimation of a single human being whose good opinion was worth having, either through her leaving Byron or through her refusal to state publicly why she had left him, we have never seen asserted, and we do not believe. Honor, love, obedience, and troops of friends followed her during the forty years of her widowhood, and stood about her at her death-bed. In fact, we doubt if any person in whose fate or history the public took the slightest interest has died within the last century who, in his last hours, had less need of making revelations or offering explanations than she. Consequently, as it seems to us, as far as she was concerned, Byron's memory might have been left as it was. The plea that it was necessary to expose him in order to diminish the influence of the Guiccioli book and his poems, we need hardly discuss; any publisher's opinion on that point would settle it in half a minute.

If we are correct in all this, of course the bringing of any charge against Byron was unnecessary, and in some respects undesirable; but there are special reasons, drawn from the nature of the charge actually made, which, as it appears to us, forbade its production, unless for the purpose of removing some equally heavy stain on somebody else's reputation. The circumstance that he is dead may be left out of account. One dead man's memory is, from the highest point of view, no more valuable than that of another, and not nearly so valuable as the character of living persons; and the charge against Mrs. Stowe of having played "the hyena rooting among the graves," etc., is simply puerile. But the crime of which she accuses Byron is one against which society seeks to protect itself by treating it practically as a crime without a name—monstrous, unnatural, execrable. It is one the punishment of which is left almost wholly to public opinion, with which the law is unable to deal effectually; and one of the most powerful of the sanctions by which society seeks to guard against it is the preservation of silence about it; the relegation of it, like parricide amongst the early Romans, to the category of almost impossible things—of things which people not only do not allow themselves to discuss, except in scientific circles, but which they do not allow to be presented to their imagination as amongst the contingencies of family life. No other defence against it could even be half as effectual as this one; and the reasons ought to be weighty indeed which induce anybody to weaken this defence by placing it before the world as a reasonable and proper topic of literary or other discussion, and as a crime committed by a great genius, whose books are in every young man's and woman's hands, and committed by him without forfeiting the admiration of the world. We need hardly say more to mark what we conceive to be the distinction between it and the crime of murder, which Harper's Weekly, in its illustration, supposes Shakespeare to have committed; and we pass over the element of time, which enters largely into all problems of this kind. We might ask, too, what would the world have lost if it had never heard this tale? What dark place in history would have remained unexplored? What human life would have been less happy; what interest of humanity would have suffered? Every fact is surely not valuable simply because it is a fact; its bearings and relations are what we have to consider in estimating it. To the principal actors, too, in the sad drama of Byron's life, their reputation here, and the amount the world knows of their doings and sayings, and its opinion of them, are now amongst the most insignificant of considerations. They care as little about them as about the newest opera or the latest Paris fashion, and must view with sad surprise the way our pens and printing-presses and telegraphs are working over them; but their friends and descendants do care, and care a great deal.

We must say, however, before finally quitting the subject, that the deep abhorrence of Mrs. Stowe's indiscretion—to use no worse term—displayed by some of our contemporaries who are usually not very particular what they publish themselves, and, in fact, have never been known thus far to refuse to publish anything for any other reason than that it would not pay, shows there is a large amount of latent virtue in the newspaper world, and that the people who profess to be shocked by the unbridled license of the press ought to be ashamed of themselves. It is, we confess, exceedingly gratifying to us, both as philosophers and philanthropists, to find what a large number there is of papers usually called "sensational" which could not have been induced to publish Mrs. Stowe's revelations for love or money. They must draw the line somewhere, and it seems they draw it at incest. It is hard, no matter what theologians may say, to extinguish the love of virtue in the human soul, though we admit that the way Messrs. Fields, Osgood & Company are making money by the article is enough to kindle righteous indignation in the breasts of the most depraved lookers-on.

THE AMNESTY—GOVERNMENT ENCOURAGEMENT OF ART.

PARIS, August 20, 1869.

THE amnesty has taken everybody by surprise, and produced the best possible effect. People who were the Emperor's intimates in early youth, and who have seen comparatively little of him during the last few years of his empire, affirm that, left to himself, this general condonation of political offences was precisely what was most natural to him, and precisely what he would have spontaneously done; only, they who know him so thoroughly add, "He is so utterly without all genuine will of his own, that it is just exactly that which comes naturally to him that he does not do, simply because he is overruled, and made to do the reverse by some of the stronger-willed individuals who surround him." Luckily, in this circumstance he was overruled completely by the new Minister of the Council of State, M. de Chasseloup Laubat, a thorough Liberal of the Orleans school, and ex-Minister under Louis Philippe. M. de Chasseloup, being firmly backed by Prince Napoleon, carried his point; and the amnesty has been granted, not only in the completest possible conditions, but in the most perfectly constitutional form; it being the first act of the Imperial Government which bears the collective signature of the whole Ministry. This, in fact, replies victoriously to the question of "Cabinet or no Cabinet?" Here you have, not one or more ministers representing for a purpose, or for a period, the Emperor's own personal policy, but the whole Ministry honestly trying to carry out what the national will has imposed upon them. There is a "cabinet" in France, which has not been the case since the year 1851.

The feeling created by this wise measure was really needed to counterbalance the gloom suddenly thrown over last Sunday's fête by the death of poor Marshal Niel. He died on the eve of the very anniversary itself—he, the Minister of War—the man whose duty it was, under pretext of glory, to drain France of her gold and blood, in order, by dint of monstrous standing armies, to keep alive the Bonapartean prestige and perpetuate the chances of victory. Just at the hour when the hundredth anniversary of the modern Attila's birth was sought to be commemorated with the utmost solemnity, the French War Minister dies! Well! the man's functions were an anachronism—he represented theories and creeds which are rapidly fading away—but the man himself is a loss; for he was upright, honest, straightforward, and will not be satisfactorily replaced. There is one man who could far more than replace him; but he is just the man who will not be called upon to do so. I allude to General Trochu, the author of the work entitled "L'Armée Française," which, in less than a year and a half, went through twenty-four editions, and has done as much as your own great war and Prussia's success at Königgrätz to modernize the military notions of Frenchmen touching standing armies. But Trochu is looked upon with suspicion and dislike by all the Emperor's entourage, and it is highly improbable that (unless great fear imposed his nomination) he should ever be raised to any responsible situation. It is of comparatively little consequence who (among the traditionalists) is named War Minister; for, as I have more than once taken occasion to state, war is henceforth impossible. Baron Beust is the last—not believer in, but—dreamer of anything of the kind. His sagacious rival, M. von Bismarck, is far too clever, and too large-minded, and too foreseeing, not to know that France will allow of no war to prevent the German races from uniting when they resolve to do so. However, the game of "playing at soldiers" will endure some years still; and for the requirements of that expensive and useless pastime, Marshal Bazaine, the "Mexican hero," or General Fleury, the hero of the coup d'état, or General Montauban (Count Palikao), the free-handed hero of Pekin, will do as well one as the other.

A great discussion has been going on about the maintenance or abolition of the Ministry of the Household and Fine Arts, and at last things have been left in statu quo. There is a good deal to say upon this point, and the proper form is certainly not yet found for the utmost degree of encouragement to be afforded to art and to artists in this country. The great difficulty is, as in every country, to decide between the impartial and the technical. If at the head of any Government institution intended to foster art you put a man technically educated, he has no end of preconceived ideas, he is full of prejudice, and (worse) he has favorites of all kinds and sorts—favorites theoretical and personal; and the injustice he commits at every turn is quite enormous. On the other hand, if you take a man utterly untechnical, because you suppose he will be more likely to be genuinely impartial, you fall commonly into the sins of ignorance and omission. The two systems may be seen working together here to perfection, and each succeeding equally ill. At the head of the arts of painting and sculpture has been placed M. de Niewerkerke, a most amiable, agreeable, pleasant man of the world; but, unluckily, a dabbler in sculpture, and, like most amateurs, a lover of facile and unelevated art. The harm done to the French pictorial arts by M. de Niewerkerke's administration is incalculable; the whole level of art has been vulgarized, lowered; and the only artists worthy of the name during the last fifteen years are the few who dare render themselves conspicuous by their open hostility to the surintendant. Here you have the inconveniences of the technical functionary.

In Marshal Vaillant, the Minister of Fine Arts and of the Emperor's Household, you have the finest possible example of the untechnical or impartial administrator. The Marshal is utterly ignorant of anything in the whole domain of art, and has certainly no parti pris, no preconceived ideas, no favorites; besides which, he is honesty, and justice, and impartiality itself. Well, for all that, he succeeds no better than his subordinate of the pictorial department, and literary art is threatening to fall as low in France as its sisters of music and design. It may be that the "way out" will be found here, as elsewhere, in absolute freedom, and that the best way to "encourage" art will be found to be to leave it completely to the mercy of the public. What tends to make one believe this is the conduct of the great uneducated public on the days of "les représentations gratis." One of these took place as usual last Sunday at the Imperial theatres, and I had the curiosity to witness it. The theatre I chose was the Grand Opera, and the performance was that of "Les Huguenots." I will not attempt to describe to you the aspect of the house, though that is one of the most interesting spectacles that can be imagined; but I will merely state what is the amount of critical sense shown. I have numberless times and in various countries seen "Les Huguenots" given before what are termed polite audiences, but never have I seen its most refined beauties appreciated as they are by this "public des faubourgs." Not a phrase of Madame Miolan's exquisite style escaped them, not one of Faure's "lights and shadows" of declamation. They seized everything, and never applauded in the wrong place. The strange thing was that they seemed less moved by the loud choral or orchestral masses than by the more delicate and refined passages, and I was told by those of the administration that this was always so. "This public," said one habitué to me, "gives the other a severe lesson: these people judge for themselves and never err; the others require a claque to guide them."

Correspondence.

BYRON'S MYSTIFICATIONS.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: In support of your theory of the origin of the Byron scandal—a theory which has also been mine—I venture to call your attention to an article from "Under the Crown," republished by Littell Feb. 13, 1869. The writer, who signs himself "Octogenarian," was a schoolmate of Byron's at Harrow, and intimate with him there and afterwards till Byron's final departure from England. He spent at one time several weeks at Newstead Abbey, and, though he himself took orders and lived "an almost solitary life in a country curacy," saw Byron not unfrequently in London, and corresponded with him constantly. The whole article is exceedingly interesting, and has doubtless been read by many of your readers. But the trait in Byron's character described in the concluding paragraphs may not be remembered. If, as appears probable, the whole terrible charge rests on Byron's "confession," it will easily be seen from the following how much reliance is to be placed on such a "confession." The writer says:

"There was hardly an offence of which he would not, with perfect indifference, accuse himself. An old schoolfellow, who met him on the Continent, told me that he would continually write paragraphs against himself in the foreign journals, and delight in their republication by the English newspapers as in the success of a practical joke. Whenever anybody has related anything discreditable of Byron, assuring me that it must be true, for he heard it from himself, I always felt that he could not have spoken upon worse authority, and that, in all probability, the tale was a pure invention. If I could remember, and were willing to repeat, the various misdoings which I have from time to time heard him attribute to himself, I could fill a volume. But I never believed them. I very soon became aware of this strange idiosyncrasy; it puzzled me to account for it; but there it was—a sort of diseased and distorted vanity. The same eccentric spirit would induce him to report things which were false, with regard to his family, which anybody else would have concealed though true. He told me more than once that his father was insane, and killed himself. I shall never forget the manner in which he first told me this. While washing his hands and singing a gay Neapolitan air, he stopped, looked round at me, and said, 'There always was madness in the family.' Then, after continuing his washing and his song, he added, as if speaking of a matter of the slightest indifference, 'My father cut his throat.' The contrast between the tenor of the subject and the levity of the expression was fearfully painful—it was like a stanza of 'Don Juan.' In this instance, I had no doubt that the fact was as he related it; but in speaking of it only a few years since to an old lady* in whom I had perfect confidence, she assured me that it was not so; Mr. Byron, who was her cousin, had been extremely wild, but was quite sane, and had died very quietly in his bed. What Byron's reason could have been for thus calumniating not only himself, but the blood which was flowing in his veins, who can divine? But, for some reason or other, it seemed to be his determined purpose to keep himself unknown to the great body of his fellow-creatures; to present himself to their view in moral masquerade; and to identify himself in their imaginations with Childe Harold and the Corsair, between which characters and his own—as God and education had made it—the most microscopic inspection would fail to discern a single point of resemblance.

"Except this love of an ill name—this tendency to malign himself—this hypocrisy reversed, I have no personal knowledge whatever of any evil act or evil disposition of Lord Byron's. I once said this to a gentleman† who was well acquainted with Byron's London life. He expressed himself astonished at what I said. 'Well,' I replied, 'do you know any harm of him but what he told you himself?' 'Oh! yes—a hundred things.' 'I don't want you to tell me a hundred things; I shall be content with one.' Here the conversation was interrupted. We were at dinner—there was a large party—and the subject was not again renewed at table. But afterwards, in the drawing-room, Mr. Drury came up to me and said, 'I have been thinking of what you were saying at dinner. I do not know any harm of Byron but what he has told me of himself.'"

L. R. W.

Cambridge, September 3, 1869.

THE CHINA MERCHANTS.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: An article in the Tribune of Aug. 31, entitled "How we should deal with China," takes occasion to insult our American merchants in that country by stigmatizing them as "that class of persons" who "are essentially narrow-minded, selfish, and grasping;" and applies to them the rhetorical flourish of Burke, that "their ledger's their Bible, their desk their altar, their counting-house their temple, their money their God;" and that if there is any class of evil counsellors whom an American minister to China ought to avoid, it is this one.

The Tribune has long been established in this city; and its editors ought to know that many of our best citizens came from and are still identified with "that class," and that their general intelligence, respectability, and humanity are at least equal to those of the Tribune editors, while they are much better qualified to say "how we should deal with China."

It is very common for the Tribune editor to apply the term of "liar" to those who have charged him with having said or done that which he deems offensive or untrue. I, of course, would not follow such a bad example, but simply say to him, in the most explicit manner, that his opinions of the American China merchants are most unfounded; that his mode of expressing them is unbecoming and vulgar; and that his remarks on the China question betray an ignorance of the subject that is, when joined to so much arrogant confidence, simply ludicrous.

A China Merchant.

Sept. 4, 1869.

THE HARVARD "RAH."

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: It has been my fortune to have heard much cheering in the various English-speaking lands. To my ear, there is no sound more inspiring than that of frigate cheering frigate, while the boatswain's whistle calls time, or the natural outburst of a body of young men animated by esprit de corps and accustomed to cheer as one. It would be hard for that matter to improve much upon the Harvard cheer of twenty years syne. But, on the other hand, it would not be easy to invent a cry more pert and tinkling than the "rah! rah! rah!" which infests but does not resound from the banks of the Charles to-day.

The original English are in some sense connoisseurs in the art of cheering. Their opportunities for observation and practice in that particular have been neither few nor small. How impressive the "rah" must seem to them we can easily conceive. Is it possible to repress a smile in favor of the Times reporter on reading his account of the great race? "The Harvard crew jump away and are putting forth wonders of power. The Americans in the two steamers are wildly excited and give a peculiar cheer—'Ah! ah! ah!' . . . . Once more, however, 'Ah! ah! ah!' burst from American lips, but the dreaded enemy crept on, got fairly abreast, and forged ahead."

The history of the "rah" is as follows: When the lists of "parts," mock or real, for exhibition or commencement is publicly read in the College-yard at Cambridge, it has long been the custom to cheer, ironically or otherwise, at the name of each recipient. As there may be forty or fifty names read, and the interest in each is often small, the long hurrah was frequently lazily abbreviated into "rah! rah! rah!" It must be admitted that the "rah" is well fitted for the emotionless service which gave it birth. But in an evil hour, some fifteen years since, it occurred to the collegians that they had better accept the amendment and make it a standing rule, and thus these "residual leavings" came to molest the public ear.

If a distinguishing cry be really necessary for the use of their college, as possibly it may be, cannot the Harvard men be induced to invent something to meet the actual requirements of the case without resorting to a cheer devoid of life and beyond the pale of human sympathy? But in any event—whatever the Harvard men may think or say of their practice or their style—let it never again be told of the rest of us Americans that, standing in the midst of a foreign throng, with the world breathless in expectancy, while a handful of "ours" pull gallantly to the front in spite of odds the most appalling, we can find no cry to express our emotions but only "Ah! ah!"

F. H.

Boston, Sept. 4, 1869.

[Our correspondent is mistaken, we think, as regards the length of time during which the cry he complains of has been in use. It certainly is not fifteen years since we heard a decent lung cheer from a crowd of Cambridge students. The three cheers used to be quickly given, but the single cheer was not shortened.—Ed. Nation.]

Notes.

LITERARY.

Messrs. J. B. Lippincott & Co. add to their list of new books, American and English, the following: "One Poor Girl, a History of Many," by Mr. Wirt Sikes, who has been a habitual student of some of the bad and miserable stages of life in this city; "Trees, Plants, and Flowers—Where

* Mrs. Villiers, Lord Clarendon's mother.

† The Rev. Henry Drury.

and How they Grow," by Mr. William L. Baily, whose book is likely to be clear, interesting, and sound; "Compensation," a novel by Anne Brewster; "Christ and the Scriptures," by the Rev. Mr. Adolph Saphir; "Personal Experience of Roman Catholicism, with Incidents of Convent Life," by Eliza Richardson, whom we take to be an Englishwoman, and who is also the author of a book similar to this one—a book entitled "The Vail Lifted; or, The Romance and Reality of Convent Life;" "The History of Freemasonry from its Origin to the Present Day," by J. G. Findel, who is a Mason himself, and whose work has the prefatory endorsement of Brother D. Murray Lyon; "Alfred the Great," by Thomas Hughes; and, finally, "Masterpieces of Living English Painters," which is a collection for presentation purposes of twenty-six autotype reproductions, taken from the best engravings, of celebrated pictures, and which contains also descriptive letterpress. We should mention here that Messrs. Lippincott & Co. have made arrangements which give them exclusive control of all Washington Irving's works, and that they will issue an edition—simultaneously with the English issue—of the Sunday Magazine, a liberal and good magazine of its kind, and one to be recommended to families—Christian or otherwise—as very readable, instructive, and well illustrated. Rev. George Macdonald is one of the contributors, and Mr. William Gilbert, who is more purely a story-teller—a man who has the old and almost forgotten liking for stories as mere stories—than any one we now think of, is another regular writer for the Sunday Magazine. The editor is Dr. Thomas Guthrie, who is perhaps a better editor than author.——Messrs. G. P. Putnam & Son have in preparation "Letters from the East," by Mr. Bryant, as well as a new edition of the same author's "Letters of a Traveller;" "The Mystic Bell, a Tale for the Young Folks," by E. J. Kuntze; "Green-houses and Green-house Plants," by M. Field—the preface by Mr. Bryant; "Mr. Secretary Pepys and His Diary," by General James Grant Wilson—a work of which we seem to recollect that it was published some two years ago; "On the Edge of the Storm," a novel by the author of "Mlle. Mori;" and—better than any of these—"Letters from England and Italy," by Mrs. Nathaniel Hawthorne.——Messrs. Macmillan & Co. have in press Dr. F. E. Anstie's "Neuralgia and Diseases which resemble it." Last week, in our mention of the authors whose names are to be found in Macmillan & Co.'s list, the reader will find Dr. Anstie's name appearing as Austin. Another small error of the types in the same paragraph makes us say that Mr. Freeman, the historian, is the author of "Ecce Homo." The comma after "Freeman" should be a semicolon. It is not any longer denied, we believe, that the author of "Ecce Homo" is Professor Seeley, of the London University. The same house have for the young people and their parents the good news that Mr. Carroll, the author of "Alice's Adventures in Wonderland," has written a companion for it, which is to be called "Behind the Looking-glass"—a place where, obviously, many marvellous things may readily be discovered, especially if the right person goes to look. "The Stranger of Seriphos" is a new book of poems by a Mr. Broome, who is not known to us. Other works announced by Macmillan as in a state of preparation are Hozier's "Campaign in Abyssinia;" Huxley on "Strong Drink," and, by the same author, "Lay Sermons" and an "Elementary Geography;" "Old Tales Re-narrated," by Henry Kingsley; Colonel Higginson's "Malbone;" a Life of the Earl of Shaftesbury, by Mr. Christie; "Woman's Culture and Woman's Work;" a Life of Galileo; Dr. Galton's "Hereditary Genius;" several school-books; these three volumes to be added to the "Globe Editions" of classical authors—namely, "Spenser," "Dryden," and "Cowper;" and three to be added to the "Golden Treasury Series"—namely, Mr. Thomas Browne's "Religio Medici," Professor Masson's edition of Milton, and the "Book of Satires," selected by Mr. Hooper.——Messrs. Bill, Nichols & Co., of Springfield, Mass., will soon make their first venture in the publishing world by putting their imprint upon an autobiography of John B. Gough, the temperance lecturer—an auspicious beginning, we should think, so far as the treasury of the new house is concerned, and not inauspicious in any respect.——Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt have in press and nearly ready a work by Professor Raphael Pumpelly, entitled "Across America and Asia," being an account of five years' travel and residence in Arizona, where Mr. Pumpelly had some exceedingly rough experiences with wild miners, in Japan, and in China, in both of which countries he spent some time in the employ of the Government, and from the latter of which he travelled overland to Europe by way of Mongolia and Siberia. The same firm will publish Mr. H. Sutherland Edwards's "Life of Rossini," which will be enriched by Doré's picture of the maestro on his death-bed—a picture not in the market, we believe; and Ehlert's "Letters on Music," translated by Mrs. Fanny Raymond Ritter.

—By reason of their close relations with the best writers of this country and England, the reading public always expect the fall list of Messrs. Fields, Osgood & Co. to promise a treat, and the treat promised this fall is one that we suppose even this house has never before equalled. First in interest is a volume from Mr. Lowell, entitled "Among My Books," which will contain some of the critical essays which their author has contributed to the North American Review. It can hardly contain them all, for it is to be a 16mo we see by the advertisement; so it is, no doubt, safe to begin grumbling at once. Four or five such essays as the "Dryden" would fill up any reasonable 16mo, and we suppose some of the lectures on more abstract literary subjects are to be left out. However, we are not likely to be unthankful for what we do get. The Rev. Mr. Samuel J. May, the veteran and venerable Abolitionist, who probably knows the people and events of the anti-slavery struggle as well as anybody in the country, if not better, writes a volume of "Recollections of the Anti-Slavery Conflict." This should be supplemented by other works, which could easily be made by any one of the old anti-slavery army; especially the comic and humorous side of the struggle should be given; some of the reformers were queer enough creatures, and some of them have a sense of the humorous—a gift that reformers, we fear, are not often blessed with—which would qualify them for giving us entertaining books as well as contributions to the history of the times. Mr. May's reminiscences, or some of them, have already appeared in print in a journal of the denomination to which he belongs—the Unitarian. "The Literature of the Age of Elizabeth," which, after being delivered as lectures at the Lowell Institute, appeared in the Atlantic from month to month, is now put into book-form by its author, Mr. Whipple, whose merits and defects as a critic are tolerably well known. Miss Anne Isabella Thackeray's complete works—"The Village on the Cliff," "Five Old Friends," "From an Island," and other stories equally good—are to be published in two volumes. "This is not the first time," Miss Thackeray writes to the firm, "that I have to thank you for thinking of our interests in America;" so the edition is "authorized," and will be treated accordingly, we suppose, though the war is not over yet between the Harpers and Fields, Osgood & Co. "George Eliot's" novels are to come out—have indeed already begun to come out—in volumes uniform with the "Household Reade" and the "Household Thackeray," which have been so successful in satisfying the popular wish for a uniform edition of the works of these favorites. The "Adam Bede," which is before us as we write, seems free, or nearly so, from a small defect which its predecessors had—a narrowness of the back margin of the pages, on account of which the reader, in order to get at the ends of the lines, had to bend the covers of the volume with bad results to the stiffness of the back. "Too Bright to Last" seems to be an English novel, as it is to be printed from advance sheets, but by whom it is we are not told. The late President Felton's "Greece, Ancient and Modern," a readable book, is to appear in a one-volume edition. "The Secret of Swedenborg" is by Mr. Henry James, and will get the best attention of philosophical religionists and of many metaphysicians; and if it does not also need their best attention, it will not be Mr. James's, for he is abstruse. "Army Life in a Black Regiment" is by Colonel T. W. Higginson, who formed, if not the best, at all events one of the earliest, and decidedly one of the most amusing, of the colored regiments. It was recruited from the Sea Island field-hands, and contained several "geniuses" whom Colonel Higginson, as his Atlantic Monthly papers bear witness, knows how to make more or less entertaining. The life, also, was a strange one. Our readers will recollect the "Charles Dickens Edition" of Dickens, in fourteen volumes; it is now to be put into seven volumes, each containing from sixteen to twenty of the illustrations. And Mr. Emerson's works, everybody will be glad to hear, are also to undergo compression, and be published in a cheap edition of two volumes, which will contain all the prose works. This gives us three volumes in one, and the size is duodecimo. Stopford Brooke's life of F. W. Robertson and his own sermons will appear in one volume each. Volume I. is announced of Professors Agassiz's and Hartt's "Scientific Results of a Journey in Brazil." Professor Hartt does the geology and Professor Agassiz the natural history of the fishes. What to expect of Mr. John D. Sherwood's "Comic History of America" we do not know; curiosity will be satisfied in November, however, if it can be held in that long. "Miracles Past and Present" is by William Mountford, a writer better known in Boston, and among religious preachers of advanced liberal views, than elsewhere and by other people. Of "Juveniles," Messrs. Fields, Osgood & Co.'s list contains some that are very good. Mr. Aldrich's "Story of a Bad Boy" is excellent, so far as we have read it in Our Young Folks, and so is Mrs. Diaz's "William Henry Letters." "The Fairy Egg" we know nothing about; nor of "A Child's Dream of a Star," except that it is Mr. Dickens's, and therefore likely to be good. Miss E. S. Phelps has written a story for children which she calls "The Trotty Book," and which the publishers declare ought to be as popular among the young people as her "Gates Ajar" has been among people of matured years. This latter work, by the way, goes into an illustrated red-line edition, and will be sought after as a gift-book by thousands more than the thirty or forty thousand who already have read it. We should have mentioned among the books for adults the Rev. Mr. Edward Everett Hale's new volume. "Sybaris and Other Homes" he calls it, and it is pleasantly satirical on modern American ways of living, as our readers know who recollect the papers as they appeared in the Atlantic.

—In books of Poetry, Messrs. Fields, Osgood & Co.'s catalogue is of course strong, but we have to record new editions of works well known rather than much that is new. Mr. Bryant, however, translates the "Iliad," and gives us this year the first twelve books. And the "Vagabonds," by Mr. J. T. Trowbridge, is new—at least as a volume, and probably as regards some of the poems; and wholly new, we suppose, is the ill-named "Uncle Sam Series" for children. It consists of four volumes of verses by Mr. Stedman, Mr. Stoddard, Mr. Bayard Taylor, and Mr. Trowbridge, who each fill a thin paper-covered volume with a ballad. Mr. Stedman does "Rip Van Winkle's Nap," and we hope he put off the composition of it till Mr. Jefferson came with inspiration for him, as indeed he might to many a poor poet. Mr. Taylor does "The Ballad of Abraham Lincoln," Mr. Stoddard "Putnam the Brave," and Mr. Trowbridge "The Story of Columbus." The illustrations are in colors, and the covers of the volumes are to be gaily illuminated—Mr. S. Eytinge, jr., and Mr. Alfred Fredericks being the artists. Mr. Gerald Massey's book is also wholly new. The rather singular and almost infallibly unhappy title of it is "A Tale of Eternity, and other Poems." But for the rest, the announcements of poetry are all of old poems in fresh forms, except that, no doubt, the new "Atlantic Almanac" will have some new verses by some one or other of its contributors, who are Mr. Lowell, Mr. Howells, Colonel Higginson, Mr. Trowbridge, Mr. Hale, Miss Kate Field, Miss Phelps, Dickens, and Thackeray—who probably furnishes some recently unearthed scrap—the firm intending to publish everything of his they can find. Mr. Lowell's complete poetical works are to appear in the "Diamond Edition" form, in various bindings, and at various prices, from a dollar and a half up. All of Whittier's poems are going to be issued in a two-volume edition, to be called the "Merrimac," as a two-volume Tennyson, which this house publishes, is called the "Farringford," from the poet's residence. There is also to be a profusely illustrated selection from Whittier's writings, which will be called "The Ballads of New England." The publishers say that it will be "the most beautiful holiday book ever produced in America," and perhaps it will. Longfellow's poetical works go into a "Red-line edition," complete in one volume, with twelve illustrations, and, besides this cheapest of illustrated Longfellows, there is to be "The Building of the Ship," with twenty pictures, designed by Hennessy and Gifford, and engraved by Anthony and Linton, and a new and cheaper edition of the translation of the Divine Comedy. Owen Meredith's "Lucile," the success of which ought to persuade him to leave off poetry, and take to novel-writing, goes into one more of its numerous editions. Tennyson, complete, is to be put into a Globe Edition—a duodecimo—for a dollar and a quarter. It is to be printed from new plates. "The handsomest and cheapest illustrated Scott" is a "red-line" small quarto, with twelve illustrations, and, bound in cloth, it will cost four dollars and a half.

— It seems that there was some mistake in the announcement that Mr. George William Curtis will be among the contributors to the College Review, which has just been started. He is compelled to decline compliance with the requests of editors in almost every case.

—The English market has been almost barren during the last fortnight, so far as regards works in Science, Fiction, History, Biography, and Poetry; and most of the books which we are called on to mention are such as may best be classed as Miscellaneous. A Mr. Wrascall Hall has published a volume of poems, of which the chief is a drama called "The Curse of Creeds." "Creeds Cursed out of the Way, or Two Lovers made Happy in a Twelvemonth," would be a better title for the poem, according to one of Mr. Hall's critics. The hero wishes to marry the heroine, it appears; but she has some scruples as to wedding with a gentleman who positively, not to say violently, declares that if there is anything he does not like, it is religion. Hereupon the hero leaves her; but, by-and-by, he comes back, and, by dint of much strong language, turns her from piety, and convinces her that she is all wrong. Then they marry. Two forthcoming books of Biography are the "Life of Jane Austen," by the Rev. Mr. J. Austen-Leigh, the novelist's nephew, and the "Life of Mary Russell Mitford," by the Rev. Mr. Guy L'Estrange. Both will have interest; and Miss Mitford's, properly done, could not fail to be pathetic, and to take its place among the most enduring records of woman's fortitude and self-sacrifice. She was thus much, at least, of "a Sancho Panza in petticoats"—as some woman, without much discrimination, once called her—that she was faithful for many years of trial to a man whom she thought herself in duty bound to serve. Her father made her life a long and painful struggle, which she bore without complaint. Exactly how to classify a work by Mr. J. S. Stuart Glennie we do not know. Doubtless it has an equal right to be considered history or fiction. Its title is "Arthurian Localities;" and the author's object is to prove the not new hypothesis that Arthur was so far from being a southwest of England hero that he was a Scot, and did his fighting and won his glory in the centre of Scotland. "The Lay of Havelock the Dane," re-edited by Mr. W. W. Keat, we may put down as poetry; and so, also—with mental reservations—the three ballads by Mr. J. Harrison—one called "The Clipper Screw," one "Maximilian," and one "Trafalgar." A book which, probably, we may safely put under the head of fiction is one by the author of "Margaret and her Bridesmaids," and is described as "a novel and yet not a novel"—a description which for some time has been of wide application to the works of contemporary novelists.

—Among the Miscellaneous books, several are interesting: "Nationality, or the Law Relating to Subjects and Aliens," is by Chief-Justice Cockburn, and deals with the subject with a view to future parliamentary legislation upon it. "A Treatise on Punctuation, and on other matters relating to Correct Writing and Printing," may possibly be of service to authors, though we imagine its good influence will most likely reach their works through the medium of proof-readers rather than in any more direct way. Numismatists will desire a book—to be issued in five or six parts, by Mr. J. Russell Smith—which treats of English coins of all denominations, from the Conquest to the present time. Two lectures by Mr. W. B. Hodgson we think we have not mentioned before; they deal with the questions of "The Education of Girls, and the Employment of Women of the Upper Classes." Messrs. Gustave Doré and Blanchard Jerrold are said to have been making a systematic exploration of the low districts of all London, for the purpose of producing an illustrated book—"it is whispered, of the gloomiest nature." Mrs. E. Lynn Linton, who is certainly the writer of some if not of all the Saturday Review essays on woman as she ought not to be—but perhaps sometimes may be, if girl-of-the-period essays keep on appearing—has written, it seems, several essays for the Broadway, which are much like the more famous ones but are rather milder. These have been collected into a volume entitled "Ourselves," which Messrs. George Routledge & Son have recently issued. "The Antiquities of Heraldry" is by Mr. William Smith Ellis, who imposes on himself the task of making it manifest that modern heraldry embodies, or is derived from, the most ancient religious symbols and military devices and the emblems of the heathen deities of antiquity. The cross he traces to the phallus, we are told. To expect a writer on symbolism to keep his eye on the things signified rather than upon the sign would be to prepare disappointment for one's self. Mr. W. Carew Hazlitt has recently edited a collection of proverbs and adages, and has once again received praise for very good workmanship and called down on himself blame for his abuse of other workers in the same field. Agriculturists will be interested in Mr. J. J. Mechi's "Profitable Farming," which has for its second title "Latest Agricultural Sayings and Doings; with Balance-Sheet from June, 1867, to April, 1869." Of Mr. Edward Arber's reprints of old English works, the latest volume is Nicholas Udall's "Roister Doister," which is edited from the unique copy in the library of Eton College. At Bury St. Edmund's there has just been discovered a letter written by Sir Isaac Newton to Mr. Ffolkes, in which the philosopher gives what seems to be a full account of his discovery of the law of gravitation, and in which there is made no mention at all of the most celebrated save one of all apples. There begins to be general doubt, therefore, if the common story has any foundation in fact. A much praised book, in which science is said to be worthily popularized, is the volume of essays read before the British Medical Association at Oxford last year. They are the work of Doctors Acland and Rolleston, of Oxford; Dr. Gull, of London; and Dr. Haughton, of Dublin. Medicine as it is and the future of medicine were, respectively, the subjects treated of by the two gentlemen last-named, and their papers, as well as those of their fellow-associates, appear to have been very well fitted not only for the comprehension of their medical brethren but that of the general public. We are apt to speak disparagingly of "the popularization of science;" but every year it becomes more evident that such is the immense increase in the extent and intricacy of each branch of scientific research, that it is not for the general public merely, but for the various classes of scientists also, that science must be "popularized." Before long an entomologist, say, talking qua entomologist—not popularizing his talk—will be no surer of an intelligent audience when he addresses accomplished geologists or able chemists, than when he is addressing able-bodied stone-breakers or strong-headed drysalters.

—Among Theological or Religious books recently published in England, or soon to be published, there are a few which have value and interest. The Rev. Mr. G. Bartle writes "The Scriptural Doctrine of Hades," in which he makes enquiry into the state of the righteous and the wicked between the time of their death and the time of their rising from the grave to undergo the general judgment, and seeks to prove, from the Bible, that the atonement for the sins of mankind was not made in this world, on the cross. Mr. Bartle believes in a Purgatory—or rather in a Hades—where souls, existing in a state which is neither completely happy nor completely miserable, await the sentence which consigns them to a perfect Heaven or an utter Hell. In Mr. Robert Baxter's "God's Purpose in Judgment," it is contended that the theory of the annihilation of the wicked, and the Universalist theory of final eternal happiness for all men, are both untrue. Odder, we dare say, than anything in Mr. Baxter's book is the fact that a citizen of the religious world should think that within that world either of these theories exists in sufficient strength to make it worth while to attack it. Among men who are not to be classed as religious there is plenty of Universalism—in a sense; and there is also plenty of Annihilationism; but as sectarian beliefs, neither of these aberrations from orthodoxy is now of any importance at all. We have already once mentioned Mr. Charles Hastings Collette's "Reply to Cobbett's One-sided History of the Reformation in England and Ireland." Mr. Collette, "using simple facts," answers Cobbett's "low, vulgar, and virulent abuse," and proves that many of his so-called "facts" are not facts. The question ceases, however, to be one of past facts—as Cobbett, if he were now living, would no doubt be very sure to tell Mr. Collette. The Rev. Mr. Isaac Williams is the author of two volumes of sermons which now go into new editions—one entitled "Female Characters of Holy Scripture;" the other, "Characters of the Old Testament." Of use to students of the New Testament will be the Rev. Mr. Wm. Pound's "Story of the Gospels," showing in a new translation their unity. Not only an English, but a Greek "harmony" is presented in Mr. Pound's work.

— Ignorance of America has not yet quite ceased to be a part of a good English education. It is true that American affairs and ideas every day get more and more of the respectful attention of Englishmen; and that every day the number of Englishmen increases who do not believe, with Mr. Carlyle, that we over here are all "going to hell" straight; and that there is an increasing number of Englishmen who, though they concede the truth of Mr. Matthew Arnold's proposition that the United States is the Paradise of Mediocrities, yet, even after they have made that dreadful admission, venture to doubt, openly, if there are not one or two dreadful admissions for Mr. Arnold also to make. Still, the time has not come yet in the inchoate America on the other side of the water for Americans and American affairs to expect from the average British subject a perfectly intelligent treatment. Naturally, the intercollegiate boat-race has brought this truth into prominence, and the British press has lately been saying several things calculated to infuriate good American citizens very much. There was, for instance, the letter written to the Times the other day by the bow-oar of the Oxford boat. After mentioning the undeniable fact that Oxford had given Harvard a beating, it proceeded to say that the beating might have been a good deal worse if it had not been for this, and that, and this other cause. Are gracious things of that kind so easily done unless one feels a rather supercilious dislike and contempt for one's defeated antagonist, and wonders a little at his impudence? We trow not. Then the Saturday Review—not at all uncivilly, however—favors us with what seems an imaginative account of Harvard University—one which, if it is not imaginative, gives us painful assurance that not yet has it occurred to the giants of Gath and Askelon to inform themselves thoroughly concerning Cambridge in Massachusetts. Harvard men wear caps and gowns, it appears, and do many other things not known to the American public. Then again we have our friend, Mr. Thomas Hughes, congratulating Harvard on having "produced" Professor Agassiz, who, the fact is, was produced "in the beautiful Pays de Vaud," as an American Doctor of Laws, recently created such by Mr. Hughes's own Oxford, has given all the world to understand. Then, finally—not to make too long and humiliating a list—there is a correspondent of the Anglo-American Times who tells the editor of that journal that it was not fair "to select from a nation like the United States a crew to compete with a mere university," evidently supposing, the editor says, that "'Harvard' was the name of a professional crew selected from the continent, something like the Wards." We can't all be Englishmen till after the Millennium; but luckily there are enough of Englishmen even now to do pretty well a chief duty of the race—console one for not being English.

OUR OWN BIRDS OF THE UNITED STATES.*

This is the somewhat awkward title of a good-looking little volume of two hundred and sixty pages which comes to us from Philadelphia, in the latitude of which it seems to have been written. We do not remember having before seen the author's name in connection with ornithology, and this little book, pretty and convenient as it is, stamps him as a judicious compiler rather than an original observer. It is smoothly and pleasantly written, and contains much general information about our birds; but it smells of the library rather than of the fields and woods, and has little of the charm and fascination, and few of the characteristic marks and features, which belong to the great works from which most of its material has been drawn. It is only fair to say, however, that the book does not assume to be a new contribution to ornithology, but aims "simply to present, in a concise and familiar manner, to the youthful reader some interesting facts relating to the birds of our own country." But we fear the youthful reader will suspect that it is a device to insinuate knowledge into his head, and will find it very dry reading, or will lay it aside altogether for books that smack more of the real article, like Bumstead's "On the Wing" or Halsey Thrasher's "Hunter and Trapper."

It would seem to require quite as much genius, and much more tact and address, to popularize any branch of science, especially to make it win upon the attention of the younger class of readers, than it does to succeed in a more learned and profound way. Young as well as old love freshness and the savor of real things; and a subject presented in such general terms as to be shorn of all picturesqueness and special interest—which is the manner of most concise and familiar treatises, and to which the book before us is hardly an exception—usually goes a-begging with both. A compilation, or even a graceful presentation, of the main facts in the lives of our birds will not suffice. A writer on ornithology who would win the ear of old and young must go to the fields and woods and tell his own story, and tell it with genius and enthusiasm—must avail himself of all the accessories of scenery and place and personal adventure, and give us a live bird and not a dead image. It is not because Audubon's facts are facts that his page is so vivid and entertaining, but because they are Audubon's facts—a world of acute and original observation borne along on the stream of a copious personal experience and adventure; and it is the cost and voluminousness of his works alone, as of those of Wilson, that create the demand for a cheaper and more concise treatise. Cheaper and more concise it must be; but a less picturesque and winsome narrative, or a page with less hearty love and appreciation of the subject, we do not want. Tried by such a test, none of the recent attempts seem to us to possess much merit. Some expectation was excited by Samuels' "Ornithology and Oology of New England," but, aside from its quotations and appropriations, it had little value, and is thoroughly unreadable. If some enterprising publisher would bring out a new edition of Nuttall's work, which is now entirely out of print, and which is prized highest by the best judges, the public would have within its reach both an agreeable book and a valuable manual of ornithology.

Still, we would not judge too harshly the work before us. The reader might pay dearer and fare worse. Any young person devoted to the study of our birds, and who needs no spur from others, but only guidance, will find in it much help. It is illustrated by over fifty wood-cuts, containing the figures of about seventy of our more familiar species, the majority of them strikingly good—so good, indeed, that there seems no excuse for the few bad ones. The cuts of the red-start, the blue-bird, the song-sparrow, the cedar-bird, the oriole, are hardly recognizable. Neither can we praise the figure of the robin—the attitude of which is that of a chicken afflicted with the gapes. The full-paged illustration of a pair of ruby-throated humming-birds is also open to criticism. According to the scale adopted in drawing the branch and the foliage of the picture, one might take these figures to represent some large new species of snipe, while the nest would accommodate a barn-fowl, though it is doubtful if even a shanghai could deliver itself of such eggs. But the cuts of humming-birds a page or two further on are excellent, as indeed are nearly all the rest of the figures in the book. Perhaps we ought not to except the frontispiece, which represents our national bird with so much the look of a goose about the head and face—and a stuffed one at that—that we are heartily ashamed of him, and inclined to discredit all the author has written about his haughty spirit and bold flight.

* "Our Own Birds of the United States. By William L. Baily." Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1869.

The system of classification adopted is, for the most part, that of Lilljeberg, which divides the class Aves (the primary system of Figors) into three sub-classes, viz., natatores (aquatic), ur sores (terrestial), and incessores (arboreal); and though readers of the older ornithologists will be a little perplexed to find cuckoos and parrots placed in the same order with the woodpeckers simply because the arrangement of the toes are the same in each, yet in the present unsettled state of the science, when every system of classification, like an ill-fitting shoe, pinches nature at one point or is too loose at another, it answers the purpose very well.

As Mr. Baily has written with the hope that his book would stimulate the reader to further and independent enquiry upon the subject of ornithology, it seems to us that if, in so small a work, he had covered but part of the field, dealing in less general remark and encomiums upon the works of nature, and given us more pointed and graphic pictures of the lives of our everyday birds, following them into their haunts, and identifying them to us by some characteristic trait or call, his success would have been much greater, because the final value of such a work is in proportion as it lets the reader into the special delights and atmosphere of the subject, giving a charm and a significance to what before was passed by unnoticed.

CURRENT FRENCH LITERATURE.

It is now more than half-a-century since the name of M. Guizot appeared in French literature, and he is still to-day a successful and vigorous writer. One of his latest works, "St. Louis and Calvin," is sufficiently known through a translation to our reading public to dispense us from any notice of it here. His last published work is "Mélanges Politiques et Historiques." Its preface bears date May, 1869, but the seven essays comprised in it appeared at intervals from July, 1816 ("On Representative Government"), to September, 1828. In thus republishing political pamphlets more than forty years old, M. Guizot disclaims any motive of personal vanity or "an old man's mere caprice." "I have lived too long," he says, "and have but too well experienced the rapid decay of everything—books, men, and governments—now to harbor the pretension of occupying the attention of the present with a vanished past. But among the facts and political problems which agitated us in France forty years ago, there are some—and these the gravest—that bear an intimate analogy with those of to-day. The dominant feature of the actual situation," continues M. Guizot, "is, evidently, an effort to emerge from the régime of dictatorship, and enter upon that of active liberty, and the efficacious influence of the country upon its government. I say dictatorship, for such is the true name of what is to-day called 'personal government.'" This is plain speech; and the preface continues with an admirable sketch of the attempts made from the period of the first Napoleon down to the present day to obtain constitutional guarantees for France.

But if the language of M. Guizot be plain, that of another French writer of to-day is yet plainer, although veiled by the text of a history as old as the sway of the Cæsars. The writer we refer to is M. Beulé, the author of a work on "The Emperor Augustus, his Family and his Friends." The reasons are very clear why such a work, well executed, should receive special attention in France just now—or, for that matter, at any time within the past fifteen years. Augustus is not the only emperor designated as "the nephew of his uncle." Until within comparatively few years, the Augustus known to France was the sovereign portrayed by the flattering Virgil, and who, attired in the more modern drapery of Corneille, has challenged the admiration of successive generations of Frenchmen. But the Augustus depicted by M. Beulé is a different personage. Here we see him as he lived and governed, with his cunning attitude and physiognomy, cruel whenever his interests did not dictate moderation, without the brilliant faculties of the great Cæsar, but—to use a telling phrase of Jules Favre—clever in corrupting for the sake of reigning, and clever in noiselessly introducing the machinery of despotism into the Roman world. Not only Augustus, but Livia, his wife, Julia, his daughter, and Mecænas and Agrippa, his lieutenants and counsellors, are admirably portrayed by M. Beulé. And with the same wonderful fidelity with which he presents Augustus, M. Beulé has also reproduced Tiberius. In this portraiture of Tiberius—a study in psychology and philosophy—we are made to see not only the individuality of the tyrant, as manifested in his despotism, but also the influence of unrestrained imperial power upon the individuality. Following the career of the successor of Augustus, noting his character before he inherited empire, and his violence and debaucheries as soon as he obtained possession of that heritage, we have a revelation of the effect of tyrannical power on him who wields it.

M. Beulé has continued this double historical study of imperial personages and imperial morals in another work just published, "Le Sang de Germanicus" ("The Lineage of Germanicus"). It is, properly speaking, a series of portraits, grouped under one title. The author's introduction presents the main idea of his work somewhat thus: "I have been severely criticised by some persons who refuse to admit the general application of my judgment upon Augustus and Tiberius, and who cannot grant to these special cases the value of a demonstration. 'Your severity for these emperors,' say they, 'is at once unjust and purely personal in its application. The faults of these two great personages make a case against them, but not against the theory they represent. Human inferiority should not be allowed to compromise the majesty of power. Augustus is a parvenu, the result of civil war; Tiberius an intruder, deformed by the tyranny of Augustus. Neither of these souls was developed in the charming cradle, the serene atmosphere, the vivifying clearness of supreme power.'"

To this the author replies:

"History serves us admirably, for she gives us a series of emperors who can satisfy all the exigencies of the problem. Born in the purple, grown up under the shadow of the throne, idols of the crowd, favorites of the soldiers, they are all the issue of excellent and noble parents, the descendants of the republican Drusus, the honorable Antonia, the honored Germanicus, the proud Agrippina. The blood that flows in their veins destines them to virtue, to popularity, to sacrifice. Ardently beloved, these princes promise Rome the delights of the golden age. Such qualities as theirs must be hereditary, and may be expected to increase sovereignly, and grow over a universe prostrate in love. Even as we select for the race the noblest breed of animals, we take the issue of a family eminently liberal, in which genius, uprightness, disinterestedness, humanity, and respect for the laws are traditional, and in which liberty counts her martyrs. And yet the lineage of Germanicus has been more fatal to mankind than the race of the most execrable tyrants; for it yielded without resistance to the test of limitless power, and produced egoists so formidable as to be compared to monsters. Of this lineage is the son of Germanicus, Caligula; the brother of Germanicus, Claudius; the grandson of Germanicus, Nero—in other words, a madman, a fool, and a poor actor, who become at once the butchers of the Roman people and the workers of irreparable political ruin. No demonstration can be more decisive against the defenders of 'personal power'; and it would almost seem as though in periods of decay and downfall virtue itself becomes the bait of servitude, and popularity a poison that acts against the country."

Although the moral lesson and the modern political teaching are distinct and clear, they do not in the slightest degree interfere with the historical fidelity of the author's painting. His satire is keen, but it is not written in his page; it springs up in the mind of the reader from the simple recital of facts and the telling force of his reflections. As we read, we plainly see that imperial modes of subjugation and servitude have an astonishing resemblance even although two thousand years apart; and such is the incisive actuality of some of these reflections that we apply them to a state of things much nearer to us than ancient Rome—as, for instance, when we read: "Revolutionists are those who sap the foundations of a state to assure their own usurpation, who violate the laws, make of the army an instrument of oppression, of the Senate a degraded tool, of free suffrage a falsehood, of the multitude a mercenary troop; and who penetrate the heart of the nation with corruption, lethargy, and self-oblivion. On the contrary, those who desire the maintenance of the constitution, the re-establishment of secular institutions, the grandeur of the state sought by a common effort, human dignity respected, the rights of citizens consecrated, the people attached to industry and honor as they are attached to their soil—such men have ever and always been the true, the only conservatives. The worst revolutionists are Augustus, Tiberius, and their successors." In the series of medallions forming this remarkable museum of the lineage of Germanicus, not the least interesting are the visages of women: Antonia, the widow of Drusus; Agrippina, the granddaughter of Augustus, and widow of Germanicus; Julia; the second Agrippina, the mother of Nero; and, finally, Messalina. The last would be an admirable portraiture were it not that Juvenal's great page on that woman, which might be called a sketch in aquafortis, must for ever render weak any modern attempt to describe her. M. Beulé, to use a common phrase, sticks to his text. He makes no allusions to modern times or modern rulers, but he who runs may read. And in this respect there is no novelty in the idea of the book. The entire literature of France, we may say, is arrayed against the principle of the Empire; and the mine of Roman history has been worked with great skill and success for material against it. Some four years ago, Rogeard's remarkable pamphlet, "Les Propos de Labiénus," made its appearance, telling the story of the old Roman legionary, its hero, who had fought for the Republic, and who, living in the reign of Augustus, expresses himself freely concerning public affairs. All of it veritable Roman history, there was not a word concerning any man or matter subsequent to the age of Augustus, and yet its every line was vitriolic in its satire of an existing government and a living man. Its author could not remain in France after its publication, and was compelled to save himself by flight. Allusions to the age of Augustus have since abounded in France, and the keenest-eyed censorship is often at fault to detect them. This sort of imperial torment has increased, and the mounting tide of discontent has only been turned by the senatus-consultum of the other day. Even in a book so apparently innocent of political allusion as Renan's "Apostles" is found this biting sentence, which, after all, is a plain historical statement: "It seems that a decree issued by Augustus sought to define with precision the limits of the right of association and of assembling. These limits were exceedingly narrow." You see that it was under Augustus, 1,900 years ago, that such a decree was rendered.

M. Nestor Roqueplan was for many years director of the French Opera. If he knows anything, it certainly is Paris and the Parisians, and he has written several works to prove it. His last is "Parisine." Some idea of its spirit may be obtained from the preface to the work. Here it is, entire:

> "On dit: Strychnine, Quinine,
> Aniline, Nicotine.
> "Je dis: Parisine."

M. Philarète Chasles gives us "Encore sur les Contemporains, leurs Œuvres et leurs Mœurs," or disquisitions on a variety of subjects—Russia and Poland, The History of Caricature in Europe, Caricature in England and France, The Mexico of To-day, etc., etc. Although M. Chasles is an author who, as his countrymen would say, sent le besoin d'écrire, he nevertheless is always fresh and interesting, and has some information to communicate. He is familiar with English literature, and has done much to introduce a taste for it in France, and was one of the earliest of living Frenchmen to write pleasantly and not without a good degree of intelligence concerning the United States, which he visited, and through which he travelled extensively.

A handsome octavo is "Philosophie de la Société," an "Étude sur notre Organisation Sociale," by Paul Ribot, a lawyer, who announces the object and scope of his work in language which no one will be so hardy as to dispute: "Nothing is more important than principles. These granted, their consequences flow logically from them. If discussion continue indefinitely, and if it obtain no results, it is because principles are not appealed to, and the two disputants are in the position of two men armed with swords, which they flourish, but at too great distance to reach each other. Being reality, truth, principles finally prevail. They end by proving themselves right; which is not surprising, since they are right itself. Nevertheless, principles are despised. Superficial men make light of them. Practical men see in them nothing but vain and useless theory. And yet nothing is more powerful. They are the touchstone of all truth, and finally they guide the world." This book contains principles only—principles of social economy, government, instruction, social science, set forth as briefly as possible. The author claims the application of a new method to social science. And then follows this somewhat remarkable statement, which will show the spirit in which the book is written: "The only point on which I have permitted myself to put forth ideas which will appear extraordinary, and which may shock some persons, is apropos of the influence that Christianity must have upon society. To me it seems that it is Christianity that constituted it in the past and maintains it in the present; that law, science, civilization, everything, depends upon it; that not only is there in reality no opposition between it and modern societies, but, on the contrary, that they are themselves the productions and, so to speak, the flowers of Christianity."

An interesting book of travels by M. ——, Secretary of Legation, attached to the French Embassy to Persia, which the author calls "Trois Ans en Asie," should properly have claimed to be nothing more than three years in Persia. The usual route chosen by travellers from Europe to Teheran, the capital of Persia, is by Constantinople and through Asia Minor; but our author takes the circuitous and more interesting one by Malta, Cairo, Suez (bien misérable, bien petit), Djeddah (port of Mecca), Aden, Muscat, the Red Sea, the Persian Gulf, Bushire, Shiraz, Kazeroon, Ispahan, and Persepolis. The Victoria, a war steamer belonging to the English East India Company, appears to have been placed at the disposition of the French ambassador and his suite, and our author does ample justice of grateful record to the hospitality extended them. There was but one drawback—unfortunately a serious one. We all do know that the French diplomat is not more thoroughly possessed of his Puffendorf and his Vattel than of his Brillat-Savarin, and our author records his judgment that the education of the cook of the Victoria was, for an Englishman, admirable, but from the French standpoint déplorable (strong emphasis on the penultimate syllable). People are astonished—thus philosophizes our author—that the English contract so many diseases in India, and are immoderate in their use of blue pills. There is greater room to be surprised that they can resist a single year their cuisine enragée. Pepper, ginger, pimento, in all their forms, are omnipresent. And in order more easily to swallow these satanic mixtures (ces mélanges sataniques), they mingle port with porter, and "triple ale" (treble X) with rum and gin. "I confess that of all the dangers that await the Asiatic traveller, I rank highest, sans contestation, and reckless of the wounded susceptibilities of tigers, serpents, and reptiles, the Britannic dinners he is forced to undergo. They are not only poison, but torture to the uninitiated, and you rise from table martyred and dying of hunger." The dinners and breakfasts excepted, our secretary might have passed his life, he says, on board the Victoria. The general tone of the work is less energetic, however, although exceedingly readable. Of adventures there are positively none. Nearly one-half the author's four hundred and eighty-three pages are taken up with the journey to Teheran, where he remains for the rest of his volume and of his three years. We cannot say that the book makes any substantial addition to our knowledge of Persia already obtained from Elphinstone, Burns, Campbell, and Deskaye. The descriptions of various peculiar Oriental types—Lascars, Fellahs, Jews, Parsees, Mollahs, Dervishes, and Guebres—are well executed, and the chapters on Persian nationality and religion show observation and reflection. The author says that the loud and ostentatious Mohammedanism of the Persians is all put on—downright hypocrisy, in short, notwithstanding the passages of the Koran constantly in their mouths, and their profuse use of pious exclamations.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Price.
Allen (Prof. W. F. and J. H.), A Latin Reader	(Edwin Ginn) $2 50
Bascom (Prof. J.), The Principles of Psychology	(G. P. Putnam & Son) 1 75
Boker (G. H.), Königsmark, and Other Poems	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.) 1 75
Brackenridge (H. H.), Modern Chivalry, 2 vols	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.)
Boardman (W. E.), He that Overcometh	(Henry Hoyt)
Clough (A. H.), Poems and Prose Remains, 2 vols	(Macmillan & Co.) 6 00
Chellis (Miss M. D.), Aunt Dinah's Pledge: a Tale	(J. N. Stearns) 1 25
Eliot (George), Adam Bede: a Tale	(Fields, Osgood & Co.) 1 00
Lectures delivered before the American Institute of Instruction, Pittsfield, Mass., Aug., 1868	(Boston)
Packard (Dr. A. S., jr.), Guide to the Study of Insects, Part IX., swd	(Salem) 0 50
Thompson (Rev. J. P.), Man in Genesis and in Geology	(S. R. Wells) 1 00
Walter Ogilby: a Tale	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.) 2 00
Whipple (E. P.), The Literature of the Age of Elizabeth	(Fields, Osgood & Co.) 1 75

JUST PUBLISHED:

Reminiscences of Jas. A. Hamilton;

OR,

MEN AND EVENTS DURING THE LAST THREE-QUARTERS OF A CENTURY.

1 vol. 8vo, $5.

Colonel James A. Hamilton, son of the distinguished Alexander Hamilton, formerly Secretary of State and United States District Attorney under Jackson, here groups together the reminiscences of a remarkably active life, covering more than half-a-century of intimate intercourse with many of the greatest minds of this country and of Europe. The large number of valuable documents embraced in the volume shed much light upon the political history of the last fifty years, and graphically written accounts of striking social events give a popular interest to the volume.

This book for sale by all Booksellers, or sent, post-paid, upon receipt of price.

CHARLES SCRIBNER & CO.,
654 Broadway, New York.

New and Old Books.

DAVID G. FRANCIS (formerly C. S. Francis & Co.), 3 Clinton Hall, Astor Place, New York, keeps constantly for sale an extensive Stock of New and Second-hand Books in various departments of Literature.

Catalogues, issued from time to time, will be forwarded FREE to any address.

STANDARD TEXT-BOOKS

AND

WORKS OF REFERENCE

FOR

Colleges, Academies & High Schools,

PUBLISHED BY

CHARLES SCRIBNER & CO., 654 BROADWAY, N. Y.

ALEXANDER.

OUTLINES OF MORAL SCIENCE. By Archibald Alexander, D.D., late Professor in the Theological Seminary at Princeton, N. J. 1 vol. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

CLARK (N. C.)

AN OUTLINE OF THE ELEMENTS OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE. For the use of Students. By N. G. Clark, Professor of Rhetoric and English Literature in Union College. 1 vol. 12mo, cloth, $1 25.

CRAIK.

A COMPENDIOUS HISTORY OF ENGLISH LITERATURE, AND OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE, from the Norman Conquest. With numerous specimens. By George L. Craik, LL.D., Professor of History and English Literature in Queen's College, Belfast. 2 vols. 8vo, half-calf, $12; cloth, $7 50.

DAY.

AN INTRODUCTION TO THE STUDY OF ENGLISH LITERATURE. By Prof. H. N. Day, of New Haven. 1 vol. 12mo, uniform with "Day's Logic," "Art of Discourse," and "Art of Composition." $2 25.

ART OF ENGLISH COMPOSITION (THE). 1 vol. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

ART OF DISCOURSE (THE). A System of Rhetoric adapted for use in Colleges and Academies, and also for private study. 1 vol. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

ELEMENTS OF LOGIC. Comprising the Doctrine of Laws and Products of Thought, and the Doctrine of Method, together with Logical Praxis. Designed for classes and for private study. 1 vol. 12mo, $1 50.

DAWSON.

THE FŒDERALIST. A Collection of Essays, written in favor of the New Constitution, as agreed to by the Federal Convention, September 17, 1787. Reprinted from the original text, under the editorial supervision of Henry B. Dawson. University Edition. 1 vol. 8vo, cloth, $3.

THE SAME. With Bibliographical and Historical Introduction, Notes, and Portraits. 1 vol. 8vo, cloth, $3 75.

DE VERE (Prof. M. SCHELE).

STUDIES IN ENGLISH; or, Glimpses into the Inner Life of Our Language. By M. Schele de Vere, LL.D., Professor of Modern Languages in the University of Virginia. 1 vol. crown 8vo, cloth, $2 50.

DWIGHT.

MODERN PHILOLOGY: Its Discoveries, History, and Influence. With Maps, Tabular Views, and an Index. By Benjamin W. Dwight, author of "The Higher Christian Education." 2 vols. 8vo, cloth, $6.

HOPKINS.

THE LAW OF LOVE AND LOVE AS A LAW; or, Moral Science, Theoretical and Practical. By Mark Hopkins, D.D., LL.D., President of Williams College. 1 vol. 12mo, $1 50.

LORD.

THE OLD ROMAN WORLD. The Grandeur and Failure of its Civilization. By John Lord, LL.D. 1 vol. crown 8vo, cloth, $3.

ANCIENT STATES AND EMPIRES. (In Press.) 1 vol. crown 8vo, $3.

MULLER.

CHIPS FROM A GERMAN WORKSHOP. Essays on the Science of Religion; on Mythology, Traditions, and Customs. By Max Müller, M.A., Fellow of All-Souls College, Oxford. 2 vols. crown 8vo, uniform with "Lectures on Language," etc., $5.

LECTURES ON THE SCIENCE OF LANGUAGE. Delivered at the Royal Institution of Great Britain, in April, May, and June, 1861. First Series. 1 vol., cloth, crown 8vo, $2 50.

The Same. Second Series, with thirty-one illustrations. 1 vol. crown 8vo, half-calf, $5 50; cloth, $3 50.

MARSH (C. P.)

THE ORIGIN AND HISTORY OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE, AND OF THE EARLY LITERATURE IT EMBODIES. By George P. Marsh, author of "Lectures on the English Language." 1 vol. crown 8vo, cloth, $3.

LECTURES ON THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE. First Series, fourth edition, revised and enlarged. 1 vol. crown 8vo. cloth, $3.

MAN AND NATURE; or, Physical Geography as Modified by Human Action. 1 vol. crown 8vo, cloth, $3.

PORTER.

THE HUMAN INTELLECT. With an Introduction upon Psychology and the Human Soul. By Prof. Noah Porter, D.D., of Yale College. 1 vol. 8vo, $5.

PERRY.

ELEMENTS OF POLITICAL ECONOMY. By Arthur Latham Perry, Professor of History and Political Economy in Williams College. Third edition, revised. 1 vol. crown 8vo, cloth, $2 50.

TENNEY.

NATURAL HISTORY. A Manual of Zoölogy for Schools, Colleges, and the General Reader. By Sanborn Tenney, A.M., author of "Geology," etc., and Professor of Natural History in Vassar Female College. Illustrated with over 500 engravings. 1 vol. crown 8vo, cloth, $3.

WHITNEY.

LANGUAGE AND THE STUDY OF LANGUAGE. Twelve Lectures on the Principles of Linguistic Science. By William Dwight Whitney, Professor of Sanscrit and Instructor in Modern Languages in Yale College. 1 vol. crown 8vo, cloth, $2 50.

WOOLSEY.

INTRODUCTION TO THE STUDY OF INTERNATIONAL LAW. Designed as an aid in Teaching and in Historical Studies. By T. D. Woolsey, D.D., LL.D. This edition revised and enlarged, cloth, $2 50.

Full Descriptive Catalogue of Chas. Scribner & Co.'s Miscellaneous, Theological, and Educational Publications sent on application.

These books are for sale by all Booksellers, or sent, post-paid, on receipt of price by the Publishers,

CHARLES SCRIBNER & CO.,

654 Broadway, New York.

REPORT ON THE

FILTRATION OF RIVER WATERS

FOR THE SUPPLY OF CITIES,

AS PRACTISED IN EUROPE,

Made to the Board of Water Commissioners of the City of St. Louis

BY JAMES P. KIRKWOOD,

Civil Engineer.

Illustrated by Thirty Engravings,

1 vol. 4to, cloth, $15.

D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher,

23 Murray Street and 27 Warren Street.

The American Freemason.

CONTENTS OF AUGUST NUMBER.

Abraham and the Sabeist. Our Monthly Record: To the Brethren, our Subscribers—Much Law: a Daniel come to Judgment—Have our Grand Lodges all been legally organized?—Invasion of Jurisdiction.—Correspondence: The African or Prince Hall Grand Lodge, Part 3—The Grand Lodge of New York—The Rights of Lodge Past Masters—What does it mean?—Dr. Epstein's Discovery. Our Monthly Masonic Chronicle: United States, England, Ireland, France.

Sixteen quarto pages monthly, for one dollar a year.

Address subscriptions to

J. FLETCHER BRENNAN, Editor,

114 Main Street, Cincinnati, O.

Just Published.

I.

A NEW VOLUME BY MR. BOKER.

KONIGSMARK,

THE LEGEND OF THE HOUNDS, and Other Poems. By George H. Boker. 12mo, tinted paper, extra cloth, $1 75.

II.

A NEW NOVEL.

WALTER OGILBY.

By the Authoress of "Wau-bun." 12mo, 617 pages, toned paper, extra cloth, $2.

ALSO,

STORY OF CATHERINE;

LITTLE TRAVELS; FITZBOODLE PAPERS; AND OTHER STORIES. By W. M. Thackeray. With Portrait of the Author from Steel, and other Illustrations. 8vo, tinted paper, extra cloth, $3 50. Forming the twenty-second and concluding volume of the Standard Illustrated Edition of Thackeray's Works.

Chambers's Miscellany of In-STRUCTIVE AND ENTERTAINING TRACTS. NEW AND REVISED EDITION. With numerous Illustrations. Vols. I. and II. in one vol. 12mo, extra cloth, $1 25.

Lippincott's Pocket Classics.

PROSE. Ten volumes 32mo, tinted paper; richly bound in extra cloth gilt, gilt top, $6 per set. Embracing the Vicar of Wakefield; Paul and Virginia; Walton's Angler, 2 vols.; Inchbald's Nature and Art; Sterne's Sentimental Journey; Pope's Essay on Man; Locke's Essay on the Human Understanding; Rasselas; and Elizabeth.

Lippincott's Pocket Classics.

POETRY. Ten volumes 32mo, tinted paper; richly bound in extra cloth gilt, gilt top, $6 per set. Embracing Lay of the Last Minstrel; Lady of the Lake; Gray's and Collins's Poems; Gay's Fables; Bloomfield's Poems; Falconer's Shipwreck; Cowper's Task; Goldsmith's Poems; Coleridge's Poems; and Thomson's Seasons.

 For sale by all Booksellers, or will be sent by mail, postage free, on receipt of price by

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO.,

PUBLISHERS,

715 and 717 Market Street, Philadelphia, and 449 Broome Street, New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS'

SPECIAL TRADE SALE,

1869.

From August 16 to September 25.

Franklin Square,
New York, August, 1869.

We invite the attention of booksellers to our special list of books, which we will sell on the following terms, for cash, from the 16th of August to the 25th of September, after which our terms will positively be as heretofore.

On orders of $100 at one time, 25 per cent. discount:

"	$500	"	30	"	"
"	$1000	"	33⅓	"	"
"	$2000	"	35	"	"

And an additional deduction of 5 per cent. for cash.

We shall not sell at any of the trade sales this fall.

The Special List will be furnished to Booksellers on application to the Publishers.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

ZELL'S

POPULAR ENCYCLOPEDIA AND UNIVERSAL DICTIONARY.

The cheapest and most complete Encyclopedia ever published.

Sold by subscription, and delivered in monthly parts at 50 cents each. The entire cost will not exceed $25.

"We find it in the main both full and correct. The spirit in which the Cyclopedia is edited is what it should be."—The Nation.

"The articles are as carefully prepared, the engravings as well executed, and the general typography as perfect as the earliest sheets. Its sale deserves to be popular and extensive."—The Round Table.

"The work is evidently conducted with intelligent and conscientious industry."—N. Y. Tribune.

Address

T. ELLWOOD ZELL, Publisher,

17 and 19 South Sixth Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Or,

AGENCY OF ZELL'S PUBLISHING HOUSE,

7 Murray Street, New York.

The Nation.

VOL. IX.—NO. 220. THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 1869. { FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM / TWELVE CENTS PER COPY

THE WEEK 201

EDITORIAL ARTICLES:
The Alleged Dissatisfaction with Grant 224
Fall Prospects 225

Manual Labor 226

CORRESPONDENCE:
The Tribune and "A China Merchant" 227
The "Harvard 'Rah'" a very good Cheer 227
Anti-Slavery Reminiscences—A Suggestion 228
Against Removing the Capital 228

Two Mistranslations by Carl Benson .. 228

NOTES:
Literary 229

The Diary of Henry Crabb Robinson .. 231
A Librarian on Free Libraries 233
Semi-Critical Old Testament Commentaries 234

CURRENT LITERATURE:
Eight Years' Wandering in Ceylon.—The Science of Government in connection with American Institutions 235-236

Books of the Week 236

Terms:—Five Dollars per annum, in advance; Clergymen, Four Dollars.  Remittances at the risk of the subscriber, unless made by draft, check, P. O. money order, or registered letter.

The date of expiration of each subscription is indicated on the printed label. A delay of more than three months in renewing subscriptions will endanger their continuance.

ADDRESS, PUBLISHER OF "THE NATION," BOX 6732, NEW YORK.

PUBLISHING OFFICE, 3 PARK PLACE.

The Week.

THE noteworthy thing about the Maine election is the small figure made by the Prohibitionists at the polls, their candidate apparently not having got six thousand votes out of a total vote of almost ninety thousand. Considering the condition of Maine's two great industries, shipbuilding and lumbering, and the belief usually prevalent among men out of work that the "party in power" is at the bottom of any widespread financial distress, the Republicans must be said to have done remarkably well in Maine. The vote of the Prohibitionists—who doubtless were almost to a man Republicans—added to General Chamberlain's majority over his Democratic opponent, gives him this year about the usual Republican majority. The total abstinence men, it seems, have not been able to carry a single district, though they have aided the Democrats in taking away two or three from the Republicans, who, however, have in both Houses an overwhelming majority, which makes sad havoc of some laborious and minute calculations as to who should be Mr. Fessenden's successor at Washington.

Political business gets itself very quietly transacted in all the other States just now, as well as in Maine, unless we take account of the family fights among the Democrats in this city. The best opinion as to the first-begun of these contentions, the Tweed-Belmont affair, is that it has come to an end—Mr. Peter B. Sweeny having come home and ordered Mr. Tweed to keep quiet. So good Republican editors are no longer to be pained by the sight of much Democratic dirty linen; by hearing Mr. A. Oakey Hall declare that the editors of the World stayed away from the polls last November, and by hearing the World talk about "W. M. Tweed, A. Oakey Hall, and the other noted corruptionists of the ring." Mr. Sweeny is quite competent, we suppose, to restore peace in this section of the household; but there is another section which appears to be very refractory. There is a Democratic Union party, which, under the lead of Mr. Nelson J. Waterbury and Mr. R. B. Roosevelt, is making a disturbance which some people think means something good. Not much, we should say. Our unterrified friends have fallen out, to be sure; but we are not persuaded yet that honest men are to come by their own. The most that outsiders will get from the quarrel will, we take it, be a little light, curious rather than necessary, on the malodorous secrets of the New York Democracy. The Citizen and Round Table of last week contains some rather interesting revelations. Mr. Belmont, the Chairman of the National Committee, was, it appears, under "instructions" from the Rothschilds last fall; he acted as the humble and obedient agent and servant of that house, it seems, and not as a good fighting Democrat; probably he was traitorously privy to the World's famous "change of front" article, and so on; in short, he is no good Chairman, or Democrat, or anything. Then there is Mr. Sweeny himself, and Messrs. Connolly and Tweed, and their immediate friends—they are corruptionists of the first water, say the Democratic Union men; and as the Citizen and Round Table represents these gentlemen, they evidently are whetting the knife for Tammany as well as for Belmont. Clearly, we should say, there will have to be a little change in the distribution of some of the offices. We may safely leave it all to Mr. Sweeny, however; he knows whether he can trust to the strength of the harness, or whether he must quiet the team with fodder.

In Pennsylvania there has been some rather important work done rather quietly by the Democratic managers, and unless in the month that is left them before the election the Republican managers make some effective response to it, they may once more find themselves where they were in 1867, when bad local nominations were most likely the cause of the defeat of the State ticket, and Judge Sharswood was elected over Judge Williams. The first Democratic nominations for local offices in Philadelphia were bad enough—so bad that the Democratic leaders have been very much disgusted with the work of their subalterns, and were determined to undo it, and now there is a new "slate," inscribed with the names of merchants of the highest character and of young lawyers of ability and undoubted honesty. It looks like a ticket decidedly dangerous to Republican ascendancy in the city. And as the vote in the State is sure to be a light one, and as the city vote can be brought to the polls with comparative ease, a majority in Philadelphia will this fall be a particularly good thing to have. And now, what are the Republican managers going to do to meet this latest move—a move in itself most heartily to be praised, and all the more to be liked if it shall compel the Republicans to make a new Republican ticket good enough to beat the new Democratic? We do not hear of their doing anything. Yet there is no disputing the fact that in Philadelphia the party is to a certain extent demoralized by the quarrel that has been raging between Brewster, the Attorney-General, and Covode, the Chairman of the State Committee. Not the least of its ill effects is the discredit reflected upon Governor Geary, who is placed in the unfortunate position of a man who is quoted—in each case "by authority"—as being at one and the same time on two diametrically opposite sides of one question; and we do not know that Mr. Brewster's or Mr. Covode's veracity in the matter is seriously doubted.

Mr. Pendleton has made another speech on the state of the country, in which he sets forth what may now be considered the Democratic creed: that the country is anything but prosperous; that the Fifteenth Amendment is objectionable because it forces negro suffrage on the people of several States against their will, and because by the strongest implication it confers on Congress and reserves to the States the right to exclude persons of the white race from the ballot because of their nativity, or creed, or want of education, or poverty, while prohibiting the exclusion of another race simply. He denounced Chinese immigration fiercely, having a very low opinion of the Chinese; maintained that taxation was unequal, labor badly paid, luxuries taxed less under the tariff than necessaries; denounced the management of the Treasury, called loudly for the payment of the bondholders in greenbacks, and naturally is very much opposed to Mr. Boutwell's purchasing bonds at a premium. In fact, the speech may be summed up by saying that there is nothing which the Government does, in Mr. Pendleton's opinion, which it does not do wrongly—as wrongly as possible; and the public debt ought to be paid in paper, and there should be no contraction of the paper.

The men are very few whom the country might not have better spared from its service than Senator Fessenden. He was not a man of what is called creative genius; as he himself said, he was naturally a doubter; he was not excellent as an administrative officer, and reluctantly accepted such trusts, but he was almost perfection as a legislator in the ordinary run of legislative business, though on great occasions he was not a leader. He knew what real leadership was, however; and thoroughly and even impatiently as he hated sham leadership and noisy pretentiousness of all kinds, he was never the man to refuse to serve when the fit leader appeared. He seemed to be without vanity; either he did not care who got the credit of what he did, or he was too proud to seem to care; and this indifference to applause, together with his hatred of incompetence, his high courage, a natural reserve of manner, his invincible unwillingness to postpone considerations of duty to any other considerations whatever, got for him the reputation of pride and coldness. In his case, as in that of many others of similar nature, this reputation was only in part deserved. His sufferings under blame at the time of impeachment were known by his friends to have been very acute, impassive as he seemed—so much did he value the affection which it was not in him to stoop to conciliate by unworthy means. It must be confessed that he had the fault of irascibility; but it must be remembered, too, that his so-called irascibility was often righteous wrath against some folly or rascality, and that whatever it was, it was increased very often, especially of late, by a peculiarly irritating disease. Senator Fessenden is doubtless not to be called a great man, able as he was, nor a man of wide culture in any field; but he was a man who has left to his country the legacy of a character and a career as lofty as that of any American who ever led a public life. And we may say that what he did is of small consequence compared with what he will do, for his example cannot but bear precious fruits.

The great nose-pulling case in Massachusetts continues to agitate the public of that State. A petition for the pardon of Mr. Curtis, signed by over three hundred persons, was presented to the Governor last week, and "argued" before him and in Council; but its prayer was rejected for one reason—and a very cogent one—because Mr. Curtis himself had not signed it. When one remembers that it was a trifling fracas in a railroad car between two persons, total strangers to each other, about a seat, one reads the articles and speeches on the affair with increasing astonishment. The Commonwealth, as we mentioned week before last, saw in the nose-pulling an attempt to establish "caste" in Massachusetts, and made a discourse on it—over a column long—in a curious vein of cantankerous theology and mushy morality, and other papers treat it with almost equal solemnity. The strenuous opposition offered to Mr. Curtis's pardon also shows that large numbers of persons believe great interests to be dependent on his serving out his term. In fact, their earnestness is only explicable on the theory that a deep and widespread conspiracy is believed to exist among the Boston nobles, having for its object the establishment of a nose-pulling oligarchy. If this belief be correct, the plot has been frustrated, partly through Mr. Curtis's haste, but mainly through the fearlessness and integrity of the judiciary. We see in one Radical paper, however, an intimation that Mr. Curtis's imprisonment is looked on as a divine judgment on the Curtis family for the share taken by the ancestors of the present defendant in trying to send back the Crafts to slavery twenty years ago. "It is a strange instance of Time's revenge," says this pious expositor, "that they who left Boston to escape slavery, with the Curtis family on their track, now return to find slavery dead and a younger scion of that family, innocent perhaps of the disgrace of his kindred, locked up in a Boston jail, with twenty millions of State Street and Milk Street property powerless to get him out! Truly, as old Bishop Hall verses it in the 51st Psalm," etc., etc. We doubt, however, if the real explanation of the matter has yet been hit upon. Many thoughtful persons have been struck by the closeness with which the nose-pulling followed or preceded—we forget which—the late eclipse, while others are disposed to connect it with one of the magnetic storms which are now known to ravage the face of the sun. The scientific men will doubtless take the case up, now that the lawyers have done with it.

The horrible accident in the Avondale mine is exciting a good deal of attention, but we fear that if anything is done to guard against the recurrence of similar disasters, it will be owing to the exertions of the miners themselves, who are quite numerous enough to affect legislation. The public has a way of forgetting all about such catastrophes within a week of their happening which makes it almost useless to call its attention to them. They furnish a text for a few newspaper articles or a few sermons, and there the matter ends. It must be confessed that a mining accident rarely occurs for which the managers are so plainly to blame. What has happened is apparently something of this kind: A long narrow hole of great depth is dug in the ground, and through it two or three hundred men are sent into a capacious mine, having this as their only communication with the world above. Over the mouth of it and at the bottom of it a large quantity of highly inflammable materials, in the shape of thoroughly dried wooden buildings and stores, are collected—so inflammable and so exposed to conflagration that we venture to say few insurance offices in this city would take a risk on them. This done, the lives of all the miners are entirely dependent on the chance of the buildings and so forth not taking fire. Should they do so, ventilation is cut off, and there is no chance for those below. The remedy seems simple enough, but it is expensive—and that is, to have more than one shaft. The miners can, if they please, and the public ought to help them, bring about legislation providing for state inspection of mining operations, and this class of subjects would furnish a much more profitable material for the discussion of the labor conventions than the currency or the national debt or the interest on capital. The statute-books of all the States bristle with precautions to guard people against being swindled by mining, insurance, and other companies, but protection for people's lives there is hardly any. In this State, if a bank or insurance company is found to be conducting its affairs in such a way as to imperil people's property, it is wound up at once; but a railroad or mining company may conduct them in a way to put hundreds of lives in jeopardy every week, without any interference on the part of anybody.

The Cuban Junta have subscribed $20,000 in "bonds of the Cuban Republic" for General Rawlins's family. Doubtless, they believe in the bonds themselves; but, considering the facility with which these instruments are issued, we think they might have made the donation twice as large. We may add that the good taste, to say the least, of presenting Mrs. Rawlins with securities whose only value lies in their constituting a kind of advertisement of a political movement, before her husband had been laid in his grave, is more than doubtful, and will wear to many persons the look of an attempt to "help the cause" rather than to minister to her necessities.

Tom Hughes has written to the New York Tribune a short letter, giving his views about the Harvard and Oxford boat-race. He ascribes the result as in great part due to the fact that the Harvards had no coaching from the outside, the consequence of which was want of uniformity of stroke. This coaching cannot be done by anybody in the boat, and he thinks the American crew has learnt a lesson on this point it will not forget. He says, too, that the Harvard crew did not look so well on the morning of the race as when he first saw them, a fortnight before, which he ascribes to the Putney air, but says nothing of the milk and currants that have been so much talked of—perhaps because he had not heard of them. He says the struggle for the first two miles was extraordinarily brilliant—on the part of Harvard particularly—that he never saw the like of it, and never expects to see it again; but that when Oxford drew ahead, and Harvard began to pull wildly, the Harvard want of coaching became clearly apparent; the mechanical part of the science here became all-important, and Harvard showed itself wanting in it, and lost. He says a good word for the much-abused coxswain. For the first mile and a half his steering was, Mr. Hughes thinks, equal to that of the Oxford boat, and his first and chief error was committed in the decision of a very difficult point, on which it was almost impossible for a stranger steering over a peculiar and difficult course not to err. Considering how important the steering turned out, and how hard it was, even with a man given up to it, the Harvard plan of steering in their old way on the Thames seems impossible of execution.

Mr. Charles Reade—not an authority on rowing, as Mr. Hughes is—more than confirms Mr. Hughes's statement as to the American crew's being overtrained and not "fit." He says further that the Oxford men "pulled all they knew" from the start, and did not "wait" for Harvard as they do sometimes for Cambridge, and that Harvard pulled the handsomer stroke of the two. Mr. Edward King, who has written very well about the crews and the race in the Boston Journal, and in whom, as a practised observer, we have confidence, adds his testimony to the effect that it is nonsense to say that the Oxford men were not at all distressed at the finish. Boating men in this city are inclined, we observe, to keep their faith in the Harvard stroke. But will it do for four miles and a third?

The question, Who is to fill Mr. Ross Browne's place in China? is receiving some discussion. Mr. Greeley has announced solemnly that he will not take the place, and now Mr. John Bigelow is talked of with just as much reason. The account given by some of the papers of the kind of man wanted for the post must be amusing reading to the class of men from whom the successful candidate will be taken. He must be "able," and "independent," and "far-seeing," and "magnanimous," and "humane," and "progressive," and, above all things, he must entertain a hearty contempt and distrust for his own countrymen in China—"the selfish traders," etc.—each of whom probably knows more of China and the Chinese than the Minister will know after ten years' residence. We recommend that, under all the circumstances, a minister of the right sort be advertised for. That is the way to get a first-class man. If a selection is to be made without advertisement, we should think a good place to pick would be among the sinologues who have been abusing Ross Browne in the columns of some of our daily and weekly contemporaries. Judging from their articles, if the Administration really desires its ambassador to possess a minute acquaintance with Chinese laws, manners, policy, and with the principles and facts which ought to regulate the intercourse of Christian and pagan nations, it will not have much difficulty in finding one amongst these gentlemen. Prince Kung will hardly venture to play any pranks under their eyes; and if he does, a scathing and fluent rebuke in his own tongue, garnished with quotations from the works of Confucius, will soon bring him to reason.

A demand for the revival of protection in England, got up by an association of "Revivers of British Industry," has excited a good deal of attention in this country, as well as on the Continent; but far more than the importance of the movement merits. In fact, its attracting any notice at all is due to the fact that for the last twenty years nobody has ventured to say a word for protection for fear of being laughed at. It had no more defenders than the Ptolemaic system of astronomy, and the announcement now that there is an association organized to agitate in its favor, under the stimulus of great popular suffering, is therefore odd enough to make people talk about it; but the oddity is due simply to its feebleness. Moreover, its prominent men are old protectionists, who have since 1847 been cowed into silence, but draw courage enough from the general suffering to raise their voices once more. They might as well, however, clamor for the restoration of the Heptarchy. Their main argument, it seems, is that British imports are worth more than British exports; but as this is true of every manufacturing and trading country in the world, and has done duty now for nearly two centuries, it produces little impression. It is very like saying that A. T. Stewart must be going to ruin because for thirty years the goods leaving his store have been worth more than the goods brought into it.

The absorbing topic of discussion just now in Europe is the French Emperor's health. It seems to be conceded on all hands that he has the rheumatism; and the points on which the gossips differ are its gravity, and the organs it has attacked, and Nelaton's opinion of the case, and the Emperor's opinion of Nelaton. However, the conviction seems to gain strength, and is now almost fixed, that a complete recovery is not to be hoped for, and that the real disease, even if not fatal before long, will seriously interfere with the Emperor's active participation in public affairs. He is sixty-one years old, and was, during part of his career at least, a viveur of no mean pretensions, and has reached the period when early "fastness" begins to tell. Some of his best advisers—Morny, Fould, and Niel—are gone, and his own nerves are clearly shaky, and Prince Napoleon has just made one of those bids for popular favor in a speech in the Senate which makes the path to be pursued by the Prince Imperial and the Empress, in case of the Emperor's death or severe illness, darker than ever before. The young man reviewed the army recently at the camp at Châlons; and he seems to have borne himself well, and looked manly and critical, and produced a good impression; but the whole effect was spoiled by a courtly order, issued the following day by General Bourbaki, in which he said his Imperial Highness "was well satisfied with the appearance of the troops." This raised a laugh, as well it might; for the French army has got long past the point of being gratified by the approval of a child.

The French senatus-consultum, embodying the "concessions" recently made to the Liberals, has been published, but does not differ in any important particular from what was promised. The power of initiating laws is reserved to the Emperor and the Lower House, and the Ministers are responsible, but can only be impeached by the Senate, and may be members of either Chamber, and may speak in both. These are really important changes. So is the concession to members of the Corps Législatif of unlimited right of "interpellation" in asking questions of the Ministry. The budget is to be voted item by item, and legislative consent is hereafter to be necessary for all postal and commercial treaties, which involves almost certainly the abrogation or serious modification of the treaty with England. Jules Favre, and other members of the Left, are said to be sufficiently satisfied with the senatus-consultum and the amnesty to be willing to bury the hatchet, and enter on their duties in a conciliatory spirit towards the Government. But then the concessions are such a patent abandonment of nearly every principle on which the Bonapartist dynasty based its claims to popular support, that the opinion gains ground in France that it cannot long survive them. If, after all, constitutional government is the only government possible for France, why retain a family on the throne which has won all its fame as its deadly enemy?

We spoke last week of Mr. Grant Duff's curious fears lest the Chinese market for Indian opium might be spoiled. A report from the English Consul at Canton shows that these fears are not altogether groundless, though what he says has little in it to console those who are opposed to the cultivation of the drug on moral grounds. It appears that the native article has for some time past been improving in quality and quantity, and is now equal to the best Indian variety, and in the interior already beats the Indian drug through its cheapness. He says, moreover, that if the Indian seed be introduced into China, the native opium will soon be, and the Bengal product will have no chance at all, as the Chinese will be able to manufacture just as well as the English and Hindoos.

The cause of female education is making progress in some odd places. A female normal school has been established at Poona, in India, and one of the English ladies taken out by Miss Carpenter takes charge of it. Moreover—and this is far more wonderful—two Bengalee ladies of good family have applied for admission to the Calcutta University. When this spirit begins to show itself among even Hindoo women, we may feel sure that the days of tyrant man's dominion are nearly numbered, and that he will before long assume his proper place in the creation he has done so much to deface.

THE ALLEGED DISSATISFACTION WITH GRANT.

Harper's Weekly made some comments last week on a subject which seems to be just now exciting a good deal of attention from a portion of the press, and that is, how much time the President of the United States ought to spend in travel and at watering-places in summer, and whether he ought to spend any, and whether President Grant, in spending as much as he has done, has not given signs of great baseness. Harper's Weekly attributes the abuse of him which the matter has called forth to the passion of the American public for what it calls "the large white wigs;" that is, the public love of a perpetual flow of "rhetoric and flap-doodle, and what is very commonly and expressively called 'squirt.'" Grant is a silent man, who hates fuss, and jabber, and all pompous and formal modes of doing business; he neither magnifies the functions of government with classical illustrations, like dignified and sonorous John Quincy Adams, nor fortifies authority with a slap, a bang, and a bouncing oath, like the "ignorant, imperious, violent, and vindictive Andrew Jackson." Consequently, every time he takes the train, or climbs a mountain, or takes a plunge in the surf, dozens of editors drop on their knees, roll up their eyes, wonder what is coming next, and pray heaven to take special charge of this deserted and betrayed people.

There is no doubt there is a great deal of truth in this theory of the causes of the outcry against Grant. People would not stand any longer a stiff and stately President like Washington, with his grandes et petites entrées, his times, and seasons, and ceremonies; but they do like a kind of President who is in reality far more objectionable—that is, a President who devotes himself night and day, body and soul, to talking to people about politics. It would be very curious—and we recommend the task to some of our students of manners—to trace the effect of railroads on the typical American politician. Fifty years ago, when it took a fortnight to get to Washington from Boston, or two months to reach it from Tennessee, the Congressman or Senator had a comparatively easy life. He saw but few of his constituents, either during the session or in his vacations, and he had plenty of time for reading, for the society of his choice, and for reflection. He was, if he pleased, a good deal alone, and when he had business to attend to he could attend to it thoroughly and heartily. Since the extension of the railroad system, all this is changed. No man who intends to devote himself to politics now can shut himself up in his room, or, in fact, take any time to himself whatever. The one condition of his success is that he shall deny himself to nobody, and that in the earlier portion of his career he shall "see" as many people as possible, and in the latter portion be seen by as many as possible. From the moment he wakes in the morning till he goes to bed at night, he is occupied either in exchanging "views" or "considering claims." Crowds from all parts of the Union constantly surround him. The result is that his looks, his tones, his gestures, adapt themselves to his way of life. He thinks comparatively little himself, and soon loses the habit of thinking, being absorbed in finding out what others are thinking, and turning it to account. He smiles mechanically, talks and shakes hands mechanically, displays a mechanical interest in everybody's affairs, pays mechanical compliments, and covers his weariness by a kind of fixed oratorical expression, and gazes at his visitors with the distant, vague, generally-distributed look with which the orator surveys his audience. The result is that the public has come to look on him as in some sort a talking machine, and is almost shocked if he gives evidence of any personal tastes, likes, dislikes, or peculiarities. They pardon his going on a journey if he makes a "few remarks" from the platform of the cars at all the leading stations, or from the balcony of his hotel, and "receives" every night in a hot parlor. He dares not avoid a bore, and the bore, when running him down, feels that he has the American people at his back. He dares not refuse to "state his views" on any topic that may be presented to him, because this would argue either stupidity or meditated treachery. He hardly dares to close his bedroom door at night; for do not the European aristocrats do the same? and who knows at what hour of the night a citizen may want to consult him?

Now, for the last twenty years our Presidents have all been drawn from this class, and have not been the best members of it either, by any means. Mr. Lincoln belonged to it, and though his fine natural qualities enabled him finally to get rid of most of the defects of his training, they marred an otherwise splendid Presidential career. The amount of time he lost—time too precious to be estimated by any human standard—in mere palavering with jobbers and adventurers about "their claims;" in hearing the "views" of local politicians, who, under a better system, would never have got access to him at all, is not, and never will be, known. He almost wore himself out, while the nation was bleeding at every pore, in considering the petty interests of the pettiest individuals. Grant, not having been bred a politician, has not their manners, and is entirely ignorant of the arts by which popularity is preserved and a show of busyness kept up by them. Moreover, he is an unusually silent man, which also tells against him, as a readiness to talk has become almost inseparably associated in the public mind with ability, not in politics only, but in every field of activity. Two of us hardly ever get together to arrange concert of action on the smallest matter, without "organizing"—that is, without one of us getting into a chair in the middle of the room, and the other taking his stand six or seven feet away from him, and haranguing him—that is, taking ten minutes to express an idea which might be expressed in five.

There is no doubt whatever that there is much truth in what the venerable Horace Binney said some years ago, as to the prejudicial effect on the mind of this apparently excessive use of the tongue, but we suspect its advantages on the whole overbalance its disadvantages. Much talking involves, at least, deliberation and a diffusion of interest, and can rarely be safely dispensed with under a popular government—hostility to it rarely showing itself, as we so often see in the abuse of the previous question in Congress, except when there is something to be "put through" which won't bear examination. Still, the general habit of it does beget suspicion or dislike of silent statesmen—a disposition to believe that unwillingness either to talk much one's self, or "sit under" other people, means indifference to or dislike of business, which is precisely the accusation that is now current against the President, though we have never heard of a single fact in the shape of neglect of duty to warrant it. There is one style of attack on him current just now of which it is difficult to write without indignation. A good sample of it is afforded in the charge which certain journals have been flinging at him incessantly during the last few days, of having been so absorbed in his own amusement at the watering-places as to have wilfully neglected the summons to the death-bed of his friend General Rawlins till it was too late. There is not and never has been a particle of doubt that the cause of his failure to reach Washington in time was partly the non-delivery of telegrams—a very natural and ordinary incident, such as occurs to everybody every day, and partly the sending of telegrams which were not accurate—a not unnatural occurrence considering that half-a-dozen times General Rawlins had been suddenly brought as low as he was in the first part of his last illness, and yet had recovered and gone all but immediately about his work again. Grant's most striking characteristic is his devotion to his friends—a devotion which he has since his election carried, in our opinion, to the point of excess, and which has, in fact, furnished materials for most of the abuse with which the very papers which now tax him with neglect of General Rawlins have been loading him during the last six months. The Sun, which has been the most active of his assailants since last April, capped the climax last week by announcing that "without Rawlins there would have been no Grant," or, in other words, that it was Rawlins who won the battles of which Grant got the honor. The Sun was never weary up to the time of Grant's election, however, in proclaiming his unsurpassed if not unequalled military ability, so that it now appears that not only has he made a bad use of his political patronage, but that his military reputation, of which the Sun was one of the loudest trumpeters, was a mere sham.

There are worse things than this to be observed, however. Grant's Administration has not only made bad appointments, but probably some of the worst ever made by a civilized Christian government. On this point none of his friends and admirers, and we count ourselves amongst the number, can deny feeling deep and bitter disappointment. One or two of his selections for high public positions have really worn the appearance of "a negation of God," as was happily said of King Bomba's government—that is, of a deliberate denial that there was a moral order in the world, and that virtue and vice, good and evil, were anything better than creations of the poet's fancy, good enough to sing of and write essays on, but which no man of affairs was to be expected to treat as realities. This is bad enough, in all conscience, but what is worse and most repulsive is that among the names of the persons whose pens are now busiest and tongues loudest in abusing the President for maladministration, and who affect most sorrow at his absence from a friend's death-bed, one finds those of men who cordially recommended the appointments which have most disgraced his Administration and most shocked those who have honored and trusted him. There may be ways of showing greater contempt for the popular conscience and understanding than all this displays, but we are glad to say we do not know what they are.

FALL PROSPECTS.

The merchants of the city generally give a rather favorable account of the present condition and immediate prospects of the fall trade. Certain kinds of goods are scarce and maintain their prices, Southern buyers are laying in liberal stocks, and the conceded abundance of our main crop staples leads every one to anticipate a healthy demand from all other sections. In spite of this buoyant feeling in commercial circles there must, however, be, for some reason or other, a great disturbance in our general national activity; for we find that, apart from city merchants, complaints of dulness and unprofitable trade far exceed anticipation. In looking over the daily papers for two or three weeks past, for the purpose of confirming the results of our own enquiries, and enabling us to give intelligently our usual fall discussion, we are surprised to find how many and how strikingly unfavorable facts we have unconsciously gathered. We cannot do better than reprint in logical order the principal of our extracts, many of which have, no doubt, been already noticed by readers of the daily papers:

"At a meeting of mill-owners and others interested in the lumber trade, held at Williamsport [Pa.], yesterday, it was resolved that but one-half of the usual stock of lumber be cut and manufactured for 1870."

"At Machias, Me., there is estimated to be a three years' supply of logs for all the saw-mills up and down the river. Lumber-dealers complain of a harder season than has been known for ten years. Real estate is much depreciated, and can be bought for 25 per cent. less than two years ago."

"The Lowell cotton-mills are endeavoring to close their establishments for three weeks, in order that stocks may be diminished and prices advance to a remunerating rate."

"The cotton factory at Harrisburg suspended operations for a time on Saturday last."

"Some of the New England mills have suspended operations, and the large mills of Fall River contemplate running on short time until trade assumes a more encouraging aspect."

"The origin of the coal-miners' strike unquestionably was the production of coal in excess of the demand, and consequent decline in the price to a figure at which every ton raised involved somebody in loss."

"There are at this moment strikes among plate-printers, coal-miners, ship-builders, journeymen tailors, and shoemakers."

"Along the Hudson River many brickyards have suspended operations owing to the low price of brick."

"The number of unoccupied houses in this city is greater than at any season since 1861."

"There are more dwellings and stores to let than at any time for several years past. The demand for new buildings is limited, and there is a prospect of a further reduction in wages."

"Real estate in Philadelphia has experienced a considerable decline. There is a glut of houses in the market."

"Real estate in San Francisco is far less salable than it was six months since, and outside lots are totally unsalable."

"The woollen goods market is decidedly dull, and heavy stocks are on hand."

"We have a magnificent crop of wheat, unsurpassed, if ever equalled, in quantity, and wholly acceptable on the average in quality."

"Last fall, red wheat in the interior of Michigan was $2 25; this summer, the same wheat sold at $1 25."

"Acres of berries are left unpicked; wagon-loads of the finest melons are left in the field or fed to cattle; apples, tomatoes, and other articles of the crop are left ungathered, because it does not pay."

"Western merchants complain that trade is in a very unsatisfactory state."

"Freights are so low that the canals of this State cannot now be navigated at rates that will pay."

"The rates at which freights are now carried on all the through lines are daily involving the carriers in loss."

"The Common Council of Chicago authorized the increase of the police force to the extent of seventy-five men. Commissioner Littsworth informs me that within three days there were over 3,000 applications."

"The number of beggars who bar one's progress or invade one's dwelling or office for alms is steadily on the increase."

"The total number of persons receiving out-door relief during the last year in Philadelphia was 85,322."

The foregoing are about one-half of the facts of a similar tenor gathered during the last three weeks from four daily papers—the Times, Herald, Evening Post, and Commercial Advertiser. They all point in one direction: abundant crops, abundant stocks of goods, plenty of houses, lumber, bricks, building material, coal, plenty of railroads, canals, mills, and mines, but yet a general want of prosperity, generally unprofitable business, and a large number of people unemployed.

What does it mean? Have we produced too much coal, too much lumber, too much wheat, and too much of other crops of the field? Have we woven too much cotton and woollen cloth, built too many houses and mills and railroads and canals? Can it be that we have produced too much? Can we produce too much?

There can be but one answer to this question. We can never produce too much. As long as one human being on the face of the earth hungers or thirsts, we can never produce too much food. As long as one human being suffers cold, we can never produce too much coal. As long as one human being sleeps homeless and houseless on door-steps or under shelter of the trees, or breathes rheumatism and ague from damp cellars, or breeds pestilence in crowded tenements, so long we can never build too many houses. So long as one poor child wears rags, we are not producing cloth enough. So long as one human soul thirsts after joy or knowledge, or one human body in vain seeks comfort, so long must it be evident that there is not joy or knowledge or comfort enough produced by our labor, and all men must strive on to produce more. Yet everywhere men seem to be engaged in diminishing production. Coal-miners seek to force a diminished production of coal by strikes. Lumbermen seek to force a diminished production by agreement. Cotton-printers seek to force a diminished production by suspension of labor. The whole Southern press is filled with urgent advice to the planters not to raise too much cotton. Why is it?

Production seems no longer profitable. Western farmers complain that they can scarcely exist on the present prices of their products. It is a fact that large quantities of garden produce even in the neighborhood of large cities have not paid for the gathering. Coal-miners claim that, until the recent strike, they were producing at a loss. House-builders are discouraged, woollen and cotton mills are losing money. Merchants and mechanics alike complain that they are earning nothing. What is the reason?

The reason is not that we are producing more than usual. The reason is that we are consuming less. In spite of nominally high wages, the great mass of the working-classes—the great bulk of the consumers throughout the country—are less able to purchase commodities than they were a few years ago. The great mass of the people are not prosperous. War, taxation, and a protective tariff have impoverished us beyond belief. There is less wealth in the country; and of what there is, as Commissioner Wells has well shown, more is in the hands of the rich, and less in the hands of the poor. As long as the feverish activity of war and the scarcely less feverish activity of returning peace continued, so long was it possible to maintain the delusion of our prosperity, so long did reckless consumption continue, and labor was fully employed at seemingly remunerative rates. But as soon as the country was blessed with one fair harvest, and the first symptoms of a decline in the prevailing preposterous high prices set in, and people began to take a calm account of stock, then the truth began to dawn on people's minds. Economy slowly and timidly sought to supplant extravagance; people began to scrutinize the price of what they bought; trade slackened; merchants beat the manufacturers down; the manufacturers sought to reduce wages; and then came strikes and labor unions, and the dawn of the great conflict between capital and labor, which, with its inevitable ultimate harmonious settlement, is to mark with greatest prominence this era of industrial progress. Precisely a year ago the Nation pointed out that the bubble of high prices could not outlast one good, abundant crop of grain; that the decline would involve everybody in loss, would diminish every one's ability to purchase products, and would speedily result in a great stagnation of business. The assertion was received with derision, and has not, indeed, been fairly borne out by events. For although, so far, the year has been anything but a prosperous one, yet nothing like the widespread distress which we anticipated has as yet been seen. In truth, the premises upon which our argument was based proved false. Some of the great crops upon which everybody counted proved to be no great crops after all. The cotton crop, from which so much was expected, fell even below the light crop of the previous year; and the wheat crop, though it yielded superbly, was not fully felt upon the general markets until this summer, owing to the desperate speculation both among farmers and dealers. But, in spite of this partial putting off of the evil day, there has been witnessed enough during the last six months to prove that our abundant crops have not prevented an unprofitable trade. If prices continue to decline in the present ratio, as they inevitably must, if our crops are really good, we shall see an early revival of the great labor struggle, that seems for the moment hushed.

With declining prices, and diminished demand for products, manufacturers must seek to reduce wages. Workmen can scarcely live decently on present wages, and refuse to submit to further reduction. The manufacturers must either work at a loss or stop work. The terrible calamity at Avondale has for the moment superseded the miners' strike in the thoughts of men; but that strike is a most noteworthy illustration of what is going on everywhere throughout the country. Each decline in the price of coal reduced the wages of the miners, until they claimed they could not subsist upon their earnings. The coal-mine owners saw no means to stop the reduction without advancing the selling price of coal. This could only be accomplished by stopping work entirely. The men consented, but at what a sacrifice! The thirty-day suspension has lasted ten weeks, and the whole mining region is distressed and impoverished. Few people realize what suffering is entailed upon whole communities by the suspension of work among any one class. The three leading stores in Hyde Park—one of the mining towns—saw their average monthly sales reduced from $22,000 to $7,400 during the strike; and even then they had to sell largely on credit. All other branches of business suffer in proportion. This is what takes place everywhere during strikes and labor suspensions; and if the decline in prices is, as seems inevitable, to continue, how can further strikes and further suspensions be avoided? And will not each suspension still further diminish the consuming power of the people, still further reduce the profits of production, and cause prices to decline still further? We see no hope for a permanent, healthy revival of business until all classes of the community, rich and poor alike, awake to the folly of their recent extravagance and wastefulness, and return to their former ways of economy and simple thrift. That awakening will only come through suffering.

MANUAL LABOR.

Nobody who watches the discussions about the "labor problem" can help wishing most sincerely that in this field of enquiry at least a reconciliation could be effected between preaching and practice. At present they are as wide as the poles apart. In the ancient world, manual labor was not unnaturally despised; and, in fact, no kind of labor was held in very high repute. Robbery, either wholesale or retail, was the favorite mode of making provision for one's old age. Whatever work had to be done from day to day to make life possible, was imposed as far as possible on slaves. Labor was openly and unblushingly spoken of as disgusting and degrading. Under this theory, however, the world went rapidly to the dogs, until, in the eighth century, hardly anybody in Europe owned anything or knew anything. The general neglect of labor and the general taste for pillage, protracted through several centuries, had left society in rags and starvation, and here the church stepped in, and started it once more on the road to civilization by preaching up manual labor as a noble and elevating and pious pursuit, not only useful to man, but well pleasing to God. Since then it has never lost its high place in the books and schools and churches. The dignity of manual labor is taught to all children, it is preached from the pulpit, and lauded by moralists in their essays, and sung by poets. Everybody knows, from the very dawning of his consciousness, that the value of what he does depends on the spirit in which he does it; that if a floor be swept in a proper frame of mind, the occupation of the sweeper is just as fine and respectable as that of the legislator or philosopher.

Partly under the influence of this teaching, and partly under the influence of the general growth of humanitarian feeling, the workingman—by which we mean the manual laborer—has risen in the social scale, and he is now acknowledged on all hands to be as good as anybody. The reason given for not admitting him into genteel circles is no longer that he is not as good as the people who compose them, but that difference of tastes and habits would not make the association agreeable to either party. His growing intelligence, too, and growing power of combination, and consequently political and social power—that is, power of imposing his will on others by inconveniencing the community if it does not listen to him—have, of course, both given increased weight to his opinions and respectability to his pursuits.

Nevertheless, it must be admitted that, with all the teaching and preaching, there is nothing which everybody in the community—we do not believe this is too sweeping a statement—more carefully and strenuously avoids if he can than manual labor. Of course, there is in European countries a large admixture, in the prejudice against it, of the old feudal taste for highway robbery; but then, after making due allowance for the effect of European traditions even on our social ideas, we must admit that there are few countries in the world in which the desire to escape manual labor by hook or by crook is stronger, or more constant, or more widely diffused than it is in this. No duke ever took more pains to avoid having to use spade or pickaxe than the average American youth of our day; and it must be admitted he has been extraordinarily successful, for most of the manual labor of the country is done by foreigners. The persons who furnish all the praise of it, and preach its dignity and delights, and who want to have it made compulsory in colleges, are never workingmen in the common sense of the term. Some of them call themselves so, owing to their having worked with their hands in their youth—that is, when they had to do it in order to subsist. But there is not one of them who ever worked in this way one minute longer than he could help—that is, one minute after he had found his way into some calling in which brains were more useful than muscle. Some of the greatest enthusiasts about manual toil we have amongst us are men who toiled manually just as long as was necessary to make themselves preachers, or lawyers, or editors, or teachers, or speculators, or capitalists; but not one minute longer. So that their whole careers give the lie in a very point-blank way to their preaching.

Now, we cannot help thinking that the talk of this class, and, in fact, of the whole non-laboring class, about the dignity and delights of manual toil, has had, and is having, a very unfavorable influence on the labor problem, because it has had, and has, a very unfavorable influence on the feelings which the workingmen bring to the discussion of it. It was an easy thing for mediæval monks to teach mediæval serfs that not only was labor a duty, but a highly elevating and dignified employment, because the monks practised what they preached, and really made their hoeing and ploughing expressions of devout feeling. In talking in this way about labor, they were unconsciously going through the necessary process of adapting the code of morals to the social exigencies of the age. The world was full of violence, of insecurity, and poverty. The race was sinking into the blackest barbarism, because some men would not work and others had no motive to work. Something had to be done to glorify toil and supply a motive for engaging in it—the ordinary motive, the hope of enjoying its fruits, being for the moment no longer in existence. But when merchants, and bankers, and capitalists, and Protestant clergymen, and editors, and lecturers took up the tale, and after getting up in the morning about eight o'clock, putting on clean linen, taking a leisurely breakfast with their families, reading the papers, went to their snug offices or libraries, and began in their easy-chairs to paint the delights of rising at six, putting on a greasy or mud-bedaubed suit, and hurrying to dig all day long in a wet ditch or hammer in a smoky forge, and recommended all men to follow it as a truly noble, not to say sacred, calling, the theory began rapidly to break down. Workingmen began to feel that they were the objects of an elaborate but very transparent attempt at imposition. They saw the preachers not only avoiding manual labor themselves, but doing their best to save their sons from it. They accordingly began to suspect the whole body of what are called "educated men" of humbug, or something very like it. Bible quotations in glorification of labor produced very much the same effect on them that similar quotations in reference to the doom of Ham and the duty of Onesimus used to produce on the Abolitionists—that is to say, instead of laboring with rapture, and considering themselves lucky in being laborers, they throw the Bible overboard, and in nearly every European country regard the clergy with the greatest hostility as the natural allies of the capitalist. When the clean-shaven, oval-nailed, well-booted, and well-tailored lawyer or doctor or banker tells them that he is a workingman himself, and that the only difference between him and them is that he works with his head and they with their hands, they simply laugh derisively. He is nevertheless right; he is a workingman, and his work is a good deal harder and more useful than theirs; and if it were not for it, they would be serfs under the lash or howling savages in the wilderness; but when he pretends to consider the laborer's work as being just as agreeable and dignified as his—as work, in short, to be liked for its own sake, just as his own—he is guilty of an attempt at deception which is now hardly ever successful.

It seems as if the time had come when this elaborate attempt to keep up this amiable fiction about labor should be dropped. The time for fictions, whether legal or moral, has passed away. Workingmen are no longer either ignorant or simple-minded. They know perfectly well that muscular toil is not agreeable; that nobody likes it, and none less than those who most pretend to revere it. The history of the human mind—that is, of what is most valuable in human nature—is in large part the history of efforts to escape it, of discoveries and inventions which lessen the necessity of it. But one of the curious and certainly unlooked-for results of the prevailing cant about manual labour is, that it has filled the heads of the workingmen—as one may see by the reports of their conventions—with the notion that, disagreeable as their occupation is, it is the only important one in the world; and that a perfect state of society—that is, the state to be aimed at in all legislation—would be one in which everybody would be forced to work with his hands, and all capitalists, exchangers, distributors, and professional men, except perhaps teachers and a few clerks, be unknown. In fact, everybody who does not handle a tool of some kind in his daily occupation is getting to be spoken of at the labor conventions as a drone, whom society would do well to take in hand. The sapient movement amongst some of our amateur educators to have manual labor made compulsory at colleges helps to spread and deepen the impression; and we see that some of the English Radicals are now raising the question whether there can be such a thing as real "culture" without manual labor, and whether our faculties would not be all improved if each of us had to devote one little seventh part of one horse-power every day to the production of some material result.

It is high time there were an end to all this, and that this most important social problem of the day were discussed in the language of soberness and truth, and in accordance with the facts of life. It is the duty of everybody, and the necessity of most people, to work, steadily and habitually; but it is ridiculous to pretend that muscular labor is one whit more respectable or useful than any other kind of labor. It is, of course, necessary to civilization; but no more so than, and indeed not so much so as, brain labor. Men may live, and do live by the million, as rude barbarians, elevated but little in thought or feeling above their beasts of burden, by mere manual toil; but for all progress, in the best sense of the word—for nearly all the comforts and enjoyments of life—we are indebted to brain labor; and nobody would suffer more from anything like neglect of brain labor than the working class. One kind of labor is, in fact, just as necessary to the race, considered as rational beings, as another. But the comparative moral and social value of different kinds of labor is to be estimated by their influence on character, and it is simply preposterous to pretend that manual laborers are juster, truer, more humane, more upright and self-controlled than clerks, or lawyers, or shopkeepers. There is nothing in their calling to make them so; while it is notorious that all muscular toil exercises a more or less deadening influence on the mental perceptions, and does, therefore, in some ways, hinder rather than help moral culture.

Correspondence.

THE TRIBUNE AND "A CHINA MERCHANT."

The Tribune on Saturday last called attention to the fact that the phrases in its article, "How to Deal with China," on which our correspondent, "A China Merchant," commented so severely last week, as being insulting to American merchants, were in reality directed expressly and exclusively against the British China merchants, and it wonders how, therefore, a respectable journal like the Nation could admit such a letter as "A China Merchant's." To which we reply that, in the first place, we do not guarantee the accuracy of correspondents' statements, or exact as a condition of publication from writers willing to put a signature to their letters anything except that they should have something to say which, primâ facie, seems worth saying, and that they should abstain from scurrilous abuse of individuals—the adoption of which rule, we may add, would, in the opinion of many good people, strengthen the Tribune's own claims to respectability, and would certainly increase its usefulness. In the second place, we have not ourselves studied the Tribune's articles on Chinese affairs with the care which perhaps they merit, since the time when we saw that it committed the task of explaining and defending the Burlingame treaty in its columns to "Mark Twain," the comic writer—a task which he performed in four or five columns of as humorous matter as has ever flowed from his lively pen. One looks to that gentleman for entertainment, and a good deal of it, but not for information as to Chinese politics or for expositions of public law. In the third place, our correspondent's error was not quite so serious as the extract published by the Tribune would seem to show. Its article was throughout directed against opinions which the American colony in China holds in common with the British, and to which Mr. Browne was replying in the very letters which brought him under the Tribune's bludgeon, and its whole tenor would have warranted the impression that it was directed in reality as much against one as the other, even if it had not wound up as follows: "Let a minister be sent to China whose name will carry influence with it, and whose force of character will secure him against being made the instrument of a greedy and reckless knot of European and American traders." This looks certainly as if, in the opinion of the writer, the American China merchants would do well to keep out of sight whenever the devil comes to get the British. We may add that "A China Merchant" is one of the most respected members of as respectable a class as the country produces—men who are in every way an honor to it—and when China comes up for discussion, some of us might spend our time worse than in listening to what they say—in writing about China, for instance. We add a word of explanation just received from him:

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: I observe some remarks in the Tribune of to-day respecting my note to you of the 4th inst. I regret that its publication should have brought any attack upon yourself. There was one important omission in it, and that was, that the words "and English" were not added to the word "American" merchants.

The letters of both communities in Shanghai express the same sentiments, and Mr. Browne's reply was addressed to them in common; and it seemed to me that the strictures of the Tribune were intended for both, although, in general, the name of only one of them was mentioned. The Tribune evidently disclaims such intention, and would confine its remarks exclusively to the English; but they are just as inapplicable to the one as to the other. The English letter to Mr. Browne was signed by all the merchants of the first respectability in Shanghai, and they are as honorable and good men as any of the merchants of London or New York. How the Tribune can maintain consistency in intimating that these gentlemen, without exception, "are narrow-minded, selfish, and grasping traders, who have squatted in the open ports of China, who would force their principles and their trade down the throats of the Chinese people," and so forth, and then deny that these strictures have any application to Americans who occupy the same position and openly avow the same sentiments, I am unable to see. Anyhow, the assault is equally reprehensible whether it was intended for only one, or for both the foreign communities of Shanghai.

The Tribune has the right to express its own opinions upon the Chinese question, or any other, as it pleases; but when it assails a whole community with indiscriminate and scandalous reproaches, such as we have noted, it may well expect a retort. A China Merchant.

New York, September 11, 1869.

THE "HARVARD 'RAH'" A VERY GOOD CHEER.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Your correspondent on the subject of the "Harvard 'Rah'" in this week's Nation is, I think, mistaken both as to when and why it originated. The facts, if I remember aright, are these: Just before the Presidential election of 1864, those students whose politics were Republican decided to join the monster Republican torchlight procession that was to march through Boston, and, desiring to have something by which to distinguish their voices from those of the various other political clubs, determined to adopt this peculiar cheer. Once adopted, the charm of novelty, and the satisfaction felt at having a mode of expressing their feelings peculiarly their own, induced not only them, but the whole college, to continue the use of it. It is now known everywhere as the Harvard cheer, and, so far from being "devoid of life and beyond the pale of human sympathy," as suggested by your correspondent, I think it would be hard to invent anything more invigorating or life-inspiring than the quick "Rah, rah, rah," as shot out by a crowd of excited young fellows. To prove that it is not wholly beyond the pale of sympathy, I would simply instance one case that struck me forcibly at the time, when, at the breaking camp this summer of our crack military corps, during the customary cheering for the officers, when the name of a special favorite came up, it was proposed, in addition to the three cheers, that they should be Harvard cheers, which were heartily given, much to the apparent satisfaction of the entire corps, although scarcely a half-dozen of those present were Harvard graduates.

Yours respectfully, F.

Boston, September 11.

ANTI-SLAVERY REMINISCENCES—A SUGGESTION.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Your suggestion in your mention of the recent book of the Rev. Mr. May, that other anti-slavery leaders should contribute their reminiscences of the times, reminds me of a series of letters contributed to the Anti-Slavery Standard, by a certain "D. Y.," which I have always thought were among the very best and wittiest contributions to newspaper literature I ever read. There are some two hundred of them, and a selection would make one of the wittiest and most truthful contributions imaginable to the history of those sorrowful times, though I fear the reputation of some of the big-wigged respectabilities of the past would suffer.

To save Mr. "D. Y.'s" modesty, I will not name him. I will only say that he is a master of English style in one of its most difficult forms—letter-writing. His manner is as good as Horace Walpole's; his matter much better worth reading. A.

Boston, September 11, 1869.

AGAINST REMOVING THE CAPITAL.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: In speaking of removing "the Federal capital" in your last issue, you say: "There is really only one objection to the scheme—or, rather, only one thing to be said in favor of Washington—and that is, the expense would be enormous, owing to the abandonment of the Government buildings."

Now, it seems to me you could not have considered this subject with that deliberation which you are wont to give matters about which you treat. The expense, it is true, should constitute a very serious objection, as it would not be less, probably, than a hundred and fifty millions of dollars, and might run up to two hundred millions, and require not less than twenty, and very likely thirty, years for its accomplishment.

But allow me to present one or two other objections to the scheme which appear to me worthy of consideration, and which did not suggest themselves to your mind.

The Government, acting under the authority of a provision of the Constitution, entered into a compact with the States of Maryland and Virginia for a tract of country ten miles square, "for the permanent seat of the Government of the United States." The territory was ceded to the United States for that purpose, and no other. A contract was made with the owners of the soil upon which the Federal city stands, by which Government became possessed in fee of a large portion of lots of the city, together with the streets, avenues, alleys, and public squares, for the sole purpose of founding a city which should be, as Congress declared, "the permanent seat of the Government of the United States." These lots have been sold from time to time, and the proceeds have gone into the public treasury. What gave value to them, and what was the inducement to purchase? Simply the fact that this had been made by Congress "the permanent seat of the Government of the United States." This constituted their whole value. The public faith was pledged as solemnly as it ever was for anything, that this should remain permanently the seat of government; and, relying on that faith, individuals have invested millions of dollars in real estate and in building: let this public faith be violated by the removal of the seat of government, and these investments would become comparatively valueless. To the holder of real estate here, and the holder of U. S. bonds, it would be nearly equally disastrous whether the seat of government should be removed, or the Government should repudiate its public debt. In either case, the public faith would be violated, and a stupendous wrong done.

The city which bears the revered name of Washington is the offspring of "The Father of his Country;" it was founded expressly for the seat of government, with streets and avenues such as no other city in the world has, from sixty to one hundred and eighty feet wide; the streets crossing each other at right angles, and the broad avenues running diagonally across them and crossing each other, leaving at their intersection large open spaces; the streets, avenues, and alleys thus taking up an unusual proportion of the city, and making it very expensive and burdensome to light and keep them in order. What use to any city but the capital of a great nation are such broad avenues and such wide streets? They would be only a detriment to a commercial or manufacturing city.

Is the fact that the permanent location of the seat of government at this place was one of the objects nearest the heart of Washington no objection to its removal? To my mind, the removal would show hardly less regard for him than the entire destruction of his house and tomb at Mount Vernon; the sacredness of his name could never attach to any other place. Let the capital once start upon its travels, and it could never be considered permanent anywhere, and might move on until it reached Santa Fé or Mexico. Cui bono?

I could suggest many other objections to this scheme; but fear that in doing so I should require more space than you would be willing to accord me.

N. Sargent.

Washington, September 6, 1869.

[Another letter by Mr. Sargent we have seen, in which he insists strongly on his point that Congress, by accepting the District of Columbia as "the permanent seat of government of the United States," bound itself for all time, so that it is debarred from ever removing the capital. But at any given moment Congress is omnipotent within its sphere, and is only bound by moral considerations to be equitable in reimbursing parties, be they States or individuals, which may be injured by its revocation in the public interest of a compact into which it has entered. The further question which has been raised, as to whether the removal of the capital is within the sphere of Congress, does not seem to us doubtful. The Constitution refers to the subject only in the words which give Congress power of exclusive legislation "over such district as may by cession of particular States and the acceptance of Congress become the seat of government of the United States." It was in virtue of inferences from this clause—inferences how drawn we do not know—that the retrocession of Alexandria County to Virginia was stigmatized as unconstitutional by John Quincy Adams in 1846; but the Supreme Court never expressed the same opinion, though it is told traditionally in Washington that Mr. Bates, sometime Attorney-General, was, by implication, committed to Mr. Adams's view. However all this may be, a new amendment would settle the question, and would perhaps be as easy to get as an Act of Congress. But the question is hardly a living one, we should say. We know of only one argument in its favor that seems to be of weight: we might find our advantage in governing this Metropolitan District of ours by Congress instead of by Tammany.—Ed. Nation.]

TWO MISTRANSLATIONS BY CARL BENSON.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Your correspondent, "Carl Benson," writes on so many subjects, and usually so well on literary ones, that any mistake on his part may do harm to the reading world at large, as well as grieve the soul of the sympathetic scholar.

In his article in your No. 218, Vol. IX., entitled "A Mistranslation by Lord Byron," he corrects one mistake of the poet and makes two of his own. The first consists in mistaking the Spanish conjunction, que, "that"—denoting the subjunctive—for the pronoun quien, "who." In the second he translates the perfect subjunctive, que oyera, as if it was the perfect indicative, oyó.

He quotes the stanza in which lies Byron's mistake, and, not having access to the original, I quote from him; although I suspect a misprint in the last word of the last line—i. e., that, instead of hablava, it should be hablara:

"Fuego por los ojos vierte
El Rey que esto oyera,
Y como el otro de leyes,
De leyes tambien hablava."

And he translates the stanza as, "literally:"

"The king, who heard this, darted fire from his eyes, and, as the other (had spoken) of laws, he spoke of laws also."

The last word, "also," tambien, is the point at which Byron made his misstep, taking it as tan bien, "so well."

Now, the stanza, word for word, reads in English thus:

"Fire, by the eyes, turns
The King, that this he should hear;
And as the other of laws,
Of laws also spake he."

"or, metrically:"

"That he should hear such speech, in ire
The King turns towards him eyes of fire,
And as the other laws had named,
Of laws he, too, his answer framed."

Carl Benson and all other critics should keep in mind the proverb: "Ne trębuchez pas en ramassant."

A. Diez.

[The stumbling was not so very great, however. "Carl Benson's" attention was directed towards the material alteration in the sense which was made by Byron's error, and not towards making a translation nicely exact, especially of the lines which were not in question. The original, we may inform Mr. Diez, has hablava and not hablara, which latter would not so well conform to the principle of versification observed in the poem.—Ed. Nation.]

Notes.

LITERARY.

Messrs. D. Appleton & Co.'s list announcing their books to be published in September is not a very long one, but contains the titles of several interesting works. "Caliphs and Sultans" consists, we are told, of "Tales not included in the Arabian Nights"—which is a remark that might be made of most tales, but by which it is probably intended that we should understand the volume to contain newer stories drawn from the same source as those which we have in the greatest of story-books—the only story-book that is important at once in the literature for adults and in the literature for children. "The Reasoning Power of Animals" is by the Rev. John Selby Watson, who takes sides against the thinkers—if there are now any such—who deny that the inferior animals, or many of them, have a portion of the reason which is possessed by man. "Phosphorescence, or the Emission of Light by Minerals, Plants, and Animals," is by T. L. Phipson, an Englishman of science. The Appletons, like half-a-dozen other publishers, dip into the French Library of Wonders, and announce as in press "Meteors, Aerolites, Storms, and Atmospheric Phenomena." "Arms and Armor in Antiquity and the Middle Ages" we have once mentioned in our notices of English works as a book translated from the French by Mr. Charles Boutell, who furnishes notes, a preface, and a supplementary chapter on arms and armor in England. Mrs. Hemans's complete poetical works are to appear in the cheap Globe Edition of the poets which Messrs. Appleton & Co. are publishing. "The Bellevue and Charity Hospital Reports" are contained in one volume, from the hand of Dr. W. A. Hammond. We cannot undertake to mention all the announcements of children's books which are now being put forth by our publishers, and we do not regret it, because, except in a few instances, the names of book and author are alike in having no exact meaning in the ears of our readers. Such of the "juveniles" as we think worth notice we shall be able to speak of before the holidays. We may, however, here say that for Miss Edgeworth's books in new editions the purchaser may look to Messrs. Kelly & Piet; that Mr. Duffield Ashmead is going to publish a translation, done by Mr. Charles A. Dana, of a German story-book, called "Nutcracker and Sugar Dolly;" that "Peter Parley" and "Mother Goose" without any abridgment, are to be had from Mr. James Miller; and that the commendable "Chinaman in California," which came out last year, and is a very good book for Sunday-school libraries, and not a bad book for other places, will be followed by "The Back Court," written by the same author, and published by the Philadelphia Presbyterian Publication Committee. The "one-syllable" literature, about the possession of which there was a hot quarrel and a newspaper controversy awhile ago between some of the publishers and the inventor of it, seems to have got into almost everybody's hands—almost every seller's; we cannot say we hope it goes into the hands of many buyers. Messrs. Felt & Dillingham now announce some of it, and so does Mr. James Miller, and so, of course, do Messrs. Routledge & Co., the authorized publishers.——Mr. James Campbell, of Boston, publishes "The History and Philosophy of Marriage; or, Polygamy and Monogamy Compared," and compared much to the advantage of polygamy, we believe. Robert Carter & Brothers have in press an autobiography and memoir of F. W. Krummacher; the fifth volume of D'Aubigné's "Reformation;" "Words of Comfort for Parents bereaved of Little Children;" "The Shepherd of Israel; or, Illustrations of the Inner Life," by the Rev. Mr. Duncan Macgregor; "The Crown without the Conflict," by the Rev. Mr. R. H. Lundie, and several religious "juveniles." Mr. Duffield Ashmead has in press a "Red-line" "Christian Year," and the same work in an illuminated edition—its designs being by Jean Lee.——Messrs. Thomas Nelson & Sons announce two of Arthur Mangin's well-known works—the "Mysteries of the Ocean" and the "Desert World," which they will issue in an illustrated edition—one like their last year's edition of "The Bird." Messrs. Sever & Francis announce De Tocqueville's "American Institutions;" a "Handy Volume Edition of Sir Roundell Palmer's Book of Praise," and (also a "handy volume") Mr. C. F. Alexander's "Sunday Book of Poetry." Mr. W. J. Widdleton has in preparation a Globe edition of the "Ingoldsby Legends," which still have a public rather larger than the one which appreciates the designs, and considerably larger than the one which is taken by the cleverness of the versification. The same publisher announces a new edition of a work which has been for some time out of print in America, if we are not mistaken—Milman's "Latin Christianity." Messrs. Lippincott's, Fields, Osgood & Co.'s, and Hurd & Houghton's, fall lists have already been noticed. For the legal works in Messrs. Little, Brown & Co.'s list, and the technical scientific works in Mr. D. Van Nostrand's, we must refer our readers to the catalogues of those houses, or the publications devoted exclusively to the trade.

—"Circular No. 2" for the current year, recently issued from the Surgeon-General's office at Washington, is the unpromising official title of an important and interesting addition to the literature of practical surgery. It is in fact a complete and exhaustive monograph on "Excisions of the Head of the Femur for Gunshot Injury," in the form of a report to the Surgeon-General by Assistant Surgeon and Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel George A. Otis. The sagacious forethought which signalized a change in the administration in the Surgeon-General's office early in the second year of the late war, not only by the liberal reorganization of the hospital system of the army, but by the establishment of the now unequalled Army Medical Museum, and by the reformation of the statistical method previously employed, has its fruition partly in this document and similar ones which have preceded it. A "Report on the Materials for a Medical and Surgical History of the War," one on "Amputations at the Hip Joint," and the magnificent catalogue raisonné of the Army Medical Museum—a great illustrated quarto, like "Webster's Unabridged"—are among these. They are all of them works most honorable to medical literature. All of them bear the marks of unstinted and well-directed labor; and the present "Circular No. 2" is really a marvel of research. What with anonymous bones coming to excite curiosity and baffle enquiry; what with scrappy reports of cases, begun amid the hurry and stress of the battle-field, continued in the hastily-extemporized hospital, and ended in the disappearance of the patient in "the dim inane" of transfer or furlough, we may imagine the classifier of specimens and digester of reports exclaiming, in the words of another physician, "What song the Sirens sang, or what name Achilles assumed when he hid himself among women, though puzzling questions, are not beyond all conjecture. But who were the proprietaries of these bones, or what bodies these ashes made up, were a question above antiquarianism; not to be resolved by man, nor easily, perhaps, by spirits." "A question above antiquarianism" must be allowed a tough one, in our time no less than in Sir Thomas Browne's; but by diligent following up of slender clues, and by assiduous correspondence (much of it with ex-Confederate surgeons, who seem generally to have responded with creditable promptness and good-temper), Dr. Otis has been able to present reasonably full histories of sixty-three cases of the operation in question, performed in both armies during the war of the rebellion. He has at the same time rendered the equally important service of eliminating from the records several spurious and replicated cases. The small number of five successes strikes the unprofessional reader with something like horror that this operation should ever be attempted, until he learns the dread alternative offered if excision be rejected—either the frightful amputation of nearly a quarter of the body, or the abandonment of a man, perhaps otherwise sound and vigorous, to a death of slow torture, from a wound which may be of small extent and involving no part necessary to life. After all, we have stout and ebrious "Private Hugh Wright," with an incredible number of inches gone from the top of his os femoris, eloping from the hospital, and becoming invisible to the admiring eye of surgery, by reason of a clear vocation he had to carry hodfuls of bricks up high ladders. Hugh admits with apparent reluctance that he found this work too heavy, and had to change it for mowing and wood-chopping. Dr. Otis's report leads him inevitably into the region of medical polemics, whose atmosphere is not always of the serenest; but we are bound to admit his candor of tone and freedom from special pleading. He who intrenches himself behind the histories of "over twenty thousand major amputations, and of more than four thousand excisions of the larger joints," with an abattis of something like five thousand surgical specimens, can afford to carry on a discussion without passion or prejudice. When the history of the medical service in the war of the rebellion is finished, it will establish one fact that deserves to be better known than it now is—that the business of life-saving was then done more thoroughly and successfully than ever before in a great war.

—The American Sovereign is the name which is to be borne by a new fortnightly paper, which will be published partly for the sake of discussing Social Science, Literature, and Rural Affairs, but mainly "in the interest of political purity and in opposition to organized knavery." "More pressing and urgent than any other question before the people," says the prospectus, "is the great and overshadowing question of political corruption;" and what we must first do is to terrify the party hacks and greedy plunderers, and secure honest men to fill public offices. Two dollars a year will be the price of this journal, to which we wish plenty of courage, an independence of libel suits, and all the success to which good service in a righteous cause entitles journals. The proprietors of the American Sovereign state their intention of publishing at an early day a contribution to the history of American politics since the Rebellion, which they will call "The Era of Dishonesty," and which they intend to make a historical record of corruption and fraud under the reign of the Rings. Venal legislators, corrupt judges, and rascally politicians are to be treated with strict justice—or rather, we should say, judicial corruption, legislative venality, and political iniquity; for here again one is embarrassed by fear of libel suits, and by the difficulty of proving what everybody knows to be true, and is driven away from particulars into vague generalities. However, let the book be prepared with real ability, so that it may be read—prepared, as Cobbett would have prepared it, rather than as if it had been done by the writers of the "Federalist"—and the American sovereigns will read it, and in good time, we may be sure, will act on it, sometimes at least, and to some purpose. 36 Dey Street, in this city, is the new paper's address.

—We have had occasion once or twice to mention the Church Union, and we cannot say we have ever praised it for its good behavior or its ability. But it has now fallen into better hands than those which managed it before, and we may fairly expect a great change for the better, both in its matter and its manners. It certainly is changed for the better in its outward appearance, and is now far handsomer and handier than before. Messrs. J. B. Ford & Co. are the new publishers, and they have induced Mr. Henry Ward Beecher to promise that he will at once become a regular contributor, and that by-and-by his connection with it shall be closer, and that he will work in an editorial capacity. Just how close his connection is to be we are not informed and do not know, but on the first day of January next he is to give a full exposition of the plans and purposes of the journal, and then we may learn. His contributions in the immediate future are to consist of his sermons from week to week, phonographically reported, and some, if not all, of his "lecture-room talks." These latter are perhaps even better liked and calculated to be more useful to the readers of the paper than even the sermons. We doubt if, except in saying one thing, we should add much to that complete description of the new paper which is implied in the statement that it is to express Mr. Beecher's views and opinions. That one thing is the promise of the proprietors that an arena will be provided where, free from denominational trammels, opposing views will be heard in courteous debate.

—The Philadelphia Photographer for September and the last number of the Zeitschrift für Bildende Kunst describe independently the new English (Woodbury) process for obtaining plates for printing from photographic negatives. Goupil & Co., of Paris, have put it into practical and apparently successful operation, and the subscribers of the Gazette des Beaux-Arts (May and June) and the Photographische Mittheilungen (August) have already had specimen prints of a very satisfactory character. Apparently, the producing capacity of the plates is all-sufficient, and, what is of great consequence, the impressions correspond to right and left in nature. In this was the grand defect of the Albert process, which reversed all the objects that it copied, and was thus greatly restricted in usefulness, though some of the proofs which we saw were wonderfully fine in detail and in gradation of tones. Mr. Woodbury, however, instead of printing directly from the gelatinous surface which he first treats with his negative, uses it in forming a matrix like a copper-plate engraving, in which, as is well-known, the lights are raised and the darks sunk. This transfer ensures the restoration of right and left in the impression, and the printing consists in pouring upon the plate a warm solution of colored gelatine, and then bringing it under the press. Unlike the Albertotype, the Woodbury picture must be printed on a peculiar surface, and owing to its great delicacy its cost when mounted is double that of the unmounted proof; and, as yet, the expense is but little less than in ordinary photography. Of course there is a gain in permanence.

—Before leaving the two journals first-named, we will allude somewhat further to their contents. The Photographer gives on a single sheet four views of the late solar eclipse, one having been taken at the totality. They are followed by reports of the various expeditions in this country to photograph the rare phenomenon, their modes of photographing, success, and general adventures, some of which, among the ignorant and superstitious, were quite amusing. The number is well worth preserving as a souvenir. In the Zeitschrift we remark another of the admirable etchings from paintings in the Brunswick Gallery—this time a full-length portrait of some Dutch gentleman of the seventeenth century, seemingly a statesman or captain, and altogether a noble and commanding figure. The original was by Frans Hals, one of the fathers of the Dutch School, though only lately appreciated at his just value. Other illustrations are of the new Schinkel statue to be erected in Berlin, and (borrowed from Lübke) of specimens of the Renaissance in France. From advanced manuscript of the Neue Künstlerlexikon is printed a very interesting sketch of the life of Leon Battista Alberti, an eminent apostle of the Renaissance, by Dr. Julius Meyer. There is the usual correspondence, chronicle of art matters, reviews, etc.

—We learn from a correspondent at Berlin that Professor Theodore Mommsen recently presented Mr. George Bancroft with a copy of his "Römische Geschichte," and accompanied the volumes with these lines which present the distinguished historian in the character of poet:

"Wir sind von gleichem Schlage,
Uns hebt die gleiche Fluth;
Ihr braucht die alte Sage,
Wir brauchen frisches Blut.

"Des einen Volkes Gründung,
Das war, das bleibt uns Rom;
Vertiefung und Verbündung
Baut jetzt am Völkerdom.

"So klingt hier die Parole,
Sie klingt auch drüben wohl,
Vom alten Capitole
Zum neuen Capitol."

The character of poet is not an accustomed one, we take it, for the learned author to appear in, and perhaps these lines are rather more valuable as a tribute of respect than as poetry. We are obliged to say so, at all events, in view of the version in English which we append as the best that we have managed to make. Want of matter is certainly not to be charged against the verses—which state of the case does not, however, make the translator's labor any easier:

"Of self-same mould are you and we;
One flood bears both along;
We need your fresher blood, and ye
Lack yet our lore and song.

"All peoples fused in one vast state,
That meant, that still means, 'Rome:'—
Of many a pillar, each separate,
Build we the People's Dome.

"Thus here the watchword we divine;
So sounds it there with you,
And the old Capitoline
Is answered from the new."

The second stanza is difficult to understand, and difficult to render after an interpretation has been decided upon. We take it to mean that the policy of ancient Rome, as of modern ecclesiastical Rome, was the absorption of nationalities and the fusing them into a single state—a political state in old times, a religious state in our day; but that now the tendency is to make empires by binding together the peoples into federal unions, at the same time deepening ("Vertiefung"), intensifying, the individuality of each people. Notwithstanding the faults which seem to be due to the professor's unfamiliarity with the vehicle he has here used in expressing his meaning—samples of which are the second stanza's abstractions performing mason-work, the obscurity of the same stanza, the confusion and the confused metaphors of his first four lines—and notwithstanding the fact that the ideas are in themselves hardly more poetical, strictly speaking, than they are poetically expressed, the verses are yet full of suggestions which are not unpoetical, and there is an ingenuity of suggestion which might be envied by almost any writer of occasional verses. For example, the historian of ancient Rome addresses the historian of the new Capitol: here is a compliment to Mr. Bancroft and to the American people. Then, too, the German people come in for a share of this same compliment, and so also does the policy of creating a united Germany, as well as—more indirectly—the men who have executed that darling wish of the German heart. Then the contrast between the old governmental ideal and the modern idea of the "parliament of man, the federation of the world," a large and noble conception, as grand as true, happily suggests Mommsen himself, the historian of old Rome, and—as Mommsen's brother-writer, his fellow-expositor of the new tendency—it suggests Mr. Bancroft also, the historian of the great Western federal republic. And, to name no more, there is the flattering assertion of German and American consanguinity, heightened by the declaration that, though our blood and the German is the same in constitution—in fact, identical—ours is "frisch," which at once makes it better, of course. And we may say, too, that there is no harshness, but rather mildness, in the allusion to American literature.

—Apropos of the notice of Mr. Edwards's book on town libraries which we print on another page, we may remark that it is a pity that we have as yet no returns showing what success has attended the scheme of establishing free or nearly free school libraries throughout France. Over 10,000 have been founded, and endowed with over a million of books. Twenty years ago, French parents complained that there were no books which they durst give their daughters that their daughters wanted. The French press is still prolific in ce que vierge ne doit pas lire; but in the last two decades some most estimable writers have tried to supply the woful deficiency of books at once interesting and not immoral. One would like to know the character of the million volumes of these school and communal libraries, and whether morality has succeeded in avoiding a sacrifice to dulness. Germany, the land of book-making, always well provided with libraries, has of late years established many for more popular use—"Volksbibliotheken." The most noteworthy peculiarity of Italian town libraries is that they are not free, a small payment being exacted from borrowers. It has been thought by some that our own libraries would do well to adopt such a rule. People value what they pay for. Could not the two systems be carefully tried by two libraries otherwise similarly situated? Possibly even a small payment would keep away many who very much need the benefit of good reading, and that those only would pay who do not need any such obstruction to make them appreciate the privilege.

—The types were decidedly in error last week in making us say of Mr. E. C. Stedman that he is a poor poet. That, as our readers know, is not our opinion of him. We think no more than Mr. Stedman does that he is to be counted among the great singers; but we think, as we dare say he may not, but as we are sure he ought, that in many of his pieces he shows himself the possessor of a genuine and charming poetical gift. In the way of lighter poetry, nothing need be much prettier than "The Door-Step" and "Pan in Wall Street," which were last published in the "Blameless Prince," and to which we believe we have already called our readers' attention more than once. The word printed "poor" was "good," and as it was an insertion in printer's proof, and did not afterward fall under the eye of the writer, the error stood in the paper as it was published.

—The new agitation of the land question in England and Ireland—and especially in Ireland—is to begin with the publication of a volume of essays of the kind so common of late in England in the treatment of various political and social questions, and of which the "Essays and Reviews" furnished the model. The volume will appear under the auspices of the Cobden Club, and will contain accounts of the tenure and distribution of land, and its relation to government and society in the United States, India, France, Belgium, Russia, and Prussia. The United States is to be treated by a Mr. Fisher, of whom we know nothing beyond his name.

—The seventh session of the International Statistical Congress was held last week at the Hague. Organized, in 1853, mainly through the efforts of A. Quetelet, the well-known author of standard works on statistical and social subjects and Director of the Belgian Bureau of Statistics, this important body met for the first time at Brussels in the year named. Its subsequent sessions were held at Paris, Vienna, London, Berlin, and Florence, at intervals of from two to three years. No international organization has been more fruitful of good results. Its deliberations have derived more than ordinary weight from the fact that the principal governments of Europe have been regularly represented in it by official delegates in the persons of the directors of their respective statistical bureaus, all of whom are shining lights in statistical science, and that the successive recommendations of the Congress have been practically carried out in most countries. The present advanced state of public statistics must be ascribed in a large measure to the influence of the Congress; comparative statistics especially have received a marked development from its steady efforts to bring about a certain uniformity in the methods of conducting official statistical enquiries in different countries. The printed transactions of the Congress form a rich mine of the most valuable information concerning the material and moral condition of the civilized races. The programme for the recent session embraced subjects of the highest importance. Among them were propositions to induce the governments represented to have less regard for their fiscal and other interests and more for the welfare of the governed in the collection of public statistics, and to provide a system of mutual correction in connection with international commercial statistics. The United States Government was represented by Hon. S. B. Ruggles, who attended the session at Berlin in 1863 in the same capacity. The subject of our next general census was to be brought up by him for discussion. The American Association for the Promotion of Science having, at its last meeting at Salem, extended an invitation to the Congress to hold its next session in this country, it is not impossible that in 1871 we shall be able to welcome the leading statisticians of the Old World among us.

—We see that Messrs. Trübner & Co. announce themselves as the London publishers of a new quarterly magazine, which is to be called the "Revue Celtique," and is to be conducted by H. Gaidoz, who will be assisted by the chief Celtic scholars of the British Islands and the Continent. Celtic Philology, Literature, and History are the subjects to which the new magazine is to be devoted, and the list of competent scholars who have promised their assistance is long. Luckily, there is something of the nature and habits of the hobbyhorse-rider in the students of such subjects, and we may expect their promises to be fulfilled with more certainty than would be reasonable in the case of the promises of men cultivating general literature who should lend their names to publishers. The list includes contributors in Belgium, Holland, Bavaria, France, England, India, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland.

THE DIARY OF HENRY CRABB ROBINSON.*

This year has seen the publication of two biographies which are among the best that English literature has to show. Neither Forster's life of Landor nor Crabb Robinson's diary is what can be called a well-planned and skilfully executed work. In the life of Landor there is a clumsiness of arrangement and a dwelling upon details which forbid the use of the word skilful in regard to its workmanship, and Robinson's diary is so almost entirely made up of gossip and anecdote, and the life of the writer himself is, on the whole, so devoid of interest and so almost entirely a mere thread on which these pleasant recollections are strung, that one hardly thinks of his work as anything but a repertory of anecdotes and contemporary criticism of distinguished men and women of England's greatest period by one who knew them personally. But that it is in perfection Mr. Robinson, who was born so long ago as 1776, had the advantages of being born of a comparatively poor family, Dissenters in creed, in the England which was anti-dissenting and insular to a very much greater degree than now, and much more exclusively than now a community worshipping rank and wealth. As a result of his circumstances, Robinson did not go to an English school, and did go to several German universities, and came away with a breadth of culture very uncommon in an Englishman; made the acquaintance of Goethe, Schiller, and the other lights of German literature, just at the time when English curiosity began to be aroused concerning them, and there was almost nobody to gratify it; acquired the German language when a knowledge of it was a rare distinction among his countrymen; was more disposed than he would have been, had he been born within the charmed circle of the best society or had he not gone abroad, to appreciate the genius and cultivate the friendship of Lamb, Wordsworth, Coleridge, and their friends, when they all were under a cloud; and thus fitted himself for collecting the mass of information concerning the great Englishmen of the last sixty or seventy years which he has given us in these volumes, and which will in turn give his name a long immortality among us and our posterity. Only Boswell has done better in Mr. Robinson's field, and even Boswell must yield to him in the amount of literary history which the two respectively give us, and must rest his claim to superiority on the fact that he had so interesting a central figure to portray, and that he showed a good deal of what may be called artistic perception in the portrayal of it. Both books have suffered and will suffer from the use of their material by other writers, and necessarily Mr. Robinson, when he loses his materials, loses more than Boswell, for Boswell, as we say, has something which cannot be taken away from him any more, or hardly any more, than a play of Shakespeare's can be superseded by voluminous quotations from it—dramatic and pictorial interest, namely. But the diary has so much to lose—is such a mine of biographical materials, that there is no danger at all of its becoming used up or rendered obsolete. Fifty new lives of fifty distinguished men and women, whose lives are already written, might be enriched from Mr. Robinson's stores; but it would be the reading of fifty books instead of one should the reader forsake the original source of the new wealth; and, on the whole, we may call Mr. Robinson's work immortal; not with the essential immortality of the gods, doubtless, but with a Tithonus-like interminability of existence which is attained by keeping the company of the true immortals.

* "Diary, Reminiscences, and Correspondence of Henry Crabb Robinson. Edited by T. Sadler." 2 vols. Boston: Ticknor & Fields. 1869.

Of Mr. Robinson himself it is hardly necessary to say much. He had in his early and his later life a good deal of the real Boswellian admiration for those better than himself; and in his later life he added to this more than a young man's fondness for social intercourse, so that he became even famous as a story-teller and talker. They relate of him that, when he gave his breakfasts, it was usual for the initiated among the guests to make their breakfasts before setting out, as the host habitually began serving up Goethe and Schiller or some other celebrity quite as soon as the cups and saucers began to make their appearance, and continued to offer intellectual fare so much more abundantly and constantly than food for the body that a hungry man was in an awkward position. Even a bold push to escape famishing was not surely successful; for sometimes there would be no housekeeper's keys, and sometimes even no housekeeper. With such a disposition and such habits of life, there was almost a necessity laid upon Mr. Robinson to be always hearing and always telling some new thing; and one has only to open the autobiography—no matter where—to see proofs of the extent of his acquisitions of this sort. To go on with his characteristic traits, we may say that, intellectually, he was of a receptive nature rather than creative or aggressive; but that he seems hardly to have had either the intellectual courage and energy with which this sort of mind is often endowed, nor quite all the breadth of tolerance and catholicity of taste with which it is still more frequently marked. He was, for example, to be called intolerant whenever Wordsworth's claims to admiration were seriously questioned. Wordsworth was, indeed, his idol, and a very devoted worshipper he was. And as to his want of decision, there were certain matters which, to the end of his life, he found it possible neither to leave alone nor to come to any conclusion about. Such were religious topics, which were, it is said, a constant theme of his discourse, and as to which he can hardly be said to have formed any fixed body of opinions down to the latest days of his life. For some time before his death, he seems to have inclined towards a liking for Church of England clergymen with no views that could be called very pronounced, and with a good deal of "liberality." As was natural, this tolerance and liking for tolerance grew upon him the older he grew; and not only as regards religious things, but others also, and he was a kinder and less exacting critic in his old age than in his youth, though, for that matter, it could never be said of him that he was not an open-minded man without harshness. His modesty was perhaps excessive; but that is an assertion open to contradiction, for we do not know that we see anything in the diary to disprove his opinion of his own powers, or to lead us to suppose that he might, as he says he could not, have done anything considerable in literature except this that he has done. He consorted intimately, while young enough to be ambitious, with men who certainly would have roused the ambition, and stimulated and strengthened the literary faculties, of almost anybody, however modest, who had much native literary ability, yet in his case nothing came of it. Still, it is not unlikely that he may have been too fastidious, and not bold enough either, and at the same time had his courage dashed and his standard of excellence too much raised by his acquaintance with the greatest geniuses of Germany and England. This is a supposition somewhat strengthened by his course in regard to the law. He gave up literature because he thought he could do nothing in it that he should care to do, and, becoming a law student, was admitted to the bar, and in time got a profitable practice and something of a reputation. He did nothing, however, to enlarge it; but at a time when many English barristers are still waiting for the first brief, he retired from the profession to live leisurely on a small competence, apparently having too little energy of mind to find it to his taste to do the work he might very probably have done excellently, and too little ambition to spur what energies he had.

However, we may be very glad that this was so; for in pleasing himself and letting his nature gratify its inclination—by leading a calm, beneficent, social, semi-studious life—he has doubtless done the world more service and laid up for mankind more pleasure than if he had been the greatest of England's chancellors. Nobody will read these volumes of his without forming a liking and a respect for his kind heart and the estimable qualities of his mind. He will go into the number of our well-loved friends, and our children's and grandchildren's; and no doubt would rather be counted there than with the admired and unloved among the great men whom he has commemorated in one of the most readable of books.

As specimens of what the reader of the diary has in store for him, we quote almost at random a few of the thousand anecdotes of men well known, or whom this book will make so.

First, we happen upon a characteristic jest of Charles Lamb's. A jest and a gibe together we may call it, as many of Lamb's jests were, and as almost all of his serious jests were. "The Gentle Elia"—as he objected to being called—was seldom wholly himself unless he was somewhat ungentle. Clearness of insight was of the essence of his genius; and in his case clearness of insight was not counteracted by the creative power, the effect of whose activity it often is to withdraw its possessor from criticism, humorous or otherwise, or to give to criticism a mildness which hardly belongs to it. We may say, by the way, that justice is not often done to Lamb's extraordinary critical discernment. In the case of the friends with whom his lot was cast, and with whom we of to-day usually connect his name, his kindness generally led him into the temptation of giving undue praise. And in the case of the dead, his critical appreciation itself, unshared as it was by those around him, led him not into extravagances of laudation, but into laudation somewhat too unlimited. However, here is the jest we were to quote; and we may be sure that, to Lamb's mind, the little dig at Doctor Johnson was not the least of its recommendations:

"Some one, speaking of Shakespeare, mentioned his anachronism in which Hector speaks of Aristotle. 'That's what Johnson referred to,' said Lamb, 'when h wrote—

'And panting Time toils after him in vain!'"

Here are three notices of Mr. Benjamin Strutt, a friend of Mr. Robinson's in his early youth, and apparently a man of acuteness and wit. On one occasion he seems to have somewhat confused the mind of his young friend:

"Strutt was cynical, a free-thinker, I think an unbeliever. Yet one day he said something that implied he was a churchman. 'What!' I exclaimed, 'you a churchman!' He laughed: 'Let me give you a piece of advice, young man. Whatever you be through life, always be of the Act of Parliament faith."

On another occasion Mr. Strutt, using the true Johnsonian manner—a manner not so displeasing when it is a Johnson who uses it—spoke thus to Mr. Robinson, who had been making some commonplace remarks, to the effect that it was Mr. John Locke's principles that had produced the French Revolution:

"That's all nonsense; Locke's book was the effect, not the cause of the Revolution. People do not rebel and overset governments because they have any ideas about liberty and right, but because they are wretched, and cannot bear what they suffer. The new government employed Locke to justify what they had done, and to remove the scruples of weak, conscientious people."

Mr. Strutt only makes one more appearance in Mr. Robinson's diary, but that is an appearance not to his discredit. Our author says:

"I once saw him by accident in London a few years after I had left Mr. Francis. He was going to the opera; I mentioned that I had no ear for music, least of all for Italian music. 'Get it as soon as you can. You must one day love Italian music, either in this or another life. It is your business to get as much as you can here—for, as you leave off here, you must begin there.' This, if seriously said [adds Mr. Robinson in a rather queer, way], implied a sort of hope of immortality very much like that of Goethe."

Another obscure person, whom Mr. Robinson seems to have remembered with respect and with satisfaction, is a Mrs. Buller. What he says of her is of some value for its remarks on the character of George IV., and of more value as exhibiting the tact of Mr. Robinson, who very well knew the old lady's line of reading:

"About this time, July 2, 1812, my diary refers to the death of Mrs. Buller—of those who never in any way came before the public one of the most remarkable women whom I have ever known. She was a lady of family, belonging to the Bullers of Devonshire, and had lived always at Court. She said once, incidentally: 'The Prince Regent has, I believe, as high a regard for me as for any one—that is, none at all. He is incapable of friendship.' On politics and on the affairs of life she spoke with singular correctness and propriety. On matters of taste she was altogether antiquated. She was the friend of Mrs. Montague and Mrs. Carter. She showed me in her bookcase some bound quarto volumes, which she assured me consisted of a translation of Plato by herself, in her own hand. She was far advanced in years, and her death did not come upon her unexpectedly. Not many days before she died I called to make enquiries, and the servant, looking in a book and finding my name there, told me I was to be admitted. I found her pale as ashes, bolstered up in an arm-chair. She received me with a smile, and allowed me to touch her hand. 'What are you reading, Mr. Robinson?' she said. 'The wickedest, cleverest book in the English language, if you chance to know it.' 'I have known the "Fable of the Bees" more than fifty years.' She was right in her guess."

Lamb we see pretty constantly in these volumes, and in this passage we have some just criticism of his on two poems, and indirectly on two men, one of whom he has often been unjustly charged with liking, and the other of whom he has been as unjustly charged with thinking not worth attention. Nobody, of course, has ever thought of Lamb as "taking to" Byron, but there is a belief that he thought of Southey as a great poet—a belief which gets little confirmation from anything in this book. Robinson says:

"January 8th.—Went in the evening to Lamb. I have seldom spent a more agreeable few hours with him. He was serious and kind; his wit was subordinate to his judgment, as is usual in tête-à-tête parties. Speaking of Coleridge, he said: 'He ought not to have a wife or children; he should have a sort of diocesan care of the world—no parish duty.' Lamb reprobated the prosecution of Byron's 'Vision of Judgment.' Southey's poem of the same name is more worthy of punishment, for his has an arrogance beyond endurance. Lord Byron's satire is one of the most good-natured description—no malevolence."

Here is Lord Thurlow in an agreeable light:

"April 13th.—Dover lately lent me a very curious letter, written in 1757 by Thurlow to a Mr. Caldwell, who appears to have wanted his general advice how to annoy the parson of his parish. The letter fills several sheets, and is a laborious enumeration of statutes and canons, imposing an infinite variety of vexatious and burdensome duties on clergymen. Thurlow begins by saying: 'I have confined myself to consider how a parson lies obnoxious to the criminal laws of the land, both ecclesiastical and secular, upon account of his character and office, omitting those instances in which all men are equally liable.' And he terminates his review by a triumphant declaration: 'I hope my Lord Leicester will think, even by this short sketch, that I did not talk idly to him, when I said that parsons were so hemmed in by canons and statutes that they can hardly breathe, according to law, if they are strictly watched.'

"Scarcely any of the topics treated of have any interest, being for the most part technical: but after writing of the Statutes of Uniformity, especially 13th and 14th Ch. II. c. 64, he has this passage: 'I have mentioned these severe statutes and canons, because I have known many clergymen, and those of the best character, followers of Eusebius, who have, in the very face of all these laws, refused to read the Athanasian Creed. Considering the shocking absurdity of this creed, I should think it a cruel thing to punish anybody for not reading it but those who have sworn to read it, and who have great incomes for upholding that persuasion.'"

And here is tinkling Tommy Moore, whom we may, perhaps, forgive for being not much at his ease nor very much delighted among so many poor friends as he must have had in a company of which Coleridge, Wordsworth, and Lamb were constituent parts:

"April 4th.—Dined at Monkhouse's. Our party consisted of Wordsworth, Coleridge, Lamb, Moore, and Rogers. Five poets of very unequal worth and most disproportionate popularity, whom the public probably would arrange in a different order. During this afternoon Coleridge alone displayed any of his peculiar talent. I have not for years seen him in such excellent health and with so fine a flow of spirits. His discourse was addressed chiefly to Wordsworth, on points of metaphysical criticism—Rogers occasionally interposing a remark. The only one of the poets who seemed not to enjoy himself was Moore. He was very attentive to Coleridge, but seemed to relish Lamb, next to whom he was placed.

"Of this dinner an account is given in Moore's Life, which account is quoted in the Athenæum of April 23, 1853. Moore writes: 'April 4, 1823. Dined at Mr. Monkhouse's (a gentleman I had never seen before) on Wordsworth's invitation, who lives there whenever he comes to town. A singular party. Coleridge, Rogers, Wordsworth and wife, Charles Lamb (the hero at present of the London Magazine) and his sister (the poor woman who went mad in a diligence on the way to Paris), and a Mr. Robinson, one of the minora sidera of this constellation of the Lakes; the host himself, a Mæcenas of the school, contributing nothing but good dinners and silence. Charles Lamb, a clever fellow, certainly, but full of villanous and abortive puns, which he miscarries of every minute. Some excellent things, however, have come from him.' Charles Lamb is indeed praised by a word the most unsuitable imaginable, for he was by no means a clever man; and dear Mary Lamb, a woman of singular good sense, who, when really herself, and free from the malady that periodically assailed her, was quiet and judicious in an eminent degree. This admirable person is dryly noticed as 'the poor woman who went mad in a diligence,' etc. Moore is not to be blamed for this; they were strangers to him. The Athenæum reviewer, who quotes this passage from Moore, remarks, 'The tone is not to our liking,' and it is added, 'We should like to see Lamb's account.'"

But time fails us to do so much as mention by name the many celebrated people of whom Mr. Robinson speaks. We must leave it to his volumes themselves to tell our readers what he has to say of Goethe, and "Conversation Sharp," and Flaxman, and Schiller, and poor George Dyer, and Daniel Webster, and Tieck, and Capel Lofft, and Charles Greeley Loring, and Mrs. Stowe, and the Brownings, and Hazlitt, and John Wilkes, and Lord and Lady Byron, and Sir Humphry Davy, and John Wesley, and Voss, and Herder, and Irving, and Rogers, and Liston the comedian, and the Kembles and Keans, and Wellington, and Miss Coutts, and Amelia Opie, and Benjamin Disraeli, and "Tom Hill, the original Paul Pry," and Mr. Gladstone, and Joe Hume, and Grote, and Robert Hall, and Godwin, and Talfourd, and Romilly, and Erskine, and Mrs. Barbauld, and Queen Victoria, and Landor, and Thackeray, and Mrs. Austen, and, in short, nearly every English body who has been made known to us during a period beginning with the times before our Declaration of Independence and ending with—our own day, we were about to say, but Robinson at the last writes of men who will be carrying on the world's affairs a quarter of a century after his more elderly readers are dead and gone.

A LIBRARIAN ON FREE LIBRARIES.*

Mr. Edwards's title may raise some false hopes among those who have town libraries in charge. His work exhibits considerable research, and is very interesting; but it will give librarians little practical assistance. For the greater part of his space is devoted to the history of town libraries, and the lessons to be drawn from this history in regard to certain great questions of management, such as whether it is the better policy to provide books or building first—(books first, is the answer); whether there should be any payment on the part of readers who desire greater privileges than are granted to the general public—(our author would have no such combination of a free and a subscription library); whether any voucher should be exacted from applicants for the loan of books—(which he answers in the affirmative), and from applicants for admission to the reading-room—(to which he says No). But even these questions are hardly discussed; and the librarian who buys the expensive book hoping to learn what form of building will best accommodate the books, the officers, and the public; whether to support the shelves by pegs or ratchets; how high the tables should be; how to plan such conveniences of desk or book-stand as it will be well to add to the tables; what form of ledger or of ticket is best adapted for charging books and for preparing the catalogue; and—not the least perplexing question—what rules to follow in cataloguing; where to buy books, and what discount to expect from the booksellers; whether to cover the books, and how to bind them when the cloth binding is worn out; what other processes a book must go through before it can be taken out—the librarian, we say, seeking assistance on these points will find no dimensions, no details, nothing but the most general hints. Mr. Edwards says of the recently erected library at Grenoble: "It is, I believe, one of the extremely small number of library buildings which have been mainly designed by a librarian. The plans are said to exhibit—as, under such circumstances, they plainly ought to do—unusual closeness of adaptation to the end in view." After this praise, it is rather provoking not to be told what the plans are.

The chief interest of Mr. Edwards's book lies in his account of the difficulties with which the promoters of free libraries have struggled in England, and of the wonderful success and efficiency of the libraries when once established. The usual resistance of townsmen to new things, their natural disinclination to increase their taxes, and an inability to appreciate the advantages of providing reading for clerks, artisans, servants, mill-operatives, have thrown every obstacle in the way. During the eighteen years which have elapsed since the first Library Act was passed, only thirty-four towns of the United Kingdom have availed themselves of its provisions and of those of the second and better act, which allowed a rate of a penny in the pound. Those thirty-four towns, however, have accumulated more than 420,000 volumes, and the average annual issues already amount to 2,938,000 volumes—Fiction heading the list, and the classes next in order being respectively History and Biography, Voyages and Travels, Sciences and Arts, Philosophy, Politics, and Law.

* "Free Town Libraries: their Formation, Management, and History in Britain, France, Germany, and America. Together with Brief Notices of Book-Collectors and of the Respective Places of Deposit of their Surviving Collections. By Edward Edwards." New York: John Wiley & Son. London: Trübner & Co. 1869.

There are some interesting questions which Mr. Edwards does not touch upon; to which, in fact, it would be very difficult to get any but a conjectural answer. What, after all, is the good accomplished by the circulation of these three millions of volumes? It cannot have been without effect. Has it merely amused, or has it, as is claimed, educated, refined, civilized the readers? Is not mere amusement, if innocent, a good in itself which there is more danger of our underestimating than overestimating? Is the effect in any proportion to the trouble, and cost, and blowing of trumpets? How much have these books stimulated the nascent ability of future writers or artists? how much have they helped the artisan in his work? how much political—and domestic—economy have they taught? how much contentment have they fostered? how much pleasure and relief from weariness or anxiety have they given? how many empty hours have they filled that would have been worse occupied, preventing visits to low resorts by supplying better and cheaper amusement? These results we cannot tabulate; we cannot even ascertain them accurately. Sociologists should attempt to find answers; statisticians could make little of them.

The account of American libraries is not very satisfactory; indeed, none can be till the publication of the next census. Our town libraries do not in their annual reports generally give such detailed statistics of their issues as the English. It is to be hoped that in 1870 questions will be put and answers obtained on many more points than satisfied our last census-takers; that we shall not only know how many volumes there are, but get at least an approximate estimate of the amount of their use. The war checked the formation of new libraries and the growth of the old; but since its close the stock of books accessible to the public must have greatly increased. In 1850, it was nearly four millions, in ten thousand libraries; in 1860, eight and a half millions, in nearly twenty thousand libraries; and in 1870, it may be from twelve to fifteen millions in twenty-five thousand libraries.

The last third of Mr. Edwards's book is filled by an alphabetical list of 1,120 book collectors, giving usually the date of death, the name of the library to which the collections went, and a brief statement of the circumstances of the acquisition. It is full of curious anecdotes of the book-lovers of the last four centuries, and will be useful as a work of reference. Of course, a first attempt at such a compilation cannot be complete—is not likely to be even accurate. In a second edition, Mr. Edwards would do well to add the name of John Harvard, whose books formed the nucleus of the first library in America, and the names of two of its subsequent benefactors—Rev. Theophilus Gale, whose "Court of the Gentiles" was famous in its day, and John Lightfoot, the great Rabbinical scholar. Nor ought he to omit three men, a part, or the whole, of whose collections are now in the library of the Divinity School at Cambridge—Dr. Francis Parkman, Dr. Convers Francis, and Prof. Friedrich Lücke. Mr. Edwards's Henry William Wales should be Henry Ware Wales. All these facts could have been ascertained by examination of documents which are in the British Museum, but Mr. Edwards complains of the inconvenience of the catalogues of that library, and apparently found such researches as he made sufficiently tedious. The same excuse could not be pleaded for the omission of fourteen out of seventeen names of collectors elsewhere mentioned by himself (pp. 228–230). Again, the four names on pp. 256, 257, and eight out of the nine on p. 249, are not given in the alphabetical list. In fact, our author does not appear to have thought of making use in the second part of the work of his own thorough researches in the first. It is a pity, too, that the list is deformed by the very unscholarlike practice of giving all Christian names in the English form, as Lewis Ariosto, John Boccaccio, Peter Séguier, Leonard of Vinci! With the older names this is not very offensive, for our fathers Anglicized freely; but, if he is following the ancient usage, he should write John Bocace, as he writes Francis Petrarch. And in the modern names, it is unendurable; for our fathers' practice is wholly obsolete—or we had thought so till Mr. Edwards's attempt at reviving it. Who ever heard, or ever will hear, except from Mr. Edwards, of John Mary Quérard?

SEMI-CRITICAL OLD TESTAMENT COMMENTARIES.*

